Hebrew understandings of death and the afterlife were transformed under Greek and Roman influence beginning in the fourth century B.C. Following a well-worn OT path, Ben Sira affirms the creation of human beings from the earth and their return to the earth at death (Sir 16:30; 17:1; 40:1, 11; 41:10), highlights the inevitability of death (Sir 14:12-19), and denies human immortality (Sir 17:30; 44:9). Others were pulled in other directions, however, with the result that theological development in this period gave rise to numerous beliefs about the nature of the afterlife. A few examples must suffice. Daniel's claim that, in the resurrection, "the wise will shine like the brightness of the sky" and "those who lead many to righteousness, like the stars" (Dan 12:3) may itself reflect Greek influence in that his simile seems to take its departure from the idea of astral immortality one finds in Greek literature. Jubilees represents Hellenistic influence in its picture of corpses at rest in the earth but spirits enjoying happiness (Jub. 23:31). The Wisdom of Solomon, the works of Philo, and the writings of Josephus, too, bear witness to a Platonic notion of the soul's immortality. (We would be mistaken, however, to accept uncritically the view *Josephus espouses that, as a "philosophical school," the Pharisees likewise held to the soul's immortality; his tendency to paint the Pharisees in his own image is increasingly recognized [cf. Elledge].) 2 Maccabees 7 reflects belief in a bodily resurrection. 1 Enoch portrays Sheol as a place of detention, with four different chambers, one for each class of the dead, where people await final judgment. The Apocalypse of Zephaniah pictures Hades as the place of punishment for the wicked, visible from heaven, with the two, heaven and Hades, separated by a river, and the wicked appearing as embodied persons, even possessing hair (Apoc. Zeph. 10:12-14). In Testament of Abraham 11 we read of two gates, one for the righteous who enter Paradise (or heaven, T. Ab. 20:12), the other for sinners destined for destruction and eternal punishment, with judgment occurring at the very moment of death.

These views of the afterlife cannot be organized along a spectrum, as though they represent different points along a continuum. Like the stars in the sky, they form instead a constellation of beliefs. This means that, when we turn to the Gospels, we cannot depend on "prevailing Jewish beliefs" to guide interpretation; there were no "prevailing beliefs," apart from general belief in an afterlife and the all-important claim that one's experience in the afterlife would be a reflection of one's conformity to Torah in the present. The not-insignificant exception to these beliefs was, of course, the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection and, with it, the idea of rewards and punishments in the afterlife (cf. Josephus, J.W. 2.165; Ant. 18.66; Mt 22:23; Mk 12:18; Lk 20:27; Acts 23:8). According to the Gospels, Jesus shared the more generally accepted Jewish belief in the afterlife and its association with the need to rebalance the scales of justice on the other side of death. If this last claim pervades the Gospels, however, it does so in sometimes surprising ways.

3. The Gospels and the Afterlife.

3.1. Matthew. More than the other evangelists, Matthew is concerned about the final *judgment, though not as a matter of speculation. Judgment, which concerns people both in and outside the church, is the moment when the righteous are distinguished from the unrighteous. Accordingly, judgment serves for Matthew as an impetus for hearing and doing God's will (see Mt 7:21-29). This is not because Matthew subscribes to a kind of "works-righteousness," as though one might be regarded as righteous on account of one's performance. Matthew's images are more organic. As a good tree bears good fruit and a bad tree bears bad fruit, so righteous people display in their day-to-day lives their covenant faithfulness before God (see Mt 7:15-20; 12:33). Those who align themselves with the kingdom behave in ways ("produce fruit"; see Mt 3:8; 21:43) that reflect their allegiance to the king. Those who do not produce good fruit are destroyed (Mt 3:10; 7:19; 13:40, 42).

Matthew uses the term geenna seven times, once with reference to people whose lives are inspired by "hell" (Mt 23:15), but otherwise with reference to the "hell" of eschatological condemnation (Mt 5:22, 29, 30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:33). Matthew 10:28 is interesting for its unusual portrait of the afterlife: "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Instead, be afraid of the one who can destroy both body and soul in hell.” This is not an example of Jesus’ adopting a Platonic view of the soul separated from the body, left to decompose in the ground; both body and soul are in hell. Matthean usage more broadly suggests that in this instance “soul” (psychē) refers to the inner aliveness of a person rather than a separate entity or “true self.” Matthew thus bears witness to a martyr theology according to which persecutors may torture the body, but only God has power over a person’s life. How is this so? The answer lies in the resurrection: God raises the dead! Concerning those who do not maintain faithfulness in the midst of persecution, however, God is capable of relegating them to Gehenna.

Expanding on the language of Gehenna (see 1 above), Matthew can portray final judgment in fiery terms (Mt 3:10, 12; 5:22; 7:19; 13:40, 42, 50; 18:8, 9; 25:41), signifying destruction in an all-consuming fire that is sometimes described as unquenchable or eternal. The concept of hell is also associated with anguished distress with the phrase “weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Mt 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30).

At several points, the outcome of the final judgment is shockingly unexpected, such as when “the heirs of the kingdom will be thrown into the outer darkness” while people from around the world, *Gentiles among them, join *Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the end-time banquet (Mt 8:11-12). Those inside the community of Jesus’ followers are vulnerable too, and must maintain faithful vigilance (cf. Mt 18:6-14; 25:1-30). In fact, only in the final judgment will it become clear who are “children of the kingdom” and who are “children of the evil one” (Mt 13:36-43, 47-50). Nowhere is this motif more transparent than in the scene Jesus paints in Matthew 25:31-46, where both the blessed and the cursed seem perplexed by the basis of final judgment. It would be difficult to find a stronger affirmation that righteous behavior is not the product of a moral calculus designed to attract divine attention, but rather an organic outgrowth of one’s allegiance to the ways of the king (for the history of interpretation, see Gray).

3.2. Mark. Mark devotes little attention to heaven and hell. References to hell are concentrated at the end of Mark 9, where Jesus warns his followers to set aside whatever might cause one to stumble in one’s faith (Mk 9:43-48). Borrowing from Isaiah 66:24 (cf. Jud 16:17; Sir 7:17), he associates those who stumble in their faith with God’s enemies, and paints hell with images of deplorable death and decomposition:

“their worm never dies, and the fire is never put out” (Mk 9:48). Mark thus uses dreadful images of end-time judgment to motivate unreserved allegiance to God. Life with God in the world to come is “eternal life”—that which the rich man wanted to obtain, but which demanded heavenly treasures, namely, renunciation of his possessions and giving all to the poor, as well as joining the band of Jesus’ followers (Mk 10:17-30). In debate with the *Sadducees, Jesus grounds his belief in the resurrection in his belief in the living, faithful God (Ex 3:6), and observes that, in the afterlife, people, like angels, will not marry (Mk 12:18-27; likewise Mt 22:23-33). Luke will draw out this simile further by noting that, like angels, people in the age to come will not die (Lk 20:27-40).

3.3. Luke. Luke is distinguished from the other Gospels primarily with respect to what J. Dupont has called Luke’s “individual eschatology,” that is, his concern with the fate of the individual at death. This motif comes into special focus in two texts: Luke 16:19-31; 23:43 (cf. also Lk 12:16-21).

In its narrative setting, Jesus’ story of the rich man and *Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31) is his reply to the *Pharisees who questioned his fidelity to the *law (Lk 16:14-18) (see Green, 98-112). The purpose of the story then, is to demonstrate Jesus’ faithfulness and the Pharisee’s duplicity vis-à-vis the law. At one level, the story concerns wealth and its manifestations: a wealthy man engages in conspicuous consumption without regard for a beggar who resides at his gate, that is, for someone who is quite literally his “neighbor” (Lk 16:19-21; cf. Lk 10:29-37). The rich and poor then experience the eschatological reversal announced in Luke 6:20-25. On another level, the story centers on the case of a wealthy man who realizes too late that he has ignored the words of Moses and the prophets concerning the poor (Lk 16:31).

The stage is set by an extravagant parallelism. The two main characters are distanced from each other in this life and the next. The rich man is outrageously affluent, while Lazarus is expendable. Both die, but the rich man is buried whereas Lazarus apparently is not. Immediately, then, the rich man appears in Hades, and Lazarus at Abraham’s side. Lazarus is in a state of bliss while the wealthy man is tormented in Hades. In this case, then, Hades is not simply a waiting area in preparation for final judgment. Lazarus already shares in Abraham’s celebrated hospitality and participates in the heavenly banquet (see Lk 11:22-30), and the rich man is now suffering in Hades. Continuity of personal identity is obvious, the relationship between the character of one’s earthly life and the nature of one’s experience in the afterlife is highlighted, and these characters act as human agents with corporeal existence (who can thirst, speak and, presumably, fetch water)—all while earthly life continues (Lk 16:27-31).

Among the Gospels, Luke alone records the exchange between the two criminals and Jesus at the scene of their crucifixion (Lk 23:40-43). The first criminal *blasphemes Jesus, whereas the second demonstrates surprising insight into Jesus' identity. Our interest is in Jesus' reply to the second criminal, "I assure you that today you will be with me in Paradise," and especially the two words "today" and "Paradise." Although it is grammatically possible that "today" could be read with "I assure you," its function as an adverb to denote when the criminal will join Jesus in Paradise is assured by Luke's well-documented concern with the immediacy of salvation (e.g., Lk 4:21; 19:9). And, since "paradise" connotes the end-time dwelling of the righteous with God (see 1 above), Jesus promises an immediate transfer to life in God's presence.

In neither of these Lukan texts do we find testimony to support the notion of an "intermediate state," that is, the presumption of the passing of time between one's death and the final judgment. If this appears to stand in tension with other NT texts, especially Pauline, that recommend the passage of time from death to the end (e.g., 1 Thess 4:16-17), this could be because we are faced with two divergent biblical traditions. Alternatively, this passing of time could be a matter of perspective: the participation of the dead in the movement from this life to the next versus the perception of time by those who bury their dead and await the eschaton. If the dead experience eternity with God, then there is good basis for imagining that they are not governed by the passing of time as we experience it (see Thiselton).

3.4. John. John never mentions hell or Hades. Moreover, for John, heaven is God's domain from which Jesus has come and to which he will return; heaven is not used in references to the afterlife. For this, John turns especially to the language of "life" itself, including the phrase "eternal life." For John's Gospel, "eternal life is . . . a continuation into the future of a reality granted and experienced here, of which faith is already a constituent element" (Thompson, 46). This faith is expressed in faithfulness, that is, in remaining or abiding—"his word abiding in you," the Spirit's abiding in you, "abiding in Jesus," "abiding in love" (Jesus' and the Father's) (Jn 5:38; 6:56; 14:17; 15:1-10). What of those who do not believe? "God's wrath remains on them" (Jn 3:36).

This is not to say that for John the end can be collapsed into the present, however. John 5:25-29 anticipates the resurrection in words reminiscent of Daniel 12:1-3. The *Son of Man will execute judgment, the graves will give up their dead, "those who have done good to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation" (Jn 5:29). In John 11:25-26, Jesus (who is "the resurrection and the life") explains that those who enjoy eternal life in the present will live even if they die, on account of the resurrection.

See also BLESSING AND WOE; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS OF JESUS; JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; LIFE, ETERNAL LIFE; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Alexander, "The Old Testament View of Life After Death," Themelios 11 (1986) 41-46; K. L. Anderson, 'But God Raised Him from the Dead': The Theology of Jesus' Resurrection in Luke-Acts (PBM; Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2006); R. Bauckham, The Fate of the Dead: Studies on the Jewish and Christian Apocalypses (NovTSup 93; Leiden: Brill, 1998a); idem, "Life, Death, and the Afterlife in Second Temple Judaism," in Life in the Face of Death: The Resurrection Message in the New Testament, ed. Richard N. Longenecker (MNTS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998b) 80-95; D. I. Block, "Beyond the Grave: Ezekiel's Vision of Death and Afterlife," BBR 2 (1992) 113-41; J. Dupont, "Die individuelle Eschatologie im Lukasevangelium und in der Apostelgeschichte," in Orientierung an Jesus: Zur Theologie der Synoptiker, ed. P. Hoffman (Freiburg: Herder, 1973) 37-47; C. D. Elledge, Life After Death in Early Judaism: The Evidence of Josephus (WUNT 2/208; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); S. W. Gray, The Least of My Brothers (Matthew 25:31-46): A History of Interpretation (SBLDS 114; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); J. B. Green, "Narrative Criticism," in Methods for Luke, ed. J. B. Green (MBI; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010) 74-112; P. S. Johnston, Shades of Sheol: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); A. T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet: Studies in the Role of the Heavenly Dimension in Paul's Thought with Special Reference to His Eschatology (SNTSMS 43; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981); S. B. Marrow, "ΑΘΑΝΑΣΙΑ/ΑΝΑΣΤΑΣΙΣ: The Road Not Taken," NTS 45 (1999) 571-86; B. C. Ollenburger, "If Mortals Die, Will They Live Again? The Old Testament and Resurrection," ExAud 9 (1993) 29-44; C. Setzer, Resurrection of the Body in Early Judaism and Early Christianity: Doctrine, Community, and Self-Definition (Boston: Brill, 2004); A. C. Thiselton, Life After Death: A New Approach to the Last Things (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2012); M. Meye Thompson, “Eternal Life in the Gospel of John,” ExAud 5 (1989) 35–55; N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (COQG 3; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003). J. B. Green

HEBREW LANGUAGE. See LANGUAGES OF PALESTINE.

HELLENISM

A controversial term, Hellenism typically denotes the presence of Greek culture. The period following Alexander the Great is frequently referred to as the “Hellenistic age,” during which time elements of Greek culture exerted widespread and long-lasting influence over much of the Mediterranean region, including Palestine. The fact that the NT Gospels were composed in Greek is testimony to the Hellenization of much of the ancient Mediterranean world.

1. Defining Hellenism
2. Hellenism and Judaism
3. Hellenism and the Gospels

1. Defining Hellenism.

1.1. Hellenism in Antiquity. The concept of Hellenism is difficult to define. The English word Hellenism derives from the Greek hellēnismos, yet both ancient and contemporary sources employ the term in a variety of ways. At one level, Hellenism has to do with the ethnic and cultural construct of “Greekness.” Thus, the fifth-century B.C. historian Herodotus records a speech from an Athenian delegation that identifies as one of the reasons for their failure to come to terms with the Persian Xerxes the Athenians’ own “Greekness” (to hellēnikon), defined in terms of “common blood, common language, altars of gods and sacrifices shared in common, and common ways of life” (Herodotus, Hist. 8.144.2 [cf. Isocrates, Paneg. 50]). Here Hellenic identity is depicted as shared kinship, language, religion and culture (see Hall).

The verb hellēnizō (“to Hellenize”) is found in Greek literature as early as Thucydides’ History of the Peloponnesian War, where the historian employs the term to indicate that the Amphilochean Argives “were first Hellenized, with respect to the language they presently speak, by their Ambrakiot fellow-settlers” (kai hellēnisthētan tēn nyn glōssan tote prōton apo tōn Amprakiotōn xynoikēsantōn) (Thucydides, Pel. 2.68.5). The wording here may imply that the verb hellēnizō typically meant something more than facility in the Greek language, given the emphasis on the fact that the Amphilochean Argives were Hellenized “with respect to the language they presently speak.” This would suggest that Thucydides interprets hellēnizō as a broader cultural, not merely linguistic, phenomenon. Alternatively, perhaps hellēnizō did primarily designate the ability to speak Greek, and Thucydides simply qualifies that “the present language” (tēn nyn glōssan) of the Amphilochean Argives is Greek. Frequently in later literature the verb hellēnizō does refer to the ability to speak, write or understand the Greek language (e.g., Plato, Prot. 328; Xenophon, Anab. 7.3.25; Lucian, Philops. 16; Chariton, Chaer. 4.5; cf. Acts 21:37). According to the first-century B.C. Roman philosopher Cicero, Aristotle’s student Theophrastus (ca. 371–287 B.C.) employed the cognate noun hellēnismos in the sense of purity or grammatical correctness in Greek prose, one of the four virtues of rhetoric (Cicero, Orat. 79). Yet just here the issue becomes complicated, for the understanding of language is closely tied to some degree of acculturation.

The most influential use of the noun hellēnismos in ancient literature, however, is found in 2 Macc 4:13, where it refers to the adoption of foreign customs by Jason, the high priest in Jerusalem in the years 175–172 B.C. Jason’s name itself is revealing, for the Jewish historian Josephus reports that Jason changed his name from “Jesus/Joshua” (Gk. Iēsous, Heb. Yēhōshua), presumably because of a desire to appear more “Greek” (Josephus, Ant. 12.239). According to the author of 2 Maccabees, during his time as high priest Jason instituted an aggressive plan to “Hellenize” the city of Jerusalem. This “climax of Hellenization” (akmē tis hellēnismou), as the author of 2 Maccabees puts it, included the establishment of a gymnasium and an ephēbeion that kept priests away from the sanctuary (2 Macc 4:9, 12)—an attack on traditional ways of living according to the law (2 Macc 4:11)—and encouragement for young men in Jerusalem to adopt a Greek style of dress (2 Macc 4:12). In short, 2 Maccabees frames “Hellenism” as equivalent to “the Greek way of life” (to hellēnikos charaktēr [2 Macc 4:10]) and to the adoption of foreign customs (allophylisomos [2 Macc 4:13]).

This negative characterization of “Hellenism” in 2 Maccabees is established in contrast to ioudaismos (“Judaism” [2 Macc 2:21; 8:1; 14:38; cf. 4 Macc 4:26; Gal 1:13–14]), the latter of which is bravely defended by the heroes of the narrative. The author of 2 Maccabees, writing shortly after the events of the Hasmonean uprising against the Selucid king Antiochus IV (and no later than 124 B.C.), is therefore responsible for the construction of “Hellenism” and “Judaism”* as antinomies. In this context, hellēnismos is a term that denotes a culture that is foreign and hostile to “Judaism.” In fact, the author of 2 Maccabees may have coined the term ioudaismos in this context to function as the polar opposite of hellēnismos. Interestingly, however, the book of 2 Maccabees itself is deeply shaped by Greek culture, for the text is a summary of a five-volume account of the Maccabean crisis written in Greek, following numerous conventions of Greek historiography, by a Diaspora Jew, Jason of Cyrene (see 2 Macc 2:19–28). The relationship between “Hellenism” and “Judaism,” therefore, is far more complex than the ideological construction of these entities as polar opposites would suggest.

1.2. Hellenism in the Modern Period. Although the term Hellenism is found in modern literature as early as the seventeenth century, it was the three-volume work of the German historian J. G. Droysen, Geschichte des Hellenismus (1836–1843), that first claimed the existence of a discrete historical time period known as the “Hellenistic age.” Reflecting a Hegelian philosophy of history, Droysen argued that the dawn of Hellenism in the activity and aftermath of Alexander the Great overcame the particularism of local Greek tribes and city-states by establishing a universal language, culture and political system. For Droysen, Hellenismus was a technical historiographical term that denoted the period of time from Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.) until the beginning of Roman Imperial rule after the Battle of Actium (31 B.C.). The mixture of Greek and Oriental culture in the Hellenistic age, therefore, became a transitional period that bridged the way from classical paganism to the emergence of Christianity as a universal religion. Significantly, Judaism played almost no role in Droysen’s historical reconstruction (see Momigliano).

Although “Hellenistic age” is still conventionally used to designate the period 323–31 B.C., there are at least two problems with Droysen’s understanding of Hellenismus. First, Greek culture itself was far from homogeneous, yet discussions of “Hellenism” often take place as if there were a pure strain of Greek culture diffused by Alexander and his followers throughout the eastern Mediterranean. More often than not, “Greek” culture in non-Greek regions was a blend of Hellenic and local elements. Second, and related, Greek engagement with, and fascination regarding, other civilizations from Egypt to Palestine to Persia predates the rise of Alexander the Great by a significant period of time, and cultural influence ran from both west to east and east to west (see Vasunia). Therefore, any model of “Hellenization” that focuses solely on the spread of Greek culture to passive recipients of cultural conquest misses the fact that “when Alexander carried Greek culture to the Near East some of his cultural baggage may have originated there” (Alexander, 70). That is not to deny the enduring legacy of Alexander the Great, for the Greek military conquests of the fourth century B.C. did shape the Mediterranean region in novel and profound ways. It is simply to note that the cultural fusion known as “Hellenism” has historical roots that antedate the “Hellenistic age.”

Broadly, therefore, “Hellenism” refers to the presence of Greek culture. More specifically, Hellenism denotes “the common urban culture in the eastern Mediterranean, founded on the Greek language . . . typically expressed in certain political and educational institutions and largely maintained by the social élite” (Barclay, 88). Thus, “Hellenism” is found where elements of Greek language, political structures, educational patterns, religious practices and other material cultural markers (e.g., dress, architecture, food, pottery) are present.

It may be helpful, however, to draw a distinction between the closely related terms Hellenism and Hellenization. If “Hellenism” refers to the presence of Greek culture or the cultural environment of the Mediterranean world in antiquity, “Hellenization” designates the process of engagement between Greek and local cultures, a process that occurred on many different levels. Occasionally this engagement was (or was perceived as) intentional and hostile, as is claimed in the depiction in 2 Maccabees of the imposition (by Jews, it must be noted) of a dominant, foreign culture upon a local context. More frequently, however, the engagement between Greek and local cultures reflected a balanced, and often unacknowledged, cultural fusion. G. W. Bowersock, for example, has made the case that “Hellenization” is a problematic term because it reflects modern notions of cultural imperialism largely absent in antiquity. Even explicit interaction with imperial power often entailed careful negotiation and dialogue rather than domination (so Ma). “Hellenization” should be retained only if it is clear that the process that it describes was mostly unforced, reflecting a Hellenistic culture that included and tolerated a great deal of cultural diversity. In contrast, the parallel but clearly distinct term “Romanization”—that is, the engagement between Roman and local cultures—reflects much greater levels of political and cultural imperialism.

2. Hellenism and Judaism.

2.1. Introduction. Like all other peoples of the ancient Mediterranean world, Jews engaged with Hellenistic culture. As we have seen, however, a sharp dichotomy has often been drawn, pitting Judaism against Hellenism. The Judaism-Hellenism divide, reflected in an ancient source such as 2 Maccabees, often has been used in modern times to identify Judaism (negatively) with particularism and nonrational thought, on the one hand, and Hellenism (positively) with universalism and rationality, on the other. For example, according to F. C. Baur, the leading representative of the nineteenth-century Tübingen school, the early Christian movement was characterized by an ideological conflict between Jewish Christianity, on the one side, and the "Hellenists," on the other. The former group represented "the cramping and narrowing influence of the Jewish national Messianic idea," whereas the liberalizing tendencies of the latter group of Greek-speaking Jews paved the way for the universalism of Pauline/Gentile Christianity (Baur, 1:49). Aside from this negative caricature, the Judaism-Hellenism divide remains an entrenched concept in modern scholarship. It remains an open question, however, whether Judaism and Hellenism should be set in sharp opposition to one another.

2.2. Diaspora and Palestinian Judaism. Jews from the Diaspora, especially in large cities such as Alexandria, Cyrene and Antioch, lived in environments pervaded by Greek culture. For Diaspora Jews, Greek was the primary language. This situation led to the production of Greek translations of the Hebrew Scriptures, a process that probably started as early as the third-century B.C. in Alexandria, Egypt (so Letter of Aristeas). Many Diaspora Jews were well integrated into the social, political and educational structures of their local contexts. Philo of Alexandria, for example, offers a fascinating example of a thoroughly Hellenized Jew who employed his considerable intellectual abilities and his familiarity with the Greek philosophical tradition in the service of his Jewish community. Other well-educated Diaspora Jews produced literature in Greek, including historical fiction (Joseph and Aseneth, Letter of Aristeas, LXX Esther, 3 Maccabees, 4 Maccabees), poetry (Philo the Epic Poet, Sibylline Oracles), philosophy (Aristobulus, Philo), historiography (Demetrius the Chronicler, Artapanus, Jason of Cyrene) and wisdom literature (Wisdom of Solomon).

A lively debate regarding the extent of Hellenization in Palestine from the third century B.C. to the first century A.D. has resulted in two opposing perspectives. On the one hand, the influential work of M. Hengel claims a significant amount of Hellenization in Palestine from the end of the Persian period to the rise of the Maccabean revolt. Hengel himself is reacting against the view that a sharp distinction could be drawn between Hellenistic Judaism and Palestinian (or "traditional") Judaism. Hengel marshals evidence for a substantial Greek influence on Jewish politics, language, education and literature in Palestine from the time of Alexander the Great to the Maccabees, concluding, "From about the middle of the third century BC all Judaism must really be designated 'Hellenistic Judaism' in the strict sense" (Hengel, 1:104).

On the other hand, critics of Hengel contend that he has overstated the Hellenization of Palestine in the pre-Maccabean era (see Feldman). For example, although it is true that some Palestinian Jews were Hellenized with respect to language, it is not so clear that the Greek language made inroads among the non-elites to the extent that Hengel assumes. More substantively, Hengel appears to treat Hellenization as an either-or proposition, as something to be rejected or accepted, without acknowledging that an individual or a group might be Hellenized to different degrees and in different ways. Thus, the antinomy between Judaism and Hellenism first seen in 2 Maccabees still characterizes much scholarship today.

3. Hellenism and the Gospels.

The foregoing discussion suggests that the question of the presence of "Hellenism" in the canonical Gospels is inherently complex, and that an answer to the question depends to a large degree on the definition of "Hellenism" employed. In some discussions there has been a tendency to categorize all "non-Jewish" elements in the Gospels as examples of Hellenism, but such a strategy ignores not only the fluid interaction of Jewish and Hellenistic culture but also the impact of non-Greek (e.g., Roman) culture.

At the same time, the abiding impact of Greek culture did not end with the emergence of Roman imperial power. The most obvious influence of Greek culture on the NT Gospels is found in the language of their composition, namely, the Koinē ("common") Greek spoken widely throughout the eastern Mediterranean region. Koinē not only was the lingua franca of the Gospel writers; it was also the language of the LXX, the Greek translation of the Jewish Scriptures, which is most commonly the source of OT quotations in the Gospels. Given the bilingual context of Roman Palestine, it is possible that Jesus possessed the ability to converse in Greek, although his first language was Aramaic (see Languages of Palestine). Moreover, the literary genre of the Gospels is perhaps best identified as Greco-Roman biography, a form of literature popular in the Greek literary tradition (see Gospel: Genre). At the same time, because the Gospels have much in common with biblical historiography, their literary genre itself bears witness to the dynamic engagement between Greek and Jewish culture.

Finally, mention should be made of the Hellenistic context of Jesus' mission in *Galilee. On the one hand, it has often been claimed that the region of Galilee was thoroughly Hellenized, particularly to the extent that it contained a large Gentile population. On the other hand, a growing body of literature suggests that Galilee was far less Hellenized than other regions of the Greco-Roman world. Archaeological evidence, for example, points to the strong presence of Jewish material culture in Galilee (e.g., ritual baths, Hasmonean coins) and only minimal Roman and Greek influence in the first century (Chancey). Certainly there were some non-Jews residing in the Galilee of Jesus' day (Mt 8:5-13; Lk 7:1-10), but the Gentile population in the region seems to have been a small minority, and interaction with Gentiles does not seem to have been a significant aspect of Jesus' mission.

See also GENTILES; GODS, GREEK AND ROMAN; JUDAISM, COMMON; ROME.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, "Hellenism and Hellenization as Problematic Historiographical Categories," in Paul Beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide, ed. T. Engberg-Pedersen (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001) 63-80; J. M. G. Barclay, Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora: From Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE-117 CE) (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996); F. C. Baur, The Church History of the First Three Centuries, trans. A. Menzies (3rd ed.; 2 vols.; London: Williams & Norgate, 1878-1879); G. W. Bowersock, Hellenism in Late Antiquity (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1990); M. Chancey, The Myth of a Gentile Galilee (SNTSMS 118; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); J. J. Collins and G. E. Sterling, eds., Hellenism in the Land of Israel (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2001); L. H. Feldman, Judaism and Hellenism Reconsidered (JSJSup 107; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); E. Gruen, Heritage and Hellenism: The Reinvention of Jewish Tradition (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998); E. Hall, Inventing the Barbarian: Greek Self-Definition Through Tragedy (OCM; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991); M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); L. I. Levine, Judaism and Hellenism in Antiquity (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1998); J. Ma, Antiochus III and the Cities of Western Asia Minor (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000);

A. D. Momigliano, "J. G. Droysen Between Greeks and Jews," in Essays in Ancient and Modern Historiography (Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1977) 307-24; I. S. Moyer, Egypt and the Limits of Hellenism (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2011); T. Rajak, The Jewish Dialogue with Greece and Rome: Studies in Cultural and Social Interaction (Boston: E. J. Brill, 2001); P. Vasunia, The Gift of the Nile: Hellenizing Egypt from Aeschylus to Alexander (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001).

D. Downs

HEROD. See HERODIAN DYNASTY.

HERODIAN DYNASTY

The Herods formed an important part of the political setting of Jesus' ministry. Several of them are mentioned in the Gospels, along with a group known as the "Herodians."

1. Sources
2. Origins of the Dynasty
3. Herod I
4. Archelaus
5. Philip the Tetrarch
6. Antipas, Herodias, Salome
7. Herodians

1. Sources.

Aside from a few references in Greco-Roman writers, the Gospels and later Christian authors, most of our information on the Herods comes from *Josephus (Josephus, J.W. 1—2; Ant. 14—18). Although he had his own agenda (Jewish War is much more positive toward the Herods than is Jewish Antiquities), Josephus drew on good sources. Remains of Herod I's buildings and several coins supplement the literary accounts.

2. Origins of the Dynasty.

The Herods originated in Idumea, a region subjugated and forcibly converted to *Judaism in 127 B.C. Herod I's grandfather Antipas was appointed stratēgos (military governor) of Idumea, but it was his resourceful son Antipater who secured the family's fortunes by supporting Hyrcanus II in the civil war after the death of Salome Alexandra. Following Pompey's intervention in 63 B.C., the land was put under the control of the Syrian governor and forced to pay tribute, with a drastically reduced Jewish territory given to Hyrcanus. A decade and a half later, in return for supporting Julius Caesar in the Roman civil wars, Hyrcanus was confirmed as ethnarchēs (national ruler) and high priest, while Antipater was rewarded with Roman citizenship, exemption from taxes, and the post of epitropos (chancellor of the exchequer) (Josephus, J.W. 1.187-194; Ant. 14.127-137, 143). Antipater was already the power behind the Hasmonean throne, but his son Herod (born in the late 70s B.C.) would oust them completely.

3. Herod I.

Herod became stratēgos (military governor) of *Galilee at the age of twenty-five (Josephus, J.W. 1.203; Ant. 14.158). His natural abilities and unwavering loyalty brought him to the attention of several prominent Romans who were in a position to advance his career. He used the Roman civil wars to his advantage, and by 42 B.C. Mark Antony had raised him to the level of tetrarchēs (ruler of a quarter of a kingdom) (Josephus, J.W. 1.242-244; Ant. 14.324-326). Two years later, however, the Parthians invaded and installed Hyrcanus's nephew Antigonus on the throne. Herod escaped to *Rome, where Antony and Octavian (later to be the emperor Augustus) promised to make him king if he defeated the Parthians (Josephus, J.W. 1.282-285; Ant. 14.377-389). By 37 B.C., after a five-month siege of Jerusalem, Herod joined a number of other client kings along Rome's eastern border.

At first, Herod's position was uncertain, as his realm had experienced prolonged civil unrest, and he himself was not of royal blood. He set about removing opposition, first by executing Antigonus's supporters (Josephus, J.W. 1.358; Ant. 15.5), and then the remaining members of the Hasmonean royal family (including his wife Mariamne). In place of the old aristocracy, Herod promoted his Idumean relatives, cultivated groups who had been hostile toward his predecessors, and promoted non-Jews to prominent positions in the army and at court. He also brought the high priesthood under his control, abandoning the traditional hereditary principle, replacing incumbents at will, and keeping the sacred vestments under his own guard. He favored men of high priestly Diaspora origins (Josephus, Ant. 15.22, 39-40, 320-322), doubtless assuming that they would pose less of a threat than older Palestinian families. These men formed a new aristocracy dependent solely on Herod.

External dangers came from Cleopatra VII of Egypt, who had designs on Herod's land. Her schemes, however, proved advantageous in that he was prevented from joining Antony at the Battle of Actium in 31 B.C. because Cleopatra had sent him to war against the Nabateans. Herod emerged victorious, but he was met by the disastrous news that his patron, Antony, had been defeated, and that Octavian was now the sole ruler of the Roman world. Undaunted, he presented himself before Octavian, stressed his former loyalty, and was promptly confirmed in his position. Later, Herod entertained Octavian lavishly and was rewarded by further territories (Josephus, J.W. 1.386-397; Ant. 15.187-201, 217). By 20 B.C., after several more extensions, he ruled over the whole of the former Hasmonean kingdom (Josephus, J.W. 1.398-400).

The years 30-12 B.C. were a time of stability, prosperity and splendor. Herod's friendship with Rome was at its height, and the king delighted in honoring his Roman patrons: he founded cities and buildings in their name and dedicated temples to the emperor in Pnias, Sebaste and Caesarea (Josephus, J.W. 1.407). Most impressive of all were Sebaste (formerly Samaria) and Caesarea Maritima, both splendid Greco-Roman cities complete with Hellenistic institutions and entertainments, the latter boasting a magnificent harbor. Herod wanted to be seen as a great patron and benefactor, showed generosity to cities outside his realm, and he even endowed the Olympic games. Jerusalem too was completely transformed. The most ambitious project was the rebuilding of the *temple (begun in A.D. 20/19); Herod doubled the size of the Temple Mount, creating one of the most magnificent temples in the ancient world (Josephus, J.W. 1.401; see also b. B.Bat. 4a).

Herod's last years were characterized by emotional and psychological deterioration. Augustus allowed him to nominate his successor, but indecision and paranoia led to several changes of his will, and he had no clear heir (his ten wives had borne him fifteen children). Continual vying for power led to the execution of his three eldest sons in the closing years of his reign. In 4 B.C., prompted by false rumors of Herod's death, two leading *Pharisees persuaded a number of youths to tear down a golden eagle that Herod had erected above the temple gates. Now aged about seventy, Herod had them burned alive shortly before his own agonizing death (Josephus, J.W. 1.648-655; Ant. 17.149-164). His burial at Herodium marked the end of a thirty-three-year reign that had brought stability and repressive peace to a nation previously torn apart by civil conflict.

Herod appears in the NT only in connection with Jesus' *birth, which Matthew dates two years before the king's death, roughly 6 B.C. (Mt 2:1-23 [on Lk 1:5, see 4 below]). The same evangelist adds the story of Herod's massacre of boys under the age of two in Bethlehem (Mt 2:16-18). Herod certainly was capable of such brutality, particularly in his later troubled years, yet the atrocity is not recorded by either Josephus (whose record is particularly detailed at this point) or Luke (whose account is quite different). Matthew's concern to present Jesus as a second Moses has prompted some to suggest that the story was created on the analogy of the Pharaoh in Exodus 1: just as the infant Moses was threatened by the evil Pharaoh, so Jesus almost lost his life at the hands of Herod.

4. Archelaus.

Upon Herod's death, the country was plunged into conflict. Decades of resentment and frustration broke out against both Herod and the Roman regime that had supported him. Order was finally restored by Varus, the Syrian legate, though not without significant casualties.

Herod's final will divided the country among three of his sons. Half (including Judea, Idumea and Samaria) went to Archelaus; born around 27 B.C., he was the eldest son of Herod's Samaritan wife Malthace. The remainder was divided between Antipas (who inherited Galilee and Perea) and Philip (who received a number of territories to the north and east of the Sea of Galilee). After brutally quelling a Passover riot, Archelaus sailed to Rome with his two brothers to have his succession ratified. Despite the request of fifty prominent Judeans for direct Roman rule (Josephus, J.W. 2.80-91; Ant. 17.299-314), Augustus decided to follow Herod's wishes. He appointed Archelaus ethnarchēs (national ruler), promising to make him king if he proved himself worthy, and Antipas and Philip tetrarchēs (rulers of one quarter) (Josephus, J.W. 2.93-100; Ant. 17.317-323).

Josephus has little to say about Archelaus: he crushed remaining unrest, appointed a new high priest, embarked on a rather mediocre building programme, and unlawfully married Glaphyra, the daughter of the king of Cappadocia (Josephus, J.W. 2.111; Ant. 17.339-353). After a ten-year reign, he was accused before Augustus by embassies from both Jews and *Samaritans of excessive brutality, a charge that fits with the reluctance of Mary and Joseph to live under his rule (Mt 2:22). He was banished to Vienne in Gaul in A.D. 6 and died there (Strabo, Geogr. 16.765).

Rather than appoint another Herod, Augustus imposed direct Roman rule on Judea. A census was taken for taxation purposes (overseen by Quirinius, the Syrian legate), and a Roman prefect was put in command. Luke sets Jesus' birth at the time of this census in A.D. 6 (Lk 2:1-7). He also refers to "Herod the king" (Lk 1:5), but the proximity of the census suggests that he has Herod Archelaus in mind ("Herod" now being a dynastic title).

5. Philip the Tetrarch.

Philip (born c. A.D. 26) was the son of Cleopatra of Jerusalem and was the half-brother of Archelaus and Antipas. He was appointed tetrarch of Iturea, Panias, Gaulanitis, Batanea, Trachonitis, and northern Auranitis following his father's death in 4 B.C. (Josephus, J.W. 2.95; Ant. 17.319; 18.106; see also Lk 3:1). Josephus describes him as modest, peace-loving and just (Josephus, Ant. 18.106-108), though saying little about his thirty-seven-year reign. He was the only Herod to put images on his coins, but because of the predominantly Gentile character of his lands, this caused little offense.

In A.D. 6/7 he rebuilt the city of Panias, renaming it "Caesarea (Philippi)" in honor of Augustus. It was near here that Jesus discussed his identity with his disciples, and, according to Matthew, that he gave Peter a special commission (Mt 16:13-20; Mk 8:27-30). Around A.D. 30, Philip enlarged and fortified Bethsaida, a Jewish village on the Sea of Galilee, renaming it "Julias" in honor of Tiberius's mother (though it is still known as Bethsaida in the Gospels). John's Gospel implies that this was the hometown of Peter, Andrew and Philip (Jn 1:44; 12:21), though the Synoptics link them to Capernaum.

Mark 6:16 (and some manuscripts of Mt 14:3) suggest that Philip was married to Herodias, who left him to marry Antipas (see 6 below). More probably he was married to Herodias's daughter Salome (so Josephus, Ant. 18.136). When Philip died in A.D. 33/4 leaving no heir, his territory was annexed to Syria and later given to Agrippa I (Josephus, Ant. 18.108).

6. Antipas, Herodias, Salome.

Antipas (born c. 25 B.C.) was the son of Malthace the Samaritan and so was the full younger brother of Archelaus. He was appointed tetrarch over two non-contiguous territories, Galilee and Perea, adopting the dynastic title "Herod" after Archelaus's banishment in A.D. 6 (Josephus, J.W. 2.167; see also Mt 14:1; Lk 3:19). Mark 6:14 incorrectly, though understandably, refers to him as "king."

Antipas's forty-three-year reign seems to have been good and prosperous. He rebuilt the city of Sepphoris, close to Nazareth (which had been destroyed in the revolt after Herod I's death), and then later he founded a new capital city on the Sea of Galilee, naming it "Tiberias" in honor of the emperor. Though impressive by Galilean standards, neither city could match the opulence of the predominantly Gentile urban centers of Caesarea Maritima or the Decapolis.

Antipas *divorced his first wife in favor of Herodias, the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip (not the tetrarch) (Josephus, Ant. 18.110, 136). The marriage was unlawful because the half-brother was still alive. According to Mark and Matthew, it was *John the Baptist's criticism of Antipas's actions that led to his arrest (Mt 14:3; Mk 6:17). Later, at Antipas's birthday party, Herodias's daughter (Salome, according to Josephus, Ant. 18.136) entranced the tetrarch with her dancing; when he offered her anything she wanted, she asked for John the Baptist's head, and Antipas, bitterly disappointed, had to comply. The story has a legendary air to it and is reminiscent of the tale of Esther, but the central claim that John criticized Antipas's marriage may well be historical. Josephus also mentions the Baptist's death, but in his account Antipas, worried by John's large following, had him imprisoned in the fortress of Macherus and executed (Josephus, Ant. 18.116-119). There are differences in emphases here, but in general terms the two accounts are complementary.

Jesus' ministry took place in Antipas's Galilee, though he seems to have avoided the cities and confrontation with the tetrarch (perhaps remembering the Baptist's fate). Luke has a particular interest in Antipas. In Luke 9:7-9 Antipas hears of Jesus and thinks that the Baptist has been raised (so also Mt 14:1-2; Mk 6:14-16); in Luke 9:9 he wants to see the miracle worker; and in Luke 13:31-32 a number of Pharisees warn Jesus against Antipas (whom Jesus refers to as a "fox"). Finally, in Luke 23:6-12 the evangelist records a hearing in front of Antipas at Jesus' trial. Learning that Jesus belonged to Antipas's jurisdiction, *Pilate sent him to the tetrarch (who was in Jerusalem for the Passover). Antipas, however, disappointed that Jesus would not perform a sign for him, mocked him and returned him to the prefect. The historicity of this scene has been questioned because there was no legal requirement for Pilate to send Jesus to a representative of his home territory, and Luke is the only evangelist to record this exchange. The meeting may have been created by Luke to parallel the trials of Paul in Acts (who was tried by another Herod, Agrippa II) or to make Antipas a second witness (along with Pilate) to Jesus' innocence. The reasons for any hostility between Pilate and Antipas (Lk 23:12), if historical, are unknown (though the incident in Lk 13:1 may have created friction).

Antipas lost his position in A.D. 39 when, urged by Herodias, he asked the emperor to make him king. His land was added to that of Agrippa I, and both Antipas and Herodias were banished to Gaul.

7. Herodians.

"Herodians" appear twice in the Gospels (Mk 3:6; 12:13 [the latter paralleled in Mt 22:16]), both times linked with the Pharisees. In the first passage, set in Galilee, their plot to kill Jesus forms the culmination of a series of controversies (Mk 2:1-3; 5). In the second, set in Jerusalem, they question Jesus over the payment of tribute (Mk 12:13-17). Neither John nor Luke mentions the Herodians, the latter's silence being all the more remarkable, given his interest in the Herods.

The Herodians have been explained in a number of ways: a religious party claiming one of the Herods as messiah; a political party seeking the extension of Herodian rule; or as identical with scribes, Essenes or even Sadducees. In all probability the word is a Latinism, Herodiani, referring not specifically to an organized party but rather to supporters, servants and officials of whichever member of the dynasty held influence (see Josephus, J.W. 1.319). At the time of Jesus it referred to supporters of Herod Antipas.

See also HELLENISM; ROME; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Braund, Rome and the Friendly King: The Character of the Client Kingship (London: Croom Helm, 1984); R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke (rev. ed.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1993); H. Hoehner, Herod Antipas (SNTSMS 17; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972); M. H. Jensen, Herod Antipas in Galilee: The Literary and Archaeological Sources on the Reign of Herod Antipas and Its Socio-Economic Impact on Galilee (WUNT 2/215; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); N. Kokkinos, The Herodian Dynasty: Origins, Role in Society and Eclipse (JSPSup 30; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); S. Mason, Josephus and the New Testament (2nd ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); J. P. Meier, "The Historical Jesus and the Historical Herodians," JBL 119 (2000) 740-46; P. Richardson, Herod: King of the Jews and Friend of the Romans (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996); E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), trans. T. A. Burkill et al., rev. and ed. G. Vermes, F. Millar and M. Black, vol. 1 (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1973).

H. Bond

HERODIANS. See HERODIAN DYNASTY.

HERODIAS. See HERODIAN DYNASTY.

HISTORICAL JESUS. See QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS.

HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY

"Historicism" refers to any of a range of approaches to assigning significance to the past. "Historiography" refers to the writing of history or, more particularly, the narrative representation of the past. In the modern era few issues have been more central to critical study of the Gospels than their historical nature. This is due especially to three interrelated considerations. First, readers have long assumed that, in some significant sense, the Gospels "intend history," that the mode of discourse found in the Gospels coheres with what we expect of ancient narratives that relate real events and real people. Second, biblical studies since the late eighteenth century has tended to segregate theology and history, prioritizing the historical over the theological. This is because, third, biblical scholars and theologians gravitated toward the view that theological claims comprise a superstructure requiring a solid, historical foundation. As a result, until recently biblical scholars generally have regarded themselves foremost as historians and their work as the quest for what actually happened. Thus, the Gospels have been cast as windows into an authoritative past rather than as authoritative witnesses to God's mighty acts in Christ Jesus. In recent decades historical inquiry has become a more complex activity because of attempts to clarify the enterprise and innovations both in the philosophy of history and in historical method.

1. Understanding "History"
2. The Gospels and "History"
3. Three Approaches to Study of the "Historical Jesus"

1. Understanding "History."

What scholars mean by "historical study" is not always clear. In the English language the term history itself can be confusing because this one word might refer to "the past," "study of the past," and "representation of the past." Work in the philosophy of history over the past three or four decades has helped to clarify the relationships among these usages (see below). Moreover, in biblical studies "critical study" is often characterized simply as "historical study" (singular) in spite of the fact that scholars actually practice a variety of historical criticisms (plural). One typology for making sense of the various ways in which the Gospels are studied historically posits three broad approaches (Green): (1) Historical inquiry is the reconstruction of past events in order to narrate the story of the past; in the discipline of history, this is the characteristic work of the historian.

(2) Historical inquiry is the exploration of Gospel traditions, sometimes called "Jesus traditions," for the purpose of explaining the processes by which events in Jesus' life have come to be recounted the Gospels. This includes a range of critical approaches, including tradition criticism, *form criticism, source criticism and *redaction criticism. (3) Historical inquiry is the examination of the historical situations to which the Gospels bear witness and within which they were generated, including especially the socio-historical institutions and sociocultural conventions that they take for granted. This article is concerned with "historical criticism" understood in the first sense of identifying what happened in the past, then retelling the story of Jesus.

Understood in this more narrow sense, questions of history about Jesus and the Gospels are raised by the nature of the evidence itself. That the NT includes four stories of Jesus that differ on points of detail and, especially in the case of John's Gospel, on overall narrative structure presses historical questions (see Synoptics and John). For example, Clement of Alexandria (ca. A.D. 150–220) thought that Matthew, Mark and Luke recounted the "physical" facts, whereas John wrote a "spiritual Gospel" (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.7 [my translation]). Reflecting on disparities between the Gospel of John and the Synoptic Gospels, Origen wrote in the mid-third century, "I conceive it to be impossible for those who admit nothing more than the history in their interpretation to show that these discrepant statements are in harmony with each other" (Comm. Jo. 10.15). Discoveries of ancient texts, especially at Nag Hammadi and Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls), in the mid-twentieth century raised questions about the Gospels' portraits of "the Jews" of Jesus' day (see Judaism, Common), for example, and more generally about the sources appropriate for historical study of Jesus and his first disciples. Study of other texts, such as the works of *Josephus, has also raised questions regarding the historical veracity of the NT Gospels, as have shifting assumptions regarding what Jesus must have said or done, or what he could not possibly have done.

Modern understandings of the nature of "history" rest in large part on the principles of E. Troeltsch (1865–1923), reformulated by V. Harvey (1926–). According to modern thought, anachronism is the unforgiveable sin (see Schorske), with the result that biblical texts like the Gospels must be read according to historical-critical assumptions and protocols. This means that readers of the Gospels must operate (1) autonomously—that is, without the influence of tradition, confessional theology, the church or one's own beliefs; (2) analogically—that is, assessing what is plausible in the ancient world by analogy with what we know happens today, since neither the laws of nature nor basic human capacities have changed over time; (3) critically—that is, open to ongoing revision in light of further study; (4) correlationally—that is, seeking to explain natural events in the world in terms of their natural causes (see Collins). Undergirding this approach to historical inquiry, and perpetuated by it, are certain pivotal assumptions about the nature of history: (1) "History" has existed as an object or sequence of objects outside of the historian's own thought processes. (2) The historian can know and describe this object or sequence of objects as though they objectively existed. (3) Historians can remove their own interests, whether theological or philosophical or political or social, as they engage in the task of doing history. (4) Historical facts are discovered in a past that exhibits a recognizable structure. (5) The "stuff" of history can be grasped through intellectual efforts, without recourse to the transcendent (see Clark, 14; Novick, 1-6).

These presuppositions and principles remain characteristic of study of Jesus and the Gospels that claims to be scientific. It is true that some scholars have attempted to revise or exclude one or more of these assumptions in their attempt to introduce divine action into the equation—to allow for the possibility of *miracles, for example. What such scholars fail to realize is that the very nature of historical investigation as a science requires the exclusion of divine action as a possible explanation of historical events. This led T. Tilley, for example, to admit that historical investigation could not proceed on the basis of faith-based warrants. At the same time, though, he urged that no religious principle could be undermined by historical study, thus severing any possible connection between theological commitments and historical inquiry. As M. Rae has rightly recognized, a different approach to the Gospels—one that takes the Gospels as testimonies to God's aims and activity—demands a different account of how to engage the historical task, one that is determined theologically (see also Levering).

2. The Gospels and "History."

The chief problem confronting the historian has been the problem of distance—how to verify and apprehend the past. Modern approaches to this problem have generally taken their cues from L. von Ranke (1795–1886), whose aim was developed methodologically in the work of Troeltsch, Harvey and others. Von Ranke claimed that he did not want to pass judgment on the past, but rather to report wie es eigentlich gewesen—"how it actually was." In spite of the ease with which virtually all NT scholars admit the impossibility of this aim, this motto has guided, and continues to guide, much of what passes for historical inquiry as scholars work to overcome historical distance through appeal to rigorous methods by which they might verify historical facts and prove the veracity of historical narratives. Nevertheless, this approach is seriously undermined by a consideration of at least three realities.

First, it must be admitted that this interest in securing the veracity of historical facts is not well documented within the Gospels themselves. Thus, we find in the Gospels almost nothing regarding the nature of their sources, the naming of witnesses consulted, and so on (pace Bauckham). Largely absent from the Gospel narratives is evidence of a concern, sometimes found among ancient historians, with documentation and verification. No witnesses are named for the content of Jesus' prayer at *Gethsemane (during which the disciples were sleeping), for example, or for his wilderness *temptations. The one significant exception to this dearth of interest in verification is Jesus' *resurrection—not that the evangelists identify witnesses to this event, but rather that Matthew provides a failsafe proof of the empty tomb (Mt 27:62-66; 28:11-15), and Luke has it that Jesus demonstrated that "he was alive with many convincing proofs [tekmērion]" (Acts 1:3 [on tekmērion, see Aristotle, Rhet. 1.12.16-17 §1357b]). Someone might claim that Luke 1:1-4 evidences Luke's concern with eyewitnesses (autoptai) and historical veracity, but this is a consequence of reading Luke's preface within the boundaries of modern history writing; in antiquity, his reference to autoptai would signify not seeking or sifting eyewitness testimony, but rather firsthand experience of the sites of historical incidents (e.g., Alexander, 120-25), and his preface would mark his commitment to unveiling the significance (not the veracity) of the narrative he had penned (e.g., Moessner).

Second, early Christian writers like the evangelists would have been influenced by traditions of history writing quite different than that represented by modern historical inquiry. From their Jewish antecedents they would have learned of historical progression in the service of God's aims, the role of historical narrative in instruction, the repetition of patterns in characters and events, and the constant awareness of God's continued presence. From their Greco-Roman predecessors they would have learned forms of history writing concerned not merely with reporting events, but with describing and explaining their sequential development. Taking the claims of ancient historians at face value, moderns have tended to characterize Greco-Roman historiographers as objective investigators who rejected the place of myth and the supernatural and the use of rhetorical tools and aims. To the contrary, their practices reveal their concern to persuade their audiences to a particular reading of the past, and their use of a variety of means for authorizing their accounts, including reference to divine intervention and the supernatural, imitation, and patterns of prediction and recurrence (e.g., Marincola; Pitcher; Rothschild). What are the consequences of these influences on the evangelists? First, history writing was, for the evangelists, a form of instruction and identity formation, demonstrating the roots of their faith in Scripture and, indeed, documenting the continuity of Jesus and Jesus movement with the scriptural stories of *Abraham, *Moses, and/or Isaianic promise in the case of the Synoptic Gospels, and with the creation of the cosmos in the case of John. Second, for the evangelists, the course of history is the arena within which God is active—grounded in God's aims in creation and liberation, with God revealing his aims through a variety of media (e.g., prophets, dreams, Scripture), and with God continuing to work through the *Holy Spirit, human agents (e.g., *Mary, *John the Baptist), heavenly messengers (e.g., Gabriel) and especially through Jesus, God's Spirit-anointed Son.

Third, the modern approach to overcoming the problem of distance by means of scholarly methods for securing historical facts and proving historical narratives has been undermined by contemporary reflection on the nature of history and history writing. In fact, a steady stream of critical studies (e.g., Bevir; Clark; Cook; Novick; Stock) has emphasized a range of observations pertinent to our reflections on what it means to think about the Gospels historically. (1) Historical recollection is never concerned with the facts only, since the mere recall of the past is itself an exercise in meaning-making. Humans apprehend episodes not as pristine events, but rather always in relation to evaluations based on what we and our communities take to be significant. (2) Hence, history writing provides us with both more and less than "the past"—more in that historiography construes events in a web of causal relationships that draw out a significance that is greater than individual episodes might suggest on their own, less in that historians must make hard-nosed choices about what to exclude lest the retelling become infinitely detailed. Consequently, history writing is inherently partial, in both senses of the word: providing only a selection of the grand total of episodes that comprise the past, and doing so in terms of the particular interests of the historian. Interestingly, these two basic and essential tasks of the historiographer—selectivity and ordering in a causal sequence, both in the service of the author's aim(s)—are the very tasks mentioned by Luke and John (Lk 1:1-4; Jn 20:30-31; 21:25). (3) History writing is thus a rhetorical exercise in which documentation and interpretation are inextricably woven together. (4) History writing is less mimēsis and more diēgēsis, more narrative representation than imitation of past events. "Memory" of persons and events is being formed in advance of the arrival of the historian. Oral history nurtures a community of memory, so that history-telling precedes and constrains history writing. And memories are in constant flux, being surfaced or suppressed, shaped and reshaped, pressed into service always in relation to their perceived importance. (5) History writing accounts for the present to which the past has led. In this sense, all historiography is contemporary, since the historian demonstrates through narrative representation how the present grows organically out of sequences of past events. As a consequence, historiography is a powerful instrument of community legitimation, identity formation and instruction.

Such considerations call for a ground shift with regard to traditional Gospels study. Indeed, historical study as it has been widely practiced is in an important sense antitextual, for it is designed to replace the discrete narratives of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John with narratives freshly constructed by the scholar in question. Those interested in such a historical enterprise need to take significant steps toward admitting that the result of their work is not an objective recounting of the past, not an unbiased presentation, and not a "scientific" account of what really happened. All history writing (whether by the NT evangelists or modern historians) is partial—that is, incomplete and perspectival. No historical account can recover the totality of the past as it really was. The work of the historian is never simply "retrieval." For those interested in studying the Gospel as historical narratives, then, the central question is not "Did this really happen?" We ask, rather, "How is this event related causally to that one? What end is served by narrating the story in this way (rather than some other)?"

3. Three Approaches to Study of the "Historical Jesus."

Today, students of Jesus and the Gospels who practice historical inquiry tend to do so in one of three ways. These approaches situate themselves vis-à-vis the perspectives sketched above in varying ways.

3.1. The Approach of Criteria-Based Historicism. From the mid-twentieth century up to the present, the primary approach to historical study of Jesus of Nazareth has been grounded in historical positivism—that is, in the principles and presumptions accompanying the view that our only knowledge of Jesus is scientific knowledge. The primary points of departure for this approach are threefold: (1) the principle of doubt, so that the burden of proof rests with those who claim the historical veracity of a saying or event in Jesus' life; (2) the exercise of Troeltschian principles of investigation (see 1 above), which on scientific grounds disallows the historicity of both divine action and unique occurrences; (3) the assumption that the basic unit of investigation is the individual saying or episode, understood to have existed originally as an isolated datum without interpretation, with the result that one might think of reported events as having a historical kernel from which the historian must strip away all theological understanding. Such historians utilize a two-step process. First, they select raw data, kernels of sayings and events thought to go back to the historical Jesus, devoid of any theological significance (since, as the thinking goes, this significance would have attached itself to the data in the process of early church transmission). This step depends on the use of "criteria of authenticity, such as multiple attestation, dissimilarity, embarrassment, historical constraints, coherence, and so on. Second, the historian arranges these data into a narrative sequence in order to provide a fresh, and purportedly more historically accurate, representation of the past. This approach either is innocent of the failure of its positivism or it denies that its positivist commitments have been undercut by critical theory.

3.2. The Approach of Critical-Realist-Based Historicism. Made popular through the work of N. T. Wright, this approach is cast as an alternative to criteria-based historical reconstruction. It has two points of departure. The first is a philosophical commitment to critical realism—that is, the view that human language refers to real events, but not in a naive fashion (memory and historical truth are not the same thing). In historical positivism, what is real is (only) what we can observe scientifically through our senses. In critical realism, what is real is the product of an ongoing negotiation between the knower and the thing known. This leads to the question "On what basis do we accept an event report as a historical occurrence and render it meaningful?" The second point of departure is an awareness that scholars always work with a metanarrative, whether acknowledged or not, on the basis of which judgments are made regarding what counts as historical. This leads to the question "What data is coherent with the likely, historical 'big picture'?" Accordingly, the historian begins with the self-conscious construction of the metanarrative and then asks, "Given this metanarrative, does this datum make sense as an historical event? And, given this metanarrative, what might it mean that this event happened?"

3.3. The Social-Memory Approach. In the wake of the sweeping criticism of the rudiments of the historical-critical paradigm outlined above, a number of historians have recognized that the recollection of historical events itself is always historically inspired. This means that historical events are never recalled apart from their significance, nor as isolated units of the past, since events are always apprehended according to shared conceptual patterns that inextricably tie together past, present and future. Historical work and historical narratives are, in this sense, inescapably partial, then, and the holy grail of traditional Jesus studies—the nontheological Jesus or, better, "what really happened"—has the same status as the mythological unicorn. Such considerations have led some historians to recast their projects in relation to recent work in social memory (see Kirk).

The central claim of social memory studies is that memory is never a simple act of recall, but rather a complex process whereby the past is reconstructed in light of present interests that are defined and shaped socially. (Neuroscientific study of memory has underscored the degree to which memory is malleable and dynamic, a reality that undermines important aspects of Bauckham's thesis regarding the Gospels as eyewitness testimony [see Redman].) Rejecting long-standing efforts to divorce "history" from "theology" in biblical studies, then, social memory studies recognize that all memory is an indissoluble mixture of past and present, of "event" and "interpretation." Dismissing out of hand the quest for "historical kernels," this means that traditions about Jesus, both sayings and events, simply cannot be isolated from their narrative framework. Moreover, rather than organizing those sayings and events within a new narrative framework of the historian's own making, the historian analyzes how events and sayings mean within their existing narrative frameworks—an approach that serves the historian's interest in conceptualizing and articulating how social groups appropriate the past in the service of the present. This approach to historical study concerns itself with what inferred actual past best explains the narrative representations that we have. In other words, how do we account for the interpretations of Jesus we read in the Gospels?

See also CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY; FORM CRITICISM; GOSPEL: GENRE; GOSPELS: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; SOCIAL SCIENTIFIC CRITICISMS; SYNOPTICS AND JOHN; THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. Alexander, The Preface to Luke's Gospel: Literary Convention and Social Context in Luke 1.1-4 and Acts 1.1 (SNTSMS 78; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); D. C. Allison Jr., Constructing Jesus: Memory, Imagination, and History (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); R. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); M. Bevir, "Why Historical Distance Is Not a Problem," History and Theory 50 (2011) 24-37; E. A. Clark, History, Theory, Text: Historians and the Linguistic Turn (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004); J. J. Collins, "The Politics of Biblical Interpretation," in Encounters with Biblical Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005) 34-44; A. Cook, History/Writing: The Theory and Practice of History in Antiquity and in Modern Times (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988); J. B. Green, "Rethinking 'History' for Theological Interpretation," JTI 5 (2011) 159-74; V. A. Harvey, The Historian and the Believer: The Morality of Historical Knowledge and Christian Belief (New York: Macmillan, 1966); C. Keith, "Jesus Tradition and What Really Happened," ZNW 102 (2011) 155-77; C. Keith and A. Le Donne, eds., Jesus, Criteria, and the Demise of Authenticity (London: T & T Clark, 2012); A. Kirk, "Social and Cultural Memory," in Memory, Tradition, and Text: Uses of the Past in Early Christianity (SemSt 53; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2005) 1-24; M. Levering, Participatory Biblical Exegesis: A Theology of Biblical Interpretation (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2008); J. Marincola, Authority and Tradition in Ancient Historiography (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997); D. P. Moessner, "The Appeal and Power of Poetics (Luke 1.1-4): Luke's Superior Credentials (παρηκολουθηκότι), Narrative Sequence (καθεξής), and Firmness of Understanding for the Reader (ἡ ἀσφάλεια)," in Jesus and the Heritage of Israel: Luke's Narrative Claim upon Israel's Legacy, ed. D. P. Moessner (LII 1; Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999) 84-123; P. Novick, That Noble Dream: The "Objectivity Question" and the American Historical Profession (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988); L. Pitcher, Writing Ancient History: An Introduction to Classical Historiography (London: Tauris, 2009); M. A. Rae, History and Hermeneutics (London: T & T Clark, 2005); J. C. S. Redman, "How Accurate Are Eyewitnesses? Bauckham and the Eyewitnesses in the Light of Psychological Research," JBL 129 (2010) 177-97; C. K. Rothschild, Luke-Acts and the Rhetoric of History: An Investigation of Early Christian Historiography (WUNT 2/175; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004); C. E. Schorske, Thinking with History: Explorations in the Passage to Modernism (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998); B. Stock, Listening for the Text: On the Uses of the Past (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990); T. W. Tilley, History, Theology and Faith: Dissolving the Modern Problematic (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2004); E. Troeltsch, "Historical and Dogmatic Method in Theology," in Religion in History (FTMT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 11-32; N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (COQG 1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

J. B. Green

HISTORIOGRAPHY. See HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY.

HOLINESS. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

HOLY SPIRIT

References to the (Holy) Spirit ("Spirit of God," "Paraclete") in the Gospels designate God's creative power in fulfilling the OT's eschatological promises through the life and ministry of Jesus and through those of his disciples.

1. Setting the Stage
2. The Synoptic Gospels
3. The Gospel of John
4. Summary

1. Setting the Stage.

1.1. Old Testament Background. At the outset of the OT the Spirit of God is associated with the newness of life and the word of God; references to God's Spirit serve to accentuate God's creative power that overcomes the forces of chaos and brings forth life (Gen 1:2; 2:7; Job 33:4; Ps 104:30; Is 40:13). In contrast, where the Spirit is withdrawn, life ceases (Gen

6:3). At times it is difficult to clearly differentiate in these passages between rûah as referring to the “spirit” of God or to “wind” as a mysterious power used by God (cf. Ex 14:21; Num 11:31); either way, these references evidence God’s creative and life-giving involvement in this world.

The OT authors refer to the Spirit also in articulating their eschatological hopes for the restoration of the people of God and this world. In some passages this renewal is depicted either as the result of a direct outpouring of the Spirit upon the people (Is 32:15-18; 44:1-5; Ezek 37:1-14; Joel 3:1-5) or as the result of the ministry of the Spirit-anointed Messiah/Servant, who will restore justice, peace, mercy and the fear of God (Is 11:1-4; 42:1-4; 61:1-4). All of these texts share a common eschatological as well as pneumatological emphasis, and they also agree in their social ethical vista (cf. Is 32:15-18; 44:1-5; Zech 3:1-10; 4:6; 12:10). While at first glance it may seem that Ezekiel 36:27 speaks of an “intrapersonal” renewal through the Spirit, the aim of the oracle is the restoration of obedience to the Torah among God’s people so that they may “live in the land” (Ezek 36:8; 37:13-14). Ezekiel’s vision is further soaked with language from Genesis 1–2 and describes the restoration of Israel’s homeland in terminology borrowed from the creation accounts (Levison, 99-103). This nexus between Israel’s eschatological hopes and the anticipated outpouring of the Spirit seems to be a logical outcome of the notion of rûah as Spiritus Creator.

The OT authors show little interest in neatly defining the exact role of the divine and the human spirit in the anticipated renewal, and often it is difficult, and perhaps even unnecessary, to clearly determine whether some of the mentions of rûah are referring to a human spirit as acted upon by God or to God’s Spirit as acting upon people (Deut 34:9; Judg 9:23; 2 Kings 19:7; Ps 51:10; Is 61:3; Ezek 11:19; 18:31; 36:26; Hos 4:12).

In the book of Judges references to rûah are mainly in the context of the ministry of Spirit-anointed leaders who have preserved Israel’s national life (Judg 3:10). In times when everyone was seeking personal advantage (Judg 21:25), these leaders restored the sense of community among God’s people.

1.2. The Holy Spirit in Judaism of the Second Temple Period. Second Temple Judaism carries over the OT’s ambiguity in regard to the Spirit of God as acting upon a person versus a person’s spirit being acted upon by God (cf. 1QS III, 13–IV, 26; Philo, Leg. 1:36-38 [Philo’s fluid application of “spirit” language is directly due to his understanding of Gen 2:7]).

1.2.1. The Spirit and Inspiration/Ecstasy. If there is any agreement in contemporary scholarship on the role of the Spirit in Second Temple Judaism, it is that during that period the Spirit was associated with *prophecy, inspiration and, at times, ecstasy. This inspiration comprised a wide range of experiences. In the sapiential tradition the Spirit both fills the sage with insight into the will of God and lets the sage speak words of wisdom (Sir 39:6-8; cf. CD-A VI, 2-11; 1QH^a XV, 7; in contrast, see 1QH^a VI, 12b-13; 1QS VIII, 15-16), or the Spirit grants insight into the plan of God so that the paths of the inhabitants of the earth will be made straight (Wis 9:17-18; cf. 4 Ezra 14:22, 40; Jub. 40:5; Philo, Gig. 55; QE 2.7; De-cal. 1; Somn. 2.252; Spec. 3.1-6; Deus 2-3; Opif. 144). According to Josephus, the divine Spirit gave Daniel special wisdom so that he was able to discern what others never had thought of (Josephus, Ant. 10.239). In Pseudo-Philo’s retelling of Israel’s story, the Spirit inspires prophetic speech (L.A.B. 31:9 [similarly Josephus, Ant. 4.119; 6.166, 222-223; Philo, Mos. 1.175]) and praise (L.A.B. 32:14 [cf. 1 En. 71:11]), accompanied with ecstatic experiences (L.A.B. 27:9-10). In this last passage, however, the locus of the Spirit’s activity is on restoring God’s salvific benefits for Israel. Elsewhere in Pseudo-Philo, Kenaz, filled with the Spirit, begins to prophesy in a state of ecstasy (L.A.B. 28:6-9).

That these accounts of inspiration and ecstasy “bear almost no resemblance to their scriptural forebears” (Levison, 219) may be only a half-truth, since such ecstatic experiences often are linked with a more fundamental transformation of the person(s), similar to Saul’s experience narrated in 1 Samuel 10:9-16: Abraham’s ecstatic experience transformed him into a virtuous person (Philo, Virt. 212-219), and the seventy elders were transformed during an ecstatic experience into something they could not become by themselves (Philo, Gig. 24; cf. Philo, Plant. 23-27; Gig. 47; see also 1Q28b, II, 24-25).

1.2.2. The Spirit and New Creation. Judaism of that period has taken over from the OT the two strata in regard to the eschatological hope for the restoration of Israel (see Exile and Restoration) and the renewal of creation: either through a Spirit-anointed figure or through the work of the Spirit upon the people in general.

In regard to the anticipated messianic figure, there are numerous references, many of them playing off Isaiah 11:1-4 (see 1 En. 49:2-3; 61:1-11; 62:1-12; Pss. Sol. 17:37; 18:8; 1Q28b V, 24-26a; 4Q161 III, 10-19; 4Q521). The proximity between the authority of this messianic figure and the strength of his word may imply that the nexus between the references to the Spirit and inspired or ecstatic utterances in the Jewish writings of that period may be due not only to Greco-Roman influences upon Judaism (so Levi-son), but also to the close proximity between the Spirit and God's creative and powerful word right at the outset of the OT.

Another set of texts depicts the Spirit as an immediate positive ethical influence on people (T. Benj. 8:2; Greek fragment of T. Levi 2.3B7-8, 14; T. Sim. 4:4) or as instrumental in the incorporation of a pagan person into the people of God (Jos. Asen. 8:9; 19:10-11; see also Philo, Gig. 24; Virt. 212-219).

The nexus between the Spirit and the OT eschatological hopes is most clearly evidenced probably in the Qumran writings. This community understood itself as the eschatological people of God. Receiving the Spirit or being cleansed by the Spirit often is associated with entering the community (1QH^a V, 18-20; VI, 11-13; VIII, 10-20; X, 11-13; 11Q13, II, 1-25; CD-A II, 11-13; 1Q34, Frag. 3, col. II; 1QS IV, 20-25), but also with sustaining the sectarians in their religious life (1QH^a XV, 6-7; 1QH^a Frag. 2, 9-13; 1Q28b V, 24-25), often by granting them special wisdom (1QH^a VIII, 14-15; XX, 11-12; CD-A VI, 2-11).

2. The Synoptic Gospels.

Among the Synoptic Gospels, Luke places most emphasis on the Spirit. However, all three of them narrate *John the Baptist's saying about the coming one's *baptism by the Spirit (and fire) (Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16), and all three relate the Spirit to Jesus' baptism (Mt 3:15; Mk 1:10; Lk 3:22). But already in the following *temptation narrative and its reference to the Spirit, Luke seems to pursue his own particular concern (Lk 4:1; cf. Mt 3:4; Mk 1:12). This is also true for the other shared reference to the Spirit, the *blasphemy against the Spirit (Lk 12:10-12; cf. Mt 12:31; Mk 3:29).

2.1. Luke. The infancy narratives of Luke's Gospel begin with multiple reports of people being filled with the Spirit and as one result thereof prophesying (Lk 1:41, 67; most likely also Lk 2:28, 38) (see Birth of Jesus). Since the appearance of E. Schweizer's article in the TDNT, it has often been argued that this inspiring work of the Spirit describes best Lukan pneumatology. This argument is at times advanced in a more exclusive way: the Spirit in Luke-Acts is related only to the inspired prophetic speech and not to Jesus' *healings and exorcisms (Menzie; a little less exclusively, Cho); or more inclusively: the Spirit is also related to God's healing and restoring power (Shelton; Hur; Woods). In the infancy narratives the Spirit is, however, also related to the Baptist's life and ministry (Lk 1:15) and to Jesus' birth (Lk 1:35). In Luke 1:13-17 the Spirit's work in and through the Baptist is further correlated with the preparation of God's people by reconciling what is ostracized, and in Luke 1:35 the Spirit clearly is the Spiritus Creator. It further seems best to understand Luke's redactional work in this verse as implying that the role of the Spirit in Jesus' conception also accounts for his status as being holy (contrary to Matthew) (see Wenk). Hence, to limit the Spirit in the writings of Luke to inspired speech and proclamation may not represent the whole picture of Luke's colorful and multifaceted pneumatology.

Following the infancy narratives, John's pneumatic ministry (Lk 3:1-20) is depicted as the fulfillment of the angel's announcement in Luke 1:13-17. Filled with the Spirit, the Baptist radically redefines the conditions for membership in God's covenant people. In the climactic prophecy about the coming one (Lk 3:16), John contrasts his ministry with the one of the mightier one, whose "Spirit-and-fire baptism" will bring about the eschatological cleansing and restoration of God's people (cf. Lk 24:46-47)—the return from *exile as anticipated in texts such as Ezekiel 36:33; Lamentations 4:22; Daniel 9:16-19; Ezra 9:6-15 (cf. 1QS XI, 11-16; Bar 1:15—3:8).

J. D. G. Dunn perceives Luke 3:16 to be paradigmatic for an individual's cleansing experience. For those who perceive Jesus' experience at his baptism (Lk 3:22) as archetypal for the believer's experience, the passage signifies an individual's conversion/initiation into the Christian life (so Dunn; however, he disagrees with the more sacramental view). Those who define Lukan pneumatology mainly in terms of empowerment for ministry assess Jesus' baptism mainly in terms of his empowerment at the beginning of his public ministry (Menzie). The allusions to Psalm 2:7 and Isaiah 42:1-4 place the idea of empowerment in the foreground, but not in such a restricted way as referring only to the inspiration of prophetic speech and proclamation; in view is Jesus' empowerment to restore the people of God, as outlined in Luke 4:16-30, and not merely the inspiration of prophetic speech. And as noticed, Luke has related the Spirit to the liberation of God's people and the fulfillment of the eschatological hopes of Israel already in the infancy narratives.

In the following temptation narrative (Lk 4:1-13) Luke differs from both Mark and Matthew and seems to imply that the Spirit not only was leading Jesus into the wilderness (Mk 1:12: ekballō with the preposition eis; Mt 4:1: anagō with the preposition eis), but also was leading him while he was there (Lk 4:1: agō with the preposition en) and thus sustaining him in his struggle with the devil. Luke's overall structure of the baptism and temptation narrative, hinting at Deuteronomy 8:1-9, as well as his redactional changes identify Jesus as the anointed messianic figure who, assisted by the Spirit, remains faithful to God. Endowed with the Spirit for his messianic ministry, and assisted by the Spirit in his conflict with Satan, Jesus returns to Galilee in the power of the Spirit to instigate his liberating and restoring ministry.

The programmatic speech (and OT quotation) at the beginning of Jesus' public ministry (Lk 4:16-30; cf. Is 61:1-2) can be understood only by also considering Luke's other programmatic OT quotation at the beginning of the book of Acts (Joel 3:1-5 in Acts 2:17-21). Both quotations agree in their eschatological vista and expect a new social order, either through the ministry of the Spirit-anointed prophet (Lk 4:16-30) or through the life and ministry of the Spirit-anointed community (Acts 2:17-21). Luke combines in his two volumes the two strata of the role of the Spirit in OT's eschatological expectations concerning the restoration of God's people: restoration through the life and ministry of a Spirit-anointed figure (Is 11:1-4; 61:1-2) or through a direct Spirit-outpouring upon the people (Is 32:15-18; Joel 3:1-5). In both volumes Luke expects the eschatological renewal of God's people to be of pneumatic origin and with social-ethical consequences; the Spirit-inspired words and deeds (Lk 24:19; cf. Acts 2:22; 7:22) accomplish God's saving and restoring work and thereby transform the (social) reality of people. Luke's redactional changes of Isaiah 61:1-2 underline this aspect even more so, and to limit the discussion of these changes to his omission of "to heal the brokenhearted" may not do justice to his overall pneumatological as well as social-ethical concern.

Luke 11:1-13 is another key text for understanding Lukan pneumatology. This passage seems to reflect the evangelist's concern to depict the Spirit as instrumental in bringing about the fulfillment of the eschatological promise. While Matthew has separated the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:5-15) from the assurance of God's positive answer to prayer (Mt 7:7-12), Luke joins them (Lk 11:1-13); the pericope begins with calling upon the Father and ends with the assurance of the Father's positive response to prayer. And while Matthew 7:11 reads that God will give "good gifts" to those who ask him, Luke concludes his pericope on prayer with the statement "How much more will the Father out of heaven give Holy Spirit to those who ask him" (Lk 11:13 [cf. Acts 2:33]). It seems that the phraseology "will give Holy Spirit" serves for Luke as a summary of God's intervention on behalf of his people who pray for the inbreaking of the eschatological kingdom of God. The terminology "will give Holy Spirit" does not entail that merely charismatic manifestations are in view here; rather, it points to God's final re-creating and restoring work among his people (daily provision of food, divine and mutual forgiveness, protection from apostasy), as anticipated in many OT passages where Israel's apostasy, God's forgiveness and the return from exile are interrelated (Is 40:1-2; Jer 31:31-40; Lam 4:22; Ezek 36:24-28; 36:33; 37:21-23; Dan 9:16-19; cf. 1QS XI, 11-16). The manifestation of the kingdom of God has been related to prayer already in Luke 1:10, and it is also the main topic of the following pericope (deliverance from demonic enslavement [Lk 11:12-28]). The nexus between prayer, the giving of the Spirit and the coming of the kingdom of God underlines that the promise of God cannot be brought about by human intervention but only by the Father's faithful mediation. To limit Luke 11:13 to an encouragement of the post-Pentecost disciples to pray for the Spirit, so that they will be empowered for the witness for Christ (Menzie's), may do justice neither to Luke's particular focus in this pericope nor to his overall perspective of the role of the Spirit in realizing the eschatological kingdom of God.

The next reference to the Spirit in Luke's Gospel—or the absence thereof—(Lk 12:8-11) cannot be discussed without considering the other Synoptics. While Matthew and Mark associate Jesus' saying of blaspheming the Holy Spirit with an exorcism and the accusation of the Jewish leadership that he is casting out demons by the prince of demons (Mt 12:22-37; Mk 3:22-30), Luke places the saying in the context of the disciples' bold confession. And while Matthew has Jesus saying that he casts out the demons by the Spirit of God (Mt 12:28), the Lukan Jesus does so by the "finger of God" (Lk 11:20). The term "finger of God" seems to be an Egyptianism and is linked with the exodus (Ex 8:15; Deut 9:10), indicating that in Jesus' ministry and exorcism God's direct and immediate exodus power has been manifested (Woods). In addition, M. Turner has convincingly argued that if Luke wanted to associate Jesus' healings and exorcism with God's dynamis rather than with the Spirit (as Menzie's argues), he would have had Jesus saying that he casts out the demons by the "power of God" (Turner, 253-59).

Regarding Luke's placing of the saying regarding "the blasphemy against the Spirit," there is an ongoing debate whether the saying in Luke 12:10 refers to a sin committed by persecutors of Christians or by believers who are pressed by the authorities to blaspheme the Spirit and thereby fail to give heed to the voice of the Spirit. The first interpretation understands the saying as an encouragement for believers in times of distress: the same Holy Spirit who has been blasphemed by their opponents will teach them what to say in times of persecution. According to this understanding, Luke would not differ so much from Matthew and Mark, since in all three Gospels the context of the blasphemy saying would be the opposition of the Jewish leaders to Jesus or to his disciples as continuing Jesus' mission. If the saying is understood as applying to Christian believers, then Luke radically differs from Mark and Matthew by indicating that to resist the confession of Jesus prompted by the Spirit is to blaspheme the Spirit. The first line of interpretation (encouragement) may correspond better with Luke's overall emphasis on forgiveness as well as with Jesus' conflict with the Jewish authorities (cf. Acts 28:25-27). It is also more consistent with his understanding of the Spirit as the power of God to liberate his people from exile: to resist the Spirit-prompted liberation proclaimed by the followers of Jesus is to place oneself outside the restored eschatological people of God; hence, such people are not participating in God's forgiveness and restoration of Israel (cf. Lk 15:11-32).

2.2. Matthew and Mark.

2.2.1. Matthew. Although the Gospel of Matthew may not be the first book that both scholars and church laypeople think about when discussing NT pneumatology, the Holy Spirit serves almost like a parenthesis for the entire narrative: In Matthew 1:18 the readers are told that Mary was "found to be pregnant through the Holy Spirit," and in Matthew 28:19 the disciples are told to baptize people from all nations "in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit." Hence, the Spirit is instrumental at the beginning of Jesus' mission, and the Spirit is present in the continuation of Jesus' mission through the disciples. In between, Jesus is identified as the Spirit-anointed servant of God who will proclaim justice to all nations (Mt 12:18, quoting from Is 42:1-4). Matthew further associates the Spirit with the inspiration of Scripture (Mt 22:43) and the disciples' defense in times of persecution (Mt 10:20).

Matthew opens his account of Jesus with the phrase "book of the genesis of Jesus Christ" (Mt 1:1), and in Matthew 1:18 he writes, "This is how the genesis of Jesus Christ was: . . . his mother Mary . . . was found to be pregnant through the Holy Spirit." This association of genesis with pneuma may well convey the idea that God, through Jesus, brings about the new creative work, and that this work is set in motion through the Spirit (Charette, 38-39), the Spiritus Creator is becoming the Spirit of the eschatological restoration. This gives the entire Gospel a "pneumatological perspective." B. Charette further reasons that the title "Emmanuel" may contain an intentional allusion to the Spirit, and that "the Holy Spirit remains with Jesus as the presence of God to carry out the salvation of his people" (Charette, 41).

This pneumatological and eschatological perspective on Jesus is heightened in the Baptist's announcement of Jesus as the mightier one who will baptize "in Spirit and fire" (Mt 3:11). This clearly refers to the anticipated eschatological restoration and purification of God's people by the messianic figure, and, as with Luke, it should not be restricted to referring either to his empowerment for prophetic speech or to an individual's conversion/initiation into the messianic kingdom.

Among the Synoptics, Matthew provides us with the longest account of Jesus' baptism (Mt 3:13-17) and agrees with Mark on the more "subjective" description of the event: "the heaven was opened [for him], and he saw the Spirit descending and coming upon him like a dove" (Mt 3:16). As with Luke and Mark, Jesus' baptism in Matthew represents his anointing to fulfill his messianic task. The very same Spirit who anointed Jesus for his messianic task now leads him up into the desert (Mt 4:1). This reference to the Spirit simply aims to underscore that Jesus' encounter with the devil was initiated not by the adversary but rather by the very same Spirit who came upon him at his baptism (Charette, however, thinks that Matthew, as Luke, understands the Spirit to be instrumental in Jesus' victorious combat with the devil [Charette, 48-51, 65-67]).

Matthew places Jesus' discussion on the blasphemy against the Spirit in the context of the eschatological fulfillment of God's promise (Mt 12:15-21) and the subsequent exorcism of a man possessed by a *demon as a sign of the final inbreaking of God's kingdom (Mt 12:22-37); hence, the presence of the Spirit in Jesus' ministry "signifies that the kingdom of God has now come" (Charette, 77). To deny the power of the Spirit active in Jesus' liberating work is to place oneself outside of God's restoring and liberating work, and in this sense such an antagonism is "unforgivable."

2.2.2. Mark. Among the Synoptics, Mark has fewest references to the Spirit, but he agrees more or less with Matthew on the role of the Spirit at Jesus' baptism (Mk 1:10; cf. Mt 3:16) and in the temptation narrative (Mk 1:12; cf. Mt 4:1), as well as in regard to the Baptist's saying about the coming one's baptism by the Spirit (Mk 1:8; cf. Mt 3:11 [Matthew: Spirit and fire]) and Jesus' saying about blaspheming the Spirit (Mk 3:29; cf. Mt 12:31). He also agrees with Matthew in attributing David's utterance (Ps 110:1) to the inspiration of the Spirit (Mk 12:36; cf. Mt 22:43; see also Lk 12:11-12; 21:15; surprisingly, Luke omits the note that David spoke "in the Spirit" [Lk 20:42]).

3. The Gospel of John.

3.1. The Spirit Endowment of Jesus. After the prologue, John's narrative opens with the account of the Baptist and his saying about the Spirit coming upon and remaining on Jesus (Jn 1:32-34). The evangelist does not tell his readers that Jesus was baptized, and he indicates that the descending and remaining of the Spirit upon Jesus seems more to have been a sign for the Baptist, who, having seen it, now can testify to the Son of God (rather than a voice from heaven testifying to Jesus as in the other Gospels). Further, John's water baptism is placed less in contrast to Jesus' Spirit baptism but rather points toward it: "And I myself did not know him, but for the purpose that he may be revealed I myself came baptizing with water" (Jn 1:31). This coming and remaining of the Spirit upon Jesus from the beginning of the Gospel ties the Spirit closely to Jesus, the bearer and the giver of it (Jn 20:22-23). According to John, Jesus, however, will give the Spirit only after his death: "This he said concerning the Spirit which those who believe in him were to receive; for there was no [Holy] Spirit yet because Jesus was not yet glorified" (Jn 7:39). There is another way by which John expresses the close proximity of the Spirit to Jesus, to which we now turn.

3.2. The Life-giving Power of the Spirit. In John's Gospel (eternal) life is associated not only with Jesus (e.g., Jn 1:4; 3:15; 11:25), but also with the word of God and the Spirit of God (Jn 3:5-7, 34; 6:63-68; cf. Is 32:15-18; 43:9; Zech 14:8). In John 7:37-39 the living *water flowing from Jesus (?), and thereby bringing forth new life, is equated with the Spirit. Whether or not the saying about the living water flowing from "his" belly may refer to Jesus' death at the cross, as both T. G. Brown and J. Levison argue, it is quite obvious that the Spirit is associated with both the word and the water that accomplishes the eschatological cleansing and re-creation as anticipated in Ezekiel 36:25-26. As such, it may be best to understand John 7:38 as being fulfilled in John 19:30 (differently, Buch-Hansen, who understands Johannine pneumatology mainly in terms of a Stoic background).

There are two other passages in which John highlights the life-giving power of the Spirit: John 3:3-8; 20:19-23. In John 3:3 the evangelist defines the newness of life as "being born from above" (Jn 3:3), which Nicodemus understands as temporal, "being born again" (see New Birth). Jesus corrects this temporal understanding by defining the new birth as "of water and of spirit" (Jn 3:5, 8 [both times using the preposition ek]). There is some debate as to whether "of water" refers to (1) natural birth followed by spiritual birth; (2) John's water baptism followed by reception of the Spirit; (3) Christian baptism. If John 3:5 qualifies John 3:3 (being born anōthen), the first option is ruled out because "of water and of spirit" is equal to "from above" (contra Brown) and thus cannot refer to natural birth. The third option is the least possible because any reference to a Christian baptism would have made no sense to Nicodemus. The second option is also not convincing, and it seems best to understand the saying along the line of L. Belleville's argument that it is influenced by Ezekiel 36:25-26 and its promise of a new heart sprinkled by clean water and the reception of a new spirit. Hence, being "born of water and of spirit" means to participate in the eschatological fulfillment of God's promise; it is coming to life again after a period of death and drought, because God breathes once more his spirit into that which is without life and which he himself has purified with clean water.

In John 20:19-23 almost all of the main themes of this Gospel are tied together and brought to a climax. John reports that Jesus, after having breathed (enephyssēsen) on the disciples, said to them, "Receive [the] Holy Spirit" (Jn 20:22). This clearly alludes to Genesis 2:7 and Ezekiel 37:5, 14 (LXX) and thereby places the entire pericope into the context of the Spirit as God's life-giving power, both at creation and in the eschatological re-creation of God's people as God's *temple. Any attempt to interpret John 20:21 either as John's account of Pentecost or the disciples' rebirth (so Brown) or ordination falls short of the eschatological vista of the text. According to John, the disciples are clean because of the word spoken by Christ (Jn 15:3), and they are consecrated by the Spirit to speak the life-giving word that they heard from Christ to this world, or to withhold it. In John 20:21 the Spirit's presence in the lives of the disciples guarantees that their mission is the continuation of Jesus' restoring and life-giving ministry (Jn 16:5-16).

3.3. The Paraclete in Jesus' Farewell Discourse.

In his farewell discourse (Jn 13-17) Jesus promises his disciples "another paraclete [paraklētos]" (Jn 14:16). The Spirit will guarantee the disciples the continuing presence of and access to God, and as such, the new paraclete continues the role of Jesus in the disciples lives (cf. Jn 20:19-23). In order to avoid any specific religious-historical figure as the explanation for John's paraclete, Brown advances the concept of a broker, as known in the Mediterranean culture, who primarily mediates access to certain "benefits from a patron who possesses these benefits"; John's paraclete guarantees the disciples continuous access to Jesus, who in turn continues to be a paraclete on behalf of the disciples (Brown, 211).

According to Levison, the first of Jesus' sayings about the paraclete (Jn 14:16-17) sums up the following ones and determines the perspective from which these (Jn 15:26; 16:7-9) must be viewed (Levison, 382-83). While D. Pastorelli understands the "Spirit of truth" as leading the disciples into all truth rather generally speaking and connoting a moral perspective (Pastorelli, 295), Levison concludes that "the spirit, when it arrives, will teach the disciples all and remind them of all (14:26) and guide them into all truth of Jesus' death and resurrection (16:13)" (Levison, 405). His argument is directly building upon his assessment that according to John, the Spirit will be given only after Jesus' death. This "current absence of the Spirit" also reflects John's major difference from the Qumran texts of the two spirits: "In the Teaching on the Two Spirits, although the spirit of truth within is tempered by the spirit of deceit, with which it battles, it is nonetheless present within as the source of a life of virtue. In the Fourth Gospel . . . there is no corresponding group of people who bask in the light. There is no group—not yet, anyway—with the spirit of truth in it" (Levison, 390). But there will be such a group, and the paraclete will recall for them the significance of Jesus' death and resurrection.

4. Summary.

Although each of the Gospels reflects its own particular outlook on the Spirit, their pneumatologies are in one way or another a corollary of the OT understanding of the Spirit as the creative and restoring power of God. This restoration, accomplished by the Spirit-endowed Jesus, will bring about a renewed and cleansed community (Spirit-and-fire baptism in the Synoptics; the cleansing as anticipated in Ezek 36—37 in John). Hence, in the Synoptics, to resist Jesus' restoring and liberating work is to blaspheme the Spirit. Within this eschatological framework, Luke, among the Synoptics, places most weight on the Spirit and links it with his social-ethical concern and his emphasis on prayer.

In all four Gospels the Spirit is further related in some way to God's creative and powerful word, which is able to transform realities (prophetic speech in the Synoptic Gospels; the life-giving and cleansing word in John).

Both Luke (seeing Luke-Acts as a two-volume work) and John accentuate most the (future) role of the Spirit in the disciples' lives as the continuation of Jesus' presence in and his ministry through them.

See also ASCENSION OF JESUS; AUTHORITY AND POWER; BAPTISM; CHRISTOLOGY; EXILE AND RESTORATION; GOD; HEALING; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; NEW BIRTH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. Belleville, "Born of Water and Spirit": John 3:5," TJ 1 (1980) 125-41; T. G. Brown, Spirit in the Writings of John: Johannine Pneumatology in Social-Scientific Perspective (JSNTSup 253; London: T & T Clark, 2003); G. Buch-Hansen, "It Is the Spirit That Gives Life": A Stoic Understanding of Pneuma in John's Gospel (BZNT 173; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2010); G. Burge, The Anointed Community: The Holy Spirit in the Johannine Tradition (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); B. Charette, Restoring Presence: The Spirit in Matthew's Gospel (JPTS 18; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); Y. Cho, Spirit and Kingdom in the Writings of Luke and Paul: An Attempt to Reconcile These Concepts (PBM; Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2005); J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit: A Re-examination of the New Testament Teaching on the Gift of the Spirit in Relation to Pentecostalism Today (London: SCM, 1970); J. Hur, A Dynamic Reading of the Holy Spirit in Luke-Acts (JSNTSup 211; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); G. Johnston, The Spirit-Paraclete in the Gospel of John (SNTSMS 12; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970); A. J. Kuecker, The Spirit and the 'Other': Social Identity, Ethnicity and Intergroup Reconciliation in Luke-Acts (LNTS 44; London: T & T Clark, 2011); J. Levison, Filled with the Spirit (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); R. P. Menzies, The Development of Early Christian Pneumatology: With Special Reference to Luke-Acts (JSNTSup 54; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991); D. Pastorelli, Le Paraclet dans le corpus Johannique (BZNT 142; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2006); J. M. Penney, The Missionary Emphasis of Lukan Pneumatology (JPTS 12; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997); E. B. Powery, "The Spirit, the Scripture(s) and the Gospel of Mark: Pneumatology and Hermeneutics in Narrative Perspectives," JPT 11 (2003) 184-198; E. Schweizer, "πνεῦμα," TDNT 6.389-455; J. B. Shelton, Mighty in Word and Deed: The Role of the Holy Spirit in Luke-Acts (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); C. Strecker, "Zugänge zum Unzugänglich: ‘Geist’ als Thema neutestamentlicher Forschung,” ZNW 13 (2010) 3-20; M. Turner, Power from on High: The Spirit in Israel’s Restoration and Witness in Luke-Acts (JPTSUP 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); M. Wenk, Community-Forming Power: The Socio-Ethical Role of the Spirit in Luke-Acts (JPTSUP 19; London: T & T Clark, 2000); E. J. Woods, The “Finger of God” and Pneumatology in Luke-Acts (JSNTSUP 205; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001).

M. Wenk

HOSPITALITY. See TABLE FELLOWSHIP.

HOUSEHOLD. See FAMILY; ECONOMICS.

HYMNS. See SONGS AND HYMNS.

HYPOCRITE

The word hypocrite is the transliteration of the Greek noun hypokritēs. In nonbiblical Greek the root hypokrin- means “to answer, respond” (cf. the use of apokrin- in the NT). In theatrical contexts hypokritēs could mean “actor” (Aristotle, Rhet. 3.2.4), and hypokrisis “delivery” (Aristotle, Rhet. 3.1.7). In other nonbiblical contexts, hypokrisis could mean “pretense,” a military feint (Appian, Hist. rom. 7.19) or feigned acts of friendship (Plutarch, Adul. amic. 50.4). In the LXX, in other Second Temple era Jewish texts in Greek, and in the NT hypokrisis and hypokritēs always have a negative connotation.

1. “Hypocrite” in the Septuagint and Old Testament Pseudepigrapha
2. “Hypocrite” in the Gospels

1. “Hypocrite” in the Septuagint and Old Testament Pseudepigrapha.

Hypokrisis, hypokritēs and forms of the verb hypokrinomai appear relatively infrequently in the LXX. In some cases, the word group connotes pretense: Antiochus pretends to come to Jerusalem in peace (2 Macc 5:25); Eleazar, under threat of torture, refuses to pretend to eat pork (2 Macc 6:21, 24-25; 4 Macc 6:15, 17); hypocrites who act holy in order to be people pleasers should be cursed by God (Pss. Sol. 4:7-8, 20). A slightly different sense is having one’s loyalties divided between God and something else. Sirach 1:28-29 treats as parallel the hypocrite and the one who, from a divided heart, is disobedient. Testament of Benjamin, a polemic against double-mindedness, includes hypocrisy in a list of things the person focused on God will not do (T. Benj. 6:5). In other cases, “hypocrite” seems to be a more broadly negative term, equivalent to “godless” or “disobedient.” In Job 34:30 “hypocrite” appears to contrast God’s steadiness and integrity with human untrustworthiness. Job 36:13 likewise uses “hypocrites in [their] heart” as a parallel to the “godless” (asebeis) who take bribes and commit injustice against the poor, and who refuse to repent when disciplined. In Sirach 32:15 a hypocrite is a person who stumbles over the Torah rather than seeking out God’s direction. A hypocrite, who hates the law, is as directionless as “a boat in a storm” (Sir 33:2).

2. “Hypocrite” in the Gospels.

In the NT, Matthew has more than half of the instances of “hypocrite” and other words derived from the same root (fourteen in all); Mark has two instances, Luke has five, and Galatians, 1 Timothy, and 1 Peter each has one. All three instances in the epistles mean “duplicity,” and 1 Peter 2:1 is the only place in the NT where “hypocrisy” is found in a vice list (albeit a very short one).

2.1. “Hypocrite” in Mark. In Mark 7:6 “hypocrites” substitute human traditions for God’s commands, honoring God verbally but without any real commitment. In Mark 12:15 “hypocrisy” describes a question asked for false motives, which Jesus recognizes and deflects. Both Markan uses appear to derive from the “pretense” part of the word group’s domain.

2.2. “Hypocrite” in Luke. Luke 20:20 changes Mark’s “knowing their hypokrisis” (Mk 12:15) to a circumstantial participle (“acting hypocritically”) without changing the connotation of duplicity. Luke 12:1, where Jesus identifies the Pharisees’ influence on the crowds as “hypocrisy,” follows Jesus’ second meal with Pharisees, during which Jesus lambasted them for misplaced priorities (Lk 11:39-52). Angered, they begin to try hard to trip him up under intense interrogation (Lk 11:53-54); “hypocrisy” therefore could describe questions with hidden agendas, as it does at Luke 20:20, or could refer to their hostility to Jesus, arising as it does from overvaluing Torah study, reputation and social status. Luke’s other three uses make “hypocrite” an epithet: those who overly focus on the mistakes of others and ignore their own failings, those who can recognize a coming storm but not the presence of God’s *kingdom, and those who would forbid healing on *Sabbath are all hypocrites. In these three examples “hypocrite” questions not motives but rather acumen: the disciples, crowds and synagogue leader are indicted for being imperceptive of God’s presence in Jesus’ words and deeds.

2.3. “Hypocrite” in Matthew. Matthew much prefers the vocative “hypocrite” to other forms of the word group. Matthew 15:7 makes Mark’s “about you hypocrites" (Mk 7:6) into a vocative "hypocrites," while Matthew 22:18 changes Mark's "knowing their hypocrisy" (Mk 12:15) into a vocative: "Hypocrites, why are you testing me?" Matthew 7:5 (// Lk 6:42) also reads "You hypocrite!" raising the possibilities that the vocative "hypocrite" was a feature of Q that Matthew adopted, or that this feature of Matthean style in Luke argues for Luke's use of Matthew.

In the *Sermon on the Mount "the hypocrites" are those who perform normal religious acts—alms-giving, *prayer, *fasting—in a way designed to draw public attention to the actor and in order to be praised by others (Mt 6:2, 5, 16; see also Did. 8:1-2). The hypocrites, who are not addressed by the text and are outsiders serving as negative examples, "have their reward" in the praise that they receive and should expect nothing else from God. In this case, the problem is the "hypocrite's" motive, and the remedy offered is, apparently, doing all of one's pious acts secretly. This strategy might eliminate human praise as a motivation, but it also would eliminate the exemplary and community-building potential of visible piety, and thus many interpreters wonder if the total secrecy urged here is hyperbolic.

In Matthew 7:5 (// Lk 6:42) any person who tries to correct someone else without first engaging in self-correction is called "hypocrite." These are insiders, and so the problem is not motive—the person with the log may be compassionately trying to remove the speck—but rather a lack of self-awareness.

Half of Matthew's fourteen instances of the root hypokrin- are in Matthew 23. In this polemic, the "scribes and Pharisees" fail to follow their own teachings (Mt 23:2-4), and their acts of piety are done for show (Mt 23:5-7). The epithet "hypocrite" thus has the sense of pretense, but the indictment is broader: the *Pharisees are criticized for misplaced priorities (Mt 23:23-24), lack of integrity (Mt 23:25-28), incorrect exegesis (Mt 23:16-22), and being implacable enemies of Jesus and his followers (Mt 23:13-15, 29-36).

Some commentators (e.g., Neyrey) consider "hypocrite" in Matthew to be purely mudslinging, devoid of any specific meaning. Others (Betz; Garland) consider "hypocrite" to reveal something about Matthew's objection to the way the "Pharisees," stand-ins for Jewish groups who oppose or compete with Matthew's group, practice their faith. The stylized "Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!" (Mt 23:13, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29) is unique to Matthew, and since "hypocrite" does not appear to have been a favorite epithet for early Christians to fling at enemies, its frequency in Matthew is both redactional and not meaningless. That is, because Matthew could have put any slur in Jesus' mouth but chose to emphasize the relatively uncommon "hypocrite," it seems likely that Matthew's community saw the insincerity of the "Pharisees" as the main reason why they rejected Jesus.

See also BLASPHEMY; PHARISEES; SCRIBES; SIN, SINNER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. D. Betz, The Sermon on the Mount: A Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, Including the Sermon on the Plain (Matthew 5:3-7:27 and Luke 6:20-49), ed. A. Y. Collins (Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); D. E. Garland, The Intention of Matthew 23 (NovTSup 52; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1979); I. H. Marshall, "Who Is a Hypocrite?" BSac 159 (2002) 131-50; J. H. Neyrey, Honor and Shame in the Gospel of Matthew (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998).

R. B. Vinson

I

“I AM” SAYINGS

The four canonical Gospels contain several pronouncements that feature the Greek phrase egō eimi (“I am”). Since only the verbal form (eimi) is required in Greek to express the words “I am,” the inclusion of the personal pronoun (egō) gives prominence to the words of the speaker. In the Synoptic Gospels and particularly in John’s Gospel, where “I am” declarations occur with striking frequency, the authoritative egō eimi statements pronounced by Jesus can possess profound christological significance.

1. Synoptic Gospels
2. John’s Gospel

1. Synoptic Gospels.

In some cases “I am,” as uttered by Jesus or other figures, is accompanied by a predicate (e.g., Mt 24:5: “I am the Christ”; cf. Mt 22:32; Lk 1:19; 24:39), while on other occasions an implied predicate can be identified from the context (e.g., Mt 26:22, 25: “Surely it [the one who will betray Jesus] is not I?” [mēti egō eimi])). Of particular interest are the three instances in Mark’s Gospel where Jesus’ pronouncement of egō eimi belongs to the narrative’s gradual unfolding of his identity (Mk 6:50; 13:6; 14:62).

On the first occasion Jesus announces to the *disciples as he walks on the sea: “Take heart, it is I [egō eimi]; do not fear” (Mt 14:27 // Mk 6:50). This egō eimi utterance functions not only as Jesus’ statement of self-identification to allay the disciples’ fear (“It’s me, Jesus”), but also as the vehicle whereby he discloses his identity as the one who exercises God’s power to walk on the sea (cf. Job 9:8; Ps 77:20; Hab 3:15). The presence of numerous theophanic motifs within the account (Mk 6:45–52; cf. Ex 14:4, 18) indicates that Jesus’ “I” pronouncement embodies his offer of divine deliverance in the form of a new exodus.

The most enigmatic Markan example of egō eimi occurs in the *eschatological discourse, where Jesus tells his disciples, “Many will come in my name saying

‘I am’ [egō eimi], and they will lead many astray” (Mk 13:6 [cf. Lk 21:8]). These impostors, later identified as false prophets and false messiahs (Mk 13:21–22), are represented as usurping Jesus’ own claim to authority (= egō eimi) as already set out in Mark 6:50 (Williams, 233–41). In a likely historical reference to leaders of popular first-century A.D. movements (see Revolutionary Movements) who sought to initiate a new deliverance patterned on the exodus and the conquest of the land (cf. Josephus, Ant. 20.97, 167–170; J. W. 2.259, 261–263), Mark emphasizes that Jesus alone has the power and authority to fulfill God’s promises.

Finally, when the high priest asks Jesus during his *trial, “Are you the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed?” (Mk 14:61), he responds, “I am [he]” (egō eimi) (Mk 14:62) (see Christ). This forms an affirmative response to the preceding question; Jesus, for the first time in Mark’s Gospel, publicly or openly confirms his identity according to the categories (“Messiah” and “Son of God”) that sum up Mark’s understanding of Jesus (see Mk 1:1, 11; 3:11; 5:7; 9:7; 15:39).

2. John’s Gospel.

Among the “I” formulations that characterize the speeches of the Johannine Jesus are a number of egō eimi declarations, for which at least three patterns of usage are commonly identified: (1) “I am” is accompanied by a predicate (e.g., Jn 15:1: “I am the true vine”); (2) “I am” is self-contained (e.g., Jn 8:28: “When you have lifted up the Son of Man, you will know that I am”); (3) “I am” has an implied predicate recoverable from the immediate context (e.g., Jn 18:5: “I am he [Jesus of Nazareth]”). However, John’s Gospel does not always maintain a hard-and-fast distinction between the second and third categories.

2.1. Metaphorical “I Am” Statements. On seven occasions Jesus makes a self-declaration in which the expression egō eimi is combined with a predicate in the form of a memorable image or concept.

- "I am the bread of life" (Jn 6:35, 48) (cf. Jn 6:41, 51;
- "I am the [living] bread who descends from heaven")
- "I am the light of the world" (Jn 8:12) (cf. Jn 9:5)
- "I am the door (for the sheep)" (Jn 10:7, 9)
- "I am the good shepherd" (Jn 10:11, 14)
- "I am the resurrection and the life" (Jn 11:25)
- "I am the way, the truth and the life" (Jn 14:6)
- "I am the true vine (Jn 15:1, 5)

With regard to form and structure, several of the metaphorical or predicative "I am" declarations are followed, either immediately or in their wider context, by conditional statements highlighting the importance of following Jesus (Jn 6:35, 51; 8:12; 10:9; 11:25-26; cf. Jn 6:48-50; 15:5-6). Sometimes the conditional statement spells out the consequences of belief both positively and negatively (e.g., Jn 8:12 NRSV: "Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness but will have the light of life"). In terms of content, the images ("bread," "light," "vine," "shepherd") attached to "I am" operate on a material level and center on tangible realities, although on a deeper level they point beyond the material objects to Jesus' true identity (see Zimmermann, 126-31). In terms of *christological function, it is necessary to investigate the origin(s) of these metaphorical "I am" sayings as well as their symbolic significance, which usually can be determined from their wider Johannine context.

Given that "I am" sayings are attested in a number of religious traditions in the ancient Near East, a wide range of possible formal parallels has been proposed, from Isis aretologies ("I am Isis, the ruler of every land" [Cyme inscription]) to gnostic texts from Nag Hammadi (e.g., "I am the first and the last" [The Thunder: Perfect Mind]) to Yahweh's "I" declarations in the OT (e.g., "I am your shield" [Gen 15:1]). Some scholars are eager to maintain a broad religious context for the Johannine predicative "I am" sayings in order to highlight their capacity to draw culturally diverse audiences into the Fourth Gospel's distinctive textual and metaphorical worlds (MacRae; Petersen).

As far as thematic affinities are concerned, all the Johannine images attached to "I am" possess striking parallels in the OT and ancient Jewish tradition (see Ball), whether it is the image of Israel as a flock (Ps 77:20; 78:52) (see Shepherd, Sheep) or a vine (Ps 80:8; Jer 2:21; Ezek 17:6-8; cf. Is 5:1-7), of the *Servant of Yahweh as a "light to the nations" who opens the eyes of the blind (Is 42:6-7; 49:6; 51:4), or of *Wisdom inviting people to eat her bread (Prov 9:5) and to eat and drink of the fruits of her vine (Sir 24:17-18) so that they will hunger for more and thirst again (Sir 24:21). The fact that possible referents for the image of "shepherd" include the successor of *Moses (Num 27:17), *God (Ezek 34:11-16; Mic 2:12) and his "servant David" (Ezek 34:23) highlights the difficulty of pinning down the Johannine metaphors to a specific OT passage. It appears likely that John deliberately draws on images that have the potential to evoke more than one referent; what binds these images together is that all of them stem from scriptural promises of divine *salvation.

The network of metaphorical "I am" statements in John's Gospel are similarly linked by the theme of salvation, as all of them focus on Jesus' role as the source and giver of eternal life. Three of the sayings refer explicitly to Jesus in terms of "life" (zōē) ("the bread of life" [Jn 6:35, 48, 51]; "the resurrection and the life" [Jn 11:25]; "the way, the truth and the life" [Jn 14:6]), whereas two other pronouncements contain overt references to "life" in their immediate context (Jn 8:12; 10:9-10). Furthermore, Jesus as shepherd lays down his life for the sheep (Jn 10:11, 15), which is then explained: "I give them [the sheep] eternal life, and they will never perish" (Jn 10:28 NRSV). The connection with "life" is also maintained in the seventh, and final, of the "I am" sayings, where remaining on the vine (= Jesus) is said to sustain the life of the branches (= disciples) and to be the source of their fruitfulness (Jn 15:1-2, 4-5).

The link between the theme of life and Jesus' "I am" claims is sometimes demonstrated by his miraculous deeds ("signs"). Jesus' feeding of the five thousand "signifies" his identity as the *bread of life (Jn 6:1-14, 26-27), and his claim to be the light of the world is exemplified by his subsequent healing of a man born blind (Jn 9:5-41). Jesus' bestowal of eschatological life is most fully explicated in the seventh of the Johannine signs: the raising of *Lazarus to physical life serves as a symbolic enactment of Jesus' claim "I am the resurrection and the life" (Jn 11:25), but also as a concrete manifestation of his earlier promise that "the hour is coming, and now is here, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live" (Jn 5:25 [cf. Jn 11:38-44]).

Given that God is frequently described as the sole giver of *life (cf. Deut 32:39; 1 Sam 2:6; Ps 36:10), and some of the Johannine metaphors are used in the OT as designations for God ("light," "shepherd"), the identification of Jesus with these life-evoking images amounts to a christological appropriation of the role traditionally ascribed to God alone. The emphatic nature of the formulation ("I am") thus articulates the exclusiveness of Jesus' claim to embody the revelatory and salvific presence of God.

2.2. Absolute "I Am" Statements. A second pattern of usage centers on Jesus' declarations in which egō eimi occurs without a predicate. In these statements, commonly referred to as "absolute" egō eimi pronouncements, Jesus employs the phrase "I am" without, it seems, clearly identifying what it is he claims to be. He declares to his opponents, "Unless you believe that I am, you will die in your sins" (Jn 8:24 [cf. Jn 8:28]), and they pick up stones to kill Jesus upon hearing him proclaim, "Before Abraham was, I am" (Jn 8:58). And when Jesus predicts his imminent betrayal, he informs his disciples: "I tell you this now, before it occurs, so that when it does occur, you may believe that I am" (Jn 13:19).

There is much debate about the origin and significance of these enigmatic absolute "I am" statements, for which there are, in contrast to their metaphorical counterparts, no non-Jewish parallels. It has been claimed that John's use of egō eimi in its bipartite form echoes God's revelation of his name to Moses, "I am who I am" (Ex 3:14a [Heb. 'ehyeh 'āšer 'ehyeh]), which is rendered in the LXX as egō eimi ho ōn ("I am the one who is") (see Odeberg, 308-10; Fossum, 127-28). It should be noted, however, that LXX Exodus 3:14 gives greater prominence to ho ōn than egō eimi, as Yahweh directs Moses to tell the people, "He who is' [ho ōn] has sent me to you." If Exodus 3:14 has influenced John's use of egō eimi in its absolute form, this probably has occurred indirectly through other divine self-declarations in the OT that can provide a more adequate explanation of Jesus' words.

The key that appears to unlock the meaning of the bipartite Johannine "I am" statements is the distinctive use of egō eimi in the LXX versions of the Song of Moses (Deut 32:39) and the prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah (Is 41:4; 43:10, 25; 46:4; 51:12; cf. Is 45:18; 52:6) to render Yahweh's proclamation of his exclusive divinity and eternal sovereignty: "I am he" (Heb. 'anī hū'). The presentation of egō eimi as the object of belief (Jn 8:24; 13:19) and knowledge (Jn 8:28) finds its closest parallel in LXX Isaiah 43:10, where Yahweh calls upon Israel to act as his witnesses, "so that you may know and believe and understand that I am [egō eimi]" (see Ball, 188-95; Williams, 271-73). Several other thematic and structural parallels strongly suggest that John has consciously reflected on both the setting and significance of "I am" as the self-declaration of God. In Isaiah's trial speeches some of the arguments presented as proof that Yahweh alone is God bear close resemblance to the context of Jesus' egō eimi declarations. Like Yahweh, Jesus exists from eternity (Jn 8:58; cf. Is 41:4; 43:13; 48:12), he is able to foretell and control events (Jn 13:19; cf. Is 43:9-10; 46:10-11), he offers salvation to those who believe in him (Jn 8:28; cf. Is 41:4; 46:4; 48:12), although those who reject him face condemnation (Jn 8:24). Central to Jesus' claim is his unique divine status: he can declare egō eimi because he is the eternal Word incarnate, the heavenly emissary, the Son, who speaks and acts in unity with the Father.

It is also possible that when Jesus claims to have been given God's name and to have manifested it during his earthly mission (Jn 17:6, 11, 12, 16), the name in question is egō eimi as a rendering for the Hebrew declaration 'anī hū' (see Brown, 1:533-38; 2:755-56). In addition to extensive Jewish evidence for the use of hū ("he") as a substitute for the Tetragrammaton (e.g., 1QS VIII, 13; m. Sukkah 4:5), those cases where the LXX reads egō eimi egō eimi (LXX Is 43:25; 51:12) could well have prompted John to interpret the second occurrence as the divine name: "I am 'I AM'" (see Dodd, 94).

2.3. "I Am" Statements with an Implied Predicate. Another cluster of Johannine egō eimi declarations are commonly categorized as statements of self-identification because a predicate can be supplied from the immediate context (Jn 4:26; 6:20; 18:5, 6, 8). Thus, the Samaritan woman's remark "I know that the Messiah is coming" leads Jesus to announce, "I am he, the one who is speaking to you" (egō eimi ho lalōn soi) (Jn 4:25-26). In other words, Jesus identifies himself as the Messiah, who will "proclaim all things" (Jn 4:25). He offers a similar response to the arresting party when they state that they are looking for "Jesus of Nazareth"; once again it is appropriate, at least in formal terms, to interpret Jesus' words as affirmation that he is the figure in question: "I am he [Jesus of Nazareth]" (Jn 18:5, 6, 8). Numerous parallels to this usage of egō eimi (e.g., LXX 2 Sam 2:20; T. Job 29:4; 31:6; Mk 14:62; Jn 9:9) indicate that, as a declaration of identity, it does not necessarily possess christological significance.

It is likely, however, that John, on these occasions, engages in a deliberate interplay of the various possible meanings of egō eimi, from its use in everyday speech to its more theologically charged function as a divine self-declaration. For example, not only do Jesus' words in John 4:26 bear resemblance to Yahweh's proclamation in LXX Is 52:6 (egō eimi autos ho lalōn), but also the pivotal position of Jesus' declaration within the scene suggests that egō eimi encapsulates all that he has hitherto revealed to the woman about himself (Jn 4:10-26). Similarly, the theophanic connotations of Jesus' pronouncement of egō eimi as he walks on the sea (Jn 6:20) indicate that this occasion of divine self-manifestation ("I am; do not fear" [cf. Is 41:10, 13; 43:1]) is what enables the disciples to move from the darkness (cf. Is 42:16) and reach the safety of the other side (cf. Is 43:16; 51:10). The polyvalent force of egō eimi finds its most dramatic demonstration in the account of Jesus' arrest, where the soldiers' response of drawing back and falling to the ground (Jn 18:6) demonstrates Jesus' sovereign control over the events leading to his death. Indeed, Jesus' twofold pronouncement of egō eimi in this scene serves as a powerful exemplification of the claims linked to this elusive expression elsewhere in John, for it encapsulates the Johannine presentation of Jesus as the one in whom God is revealed and his promises are fulfilled.

See also BREAD; CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; LIFE, ETERNAL LIFE; LIGHT AND DARKNESS; SHEPHERD, SHEEP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. M. Ball, "I Am" in John's Gospel: Literary Function, Background and Theological Implications (JSNTSup 124; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (2 vols.; AB 29, 29A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966); C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953); J. E. Fossum, "In the Beginning Was the Name: Onomanology as the Key to Johannine Christology," in The Image of the Invisible God: Essays on the Influence of Jewish Mysticism on Early Christology (NTOA 30; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995) 109-33; E. Harris, Prologue and Gospel: The Theology of the Fourth Evangelist (JSNTSup 107; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 130-54; G. W. MacRae, "The Ego-Proclamation in Gnostic Sources," in The Trial of Jesus: Cambridge Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, ed. E. Bammel (London: SCM Press, 1970) 122-34; H. Odeberg, The Fourth Gospel: Interpreted in Its Relation to Contemporaneous Religious Currents in Palestine and the Hellenistic-Oriental World (Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1929); S. Petersen, Brot, Licht und Weinstock: Intertextuelle Analysen johanneischer Ich-bin-Worte (NovTSup 127; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008); R. Schnackenburg, The Gospel According to St. John (3 vols.; London: Burns & Oates, 1980), 2:79-89; C. H. Williams, I Am He: The Interpretation of 'anī hū' in Jewish and Early Christian Literature (WUNT 2/113; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); idem, "'I Am' or 'I Am He'? Self-Declaratory Pronouncements in the Fourth Gospel and Rabbinic Tradition," in Jesus in Johannine Tradition, ed.

R. T. Fortna and T. Thatcher (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001) 343-52; R. Zimmermann, Christologie der Bilder im Johannesevangelium: Die Christopoetik des vierten Evangeliums unter besonderer Berücksichtigung von Joh 10 (WUNT 171; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004).

C. H. Williams

ILLNESS. See HEALING.

IMMINENT ESCHATOLOGY. See ESCHATOLOGY.

INAUGURATED ESCHATOLOGY. See ESCHATOLOGY.

INCARNATION

The Council of Chalcedon insisted in A.D. 451 that Jesus Christ was not two persons (prosōpa) but rather a single person (prosōpon), made known in two natures (physeis), human and divine. This careful formula for describing the incarnation came only after centuries of reflection and debate regarding the precise selection and careful definition of key terms. A similar concern for precision accompanies the writing of an article such as this one. Four issues are particularly problematic. First, historical questions loom large. Some scholars see high *Christology only in later NT documents (Dunn), while others see such beliefs very early (Hurtado). Second, some scholars require a clear statement regarding the pre-existence of Christ before they will identify something as specifically incarnational (Brown, 141). Third, many issues occupied the NT authors, and not all authors were equally focused in a singular way on the incarnation, even in an inchoate fashion. Fourth is the issue of genre. As narratives, Gospels do not systematically articulate their doctrines in the manner of theological treatises or creeds. For many reasons, therefore, it is difficult to discern the classic doctrine of the incarnation in a given Gospel. And yet, if the Gospels do not express the doctrine of the incarnation in its classic form, they can be read to contain a doctrine of the incarnation. Or rather, the canonical Gospels represent several searching attempts to demonstrate that the human Jesus of Nazareth was *God in the flesh.

1. The Gospel of John
2. The Synoptic Gospels
3. Conclusion

1. The Gospel of John.

John 1:14 offers the most explicit statement about the incarnation in the NT: "The Word became flesh."

1.1. The Dialectical Theology of John. To call Jesus “the Word” (ho logos) implies a high Christology. The term * logos has a history too rich to be explored in any depth here (see Tobin), but for present purposes it is enough to say what the prologue to John’s Gospel says. All things were created through the Word; the Word was with God; the Word was God (Jn 1:1-2). Applying this term to the preincarnate Jesus corresponds to Jesus’ claim later in John’s Gospel: “The Father and I are one” (Jn 10:30). On the other hand, to say that Jesus took on flesh is to evoke an image of lowliness. Here “flesh” (sarx) refers to mundane human existence, as opposed to the heavenly existence of the Spirit (see Jn 3:6; 6:63). This corresponds to Jesus’ comment later in John’s Gospel: “The Father is greater than I” (Jn 14:28). Thus, in the brief statement of John 1:14 we see the high and the low poles of Johannine Christology, and both poles continue to be held in tension throughout this Gospel.

How does the body of John’s Gospel coordinate these elements? Prominent interpreters have argued that they are not coordinated at all. R. Bultmann famously focused his attention on Jesus’ humanity and insisted that the Word incarnate is nothing but a human being (Bultmann, 40-49). The incarnation implies that any contact with the divine Logos is impossible through the human Jesus. For Bultmann, then, the emphasis of John’s Christology was found in the first half of John 1:14: “The Word became flesh.”

At the other extreme, E. Käsemann insisted that the Fourth Gospel actually reflects a “naïve docetism,” wherein Jesus’ humanity was only on the level of appearances and was not real. Käsemann drew his inspiration from the latter half of John 1:14: “And we beheld his glory.” Jesus’ humanity, for Käsemann, was not important for Johannine Christology, and Jesus was simply “God striding over the earth,” revealing his divine glory (for a detailed response to Käsemann, see Thompson).

Each side of this divide finds support for its position somewhere in John’s Gospel. For example, Jesus is referred to as God both at the beginning (Jn 1:1, 18) and at the end (Jn 20:28), and he repeatedly employs the “I am” phrase of Exodus 3:14, which identifies the God of Israel (Jn 8:24, 28, 58). On the other hand, Jesus’ fleshly incarnation is given equal attention (Jn 1:14), especially when Jesus dies and a special point is made of providing eyewitness testimony that blood and water actually poured from his wound (Jn 19:34). Thomas even touches the flesh of the risen Jesus (Jn 20:27). How does one resolve this tension?

It is important to recognize that Christology is not the only theological matter in John that operates in this fashion. For example, Johannine eschatology has both a realized and a future character, as exemplified in John 5:25: “Very truly, I tell you, the hour is coming, and is now here, when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live.” Thus, Jesus can refer both to the future life that believers will enjoy (Jn 11:25; 14:23) and to the present reality of their new life: “Very truly, I tell you, anyone who hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life, and does not come under judgment, but has passed from death to life” (Jn 5:24). The same applies to signs and faith in John. Signs are supposed to lead to belief (Jn 20:31), and they do so (Jn 2:11), but some who believe are rejected or rebuked (Jn 2:23-25; 4:48). All major theological topics in John reflect the same tension (see Anderson, 314-17).

A key to unlocking these theological tensions appears in John 12:36, where Jesus announces, “While you have the light, believe in the light, so that you may become children of light.” But after emphasizing images of light and illumination, the evangelist says, “After Jesus had said this, he departed and hid from them.” The moment of revelation is also a moment of concealment. C. K. Barrett refers to this as the “dialectical theology” of the Fourth Gospel, in which opposing statements contradict one another, and the contradictions are not resolved in order to push theological reflection to a higher plane (Barrett, 67). This method seems to reflect the radical character of the incarnation. When God becomes mortal, when eternity enters time, and when the Creator enters the creation, the categories of reality are shattered. Such a phenomenon cannot be systematically explained. A narrative Gospel is such a rich vehicle for depicting the incarnation for precisely this reason. Narrative can accomplish what a treatise struggles to lay out systematically.

1.2. Glory and the Incarnation. The disagreement between Bultmann and Käsemann over the relative value of the two clauses in John 1:14 is instructive for other aspects of the incarnation as well. When John 1:14 closes by asserting, “We have beheld his glory,” the term “glory” refers to the events of the hour of Jesus’ death and resurrection (e.g., Jn 12:31; 13:31; 17:1). Thus, the Word becomes flesh and reveals his glory—on the cross. The incarnation and the human life of Jesus in John must be understood to be inherently connected to Jesus’ death (Thompson). Käsemann did not see this connection, for at least two reasons. First, in keeping with his docetic reading of John, Käsemann believed that “the passion comes into view in John only at the very end,” and that John simply forces “the features of Christ’s victory upon the passion story” (Käsemann, 7). This is true, but only partly so. Christ’s victory certainly is pressed upon the passion when Jesus announces, “In this world you will have trouble, but take heart; I have overcome the world” (Jn 16:33). But if Christ’s victory is pressed upon the passion, John also presses the passion upon the entire incarnate life of Christ. The death of Jesus comes into view well before the very end. This is obvious in many ways, but especially in John’s rich and varied use of imagery to describe Jesus. Images are not only piled upon one another, but also modified and made multivalent. As he prepares to depart from the world, for example, Jesus refers to the “way” on which he travels (Jn 14:4). But then suddenly, instead of speaking of the way on which he travels, Jesus insists, “I am the way” (Jn 14:6). The image of the way is not one thing, but many. And yet, as image is piled upon image, and as each image is turned this way or that to reveal new complexities and meaning, our focus is not distracted, but rather sharpened—on the cross. H. Attridge writes, “The cross lurks in and around many, if not all, of the images in the gospel. . . . I would suggest that the gospel as a whole might be construed as one large cubist image, refracting the cross through other images, of light, water, shepherds, ladders, snakes” (Attridge, 54). The image of water, for example, flows throughout the early chapters of John’s Gospel, and it means many things. But this complexity and confusion associated with water are clarified on the cross when water pours out with blood from Jesus’ wound in the passion (Jn 19:34). “The water that works with the spirit to give new birth flows finally from the cross” (Attridge, 9). Other major images in John operate similarly, pointing to the cross throughout Jesus’ earthly life.

The question of Jesus’ glory is the second issue forming Käsemann’s views about the death of Jesus. For, if Jesus reveals his glory on the cross, this revelation of glory is redundant and irrelevant, since Jesus already reveals his glory at Cana (Jn 2:11). This claim does not account, however, for John’s postresurrection perspective. John makes it clear that things after the hour of Jesus’ glorification are different from before the hour (Jn 7:39), and the significance of Jesus’ earthly life is understood only after the events of the hour (Jn 2:22; 12:16). And yet, the clear scheme separating the “before and after” of the hour often is violated, especially in the farewell discourse (Jn 13–17). Jesus there claims that he has already been glorified (Jn 13:31), but then conversely prays, “Father, the hour has come; glorify your son” (Jn 17:1 [cf. Jn 17:5]). Or, Jesus can announce his imminent departure by saying, “In a little while, the world will no longer see me” (Jn 14:19), but then he announces that he has already left: “And I am no longer in the world” (Jn 17:11). The same postresurrection perspective lies behind the revelation of glory in John 2. Because the incarnate life of Jesus culminates in the cross, the glory of the cross is visible throughout that incarnate life: “The time is coming and now is” (Jn 5:25). And yet, this is not so because the cross is irrelevant, but rather because it is hyperrelevant. It is the culmination of the incarnation. The Word became flesh in order to reveal his glory (Jn 1:14).

2. The Synoptic Gospels.

Do the Synoptic Gospels reflect such careful attention to the enfleshment of God in the human Jesus as John does? How might the Synoptic Gospels communicate implicitly things that are more explicit in John? To answer these questions, it is first important to recognize that no other Gospel envisages Jesus as a preexistent being as the Gospel of John does. If incarnation depends completely on a notion of preexistence, then we cannot see the incarnation in any Gospel but John’s. And yet, there is still much to say. The birth narratives of Matthew and Luke are especially suggestive in this regard (see Birth of Jesus). This does not mean, though, that the idea of virginal conception per se implies the incarnation of God. Philo, for instance, refers to the miraculous conceptions of Sarah and Zipporah without implying that those born from them are divine (Cher. 47). But additional elements in both Matthew and Luke’s birth narratives suggest and imply something very close to the incarnational thought of John.

2.1. The Gospel of Luke. This is especially true of Luke, as it has been recently read by K. Rowe. By focusing on Luke’s subtle use of the term “Lord,” Rowe argues that Luke’s Christology is especially closer to John’s claims that “the Word was with God” and “the Word became flesh.” Luke and John may use different terms, but they express something similar (Rowe, 230). The operative term in Luke for showing this is “Lord” (Gk. kyrios), which plays a prominent role in the birth narratives (Rowe, 31–55). Throughout the first two chapters of Luke we hear over twenty references to the God of Israel as the Lord, such as that Zechariah and Elizabeth were “living blamelessly according to all the commandments and regulations of the Lord” (Lk 1:6). It comes as a surprise, then, that Elizabeth suddenly calls Mary “the mother of my Lord” (Lk 1:43). Jesus receives the name of the God of Israel, which tightly identifies Jesus with God. And yet, there is also a distinction between the two, especially when Luke 2:11 couples the title "Lord" with that of "Messiah": "To you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, who is the Messiah, the Lord" (see Christ). This is the first application of the term "Messiah" to Jesus, and it helps us to understand how he is Lord. Throughout the ensuing Gospel, Luke distinguishes between the Lord who is the Father in heaven and Jesus the Lord, the Messiah, on earth. The term "Lord" thus identifies Jesus with the Father but also distinguishes between the two.

2.2. The Gospel of Matthew. The Gospel of Matthew seems to accomplish something similar, but in a different way. In Matthew, however, the operative term is not "Lord" but rather "Emmanuel": "And they shall name him Emmanuel," which means, "God is with us" (Mt 1:23). The phrase here translated "God is with us" is taken from the LXX version of Isaiah 8:8, and its relevance for Matthew has been understood in two different ways (Davies and Allison, 1:217). One way is to render the phrase not as "God is with us," but instead as "with us is God." In this rendering Jesus may make God especially present, but he himself is not God. That Matthew nowhere else calls Jesus "God" supports this reading, and W. Davies and D. Allison prefer this interpretation. They recognize, however, that Matthew 1:23 often is rendered "God is with us" in concert with John 1:1-5; 20:28. This translation finds support in the regular insistence throughout Matthew of the importance of Jesus being "with" his disciples (Mt 18:20; 25:31-46; 28:20). If Jesus is "with" his disciples on earth, God the Father is always spoken of as being in heaven in Matthew (e.g., Mt 6:9). Thus, through his very human (albeit miraculous) birth Jesus is a human being, while he is also in some mysterious sense "God with us." J. Dunn observes of Matthew that here we can see "a concept of incarnation," if only implicitly and not explicitly (Dunn, ABD 3:403).

2.3. The Gospel of Mark. Can Mark be read in a similar fashion? Like John's, Mark's image of Jesus reflects a dialectical tension between knowledge and ignorance, power and weakness, and so forth (Boring, 462). Jesus, for instance, knows that power has left him when a woman touches his garments, but he does not know who touched him (Mk 5:30). In various other ways Jesus is equally associated with, and distinguished from, God. Thus, the language from the psalms (Pss 29:3; 46:3; 65:8) regarding God's victory over violent seas applies to Jesus (Mk 4:35-41), while, on the other hand, it is not up to Jesus to determine who will sit at his right hand (Mk 10:40). Or, only the Father, not Jesus, knows the time of the end (Mk 13:32). Jesus, finally, also dies a painful death on the cross, indicating his humanity. Mark thus seems to hold in tension the high and low poles of Christology. But Mark's emphasis is not where John's is, with such a total focus on the incarnation and its significance. Mark seems primarily concerned to depict a Jesus who is "the basis for redemption and the pattern for his followers" (Hurtado, 311). And yet, given Mark's high Christology, whereby Jesus is regularly associated with God, it is possible with Mark, as it was with Matthew and Luke, to say that something lies implicit in this text that John makes explicit and develops further (Boring, 471).

3. Conclusion.

This article has discussed the incarnation in the Gospels by operating in reverse chronological order, beginning with the document generally considered to be the last written, John, and concluding with the document largely considered to be the first written, Mark. The fact that John, the latest Gospel, contains the most explicit statements on the incarnation might suggest that only later Christology is high Christology. According to this line of argument, Mark, and maybe even Matthew and Luke, present Jesus through the prism of a lower Christology, whereas John elevates Jesus to a status higher than that given to him by the other evangelists. But I believe that this way of reading would be incorrect. Early Christology is high Christology. The earlier Gospels may articulate in different ways the idea that Jesus was God incarnate, but they do seem to express this belief. And their various expressions are not different in kind from that expressed in the Gospel of John. They are different in degree. They leave implicit what John makes explicit.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; JOHN, GOSPEL OF; LOGOS; LORD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. N. Anderson, "On Guessing Points and Naming Stars: Epistemological Origins of John's Christological Tensions," in The Gospel of John and Christian Theology, ed. R. Bauckham and C. Mosser (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 311-45; H. W. Attridge, "The Cubist Principle in Johannine Imagery: John and the Reading of Images in Contemporary Platonism," in Imagery in the Gospel of John: Terms, Forms, Themes, and Theology of Johannine Figurative Language, ed. J. Frey, J. G. van der Watt and R. Zimmermann (WUNT 200; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006) 47-60; C. K. Barrett, "The Dialectical Theology of the Gospel of John," in Essays on John (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982) 49-69; R. Bauckham, Jesus and the God of Israel: God Crucified and Other Studies on the New Testament's Christology of Divine Identity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); M. E. Boring, "Markan Christology: God Language for Jesus?" NTS 45 (1999) 451-71; R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1993); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribner, 1955); S. Coakley, "What Does Chalcedon Solve and What Does It Not? Some Reflections on the Status and Meaning of the Chalcedonian 'Definition,'" in The Incarnation: An Interdisciplinary Symposium on the Incarnation of the Son of God, ed. S. T. Davis, D. Kendall and G. O'Collins, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002) 143-63; W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison Jr., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew (3 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988-1997); S. T. Davis, D. Kendall and G. O'Collins, eds., The Incarnation: An Interdisciplinary Symposium on the Incarnation of the Son of God (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002); J. D. G. Dunn, "Incarnation," ABD 3:397-404; idem, Christology in the Making: An Inquiry into the Origins of the Doctrine of the Incarnation (London: SCM, 1989); L. W. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); E. Käsemann, The Testament of Jesus: A Study of the Gospel of John in the Light of Chapter 17, trans. G. Krodel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); D. Lee, "The Gospel of John and the Five Senses," JBL 129 (2010) 115-27; J. Marcus, Mark 1-8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 27; New York: Doubleday, 2000); idem, Mark 8-16: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AYB 27A; New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009); K. Rowe, Early Narrative Christology: The Lord in the Gospel of Luke (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); D. M. Smith, The Theology of the Gospel of John (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); M. M. Thompson, The Humanity of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); T. Tobin, "Logos," ABD 4:348-56.

G. L. Parsenios

INFANCY GOSPEL OF THOMAS. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

ISAAC. See ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB.

ISRAEL

In the first century A.D. Israel no longer existed as a geopolitical entity, although hope for an independent state was never extinguished. In the pre- and post-A.D. 70 contexts, however, the term "Israel" continued to be primarily used either as an ethnic designation for people of Jewish descent or as a religious designation of the elect who were in a covenantal relationship with their God. Only in the former sense is the term interchangeable with terms such as "Jews" and "Judeans," which regularly appear on the lips of non-Jews. All three meanings—geopolitical, ethnic, religious—are recognizable in the usages of the term "Israel" in the Gospels. The name "Israel" in Luke 4:25-27 refers to the northern kingdom of Israel that eventually was destroyed by Assyria. The expressions "the land of Israel" (Mt 2:20-21) and "the towns of Israel" (Mt 10:23) carry clear geopolitical nuances. The phrase "the twelve tribes of Israel" (Mt 19:28; Lk 22:30) appears in the description of the eschatological vision of the restored Israel (see Exile and Restoration). The interchangeability of the titles "the King of Israel" (Mt 27:42; Mk 15:32; Jn 1:49; 12:13) and "the King of the Jews" (Mt 2:2; 27:11, 29, 37; Mk 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26; Lk 23:3, 37, 38; Jn 18:33, 39; 19:3, 19, 21) indicates that Israel represents here an ethnic designation even though the title itself has definite political overtones. But most of the references to Israel in the Gospels function primarily as religious terms that allude to the Jewish people's special status before God and God's commitment to them (Mt 2:6; 8:10; 10:6; 15:24, 31; 27:9; Mk 12:29; Lk 1:16, 54-55, 68, 80; 2:25-35; 9:33; Jn 1:31).

It would be misleading, however, to limit the study of Israel in the Gospels to its terminological usage, since the entire story of Jesus' ministry, portrayed in a distinctive way in each Gospel narrative, sheds light on Jesus' relation to Israel. This investigation involves two basic questions. The first concerns the content of Jesus' message vis-à-vis the variegated character of Second Temple Judaism. Did Jesus, like Qumran covenanters (see Essenes) and other Jewish groups that developed a sectarian mentality, claim that only those who respond positively to his message represent the remnant—the "true Israel"—or was his aim to reform Israel as a whole? The second question concerns the effect of the rejection of Jesus' message on the status of Israel as God's chosen people. Has God, in response to Jewish obstinacy, passed on the promises originally given to Israel to another people? This problem is closely related to the transformation of the early church from a Jewish sect into a predominantly Gentile movement and to the concept of the "new Israel." It should be noted that the terms "true Israel" and "new Israel" do not appear in the Gospels. Many interpreters, however, find them helpful because they allow them to express, on the one hand, the concept of Israel that affirms the validity of Jewish ancestry but radicalizes other relevant criteria for membership in the people of God ("true Israel"), and, on the other hand, the concept of Israel that is based on a completely new set of criteria that minimize the ethnic component ("new Israel").

1. Israel in the Gospels
2. Jesus and Israel

1. Israel in the Gospels.

In the past two decades *form- and *redaction-critical studies of the Gospels have given way to literary studies of the Gospel narratives, which prioritize the final form of the text rather than its editorial layers (see Narrative Criticism). One of the consequences of this methodological shift is a de-emphasis on speculative reconstructions of specific historical circumstances of the evangelists' communities. This does not mean that scholars no longer pay attention to the evangelists' roles in modifying their sources and in shaping received traditions, but only that they are less willing to engage in various conjectures about the formation of the text and the particular settings of the authors and their audiences. There is a general agreement that, on the whole, the Gospel authors try to explain why Jesus' preaching achieved so little success among first-century Jews so that a movement that began as an exclusively Jewish endeavor became a predominantly Gentile phenomenon.

1.1. Mark. The plot of Mark's Gospel is dominated by the repeated misunderstandings of Jesus' words and deeds by the characters in the narrative, including Jesus' own *family (Mk 3:19-21, 31-35), his *disciples (Mk 4:10-13, 37-41; 6:48-52; 7:18; 8:17-18, 21, 31-33; 9:31-32) and his contemporaries (Mk 2:6, 16, 24; 6:2-3; 15:35). Within this context Mark paints a picture of a favorable disposition of the crowd that marks the greater part of Jesus' ministry (Mk 2:12-13, 15; 4:1-2; 5:24; 7:37; 12:37), which eventually turns into hostility under the influence of the conspiracy against Jesus by the religious leaders (Mk 3:6; 12:12; 14:1-2; 15:6-15) (see People, Crowd). The Markan narrative about Jewish obstinacy and the rejection of Jesus finds an unexpected resolution in the confession of Jesus' divine sonship by the Roman centurion (Mk 15:39).

Some scholars take this plot twist as an indication that Israel, either in part or as a whole, has been rejected by God in favor of the *Gentiles. A similar conclusion is reached by many redaction critics who regard the parable of the tenants, with its climactic declaration that the owner of the vineyard will "give the vineyard to others" (Mk 12:1-11), as an expression of the early church's theology of the transferal of Israel's religious privileges to the church. This approach has been rightly questioned by A. Collins, who suggests that the parable of the tenants merely envisions the transferal of leadership to those who respond positively to Jesus as the Messiah.

1.2. Matthew. Matthew's narrative follows the basic contours of Mark's plot. What is novel is a programmatic focus on Jesus' earthly ministry to Israel. The Matthean Jesus and his disciples are sent only to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:6; 15:24). The amazed crowd exclaims, "Never has anything like this been seen in Israel" (Mt 9:33) and praises the God of Israel (Mt 15:31). And yet the narrative concludes with the instruction of the risen Jesus to his disciples to "go . . . and make disciples of all nations" (Mt 28:19). To this list of the distinctively Matthean features we can add a more repugnant portrayal of the Jewish leaders and a shift of the blame for Jesus' crucifixion to the Jewish people as a whole: "His blood be on us and on our children!" (Mt 27:25) Moreover, in Matthew 21:43 Jesus says to the chief priests and the Pharisees that the *kingdom of God will be taken away from them and "given to a people that produces the fruits of the kingdom." The list can be further expanded by a redactional remark in the parable of the wedding feast that the enraged king burned the city of the hostile invitees (Mt 22:7), which most scholars understand as an overt reference to the destruction of *Jerusalem in A.D. 70. What emerges is, in the opinion of many interpreters, an outline of Matthean salvation history that begins with Jesus' mission to Israel, moves toward Israel's rejection of Jesus, and concludes with the replacement of Israel with the *church.

Scholars have proposed different labels for Matthew's conception of the church. W. Trilling prefers the term "true Israel," although it no longer includes the ethnic component, while both D. Hare and G. Stanton argue that the church in Matthew is neither a "true Israel" nor a "new Israel" but rather a completely new entity that they call a "third race" vis-à-vis both Jews and Gentiles. While the relationship between the Matthean community and formative Judaism remains a controversial issue, B. Repschinski rightly warns against an identification of the Jewish leaders in Matthew with the whole of Israel and calls attention to the combination of the mission to Israel with the denunciation of its leaders that permeates Matthew's narrative. In a recent publication, M. Konradt emphasizes that Matthew nowhere speaks about the rejection of Israel, nor does he envision the church as the new people of God. Rather, the evangelist paints a picture of a gradual differentiation between the Jewish leaders and the crowd, on the one hand, and between Jerusalem and *Galilee, on the other hand. Jesus' criticism of his contemporaries (Mt 12:38-45; 16:1-4; 23:34-36) is directed not against the Jewish people as a whole but only against the Jewish authorities. The Great Commission (Mt 28:19-20) is therefore not a break in the Matthean soteriological scheme but instead represents the ultimate goal of salvation history, which began with *Abraham's election and God's commitment to Israel.

1.3. Luke. Luke's narrative of Jesus' ministry begins with various hints at an enthusiastic response of the people to Jesus' preaching (Lk 4:36-37; 5:26; 6:17-18; 7:11) and ends with an account of their collaboration with the religious leaders in the plot against Jesus (Lk 23:13-23). At the same time, the evangelist takes pains to minimize the guilt of the crowd by emphasizing that it was the chief *priests and the leaders who delivered Jesus to *death (Lk 24:20), that only the leaders mocked Jesus on the cross while "the people stood by, watching" (Lk 23:35), and that, after Jesus died, the people returned home "beating their breasts" (Lk 23:48). The goal of such efforts is to prepare the way for the people's repentance in Acts 2:37-39, who are retrospectively described as acting in ignorance (Acts 3:17). Yet, the sequel of Luke's Gospel concludes with a description of a failed mission to the Jews and Paul's ominous words: "Let it be known to you then that this salvation of God has been sent to the Gentiles; they will listen" (Acts 28:28).

This narrative development has been variously interpreted. There is a scholarly consensus that Luke wants to demonstrate that God's promises to Israel remain valid despite the fact that most Jews rejected God's offer of salvation through Jesus. Differences of opinion remain, however, with regard to the question of whether God's saving purposes have been transferred from Israel as a people of God to the church as a "new Israel." H. Conzelmann, R. Maddox, J. Sanders, J. Jervell and H. Räisänen, for example, answer this question in the affirmative and argue that in Luke's soteriological scheme Israel has been replaced by the new entity composed of those who believe in Jesus. In this reconstruction only the believing Jews belong to the "new Israel." A more nuanced version of this view is offered by M. Wolter, who contends that Luke's primary aim is to reassure the largely Gentile Christian congregations that they stand in continuity with the salvific promises originally given to Israel. He further insists that the non-believing Jews can claim membership in Israel as long as they have not irrevocably rejected the Christ proclamation. Other scholars, by contrast, believe that Luke's portrayal of Israel's obduracy is not his final word on the subject. R. Tannehill speaks for many when he contends that the salvation of a remnant is not an adequate solution to the theological problem created by the negative response of so many Jews. In his view, the tragic ending of Luke-Acts does not provide the ultimate answer to God's saving purposes, which will not be completed until Israel as a people accepts *salvation through Jesus Christ.

1.4. John. The plot of the Fourth Gospel is characterized by a strong Jewish opposition to Jesus, which begins very early in his ministry (Jn 2:18-20) and rapidly develops into a murderous conspiracy that leads to Jesus' arrest and crucifixion (Jn 7:1, 13, 44; 8:40-44; 9:22; 10:31; 11:47-53, 57; 18:28-31). The typical term that the author uses for Jesus' opponents is "the Jews." This does not mean, however, that this label always carries its usual ethnic and religious connotations, as R. Brown convincingly demonstrated. He has shown that it is erroneous to read the Johannine polemical passages as references to the Jewish people in general. In these texts the term "Jews" refers to Jewish religious authorities that are opposed to Jesus and primarily functions as a stereotype of rejection. In other passages the term serves as a religious (Jn 4:22) or geographic designation (Jn 11:19, 31, 33, 36). The name "Israel" always has a positive connotation (Jn 1:31, 49; 3:10; 12:13). The Fourth Evangelist also mentions some Jews who believed in Jesus (Jn 8:31; 11:45; 12:11). The major plot line in the Fourth Gospel is therefore not much different from the general plot line of the Synoptic Gospels. Jesus' ministry is only moderately successful among the Jews, but the main opposition comes from the religious leaders and not the Jewish people in general. J. Martyn has offered one of the best-known and most widely accepted explanations of the increased tension between Jesus and his Jewish adversaries. In his view, John's narrative reflects the history of the Johannine community, whose members suffered excommunication from the synagogue. The Fourth Gospel thus points to an inner-Jewish dispute that fostered the development of the sectarian mentality of John's community and contributed to its self-understanding as "the true Israel," as recently argued by J. Dennis.

2. Jesus and Israel.

The main question raised in historical-Jesus research with regard to Jesus' relationship to Israel concerns the content of his message. Scholarly views on this subject can be classified into two major groups. The first group includes those who believe that Jesus wanted to reform Israel as a whole. Among them, E. P. Sanders is the best-known proponent of the idea that Jesus' selection of the twelve *disciples functions as a symbolic representation of the restored Israel. In his view, Jesus expected the eschatological recovery of the twelve tribes of Israel, which is visible not only in his preaching about the kingdom of God but also in his *miracles of *healing as the signs of God's final victory over evil. Sanders points out that Jesus affirmed the permanent character of God's covenant with Israel and promised *sinners a place in the kingdom without demanding their repentance. A similar reconstruction of Jesus' aims is proposed by J. Meier, who accentuates the symbolic meaning of the twelve disciples for the divine restoration of all Israel. N. T. Wright, who also advocates Jewish restoration *eschatology, takes a different approach. He interprets Jesus' message to his contemporaries, who still viewed themselves as living in *exile, as a call to adopt a radically new way of living, which Wright metaphorically describes as being the light of the world. This means, in practical terms, abandoning nationalistic aspirations and replacing adherence to the *temple and the Torah with allegiance to Jesus.

The second group includes scholars, such as B. Meyer, who situate Jesus' message within the context of the Second Temple sectarian dispute of who constitutes the true Israel. The central concept in this discussion is the idea of a remnant, which presupposes a distinction between ethnic and religious Israel. This view has been recently advanced by S. Bryan, who argues that by calling sinners to *repentance, *John the Baptist established a faithful remnant, which Jesus, by selecting the twelve disciples, transformed into the eschatological remnant. The twelve disciples thus do not symbolize the future restoration of the twelve tribes of Israel but rather represent an already accomplished restoration of a remnant, which nevertheless remains open for new adherents until the final judgment of disobedient Israel.

Which of these two approaches is more persuasive depends, for the most part, on one's perspective. If we consider the limited scope of Jesus' ministry, his call to repentance, and the announcement of God's judgment on unrepentant Israel, Jesus can be described as a proponent of a remnant theology. But if we consider the open character of the Jesus group and the portrayal of the reconstituted Israel in the eschatological discourses, the far-reaching character of Jesus' message will carry more weight.

See also ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB; ANTI-SEMITISM; EXILE AND RESTORATION; GENTILES; JUDAISM, COMMON; PEOPLE, CROWD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (2 vols.; AB 29, 29A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966-1970); S. M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions of Judgement and Restoration (SNTSMS 117; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); A. Y. Collins, Mark: A Commentary, ed. H. W. Attridge (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke, trans. G. Buswell (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); J. A. Dennis, Jesus' Death and the Gathering of True Israel: The Johannine Appropriation of Restoration Theology in the Light of John 11.47-52 (WUNT 2/217; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); D. R. A. Hare, The Theme of Jewish Persecution of Christians in the Gospel According to St. Matthew (SNTSMS 6; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967); J. Jervell, Luke and the People of God: A New Look at Luke-Acts (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1972); M. Konradt, Israel, Kirche und die Völker im Matthäusevangelium (WUNT 215; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007); R. Maddox, The Purpose of Luke-Acts (FRLANT 126; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1982); J. L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (3rd ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003); S. McKnight, A New Vision for Israel: The Teaching of Jesus in National Context (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (4 vols.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1991-2009); B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979); H. Räisänen, "The Redemption of Israel," in Luke-Acts: Scandinavian Perspectives, ed. P. Luomanen (PFES 54; Helsinki: Finnish Exegetical Society; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1991); B. Repschinski, The Controversy Stories in the Gospel of Matthew: Their Redaction, Form and Relevance for the Relationship Between the Matthean Community and Formative Judaism (FRLANT 189; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2000); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. T. Sanders, The Jews in Luke-Acts (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); G. N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992); R. C. Tannehill, "The Story of Israel within the Lukan Narrative," in Jesus and the Heritage of Israel: Luke's Narrative Claim upon Israel's Legacy, ed. D. P. Moessner (Harrisburg,

-
- PA: Trinity Press International, 1999) 325-39; W. Trilling, Das wahre Israel: Studien zur Theologie des Matthäus-Evangeliums (3rd ed.; SANT 10; Munich: Kösel, 1964); M. Wolter, "Israel's Future and the Delay of the Parousia, According to Luke," in Jesus and the Heritage of Israel: Luke's Narrative Claim upon Israel's Legacy, ed. D. P. Moessner (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999) 307-24; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; London: SPCK, 1996). L. Novakovic

J

JACOB. See ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB.

JERICHO. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

JERUSALEM

The city of Jerusalem has been inhabited for over five thousand years, and it was the largest and most significant city in Israel at the time of Jesus. Here stood the *temple, center of Judaism; here King David had his court; here the Jewish people expected the Messiah to appear; here the last days of Jesus, his death and resurrection took place; and here the church began. The importance of Jerusalem in Jesus' day can scarcely be overestimated.

1. History, Geography and Economics
2. The Significance of the City
3. The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the City
4. Locations in the City Found in the Gospels
5. Significance of the City and Its Destruction for the Gospels and Jesus

1. History, Geography and Economics.

The name "Jerusalem" is found in Egyptian texts dating to 1900–1800 B.C. and perhaps in Ebla tablets dating to 2600–2300 B.C. The origins of the name are obscure, but it is frequently understood to mean "foundation of peace." The name has two Greek spellings in the NT and elsewhere: Hierosolyma and Ierousalēm; there is no widely recognized reason for using one spelling over the other (BDAG 471).

Evidence from pottery found in the city suggests the site was occupied in the Chalcolithic period (ca. 3500 B.C.). It was taken by the Israelites under King David (2 Sam 5:6–9) from the Jebusites (ca. 1000 B.C.) and grew considerably. After the return from Babylonian exile (sixth century B.C.), the city and the temple were reconstructed. By Jesus' day, the city covered some 93 ha (230 acres) and had an estimated population of twenty-five thousand to eighty thousand (Jeremias; Wilkinson; Broshi). The population swelled enormously with visitors at the time of the pilgrim festivals (Jeremias estimates six- or sevenfold).

The city stands on two ridges, the Temple Mount (or Ophel) and the Western Hill (or Mount Zion; see 2 Sam 5:7; Pss 9:11, 14; 48:2, 11), themselves on a limestone plateau about 800 m above sea level (cf. Ps 48:2). These ridges are surrounded by steep valleys on three sides; in between them is the shallower Tyropoeon Valley (Josephus, J.W. 5.140: hē tōn tyropoion pharanx, meaning "the valley of the cheesemakers" [see LSJ, s.v.]). The Mount of Olives is the highest point in the city, to the east of the Temple Mount across the Kidron Valley (Zech 14:4; Mk 13:3; Lk 19:37).

Herod the Great (d. 4 B.C.) (see Herodian Dynasty) significantly altered the face of the city by a huge building program that included the rebuilding and expansion of the temple (begun 19/18 B.C. [Josephus, J.W. 1.401]), a massive task that was not many years completed when the temple was destroyed in the Jewish revolt in A.D. 70 (note the disciple's admiration for the size of the temple in Mk 13:1; cf. Josephus, Ant. 15.412). Herod also built a palace for himself (Josephus, J.W. 1.402), a market enclosed by a wall, a major aqueduct about 44.5 km long (Josephus, J.W. 2.175), the Antonia fortress, which overlooked the temple (Josephus, Ant. 18.91 [referred to as "the barracks" in Acts 21:31–40]), a theater and a hippodrome. Herod's use of the qorbān temple tax for building works caused protest by the Jewish population, which Herod put down with force (Josephus, J.W. 2.176–77). Herod also seems to have introduced a grid system of streets at right angles to each other in the city (Wilkinson). This was the city of Jesus' day.

The city's *economy was varied. Sheep farming, olive oil and fruit were significant, and the "valley of the cheesemakers" also suggests a dairy industry. The temple generated income and commerce by the need for building stone, by the need for artisans to build and maintain its structures, by the pilgrims who visited three times each year, and by the temple tax paid by every Jew in the land and the Diaspora.

2. The Significance of the City.

God's ancient promise of the land to Abraham (Gen 12:1; 15:18-21), renewed at the time of the exodus (Ex 3:8), was central to Jewish belief and action. Jerusalem was seen as the heart of the land, and the temple, where God had placed his "name," as the heart of the city (Is 18:7). This was why the Babylonian exile of 587 B.C. had been so devastating for the Israelites; since both city and temple were razed to the ground, it seemed that God had abandoned them (1 Kings 8:48; 9:3; Ps 137; Mt 23:21).

Jerusalem was a contested place in Jesus' day, for it was occupied by the Romans, and this, in combination with the collaboration of priestly and *Sadducean groups with the occupying forces, caused it to be defiled in the eyes of some Jews. In particular, the Essene sect at Qumran regarded the city and the temple as corrupt, and therefore they withdrew to the Dead Sea to practice their faith in greater purity (see Josephus, Ant. 18.19). However, the large majority of Jews, both in the land and the Diaspora, aspired to go to the three major pilgrim festivals in Jerusalem (Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles) at least on some occasions (see Feasts). Most also paid the annual temple tax (cf. Mt 17:24). Jesus and his first followers, all of whom were Jews, would have shared this view.

3. The Jewish Revolt and the Destruction of the City.

In the years following Jesus, Jewish resentment against the occupying *Romans grew, culminating in the Jewish revolt of A.D. 66-73, for which *Josephus is our main source (esp. J. W. 2-7) (see Revolutionary Movements). Florus's policies as Roman procurator

(A.D. 64-66) precipitated the revolt: he took the Greeks' side against the Jews in civil rights conflicts in Caesarea and then took seventeen talents of gold from the temple treasury to pay Roman government expenses (Josephus, J. W. 2.293). Florus used military force to suppress protests (Josephus, J. W. 2.296-308), increasing the offense that he had caused. In response, the Jews stopped offering the twice-daily sacrifices for the emperor's health (Josephus, J. W. 2.409), which were a Roman concession to Jewish sensibilities about emperor worship: the Romans accepted the Jews praying to their God for the emperor, even if they would not pray to the emperor (Josephus, J. W. 2.415-416). The revolt spread, beginning in Jerusalem with the capture of the Antonia fortress and the slaughter of its Roman garrison in August of A.D. 66 (Josephus, J. W. 2.430-440) and then throughout the land (Josephus, J. W. 2.408, 484-486).

The Romans responded with large military force to this revolt, although with some inexplicable mistakes early in the campaign and understandable delays later because of the uncertainties of the year of the three emperors in A.D. 69 (see DNTB, Destruction of Jerusalem). Vespasian, who had been overseeing the Roman forces in the war, was declared emperor in July of A.D. 69 (Josephus, J. W. 4.601, 616-621). In turn, he appointed his son Titus to oversee the taking of Jerusalem (Josephus, J. W. 4.658-659).

While the Romans were in the years of some uncertainty, there was also division among the Jewish people, torn between extremists (who themselves were not united) and moderates. After the Romans' first failed campaign in November of A.D. 66, led by Cestius Gallus (Josephus, J. W. 2.510-558), Jewish moderates took control, led by the former high priest Ananus (Josephus, J. W. 2.563, 648, 651). However, by late A.D. 67 extremists led by Eleazar and the "Zealots" (Josephus, J. W. 2.651; 4.160) attacked the

Table 1. Chronology of Events Leading to the Destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 66-70)

66 August	Jewish insurgents capture the Antonia fortress; Cestius, Syrian legate, attacks Jerusalem and retreats.
67 spring-fall	Roman army under Vespasian subdues Galilee.
67-68 winter	Zealot party formed under Eleazar controls Jerusalem.
68 spring	Vespasian subdues Judea.
June	Nero's death and ensuing turmoil in leadership delay siege of Jerusalem.
69 spring	Turmoil goes on within Jerusalem with three parties vying for power.
June	Vespasian resumes campaign.
July	Vespasian proclaimed emperor and departs.
70 spring	Command is given to Titus, Vespasian's son.
May	Titus breaches Agrippa's wall.
August	Titus takes and burns the temple.
September	Jerusalem is sacked and burned.

moderates and seized the temple, putting in place a high priest chosen by lot (Josephus, J.W. 4.138-150, 155). A bloody battle ensued, with the outcome that the extremists, in alliance with John of Gischala and a large force of Idumeans, took the city (Josephus, J.W. 4.158-161, 193-355).

In the following year, John and Eleazar divided because both wanted absolute power (Josephus, J.W. 4.389; 5.5-8). This division eventually opened the way for Simon bar Giora from Gerasa to enter the city with the support of the moderates and finally become "master of Jerusalem" (Josephus, J.W. 4.503-577) in A.D. 69. Simon's army of fifteen thousand controlled most of the city; John's six thousand soldiers held the outer temple courts and parts of the lower city; and 2,400 Zealots under the command of Eleazar held the inner temple courts (Josephus, J.W. 5.248-254). This internal conflict divided those defending the city against Titus, with the divided defenders destroying vital grain stores that would have allowed them to resist the Roman siege for longer (Josephus, J.W. 5.22-28). Subsequent famine resulted in a large number of deaths (Josephus, J.W. 5.569).

Titus laid siege at Passover (April) A.D. 70 and initially attacked from the north, breaking through the wall after two weeks, using a combination of siege engines and towers (Josephus, J.W. 5.275-302). Titus established a cordon 7.85 km in length around the city to prevent anyone leaving or entering (Josephus, J.W. 5.491-511). In July Titus broke through the inner wall (Agrippa's wall) and the Antonia fortress, and in August took the inner temple courts. His troops took the temple's treasures and set fire to it, apparently against his orders (Josephus, J.W. 6.249-285). The Romans desecrated the temple by offering sacrifice to their standards there (Josephus, J.W. 6.316). In September the rest of the city was burned and sacked (Josephus, J.W. 6.354). Titus went in triumph to Rome in A.D. 71 with almost one hundred thousand prisoners, including Simon and John, and many treasures from the temple (Josephus, J.W. 7.116-157).

Although Jewish resistance outside Jerusalem continued for some time, the fall of the city was the decisive battle. The fall of the last outpost at Masada in A.D. 73 by mass suicide of its Jewish defenders was the final act of the drama (Josephus, J.W. 7.304-406).

4. Locations in the City Found in the Gospels.

Several places in Jerusalem are named in the Gospels (Murphy-O'Connor 2008; Mackowski; Wilkinson), although it is interesting how little description the evangelists provide for their stories' settings. They give readers the bare minimum to understand the events and words that are the focus of the Gospel stories; we would not even know there were tables in the *temple had not Jesus overturned them (Mk 11:15)!

John 5:2 mentions Bethesda as having five porches. This location has been identified by ancient pilgrims and modern archeologists. It consists of two pools divided by a wall, and it lies north of the temple platform, near to the Sheep Gate; thus, the pools may have been used for washing sheep for use in sacrifice in the temple. The Copper Scroll from the Dead Sea mentions a place called "Beth Eshdaitain" as a pool, which appears to be the same place (3Q15 XI, 12).

John 9:7, 11 mention the Pool of Siloam, where Jesus sent the blind man to wash, and excavations in 1880 led to its identification. It was fed by the Gihon spring. Its water was poured out in the temple at the Feast of Tabernacles, and the rabbis saw this outpouring as celebrating eschatological hopes (Str-B 2:799-805).

The upper room where the *Last Supper took place (Mk 14:15; Lk 22:12) seems to be identified by Luke as also the gathering place of the earliest believers (Acts 1:13). This location may be the cenacle on Mount Zion (Murphy-O'Connor 1995), and it appears to be a large room near to a probable Essene quarter in the city (Capper; Riesner; cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.145). If so, Essene influence on Jesus and his followers is possible.

The Mount of Olives was understood, on the basis of Zechariah 14:4-5, to be where God would intervene in battle with Gentiles. It lay across the steep Kidron Valley from the Temple Mount and was visited by Jesus and his followers (Lk 21:37). Jesus' entry to the city began there (Mk 11:1 par.), and his *ascension took place there (Acts 1:12). The Bethany home of Lazarus, Martha and Mary probably was near there (Mt 21:17; Mk 11:11; Jn 11:1, 18; 12:1).

*Gethsemane (the name means "oil press"), the garden where Jesus prayed (Mt 26:36; Mk 14:32; Lk 22:39; Jn 18:1-2), was located on the western slopes of the Mount of Olives, although its location cannot be identified with certainty. It is interesting that if Jesus had wished to do so, he could have fled from his potential captors in Gethsemane in ten minutes' rapid walking over the Mount of Olives.

The high priest's house, where the first hearings of Jesus' Jewish trial took place (Mt 26:58; Mk 14:54; Lk 22:54; Jn 18:13), may have been west of the city on Mount Zion. Josephus locates the house of Ananus, high priest in A.D. 47-55, there (Josephus, J.W. 2.426). It is unlikely to be on the site of the modern Church of St. Peter in Gallicantu. The Sanhedrin itself met close to the temple in a place called the “Xystus” (Josephus, J.W. 5.144).

The praetorium where *Pilate saw Jesus (Mt 27:27; Mk 15:16; Jn 18:28, 33; 19:9) was the governor’s headquarters, and it could have been the Antonia fortress or Herod’s palace. Some identify a pavement found in the fortress as Gabbatha, where Pilate gave judgment (Jn 19:13). However, it seems more likely that Jesus was taken to Herod’s palace, for that was where Pilate came to reside during Jewish feasts to ensure that good order was kept (cf. Philo, Legat. 38.299). The hearing before Pilate seems to have taken place outdoors (cf. Mt 27:19; Lk 23:4) and on a hill (for the crowds “came up” to it [Mk 15:8]). Herod’s palace had been built from 20 B.C. onward (Josephus, J.W. 5.156-183) and was in an elevated western part of Jerusalem.

Hakeldama, the site of Judas’ death (Acts 1:19), identified as “the potter’s field” or the “field of blood” (Mt 27:7-10), probably was located at the end of the Hinnom Valley, to the south of the city. Tradition since the fourth century A.D. consistently places it in the grounds of the Monastery of St. Onuphrius.

The Hinnom Valley itself, called “Gehenna” (Gk. geenna) by Jesus (Mt 5:22, 29-30; Mk 9:43, 45, 47; Luke 12:5), was a ravine to the south of the city, where, (probably later) popular Judaism believed, final judgment was to take place (Sib. Or. 1:100-103; 2:283-312; Ascen. Isa. 4:14-18). Jesus spoke of this place as a metaphor for a place of punishment.

Golgotha (the name means “place of a skull”), the place of Jesus’ crucifixion (Mt 27:33; Mk 15:22; Jn 19:7) (see Death of Jesus), was a rock formation and is likely to be on the site of today’s Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Archeologists have found remains of a temple to Aphrodite there, built in A.D. 135 to replace a Christian place of worship. This site is much more likely than that above the modern Garden Tomb north of the Damascus Gate. John records that Golgotha was close to the city (Jn 19:20), and that Jesus’ burial place was nearby in a garden (Jn 19:41-42).

The earliest Christian communities preserved knowledge of these sites, although they do not seem to have become sites of pilgrimage until a few centuries later.

5. Significance of the City and Its Destruction for the Gospels and Jesus.

5.1. Mark. Mark opens his Gospel with quotations from Isaiah 40:3 and Malachi 3:1 (Mk 1:2-3), both drawn from OT passages about the Lord coming to Jerusalem, and his whole story is strongly focused on Jesus going to Jerusalem, where he will die and be raised, for Jesus is “the Lord” coming to the city (Mk 11:3). He is also the Davidic king (see Son of David), recognized by the divine voice at his *baptism as God’s “Son” (Mk 1:11), a kingly designation drawn from Psalm 2:7, itself a coronation Psalm focused on Zion (Ps 2:6) (see Son of God). He enters Jerusalem to cries recognizing his kingly status (Mk 11:9-10) (see Triumphal Entry), a status ironically underlined by Pilate’s inscription and the taunts of the crowd at Jesus’ crucifixion (Mk 15:26, 32).

While the focus of Mark 1—8, set in the north of the land, is on Jesus’ identity, leading up to Peter’s recognition of him near Caesarea Philippi (Mk 8:29), the second half drives the story south toward Jerusalem and focuses on Jesus’ death (Mk 10:32; 11:1, 15, 27). Three times Jesus predicts his coming arrest, death and resurrection, on the last occasion explicitly saying that the events will happen in Jerusalem (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34). Mark 11—16 is set in Jerusalem, a city divided in its reaction to Jesus: he is welcomed as king (Mk 11:8-10), and the crowd listen attentively to his teaching (Mk 11:18b; 12:37), but the leaders plot against him and question him critically (Mk 11:18a, 27-33; 12:12a, 13-17) (note that opponents earlier came from Jerusalem [Mk 3:22; 7:1]). Ultimately, Jesus is alone, with the crowd, probably a mob of the leaders’ supporters, calling for his death and mocking him on the cross (Mk 15:11, 14, 29).

And yet, ironically, it is there, at the place of his death, that a Gentile recognizes him (Mk 15:39; cf. Mk 1:1) as the temple curtain is torn, showing that Yahweh is not confined to the temple but rather is moving in the world to draw people to himself through the broken body of Jesus (Mk 15:38). In raising Jesus, God overturns the city’s verdict on Jesus (the passive “he has been raised” [ēgerthē] implies that God raised Jesus [Mk 16:6]). Mark’s brief account of Jesus’ resurrection focuses on *Galilee, not Jerusalem, as the place where Jesus will meet his disciples (Mk 16:7); the privileged status of the city is over, for it failed to recognize its king when he visited.

We should consider the predictions of the *apocalyptic discourse of Mark 13 in this wider setting. Here Jesus warns of the city and the temple’s destruction in graphic terms, including the Danielic “desolating sacrilege” (Mk 13:14; cf. Dan 9:27; 12:11) being set up in the temple. Interpreters debate how much of this chapter relates specifically to the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and how much is about a future return of Jesus. One view sees Mark 13:24-27 focusing on Jesus’ vindication in his *resurrection (as the *“Son of Man” who goes to Yahweh to be vindicated [see Dan 7:13-14]) and the fall of the city; the cosmic language thus speaks of “earthshaking” events (Wright 1996). Another approach sees the chapter partly referring to the fall of the city, but Mark 13:24-27 as referring to future events including Jesus’ return to earth (Adams) (see 5.5 below).

5.2. Matthew. Matthew is the most positive and most negative of the evangelists in his presentation of Jerusalem. He names Jerusalem positively as “the holy city” (Mt 4:5; 27:53) and the temple as “the holy place” (Mt 24:15 [contrast Mk 13:14]). The city is “the city of the great king” (Mt 5:35), meaning Yahweh, and God dwells in the temple (Mt 23:21). The standing of the city begins high.

However, Jesus is greater than the temple (Mt 12:6 [in Matthew only]); the king in the parable will burn down the “city” of those who reject his wedding invitation (Mt 22:7 [in Matthew only]), hinting at Jerusalem’s destruction; Jerusalem is a city that kills the prophets and those sent to it, and its house is left desolate (Mt 23:37-39); and Matthew includes and expands Mark’s apocalyptic discourse predicting the city’s downfall (Mt 24).

Jesus divides the city’s people. The Passover crowds welcome Jesus as king (Mt 21:1-9; cf. Zech 9:9, cited in Mt 21:5) and as a prophet (Mt 21:11). However, the city is thrown into turmoil by him (Mt 21:10); this is the same city that was fearful and joined with Herod in trying to kill the infant Jesus (Mt 2:2-3, 16). It is the Jerusalem leaders who plot Jesus’ death (Mt 26:3-4).

There are other hints at Jerusalem’s role in opposing Jesus, leading to the city’s rejection. In a parable, the owner’s son is first ejected from the vineyard and then killed (Mt 21:39 [contrast Mk 12:8]), which may connote Jesus’ crucifixion outside the city. Jesus is compared to Jeremiah (Mt 16:14), a prophet mentioned by Matthew alone, whose message condemned Jerusalem (e.g., Jer 4; 7; 36:31) and who was imprisoned (e.g., Jer 33:1; 32:2) and rejected by the city (e.g., the destruction of the scroll of his words [Jer 36]). The Great Commission is set in Galilee (Mt 28:16; cf. Mt 28:10), identifies Jesus’ universal power (Mt 28:18), and specifies that Jesus’ disciples are to make disciples of “all nations” (Mt 28:19) (see Mission). The only role in the story for Jerusalem after Jesus’ resurrection is as a place where rumors and lies are spread (Mt 28:11-15).

5.3. Luke. Luke has most references to Jerusalem among the Synoptic Gospels (about 60 percent of them). His story begins (Lk 1:8-22) and ends (Lk 24:53) in the temple. Jesus visits the temple twice as a child (Lk 2:22-24, 41-51) and is recognized on both occasions as remarkable (Lk 2:25-38, 47). Luke accentuates Jesus’ journey to Jerusalem compared to Mark, both in its length (from Lk 9:51 to Lk 19:29) and in repeated statements that Jesus was traveling to the city (Lk 9:53; 13:22, 33; 17:11; 18:31; 19:28). As he travels, Jesus is reshaping the people of God around himself, warning of the division that he brings (Lk 12:49-53) and yet offering assurance that God provides for those who follow and confess Jesus (Lk 12:11-12). As Jesus nears the city, he clarifies that his arrival will not precipitate the kingdom’s immediate visible arrival (Lk 17:20-37; 19:11-27), but that he will suffer, die and rise again (Lk 18:31-34) as Israel’s Messiah, ironically recognized as such (“son of David”) by a blind man (Lk 18:35-43).

Luke initially presents the city sympathetically: those in Luke 1—2 hope for its redemption (Lk 1:46-55, 67-79; 2:25-32, 36-38). However, he also includes four oracles against Jerusalem, only one (Lk 13:32-35) shared with Matthew (the others are Lk 19:41-44; 21:20-24; 23:27-31), thus highlighting that judgment will come on the city. Jerusalem is the city that kills the prophets, whose children can find protection under Jesus’ wings alone, not in the city; and yet the city will reject him and be left desolate (Lk 13:32-35). Jerusalem faces God’s judgment: the temple (the “house” of Lk 13:35) will be abandoned; the city’s enemies will crush it because it did not recognize God visiting in Jesus (Lk 19:42-44); Gentiles will desolate the city (Lk 21:20, 24); Jerusalem’s people will call on the mountains to fall on them (Lk 23:30); God will bring vengeance and wrath on the city (Lk 21:22, 23); and believers are called to flee the city (Lk 21:21). Why so? Most importantly, it is because the city rejects Jesus: Jesus cryptically speaks of what “they”—the Romans—are doing and compares himself being crucified by the Romans to fresh green wood and Jerusalem to dry wood that is ready for burning and destruction (Lk 23:27-31, echoing OT warnings to the city [Jer 9:17-21; Hos 10:8; cf. Lk. 19:42-44]). Jesus’ death is both consequence of the city’s rejection of him and foretaste of what the city itself will face.

Luke’s apocalyptic discourse (Lk 21) has sometimes been understood to betray signs of being written after the cataclysmic events of A.D. 70. Luke does not include Jesus instructing his disciples to pray that the events will not happen in winter (cf. Mk 13:18; Mt 24:20); if Luke were writing after A.D. 70, he would know that the siege of the city took place in the spring and summer. However, C. H. Dodd argues cogently that Luke’s presentation consciously echoes the city’s fall to Babylon in 587 B.C., and that “there is no single trait of the forecast which cannot be documented directly out of the Old Testament” (Dodd, 79). Thus, this chapter alone does not provide a case for Luke writing post-A.D. 70.

However, Luke also presents Jerusalem as a city of a new beginning, for all of Jesus’ resurrection appearances occur in the city’s vicinity (Lk 24:13-53), and Luke’s Gospel ends with the disciples being told to stay in Jerusalem and wait (Lk 24:49). The Spirit comes in the city (see Holy Spirit), and the first proclamation of gospel and the first believing community are there (Acts 2). However, Acts’ ending in Rome (Acts 28) after multiple return visits to Jerusalem (Acts 1—7; 8:25; 9:26; 22:2, 22, 30; 15:2; 18:22; 19:21; 21:17) shows that the center of God’s activity is no longer geographical, focused in Jerusalem, but rather in the person of Jesus (Walton).

5.4. John. John’s presentation is rather different from that found in the Synoptics, for Jesus visits Jerusalem three times as an adult (Jn 2:13, 23; 5:1; 12:12). Much of John is set in the city (perhaps 80 percent), with considerably less stress than in the Synoptics on Jesus’ Galilean ministry (e.g., 30 percent of Matthew’s narrative is set in Jerusalem). John has a heightened focus on the city and the temple, but he portrays Jesus as replacing the temple as the means of access to God (e.g., Jn 2:18-22; 14:6-7); hence, John lacks any endorsement of the city as “holy” (contrast Matthew).

As in the Synoptics, Jerusalem divides in response to Jesus. Some believe (Jn 2:23; 7:40-41; 8:31; 9:36-38; 11:45; 12:11), even among the authorities (Jn 11:42; 19:38-39), although their faith can be of the wrong kind (Jn 2:24; 8:31-59), insufficient (Jn 7:40-41) or fickle (Jn 11:45; 12:11). However, the Jerusalem-based Jewish authorities oppose Jesus and his associates (Jn 7:13, 25, 32, 45-52; 8:13; 9:13-34 [esp. v. 22]; 11:42, 47-53; 12:10), and ultimately their plans bear fruit in the arrest, trial and death of Jesus (Jn 18—19). Jesus dies finally recognized (ironically) as the king of the Jews (Jn 19:19; cf. Jn 18:33, 37; 19:3, 12, 21) at the same time as the chief priests are secularizing the Jewish state by averring that their only king is Caesar (Jn 19:14-15)—an amazing admission for leaders in a nation claimed to be the people of God. “Jerusalem became for John a window into the heart of Judaism” (Walker) as a steppingstone to the universal saving ministry of Jesus. Yet Jesus’ kingship of Israel is identified early in John as a key theme by Nathanael’s response to him (Jn 1:49), and by the response of the Passover pilgrims (Jn 12:12-15, quoting Zech 9:9). Thus John, in a vein similar to the Synoptics, presents Jesus as coming as king to the royal city of Jerusalem and being rejected, which means that Jerusalem itself is merely a secular city on a par with others (Walker).

This assessment of the city and its leaders should not lead to the hasty conclusion that John is *anti-Semitic; rather, John, himself probably a Jew and perhaps a Jerusalemite, addresses the world, including the Jewish people, inviting them to respond to Jesus, who is the fulfillment of all that Jerusalem and its temple stand for as the means of access to the one true God. John is clear that there can be no going back to the way the world was before the coming of Jesus; his coming has now changed the universe irrevocably, and thereby it has relativized both city and temple.

How does John’s picture fit with that in the Synoptics? In brief, just as Mark and Matthew do not report some of Jesus’ visits as a child to the city narrated by Luke, so the Synoptics do not report some of Jesus’ visits as an adult mentioned by John. John, though, provides the explanation for Jesus’ final visit to the city that the Synoptics lack: the death of Lazarus (Jn 11). Dodd and others have argued cogently for a historical tradition in John independent of that in the Synoptics, and thus there is thus no prima facie reason to reject events in John simply because they are not found in the Synoptics (see Synoptics and John).

5.5. Jesus and Jerusalem. Jesus was not alone in warning against the temple and the city. Before him, Jeremiah had criticized unthinking reliance on the temple (Jer 7:1-15; note Jer 7:11, quoted by Jesus in the temple [Mk 11:17 par.]), and Ezekiel had portrayed Yahweh’s glory leaving the temple (Ezek 10). A few years after Jesus, his namesake Jesus ben Ananus warned of the city’s destruction (Josephus, J.W. 6.300-309), as did Josephus (Josephus, J.W. 5.361-420). M. J. Borg identifies the “threat tradition” in Jesus’ teaching in sixty-seven distinct sayings in the Synoptics, spread throughout different literary forms and putative sources. To suggest that all of this was postdiction, composed after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and in the light of that event, seems highly unlikely; underneath this much smoke, there is likely to be the fire of words from Jesus himself.

The coming judgment on Jerusalem announced by Jesus fits well with Jesus’ actions on entering the city on his final visit. In riding into the city, Jesus is presented as Jerusalem’s true king (Mk 11:10 par.). However, rather than riding a warhorse, he enters on a donkey; the allusion to Zechariah 9:9 (Mt 21:5; Jn 12:15) interprets the donkey as symbolizing Jesus’ entry as humble: he is a different kind of king. Each of the Synoptic Gospels then presents Jesus as visiting the temple (Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:11, 15-17; Lk 19:45-46) on what looks like a “tour of inspection” in which he finds the temple inadequate (this is the symbolism of the withering of the fig tree [Mk 11:12-14]). The claims against Jesus at his trial that he had threatened to destroy the temple (Mt 26:61; Mk 14:58) fit well with this nexus of themes, for they reflect a misunderstanding of his statement that the temple would be destroyed, perhaps in conjunction with his riddle about his body as the true temple (Jn 2:19-22).

Confidence about these central themes—Jesus as Jerusalem's true king coming to inspect the city, and his warnings of disaster because the city had turned from Yahweh's chosen path for her—leads us to greater confidence that other themes concerning Jesus and the city in the Gospels originate in the life, ministry and teaching of Jesus.

See also ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY; ECONOMICS; FEASTS; HELLENISM; HERODIAN DYNASTY; JUDAISM, COMMON; PONTIUS PILATE; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS; ROME; SADDUCEES; SCRIBES; TEMPLE; TEMPLE ACT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Adams, The Stars Will Fall from Heaven: Cosmic Catastrophe in the New Testament and Its World (LNTS 347; London: T & T Clark, 2007); M. Avi-Yonah, Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land (4 vols.; London: Oxford University Press, 1975) 2:579-647; D. Bahat and C. T. Rubinstein, The Illustrated Atlas of Jerusalem (2nd ed.; Jerusalem: Carta, 1996); M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (rev. ed.; Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998); M. Broshi, "Estimating the Population of Ancient Jerusalem," in Bread, Wine, Walls and Scrolls, ed. M. Broshi (JSPSup 36; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001) 110-20; B. J. Capper, "The Palestinian Cultural Context of Earliest Christian Community of Goods," in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. Bauckham (BAFS 4; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 323-56; W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christian and Jewish Territorial Doctrine (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974); C. H. Dodd, "The Fall of Jerusalem and the 'Abomination of Desolation,'" in More New Testament Studies (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1968) 69-83; L. K. Fuller Dow, Images of Zion: Biblical Antecedents of the New Jerusalem (NTM 26; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 2010) 140-65; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus (London: SCM, 1969); R. M. Mackowski and G. Nalbandian, Jerusalem, City of Jesus: An Exploration of the Traditions, Writings, and Remains of the Holy City from the Time of Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); W. H. Mare, The Archaeology of the Jerusalem Area (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987); J. Murphy-O'Connor, "The Cenacle: Topographical Setting for Acts 2:44-45," in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. Bauckham (BAFS 4; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 303-21; idem, The Holy Land: An Oxford Archaeological Guide from Earliest Times to 1700 (5th ed.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008); R. Riesner, "Jesus, the Primitive Community, and the Essene Quarter of Jerusalem," in Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (New York: Doubleday, 1992) 198-234; L. Ritmeyer and K. Ritmeyer, Jerusalem in the Year 30 A.D. (Jerusalem: Carta, 2004); P. W. L. Walker, Jesus and the Holy City: New Testament Perspectives on Jerusalem (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); S. Walton, "A Tale of Two Perspectives? The Temple in Acts," in Heaven on Earth: The Temple in Biblical Theology, ed. T. D. Alexander and S. J. Gathercole (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2004) 135-49; J. Wilkinson, Jerusalem as Jesus Knew It: Archaeology as Evidence (London: Thames & Hudson, 1978); N. T. Wright, "Jerusalem in the New Testament," in Jerusalem Past and Present in the Purposes of God, ed. P. W. L. Walker (rev. ed.; Carlisle: Paternoster; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 53-77; idem, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996).

S. Walton

JESUS IN NON-CHRISTIAN SOURCES

Traditions about Jesus appear in ancient non-Christian literature. These traditions have value principally because they offer data from those generally opposed to Christianity that corroborate or occasionally clarify the historical witness of the Gospels.

1. Josephus
2. Roman Historians and Other Writers
3. Rabbinic and Other Jewish Writings
4. The Qur'an

1. Josephus.

Flavius *Josephus (ca. A.D. 37-100) was a military leader in Israel's catastrophic war with *Rome (A.D. 66-70), in which he went over to the Roman side. Under Roman imperial patronage, he wrote an account of the conflict entitled Jewish War. He also wrote Jewish Antiquities and other works. These were written in Greek but later were translated into other languages, including Slavonic.

1.1. Greek. Twice in Jewish Antiquities Josephus refers to Jesus. "And so he [Ananus the high priest, son of Annas; cf. Lk 3:2] convened the judges of the Sanhedrin and brought before them a man called James [cf. Acts 15:13], the brother of Jesus who was called the Christ, and certain others. He accused them of having transgressed the law and delivered them up to be stoned" (Ant. 20.200-203).

The authenticity of this passage is widely accepted because of its wording that is neutral to Jesus. A longer passage, known as the Testimonium Flavianum (or Flavium), is disputed: "About this time there lived Jesus, a wise man, if indeed one ought to call him a man. For he was one who wrought surprising feats and was a teacher of such people as accept the truth gladly. He won over many Jews and many of the Greeks. He was the Messiah. When Pilate, upon hearing him accused by men of the highest standing among us, had condemned him to be crucified, those who had in the first place come to love him did not give up their affection for him. On the third day he appeared to them restored to life, for the prophets of God had prophesied these and countless other marvelous things about him. And the tribe of Christians, so called after him, has still to this day not disappeared" (Ant. 18.63-64). The authenticity of this passage as a whole is doubted because nowhere else does Josephus discuss Jesus, which would be very hard to explain if he believed him to be the Messiah (see Christ). Moreover, Josephus regarded Vespasian as the messiah of Judah (J.W. 3.392-408), an interpretation probably based on Genesis 49:10, and one that also cohered with the views of Tacitus (Hist. 5.13) and Suetonius (Vesp. 4).

Although some scholars view the Testimonium Flavianum in its entirety as a Christian interpolation, most regard it as a Christian embellishment of a passage that was either originally critical of Jesus and his following or neutral to them, depending on how they reconstruct its hypothetical original form. The fact that this passage apparently was unknown to most of the early church fathers, although an argument from silence, persuades many scholars of the inauthenticity of its present form. Had this form existed at the end of the first century A.D., it is quite likely that Christian apologists would have cited it often. Although Eusebius (fourth century) knows of this passage (see Hist. eccl. 1.11.7-8; Dem. ev. 3.5), according to Origen (third century), Josephus did not regard Jesus as the Messiah (see Comm. Matt. 10.50.17; Cels. 1.47). This suggests that the passage, as we now have it, arose between the times of Origen and Eusebius.

The Arabic version of the Testimonium Flavianum (taken from Agapius, Book of the Title) reads as follows: "Similarly Josephus the Hebrew. For he says in the treatises that he has written concerning . . . the Jews: 'At this time there was a wise man who was called Jesus. And his conduct was good, and [he] was known to be virtuous. And many people from among the Jews and the other nations became his disciples. Pilate condemned him to be crucified and to die. And those who had become his disciples did not abandon his discipleship. They reported that he had appeared to them three days after his crucifixion and that he was alive; accordingly he was perhaps the Messiah concerning whom the prophets have recounted wonders'" (Pines, 16) (Klausner, 55-56, restores the passage along similar lines). The Arabic version may very well preserve a form of the passage that is closer to the original than the one we now find in the Greek manuscripts, but it too is unlikely to represent Josephus's point of view.

It is the context of the Testimonium Flavianum that argues against any positive, or even neutral, form of the passage. The Testimonium Flavianum falls in the middle of Jewish Antiquities 18.35-95 (from the appointment of Caiaphas to the dismissal of Caiaphas and Pilate), a section that is highly negative and critical of Roman severity and insensitivity and of the foolish and reckless behavior of various Jewish groups in Palestine. It is much more likely that the original form of the passage described Jesus and his following as yet one more "disturbance" brought on by misguided messianic aspirations (see Revolutionary Movements).

Nevertheless, the Testimonium Flavianum is not without significance. Even if the original form of the passage was negative, the fact that Josephus apparently viewed Jesus as a messianic claimant is suggestive. This may tell us something about the nature of Jesus' ministry, possibly something of his self-understanding, and something about the political factors that led to his arrest and crucifixion.

1.2. Slavonic. In the Slavonic (or Old Russian) version of Josephus's Jewish War there appear several passages that make reference to *John the Baptist, Jesus and early Christians (passages without parallel in the Greek manuscripts). A lengthy passage describes Jesus as "more than a man," yet not "an angel," one who "wrought amazing and wonderful deeds" by his "word and command" (J.W. 2.9.3, between §174 and §175, according to the chapter divisions of the Greek tradition). The passage goes on to say that many urged him to lead an uprising against the Romans, and that out of fear that such a thing might happen the Jewish leaders bribed Pilate to have Jesus executed.

Of interest is the passage (within J.W. 5.5.2 §195) that reports the wording of a tablet, written in Greek, Roman and Jewish characters, that hung at one of the gates leading into the temple: "Jesus has not reigned as king. He has been crucified by the Jews because he proclaimed the destruction of the city and the laying waste of the Temple.” This statement evidently reflects the charge that the Jews (but apparently not the Romans) brought against Jesus when he was accused of having threatened to destroy the temple (cf. Mk 14:58; Acts 6:14).

Scholarly opinion varies widely on the question of the authenticity and value of these additions. The lack of overt sympathy for Jesus and his followers favors authenticity, for it is hard to understand why a Christian would add so many passages that do not promote Christian views. It is equally hard to imagine why a non-Christian would add passages that concerned a figure who otherwise plays no role in Jewish War and for whom Jesus’ life is of little or no importance. Of course, the absence of these passages in the Greek manuscripts tells against their authenticity. Even if these Slavonic passages are accepted as authentic, their historical value is another question.

2. Roman Historians and Other Writers.

Pagan writers said little about Jesus, and what they did say varies in its historical value and interest. In a letter to his son, Mara bar Serapion (ca. A.D. 73) asks, “For what advantage did . . . the Jews [gain] by the death of their wise king?” This oblique reference to Jesus may be the only positive reference to him in classical authors. Tacitus (ca. A.D. 110) tells us that the name “Christian” “originates from ‘Christus’ who was sentenced to death by the governor, Pontius Pilate, during the reign of Tiberius” (Ann. 15.44). In a letter to Trajan, Pliny the Younger (A.D. 110) explains that Christians regularly assemble to recite “a hymn antiphonally to Christ as God” and to “partake of a meal” (Ep. 10.96).

In his Life of Emperor Claudius, Suetonius (ca. A.D. 120) reports, “Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome [A.D. 49; cf. Acts 18:2] who, instigated by Chrestus, never ceased to cause unrest” (Claud. 25.4). Apparently, Suetonius and probably his sources have confused “Chrestus,” a name commonly held by slaves, with “Christus,” a title with which he probably was unfamiliar.

Celsus (ca. A.D. 179), according to Origen (ca. A.D. 248), claimed that Jesus was the illegitimate son of a Roman soldier (Cels. 1.32-33) and that he performed miracles through the power of magic: “He was brought up in secret and hired himself out as a workman in Egypt, and after having tried his hand at certain magical powers he returned from there, and on account of those powers gave himself the title of God” (Cels. 1.38; cf. Cels. 1.6, 68, 71).

According to Julius Africanus (ca. A.D. 230), the Samaritan chronicler Thallus suggested that the darkness at the time of Jesus’ death was caused by an eclipse of the sun (Frag. 18).

Taken together, Roman witnesses to the historical Jesus see him through the lens of their knowledge of Christianity. They are much more interested in Christianity than in its Christ. The depth of treatment that Jesus receives is quite shallow, and in the main they label him a troublemaker who founded and led a superstitious and possibly seditious movement.

3. Rabbinic and Other Jewish Writings.

There are relatively few references to Jesus in the Talmud (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings) and midrashim. Although the name “Yeshu,” or “Yeshu ha Notzri” (“the Nazarene”), sometimes does occur, some of the relevant passages refer to him as “Balaam,” “ben Pandira,” “ben Pantera,” “a certain person” and possibly “ben Stada” (although the majority of the references to Balaam and ben Stada are not to Jesus). In the Middle Ages many of these traditions were further developed and compiled into a small anti-Gospel known as the Toledot Yeshu (“Story of Jesus”) (earliest references to this writing date from the ninth century; for an edited version, see Goldstein, 148-54).

3.1. On the Parents and Birth of Jesus. In what may be a reference to the Gospels’ claim of Jesus’ virginal conception, we are told that Mary, “who was the descendant of princes and governors, played the harlot with carpenters” (b. Sanh. 106a). “Princes and governors” probably alludes to some of the names in Luke’s genealogy, which some church fathers thought was Mary’s. The second part of the statement is an obvious allusion to Joseph the carpenter. “Was not . . . his mother Stada? His mother was Miriam, a women’s hairdresser [megaddela]. As they say . . . ‘Stath da [i.e., ‘this one strayed’] from her husband” (b. Šabb. 104b) (Mary “the megaddela” is sometimes confused with Mary Magdalene [cf. b. Hag. 4b]). Elsewhere we are told that “Jesus . . . was near to kingship” (b. Sanh. 43a) (or “near to the kingdom,” possibly as satire on Jesus’ proclamation that “the kingdom of God is near” [Mk 1:15]). Rabbi Simeon ben Azzai (late first to early second century) claims that he “found a scroll of genealogical record in Jerusalem, in which was written: ‘A certain person was illegitimately born of a married woman”’ (m. Yebam. 4:13 [cf. b. Yebam. 49a]).

3.2. On the Life of Jesus. Stories are told of Jesus being rejected by various rabbis: “When King Janneus [104-78 B.C.] slew our Rabbis [ca. 87 B.C.], Rabbi Joshua [ben Perahiah] and Jesus fled to Alexandria of Egypt,” where Jesus was later excommunicated and condemned for worshiping an idol (b. Sanh. 107b [cf. b. Soṭah 47a; cf. y. Hag. 2:2; y. Sanh. 6:6]). The association of Jesus with a flight to Egypt may have been suggested by Matthew 2:13-15. The chronological displacement of Jesus in this tradition is obvious, but there is good reason to identify this “Jesus” with Jesus of Nazareth.

3.3. On the Ministry of Jesus. We are told that “Jesus had five disciples: Matthai, Nakai, Nezer, Buni and Todah” (b. Sanh. 107b). Although the first name does resemble “Matthew,” and the last possibly “Thaddeus,” these names are only meant to serve as a basis for word plays. This is seen in the subsequent paragraph of the tractate Sanhedrin, where aspersions are cast against Jesus and his disciples, and their deaths are justified. The rabbinic view of Jesus’ ministry of *miracles is similar to that of Celsus already noted: “Jesus the Nazarene practiced magic and led Israel astray” (b. Sanh. 107b [cf. t. Šabb. 11:15; b. Sanh. 43a; b. Šabb. 104b; b. Soṭah 47a]). The charge of practicing magic parallels the accusation found in the Gospels that Jesus cast out demons by the power of Satan (cf. Mk 3:22).

3.4. On the Teaching of Jesus. The rabbis hope that they do “not have a son or a disciple who burns his food in public [i.e., teaches heresy], like Jesus the Nazarene” (b. Sanh. 103a [cf. b. Ber. 17b]). “One of the disciples of Jesus . . . told me, ‘Thus did Jesus the Nazarene teach me: For of the hire of a harlot has she gathered them, and to the hire of a harlot shall they return’ [cf. Deut 23:18]” (b. ‘Abod. Zar. 16b-17a [cf. t. Hul. 2:24: “Jesus ben Pantera”; Eccles. Rab. 1:8 §3; Yalqut Shimoni on Mic 1; Prov 5:8]). “The disciples of Balaam the wicked shall inherit Gehenna and go down to the pit of destruction” (m. ‘Abot 5:19). “He [a judge] said to them: ‘I looked at the end of the book, in which it is written, “I am not come to take away the Law of Moses and I am not come to add to the Law of Moses” [cf. Mt 5:17], and it is written, “Where there is a son, a daughter does not inherit” [cf. Num 27:8].’ She said to him: ‘Let your light shine forth as a lamp’ [cf. Mt 5:16]. Rabbi Gamaliel said to her: ‘The ass came and kicked the lamp over”’ (b. Šabb. 116b).

From the same tradition we find a proverbial statement that probably sums up very well the rabbinic view of Jesus’ teaching: “Since the day that you were exiled from your land [i.e., the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70] the Law of Moses has been abrogated, and the law of the euangelion has been given” (b. Šabb. 116b). In fact, by playing on the Greek word euangelion, the Rabbis sometimes referred to it as the ‘awen gillayon (“falsehood of the scroll”) or the ‘awon gillayon (“perversion of the scroll”).

Most offensive to the rabbis was the Gospel claim that Jesus was *God and *Son of Man (cf. Mk 14:61-62; Jn 19:7), who would ascend to heaven (cf. Jn 20:17). Rabbi Abahu (third century) is reported to have said: “If a man says to you, ‘I am God,’ he is a liar; [or] ‘I am the son of man,’ in the end he will regret it; [or] ‘I will go up to heaven,’ he that says it will not perform it” (y. Ta’an. 2:1). Again from Abahu: “[God] says . . . ‘I am the first’—I have no father; ‘I am the last’—I have no son” (Exod. Rab. 29:5 on Ex 20:2). Similarly, Rabbi Aha (fourth century) declares: “There is One that is alone, and he has not a second; indeed, he has neither son nor brother—but: ‘Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One”’ (Deut. Rab. 2:33 on Deut 6:4). “There was a man, the son of a woman, who would rise up and seek to make himself God, and cause the entire world to err. . . . If he says that he is God, he lies; and in the future he will cause to err—that he departs and returns in the end. He says, but will not do. . . . Alas, who shall live of that people that listens to that man who makes himself God?” (Yalqut Shimoni on Num 23:7).

Elsewhere we are told that Moses warns Israel not to expect “another Moses” who will “arise and bring another Law from heaven” (Deut. Rab. 8:6 on Deut 30:11-12). The rabbis predict that “the ‘servant’ [i.e., Jesus] will bow down to the [real] Messiah” (b. Sanh. 61b). Lying behind this statement is the Christian view of Jesus as the Lord’s servant.

3.5. On the Crucifixion of Jesus. “On the eve of Passover they hanged Jesus the Nazarene. And a herald went out before him for forty days, saying: ‘He is going to be stoned, because he practiced sorcery and enticed and led Israel astray. Anyone who knows anything in his favor, let him come and plead in his behalf. But, not having found anything in his favor, they hanged him on the eve of Passover”’ (b. Sanh. 43a [cf. t. Sanh. 10:11; y. Sanh. 7:12; Tg. Esth. 7:9]). “They brought him to the Beth Din [i.e., House of Judgment, perhaps the Sanhedrin] and stoned him . . . and they hanged him on the eve of Passover” (b. Sanh. 67a [cf. y. Sanh. 7:16]). Jesus’ execution “on the eve of Passover” coheres with Johannine chronology (cf. Jn 18—19). “Balaam the lame was thirty-three years (old) when Phineas the brigand killed him” (b. Sanh. 106b). Although it is disputed, “Phineas the brigand” may refer to Pontius Pilate. If this is correct, then the thirty-three-year-old “Balaam” must be Jesus. “The robber was caught and they hanged him on the gallows, and all passersby say: ‘It seems that the ruler is hanged.’ Thus, it is said, ‘He that is hanged is a reproach to God’ [cf. Deut 21:23]” (t. Sanh. 9:7). Excluded from the “world to come" (m. Sanh. 10:2), Jesus will be boiled in filth in Gehenna (b. Git. 56b-57a).

3.6. On the Resurrection of Jesus. "He then went and raised Jesus by incantation" (b. Git. 57a, MS M). "Woe to him who makes himself alive by the name of God" (b. Sanh. 106a). These statements belong to the general accusation that Jesus was a magician. The Jewish charge recorded in Matthew 28:11-15, that Jesus' disciples stole his dead body from the tomb and then proclaimed Jesus as alive, is not recorded in rabbinic writings, although Matthew reports it as being widespread in Jewish circles at the time of the Gospel's writing ("still told among the Jews to this day" [Mt 28:15]).

3.7. On Healing in the Name of Jesus. "It once happened that [Eliezer] ben Dama, the son of Rabbi Ishmael's sister, was bitten by a snake; and Jacob [James?], a native of Kefar Sekaniah, came to him in the name of Jesus ben Pantera. But Rabbi Ishmael did not permit him." Ishmael goes on to say that it is better to die in peace than to be healed in the name of Jesus (t. Hul. 2:22-23 [cf. y. Šabb. 14:4; y. Abod. Zar. 2:2; b. Abod. Zar. 27b; Eccles. Rab. 10:5 §1]).

In general, Jewish traditions about Jesus have some limited historical value for our knowledge of Jesus, particularly in documenting opposition to Jesus during his ministry that was based on charges that he was a magician, in league with Satan, and/or was a deceiver of Israel. They shed more light on ancient Jewish attitudes toward Christianity than on Jesus himself. The rabbis were concerned to warn Jews away from Christianity, which they viewed as a continuing threat. To that end, they constructed an anti-Christian polemic that parodies the NT narratives.

4. The Qur'an.

Jesus, his mother Mary, and his disciples are frequently mentioned in the Qur'an (ca. A.D. 620-630?). The Arabic tradition appears to be dependent on the NT Gospels, especially Luke (cf. Qur'an 3:37-41 with Lk 1:5-25, 57-79), and possibly some of the ideas that came to expression in the rabbinic writings. One Qur'anic passage relates to the virginal conception and birth of Jesus: "And mention Mary in the Book when she drew aside from her family to an eastern place, taking a veil (to screen herself) from them. Then We sent to her Our spirit, and there appeared to her a well-made man. . . . She said: 'When shall I have a boy and no mortal has yet touched me, nor have I been unchaste?' . . . So she conceived him; then withdrew herself with him to a remote place. And the throes (of childbirth) compelled her to go to the trunk of a palm tree. She said: 'Oh, would that I had died before this, and had become something utterly forgotten!' Then (the child) called out to her from beneath her: 'Grieve not. . .'" (Qur'an 19:16-17, 20, 22-24 [see also 66:12]).

Another passage refers to the feeding of the five thousand: "When the disciples said: 'O Jesus son of Mary, will your Lord consent to send down to us food from heaven?' He said: 'Be careful of (your duty to) Allah, if you are believers.' They said: 'We desire that we should eat of it and that our hearts should be at rest, and that we may know that you have indeed spoken the truth to us that we may be of the witnesses to it.' Jesus the son of Mary said: 'O Allah, our Lord! Send down to us food from heaven which should be to us an ever-recurrent happiness, to the first of us and to the last of us, and a sign from You, and grant us means of subsistence, and You are the best of the Providers.' Allah said: 'Surely I will send it down to you, but whoever shall disbelieve afterwards from among you, surely I will chastise him with a chastisement with which I shall not chastise anyone among the nations'" (Qur'an 5:112-115 [cf. Jn 6:31-65]).

Elsewhere Jesus denies divine sonship: "And when Allah will say: 'O Jesus son of Mary! Did you say to men, "Take me and my mother for two gods besides Allah?"' He will say: 'Glory be to You, it did not befit me that I should say what I had no right to (say). If I had said it, You would indeed have known it. You know what is in my mind, and I do not know what is in Your mind. Surely You are the great Knower of the unseen things'" (Qur'an 5:116 [see also 4:171; 5:71, 75]).

Finally, the Qur'an describes the death and ascension of Jesus: "Allah set a seal upon them owing to their unbelief, so they shall not believe except a few for their saying: 'Surely we have killed the Messiah, Jesus son of Mary, the apostle of Allah.' They did not kill him, nor did they crucify him, but it appeared to them (like Jesus). . . . No! Allah took him up to Himself" (Qur'an 4:155-58). A similar idea is credited to Basilides, according to Irenaeus: "He [Christ] appeared, then, on earth as a man, to the nations of these powers, and worked miracles. Wherefore he did not himself suffer death, but Simon, a certain man of Cyrene, being compelled, bore the cross in his stead; so that this latter being transfigured by him, that he might be thought to be Jesus, was crucified, through ignorance and error, while Jesus himself received the form of Simon, and, standing by, laughed at them" (Haer. 1.24.4). In sum, the Qur'an is important for understanding the early Muslim attitude toward Christianity, but due to its temporal distance from Jesus and its aim of fitting Jesus into the line of Muslim prophets culminating in Muhammad, it has little or no value for our knowledge of the historical Jesus.

In sum, the ancient literary references to Jesus by non-Christian writers in general serve to corroborate, but not supplement, key parts of the portrait of him in the canonical Gospels. They are also important in evaluating the nonhistoricity hypothesis, a radical opinion emerging in the 1800s that posits that Jesus did not exist. This hypothesis is not dealt with in mainstream scholarship, but it is widespread in popular books and on the internet, and it forms a significant part of anti-Christian polemic today. The witnesses to Jesus by ancient non-Christian writers indicate that Jesus did in fact exist, founded a movement that continues, had a ministry that resulted in his crucifixion, and is proclaimed by the church as raised from the dead.

See also GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL; JOSEPHUS; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. N. Birdsall, "The Continuing Enigma of Josephus' Testimony about Jesus," BJRL 67 (1985) 609-22; F. F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins Outside the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); S. Byrskog, "The Historicity of Jesus: How Do We Know That Jesus Existed?" in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, 3: The Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011) 2202-6; J. H. Charlesworth, Jesus Within Judaism: New Light from Exciting Archaeological Discoveries (New York: Doubleday, 1988); J. M. Creed, "The Slavonic Version of Josephus' History of the Jewish War," HTR 25 (1932) 277-319; G. H. Dalman and H. Laible, Jesus Christ in the Talmud, Midrash, Zohar, and the Liturgy of the Synagogue (repr., New York: Arno, 1973 [1893]); R. Dunkerley, Beyond the Gospels (Baltimore: Penguin, 1957); C. A. Evans, Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography (NTTS 13; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1989) 168-87; L. H. Feldman, "The Testimonium Flavium: The State of the Question," in Christological Perspectives: Essays in Honor of Harvey K. McArthur, ed. R. F. Berkey and S. A. Edwards (New York: Pilgrim, 1982) 179-99, 288-93; R. T. France, The Evidence for Jesus (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1986); M. Goldstein, Jesus in the Jewish Tradition (New York: Macmillan, 1950); M. Harris, "References to Jesus in Classical Authors," in The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham (GP 5; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1982) 275-324; idem, Three Crucial Questions About Jesus (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994) part 1; R. T. Herford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash (repr., New York: Ktav, 1975 [1903]); J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth: His Life, Times, and Teaching, trans. H. Danby (New York: Macmillan, 1925) 18-56; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1991) 56-111; S. Pines, An Arabic Version of the Testimonium Flavianum and Its Implications (Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 1971); P. Schäfer, Jesus in the Talmud (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007); G. N. Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God's People?" in Jesus of Nazareth, Lord and Christ, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 159-75; G. Vermes, "The Jesus-Notice of Josephus Re-examined," JJS 38 (1987) 1-10; R. E. Van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament: An Introduction to the Ancient Evidence (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001).

C. A. Evans and R. E. Van Voorst

JEWISH QUEST FOR JESUS. See QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS.

JEWISH REVOLT. See JERUSALEM; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS.

JOHANNINE THEOLOGY. See JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

JOHN AND THE SYNOPTICS. See SYNOPTICS AND JOHN.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF

Although each of the four extant first-century Gospels makes a distinctive contribution, the Fourth Gospel offers a portrait of Jesus most distinct from the others. Most of its prominent themes, such as Jesus' deity, appear in the others, but John's Gospel underlines these in a unique way. This article addresses introductory literary, historical, and theological issues in the study of this Gospel.

1. Literary Questions
2. Historical Questions
3. Johannine Theology
4. Conclusion

1. Literary Questions.

Although scholars differ on details of the structure of the Gospel of John, the basic elements command wide consensus. Also inviting comment, John has distinctive literary features that often differ from the Synoptics. Particularly important from a literary perspective is this Gospel's narrative unity, which lays the groundwork for the third main section of this article, on Johannine theology.

1.1. The Structure of John's Gospel. John's Gospel as a whole functions as a narrative unity, with new elements building on earlier ones toward the climax of Jesus' resurrection appearances. In contrast to the shorter pericopes and sayings that dominate much of the Synoptics, John has numerous lengthy scenes and speeches. On a more detailed level, John contains a number of long narratives divisible into shorter pericopes (e.g., the scenes in Jn 6:1-71; or, longer, Jesus at the Festival of Tabernacles in Jn 7:1-10:21), whereas other narratives are brief (e.g., Jn 4:46-54) and may be read in connection with surrounding narratives (e.g., Jn 4:1-45). Often speeches and dialogues correspond to the narratives that they follow (e.g., Jn 5:17-47 with Jn 5:1-16). Most scholars agree on the following general structure of this Gospel.

1.1.1. Prologue (Jn 1:1-18). Although some scholars recently have made a case for a shorter preface (Jn 1:1-5), most scholars recognize John 1:1-18 as the prologue, with material about *John the Baptist (Jn 1:6-8, 15) anticipating the beginning of the actual narrative. (If one omits these passages about John, the prologue could be divided into three stanzas of twelve lines each. Though the prologue lacks the precise rhythm of a Greek hymn, in rhetorical terms it is at least exalted prose.) Recognition of Jesus' deity and unity with the Father frame the prologue (Jn 1:1, 18).

1.1.2. Body of the Gospel (Jn 1:19-20:31). The largest bulk of narrative action transpires between John 1:19 and John 12:50 (or possibly somewhere in Jn 13). Much of this section is structured temporally around festivals (see Feasts), and it includes far more scenes in Judea than the Synoptics include. Scholars sometimes call it the "Book of Signs" because much of the action surrounds Jesus' signs. Because the first of these signs turns water to wine and the last involves the raising of *Lazarus, some suggest a sort of inverted echo of *Moses' signs in Exodus (from water turned to blood to the death of the firstborn). In terms of plot development, hostility toward Jesus builds from the Jerusalem authorities as the narrative progresses and Jesus unveils more about his identity. As conclusions of sections often did, John 12:44-50 recalls many features of the preceding narratives.

In John 13:1 through John 17:26 Jesus prepares his disciples for his departure. Here Jesus washes his disciples' feet and instructs them about the coming of the Spirit and how they must carry on after his departure from the world.

In John 18:1 through John 20:31 John recounts the story of Jesus' *passion and *resurrection, with which early Christians in general were familiar; at many points, however, he goes his own way. Even here, however, he sometimes includes features that incidentally explain details in the Synoptics or that cohere more closely with what we know of his milieu (e.g., Jesus carrying his own cross).

1.1.3. Epilogue. John 21 is an epilogue, following the climactic conclusion of John 20:30-31.

1.2. Some Literary Features of John's Gospel. Some features of John's language, such as connecting sentences with conjunctions like "and" and "therefore," perhaps suggest a Semitic style, but this connective practice was widespread in common Greek by this period. John's Greek style is relatively simple and straightforward, although some have compared elements of his christological language (like that of other NT authors) to "grand rhetoric" often applied to sublime subjects.

On a purely narrative level, John builds suspense toward the passion narrative with conflicts from John 2:18-20 onward. One feature of this suspense appears in John's use of Jesus' "hour" or "time," referring to his impending death (Jn 2:4; 7:6, 30; 8:20; 12:23-24; 13:1; 16:32). Nevertheless, the vast majority of John's audience would know of Jesus' death and resurrection before hearing his story, and John could expect not only first-time hearers but also those who were hearing the story multiple times.

Characters include "round" (multifaceted) characters such as Peter, who nevertheless acts very much in character with the way we find him in the Synoptic Gospels. By contrast, the composite character "the Jews" are "flatter," usually consistently confused or hostile. They stand not for all Jewish people (indeed, John presents Jesus and his followers as ideal Israelites), but especially for the Judean elite (see 2.3.2 below).

John's Gospel is full of irony (see Duke; O'Day). Thus, for example, Jesus' enemies admit that they "know nothing at all" (Jn 11:49) and do not "do anything good" (Jn 12:19). Wordplays are frequent (e.g., Jn 3:3, 8). This Gospel contains many narrative asides, guiding the hearer in how to interpret the narrative. For example, John explains terms (e.g., Jn 1:38, 41), customs (e.g., Jn 2:6) and the relevance of Scripture (e.g., Jn 2:17; 6:31, 45).

To a far more significant degree than the other canonical Gospels, John employs narrative symbolism. While John does not do so to the extent that would warrant wholesale allegorical interpretation (pace Origen), often there are illustrative connections between his narrative and the discourse sections. For two obvious examples, Jesus' feeding of the five thousand points to him as the *bread of life (Jn 6:35, 48), and as the "light of the world" (Jn 8:12; 9:5), Jesus opens blind eyes. Likewise, Jesus dies on Passover as the *lamb who takes away the world's sins (Jn 1:29).

Less obvious examples are also fairly likely. Thus, it probably is significant that John specifies Judas's departure as being "at night" (Jn 13:30; cf. Jn 9:4 and John's other light/darkness symbolism) (on John's symbolism, see Koester). Very possibly even the disciples' asking where Jesus is "staying" (employing the Greek verb menō [Jn 1:38]) and following him home illustrates the later principle in which Jesus and the Spirit come to "dwell" (menō) with believers and make his home in them (Jn 14:17, 23; 15:5).

John may also adapt material in the widely familiar passion narrative. Compare the following features in Table 1. Such features do not mean that John has invented all the differences, some of which could be reconcilable with the Synoptic version. They do suggest John's emphasis: no one takes Jesus' life from him, but rather he lays it down willingly (Jn 10:18).

A major literary feature of this Gospel is its repetition and development of themes.

1.3. Narrative Unity. In the heyday of *redaction criticism scholars offered speculative reconstructions of how the Johannine community developed, based on ingenious readings of the Johannine Gospel and Epistles. The most influential of these was R. Brown's Community of the Beloved Disciple (abandoning his earlier defense of the apostle John as the work's author), which proposed four stages in the community's development. Today, when detailed historical reconstructions behind texts have waned in biblical studies more generally, few scholars continue to maintain Brown's detailed approach, despite continuing respect for his commentary. (Toward the end of his life, Brown himself doubted that scholars could always discern which details belonged to which stage.) Even a work by a single ancient author could experience multiple stages in editing and postpublication revisions, but identifying these stages from a single version of the work is (apart from perhaps some individual elements) virtually impossible. This is all the more the case in the Fourth Gospel, where most scholars find the style fairly consistent throughout the work (often even in Jn 21).

In 1983 R. Culpepper's Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel drew attention to the pervasive stylistic unity of this Gospel, shifting the focus from often futile attempts to distinguish sources to understanding how John has constructed his narrative for the purpose of communicating his theology. Interest in John's cohesive narrative dominates studies of John's Gospel today, proving profitable and less speculative than much traditional interest in John's sources.

At some points, questions of sources or literary disunity remain prevalent. Many scholars, for example, find a break in the "final discourses" at John 14:31 ("Arise, let us go from here"), which they believe can be accounted for only by a careless meshing of sources. A growing minority of scholars allow that Jesus simply continues speaking after signaling this action, or that it performs a figurative narrative function.

Johannine scholarship also maintains a strong tradition of viewing John 21 as an appendix added by a later hand, despite the lack of manuscripts without it. Many recognize that the style and vocabulary (apart from terms distinctive to the context) are Johannine; one also may identify key literary connections with the rest of the Gospel. Nevertheless, until recently most scholars have considered the narrative too anticlimactic after John essentially concludes the Gospel with his statement of purpose in John 20:30-31. By contrast, an increasing number of commentators (e.g., Keener 2003, 1219-24; Brant 2011, 278) contend for literary unity even here, influenced by the increased emphasis on narrative unity today (most continue to view Jn 21:24-25 as a later addition). Ancient writings and speeches often did continue beyond a concluding climax (see, e.g., book 24 of Homer's Iliad). (However, nearly all scholars recognize Jn 7:53-8:11 as a later interpolation; it not only interrupts the narrative but also lacks the best textual support.)

The tendency today is to read John's Gospel (or

Table 1. Features of John's Passion Narrative Compared with Mark

Mark 14-15	John 13-19
Jesus' prayer of anguish and submission in Gethsemane (14:36)	Jesus' prayer of anguish and submission (12:27-28)
Judas and Jesus dip bread in the bowl (14:20-21)	Jesus gives Judas the morsel (13:26)
The Last Supper interprets Jesus' death in light of Passover (14:12, 22-26)	Jesus dies as the Paschal lamb (19:31, 36)
Simon of Cyrene carries Jesus' cross (15:21)	Jesus carries his own cross (19:17) nearly all of it) as a whole, whatever its sources; stylistically and thematically it is a unity. Narrative unity proves an especially helpful premise for tracing themes throughout the book.

1.4. Genre. Scholars have offered various proposals for the genre of the canonical Gospels, including John (see Gospel: Genre). Some have argued that they are “unique”; while this is in a sense true (because the individual they portray is unique), this description is not very helpful because it defeats the purpose of placing works in larger genre categories. Some have compared dramas or epics, but in antiquity these were poetic genres quite different from the Gospels, even if they may have exerted influence on some elements of the Gospels. Later apocryphal Gospels bear all the marks of novels, and they flourished in the heyday of novels (the late second through the third centuries A.D.). Our first-century A.D. Gospels, by contrast, reveal clear indications of historical traditions.

Some have compared them with the gnostic Gospels, but the latter title is a misnomer (see Gospels: Apocryphal). These works are mainly collections of sayings, and while sayings collections surely circulated in the time of the Gospels (perhaps *Q; earlier, e.g., Proverbs), our extant first-century A.D. Gospels are narratives, not mere collections of sayings. John’s genre, then, is not comparable to that of gnostic Gospels.

The likeliest genre for the Gospel of John is ancient biography, which resembles the view held until the early twentieth century. Early twentieth-century scholars noted differences between the Gospels and modern biography, but more recently scholars have observed that the Gospels fit with ancient biography, which did not need to adhere to chronological sequence (e.g., Talbert; Shuler). R. Burridge has argued this most decisively (for both the Synoptics and John), showing that ancients would have read as biographies works about a single individual and within this range of length. This conclusion has implications for questions of history in John.

2. Historical Questions.

This section addresses John’s date and setting, provenance, proposed backgrounds, authorship and historical value.

2.1. Date and Setting. Although it once was fashionable for critical scholars to date John to the late second century, a fragment of the Gospel dating to the early second century (P⁵², discovered in 1935) has laid that speculation to rest. The strong majority of scholars now date John to the last decade of the first century, the very period specified by early Christian tradition.

Domitian was emperor at this time, and increasingly he demanded worship toward the end of his reign (see Rome). Many scholars today believe that ancient sources unfairly slander Domitian, but these sources are virtually unanimous in their negative appraisal of him and should be given due consideration. In any case, cities in the Roman province of Asia had long taken the imperial cult very seriously; if enemies of Christians in some cities (perhaps Smyrna and Philadelphia [see 2.2 below]) accused them to the authorities of rejecting Roman authority on the grounds of nonparticipation, the consequences might be grave. Jews were exempt from participation, but Christians, if expelled from synagogues, could lose that exemption. Later Christians believed that persecution occurred during this period (Tertullian, Apol. 5.4; cf. Rev 2:10, 13), though it did not affect all locations (cf. Rev 3:17). Many scholars suggest that in their emphasis on Jesus’ deity, John and Revelation might counter imperial claims as well as those in the *synagogue who might tolerate less exalted views of Jesus.

2.2. Provenance. Proposals about this Gospel’s provenance vary. Some propose an Alexandrian origin. A more significant minority of scholars have proposed a Palestinian, especially Galilean, provenance; still others suggest that John’s Semitic environment and Greek language fit best with a setting in urban Syria. None of these conclusions need follow, although they are possible. Most accept that John’s content reflects a Palestinian milieu (e.g., his intimate knowledge of pre-A.D. 70 *Jerusalem’s topography), but it need not follow that his target audience or place of writing also was Palestinian. After the war in A.D. 66–73 devastated Judea, large numbers of Palestinian Jews settled in Asia Minor (see Josephus, Ant. 20.256). John takes for granted his implied audience’s knowledge of some sites, but many of those so assumed appear already in Synoptic traditions that they may have known.

In the absence of firm evidence to the contrary, the largest number of scholars continue to situate John in Ephesus, following early Christian tradition regarding where the apostle John settled late in his life (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1; Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.23.6–19), presumably along with other Judean emigrants. Most scholars associate this work with other Johannine works, one of which, the book of Revelation (see Rev 1:1), clearly circulated in the Roman province of Asia, of which Ephesus was the most prominent city (Rev 1:11; 2:1). Others suggest that John composed his Gospel (or at least was preaching its contents) in Palestine but circulated a more finished form from Ephesus.

While Ephesus was traditionally a center of Johannine tradition, and much of John can fit this context (van Tilborg), two of the Johannine churches in Revelation closely fit the very setting that contemporary scholarship has most often reconstructed for this Gospel. Apparently, synagogues in Smyrna and Philadelphia had expelled Jewish followers of Jesus, inciting conflict over the question of who genuinely constituted the heirs of God's covenant promises (Rev 2:9; 3:9). In the early second century John's disciple Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna; reportedly accused by members of the Jewish community there, he was executed by Roman officials. (Archeology shows that Palestinian émigrés settled in Asia Minor, including in Smyrna.)

Because of the confluence of Palestinian Jewish background and a Diaspora audience of Jesus' followers who had belonged to synagogues, it is helpful to draw on a range of ancient Mediterranean background to illumine this Gospel. Whereas Palestinian Judaism particularly illumines the traditions behind it, Diaspora Judaism also helps illumine John's Gospel as it was addressed to and would be heard by its first audiences.

2.3. Background. Today scholars usually see the Fourth Gospel's background as primarily Jewish and involving conflict with synagogues. While this seems by far the most plausible view, it is helpful to first survey some of the alternatives.

2.3.1. Proposed Backgrounds. Only a few scholars think that *Samaritans influenced the final shape of John's Gospel (and virtually none see them to be the primary audience). By contrast, the view that John addressed gnosticism has had many supporters, not least the second-century A.D. church father Irenaeus (who sought to deliver John's Gospel from gnostics who were exploiting it in support of their theology). Most of the proposed parallels, however, appear outside gnosticism. For example, Johannine dualism (life/death; light/darkness; above/below; etc.) fits apocalyptic and Qumran thought (see Dead Sea Scrolls). The supposed gnostic redeemer myth is a composite constructed from different, unrelated elements. R. Bultmann's Mandaean parallels to John, which heavily influenced his reading of this Gospel, derive from centuries after it became widely circulated and probably reflect the influence of Johannine language rather than the reverse. (On the lack of evidence for full-blown gnosticism in the first century A.D., see Yamauchi.)

2.3.2. Judaism. Early twentieth-century scholars tended to view the Fourth Gospel's milieu as predominantly Greek. Discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, however, revealed that John's supposed Greek elements in fact reflect stronger Jewish than Greek parallels (e.g., his light/darkness symbolism and other moral dualism), yielding today a strong consensus that John's milieu is Jewish.

This case can be overstated. Diaspora churches in Asia Minor undoubtedly included *Gentiles, though these Gentiles would have viewed themselves as converts to a form of Judaism (e.g., 3 Jn 7; Rev 1:20; 2:9). Although some scholars view John's "Greeks" (Jn 7:35; 12:20) as Diaspora Jews, they more likely are to be identified as Gentiles who could be grafted into the Christian movement, which itself was Jewish (cf. Jn 10:16). Claims that Greek translations of "messiah" and "rabbi" imply many Gentiles in John's audience, however, are misplaced; Diaspora Jews usually spoke Greek, and John is noteworthy not for including the Greek translation but rather for including the Semitic terms that are translated.

Since the mid-twentieth century, recognition of the Jewish milieu of the Fourth Gospel has grown into a very strong consensus. Greek culture influenced even Palestinian Judaism, so some Greek elements are to be expected everywhere in the NT; but many elements are non-Greek and specifically Jewish. Much of this Gospel is barely intelligible to those unfamiliar with Jewish customs, such as purification (Jn 2:6), Passover (Jn 2:13, 23) or current understandings of circumcision on the Sabbath (Jn 7:22-23). Jesus is greater than the *Sabbath (Jn 5:18-29), *Abraham (Jn 8:53), Jacob (Jn 4:12) and the prophets (Jn 8:53); he is eschatological manna (Jn 6:32, 35 [emphasized in Jewish tradition]); he is the fulfillment of Ezekiel's new temple river (Jn 7:37-39), Jacob's ladder (Jn 1:51), Moses' serpent (Jn 3:14); and so forth. Whether the dominant leaders of his own people accepted the claim or not, John argues that Jesus is "King of the Judeans" (Jn 19:19-22). Many Gentiles had heard of the Jewish Sabbath, but Jesus fulfills aspirations for the Feasts of Passover (as the lamb), Tabernacles (Jn 7:2, 37-39; possibly "light" in 8:12) and possibly Hanukkah (Jn 10:22, 36 [as one consecrated]). These connections would make little sense to Gentiles (except for God-fearers attending local synagogues).

We should recognize that first-century A.D. *Judaism was very diverse, perhaps even more so in the Diaspora than in Palestine. Scholars often have used later *rabbinic literature to illumine John's Gospel, and this use seems justified in that rabbinic sources provide the largest corpus of ancient Jewish material and sometimes the only source detailing particular information (such as conflicts between Jewish Christians and members of the Judean elite). Nevertheless, given John's probable Diaspora setting, we do well to draw from the widest possible range of sources (including sometimes those elements of broader Mediterranean culture that also influenced early Judaism).

2.3.3. Conflict with Synagogues. Ancient preachers, like modern ones, focused on material most relevant to their audience's situation. Most scholars recognize that the polemical tone toward the Pharisees in the Fourth Gospel reflects a higher level of conflict with them than in Mark or even Matthew. While all our early sources are clear that Jesus had conflict with *Pharisees, they also are clear (even in John) that it was Jerusalem's *priestly elite that engineered his execution. After A.D. 70, however, heirs of Pharisaism became an increasingly dominant voice in Judea; the temple's destruction ended *Sadducean, priestly hegemony. Jewish believers in Jesus and non-Christian Pharisees came increasingly into conflict in the following decades, a conflict reflected both in early rabbinic sources and in Matthew and John.

In 1968 J. Martyn argued that a critical breaking point between Jesus' Jewish followers and synagogue authorities was the Birkat ha-Minim. Synagogue leaders added this curse against schismatics to daily prayers, and many think that it targeted especially Jewish Christians. Despite subsequent debates about its nature, it does seem probable that Jewish Christians, given their numbers, were the "schismatics" most affected by this malediction. It also seems plausible, despite objections, to date the curse to around A.D. 85 (the time of Samuel the Small). The Qumran Scrolls further demonstrate that the practice of expulsion from the community existed by this period; reluctant to pronounce a curse against themselves, however, those viewed as schismatics might have voluntarily withdrawn without expulsion.

Nevertheless, there is little reason to believe that a change in prayer liturgy in Palestine would be immediately adopted by Greek-speaking synagogues throughout the Mediterranean Diaspora. It may be better to understand this curse as illustrating more generally the sorts of tensions between Jewish authorities and Jewish followers of Jesus that arose in some locations. Synagogues were well networked, and events in Palestine influenced events elsewhere, but we need not assume a universal expulsion of Christians from all synagogues. That they were expelled from some, however, seems likely. Today most scholars, even those who do not follow Martyn's thesis fully, recognize that conflict with the synagogue is a major issue in John's setting (cf. Rev 2:9; 3:9, noted above). John repeatedly addresses this issue (Jn 9:22; 12:42), including as a warning for what is to come (Jn 16:2). At the same time, that John has reason to emphasize a point need not mean that he invented it; the warning is consistent with other extant Jesus tradition (cf. Mk 13:9; Lk 6:22).

Despite its later abuse by anti-Semites, the Fourth Gospel is not anti-Jewish; John and his target audience were Jewish followers of Jesus, a Jewish movement that actually predates the later rabbinic movement (see Anti-Semitism). The polemic in this Gospel is conventional intra-Jewish polemic (the DSS, for example, more harshly denounce the rest of Israel as the "congregation of Satan" [1QH^a X, 22]). A key issue that scholars raise in this regard is what John means by "the Jews," a label that he sometimes uses positively or in a neutral way, but often negatively. Jesus himself is recognized as a "Jew," but only by outsiders (Jn 4:9; 18:35), suggesting rejection by the leaders of his own people. John usually applies the term to Judeans (often as distinguished from Galileans), an observation that is also consistent with the seat of Pharisaic power in John's day. Moreover, the term often applies to the Judean elite, distinct from the "common people" (cf. Jn 7:49; 12:19). Theologically, John also uses these "Jews" as the local illustration of the larger principle "the world," of which they are only a part.

Beyond these observations, the title served another polemical function. One key issue in the polemic would have been the true identity of the heirs of Israel's remnant (in rabbinic sources, see b. Yebam. 102b; b. Sanh. 39ab; Pesiq. Rab. 5:1; Herford, 247-51, 290-91). By expelling Jesus' followers, synagogue leaders set themselves up as arbiters of Jewish identity; John, however, counters that Jesus defines his own people, applying biblical images for Israel to Jesus' followers (Jn 10:11-16, in the context of 9:34-41; 15:1-6).

As noted above, John's Gospel is full of irony. If Jewish leaders claimed to be the true arbiters of Jewish identity, John may grant them the title "Jews" ironically, while undermining their genuine right to that claim throughout his narrative (see Keener 2003, 214-27), and indeed meaning the opposite (Rev 2:9; 3:9). This would resemble the ironic suggestion that the law is "their law" (Jn 8:17; 10:34; 15:25), when the narrative's point is the opposite.

2.4. Value for Study of the Historical Jesus. The biographic genre of John's Gospel both suggests significant historical content and allows for the sort of freedom apparently found in the Johannine style of the speeches. Historical investigation also invites discussion of John's sources.

2.4.1. John's Narratives. A work's genre, defined within a culture-specific range of options, shapes how authors could expect their original audiences to approach their work. Some genres included the expectation of historical elements, although even historiography was written with some conventions differing from how historians normally write today (see Historicisms and Historiography). Ancient biographies varied in subject and method, so while John addresses Jesus as an individual as the Synoptics do, he is not bound to follow their approach. While biographies differed from multivolume histories, however, they were essentially historical works; good biographers did not invent events, though they selected traditions most useful to them and could reshape them. Biographies of recent characters (in the past century or so, as in Tacitus or Suetonius) tended to be more reliable than those concerning characters of the distant past (as often in Cornelius Nepos or Plutarch). This observation suggests that the first-century Gospel writers preserve substantial information about the historical Jesus (see Keener 2009a).

The question of history in John remains an issue of debate (see esp. Anderson, Just and Thatcher). Many scholars believe that John had access to considerable information not preserved in the Synoptics; he does claim eyewitness tradition through the Beloved Disciple (Jn 19:35), whom most scholars see as a source for John's tradition (cf. Jn 21:24) (see 2.5 below). In ancient biographies and histories (as opposed to apocalypses and novels) claims to be present for events were nearly always intended as historical claims.

Moreover, John frequently displays knowledge of Palestinian topography (e.g., Jn 3:23; 5:2; 9:7) and customs (e.g., Jn 7:37-38; 8:12, 58) that may have eluded much of his Diaspora audience, and these usually are held to reflect historical information behind his account. Such features rarely appear in novels (in which even characters usually are fictitious). Sometimes his portrayals match our expectations from ancient sources better than do the Synoptics (such as Jesus carrying his own cross), or they provide particularly plausible explanations for events that appear in the Synoptics, such as the conspiracy against Jesus (Jn 11:47-53) or Pilate's reticence to charge him with treason (Jesus fits the image of a harmless sage in Jn 18:36-38 [see Keener 2003, 1109-14]).

2.4.2. Discourses and Dialogues. Whereas John's narratives resemble the Synoptics, his speeches (as opposed to collections of sayings) generally run much longer. Virtually all scholars recognize that John's distinctive style (also largely found in the Johannine Epistles) pervades the speeches. While early sources reveal that Jesus sometimes spoke this way in private (Mt 11:27 // Lk 10:22; Mk 13:32), and such teaching may have shaped John's own idiom, John has developed Jesus' speech in his own words throughout the work. That observation should not surprise us; even elementary students regularly paraphrased sayings of famous sages.

Perhaps more surprising is the length of many speeches, dialogues and debates that occur in this Gospel, as well as their often distinctively Johannine content (especially in terms of Johannine Christology). John seems to have exercised more literary freedom than the Synoptics did, although John was not violating the expectations of the ancient biographic genre in doing so. Historians in fact regularly developed speeches from briefer sources (or, where necessary, even inferences), trying to flesh out more compact information into fuller scenes appropriate for ancient narratives. Although this approach to narration differs from the way we write history today, it was acceptable practice in the first century (although again the range of liberties taken varied considerably from one writer to the next). R. Bauckham, pointing to the speeches in John, even compares John's genre with ancient historiography (Bauckham, 106-12).

Historians who developed speeches and dialogues, however, ideally sought to reconstruct this material in keeping with what was known of the speakers, insofar as possible. Often this reconstruction included even elements of the speaker's known style, but most importantly it included the substance of what such speakers would be thought to have offered on such occasions (based on any available information), and what was consistent with the speakers' values and ideas. From this practice we may surmise that, at the very least, John, who has eyewitness material (see 2.5 below), believed that these speeches accurately represented the message of Jesus and the sorts of ideas that Jesus would have communicated on the occasions in question. Given his speeches' content, John plainly does not feel constrained by the emphases known to early Christians from Mark (John has a sort of "messianic secret" of his own, but it is far less discreet than in Mark's Gospel, though as in Mark, the denseness of Jesus' dialogue partners contributes to it).

Lest we overestimate John's creativity in the speeches, however, we should note the presence of some sayings that the Synoptics also attest, yet in Johannine idiom (e.g., Jn 1:26-33; 12:25; 13:16). Some of Jesus' arguments (like the halakic argument in Jn 7:22-23) resemble the style of Jesus' argumentation in the Synoptics. That speech is in John's distinctive style does not mean that John does not reflect earlier material. It simply means that we cannot readily distinguish his sources based on style (on John's discourses, see Keener 2003, 53-80).

2.4.3. Sources. Although scholars today emphasize the Fourth Gospel's literary unity (see 1.3 above), historical questions invite consideration of possible sources. Other source theories and authorship questions are surveyed below, but our best "test case" is where John overlaps with the Synoptics (e.g., Jn 1:26-32; 6:10-13, 19-20; 12:3-8, 14). Scholars differ as to whether John used one or more of the Synoptics (most often Mark), the most common position being that he did not (see Smith 2001; those favoring John's use of the Synoptics include notably the Leuven school). I concur with this dominant position, but it can hardly follow that John (who uses the Gospel form) did not know of such works. Whether or not John knew the accounts in the Synoptics, however, the points where he overlaps with them reveal that John is not simply composing freely without respect to prior historical information. Even if John used the Synoptics at some points rather than simply events or traditions behind them, can we possibly suppose that John selected only sources that happened to remain now extant, and elsewhere he simply composed freely? We know that many accounts about Jesus circulated (Lk 1:1). It therefore is reasonable to suppose that John preserves significant historical tradition not found in the Synoptics. In any case, it appears that John's relation to the Synoptics or their tradition may be complex (see Synoptics and John).

The range of ancient biographies allows for considerable adaptation on the freer end of the spectrum. Thus, for example, Philo allegorizes some of his accounts of biblical characters. John is considerably more conservative than Philo, yet all commentators concur that John is more directly interpretive than the Synoptics. How far does John push the interpretive element? Scholars generally note that his narratives are mostly Synoptic-like; questions about John's reliability center more on the speeches than his narratives (see 2.4.2 above).

In view of John's fairly consistent style, it is difficult to reconstruct particular sources that do not remain extant. Some scholars (e.g., R. Fortna) have sought to distinguish sources in John, though few other scholars have been persuaded by his detailed reconstruction. (The signs narratives, often called the "Book of Glory," do differ in texture from Jesus' final discourses, a contrast often attributed to different sources. Miracle accounts and speeches could circulate in different sources in antiquity; they did not always do so, however, and even here we lack certainty that different sources must be involved.)

More influentially, J. Martyn argued for two levels in John: the level of John's historical tradition and the level of his theological exposition for the Johannine community. More recently, U. von Wahlde has taken Martyn's basic approach to a particularly sophisticated level, seeking to identify both tradition and redaction in John's Gospel. He employs archeological data and literary analysis, noting not only the elements that fit John's deliberate literary design, but also those that do not. While most scholars regard such a detailed reconstruction of layers as too hypothetical, von Wahlde at least has identified points of likely historical tradition in the Fourth Gospel.

Despite these secondary questions, scholars recognize the literary unity of most of the Fourth Gospel. In view of the book's stylistic unity, the question of John's use of earlier material must be decided on grounds other than style; some ancient writers put all their material into their own style. More relevant for evaluating this Gospel's historical claims, therefore, is the possibility that the author himself is or depends on an eyewitness source.

2.5. Authorship. When asking questions of authorship, we must consider what we mean by that term. Many have argued that the Johannine Gospel and Epistles reflect a community project, created by a circle around John. In its most sophisticated form, this thesis has been developed by R. Culpepper, who notes that ancient schools often collected and edited the teachings of their founders (Culpepper 1975). Establishing this possibility does not prove that a "community" rather than an author composed the work, but it does show the plausibility of such an approach. Even on this approach, however, a particular Johannine figure, the source of tradition, stands behind the community that speaks in his name.

Few people in antiquity wrote their books by hand; usually they dictated to scribes. Furthermore, many composed works that used or incorporated earlier sources or traditions (in the way some believe that John's Gospel utilized the testimony of the Beloved Disciple). Final works could be reedited by the authors or others (in the way some find in John levels of redaction). John's Gospel is a cohesive whole; hence, by "authorship" I mean responsibility for the story as a whole (at least in the form of the witness's sermonic material). That it was further shaped or edited by this author's followers (perhaps a "circle" or "school"), however, remains possible (many so interpret Jn 21:24, although "we know" is a frequent Johannine idiom). As we noted earlier, the form of John's Gospel as we have it is a narrative unity; any other readings must indulge some degree of speculation.

Scholars propose various views of the Fourth Gospel's authorship, most often John the elder; John the apostle; a disciple, circle or school surrounding either of these persons; or others whom we cannot reconstruct from tradition. Although only a minority of scholars today regard the author as the apostle John (the traditional view, defended briefly below), a large number (e.g., Kysar; O'Day; Smith) accept eyewitness tradition in this Gospel (a tradition that in some respects might bring this Gospel closer to the eyewitness level than does Mark or Luke, though they could preserve others' eyewitness tradition accurately). Yet, as F. F. Bruce asked, if the author (or source) was an eyewitness, why could it not be John son of Zebedee? (J. Charlesworth has made a reasonable case for Thomas as author, though this has not generated wide assent; a few have suggested that the Beloved Disciple was Lazarus, offering a reasonable argument but from very limited internal evidence.)

Many today maintain that the *Beloved Disciple must not have been one of the Twelve, but arguments for this position are hardly decisive. For example, some argue that he was not one of the Twelve because this Gospel's tradition differs from the Synoptics or this disciple competes with Peter. Yet, in this period who but one of the Twelve could compete with Peter or radically supplement widely circulated traditions now dominant? (Against some reconstructions of the Johannine community, one should also note that ancient rhetoric allowed for friendly as well as hostile forms of rivalry.) Mark's doubt that Jesus' male disciples were at the cross (Mk 14:50) is a general statement that (in view of Mark's emphasis on discipleship failure) need not genuinely exclude every individual historically (Jn 19:26). Some complain that the Fourth Gospel omits scenes where the Synoptics attest the son of Zebedee's presence; if John was present for nearly all of Jesus' ministry, however, he would hardly feel compulsion to focus his narration simply on scenes where Mark specifically noted his presence. Although his anonymity may well serve a literary function (Beck), the Johannine community knew who this literal figure was and respected him highly (Jn 21:20-25). The Beloved Disciple appears extremely prominent in Jesus' circle (Jn 13:23), which normally would suggest one of the Twelve.

What is the relationship of the Beloved Disciple to the author? Some distinguish the actual author from the Beloved Disciple as the implied narrator, but the texts on which this distinction rests (Jn 19:35; 21:24) do not make that case clear. Moreover, such distinctions are rare in ancient biography and historiography (as opposed to, say, some novelistic works).

Although many scholars disallow the minority scholarly view that the apostle John authored the Fourth Gospel, the views that he authored it or that it rests on his tradition together comprise more adherents than any other single proposal regarding authorship. Internal evidence points largely to the apostle John, as argued already by B. F. Westcott in the nineteenth century; critics have more often neglected than sought to refute his argument. In summary: the only possibly surviving figure in the Synoptics accorded as prominent a role as the Beloved Disciple has in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 13:23), yet unnamed in this Gospel (cf. Jn 21:2), is the apostle John. John's age would not be a problem; since disciples typically were in their teens, John could be in his 80s in the last decade of the first century. We do know of some other ancient (and modern) figures whose minds remained sharp at this age. Ancients sometimes pseudonymously appropriated the names of earlier figures to lend authority to their works; but this work does not name its author, and we know of no convention of implicit pseudonymity.

More plainly, external evidence favors John the apostle as the author. Classical studies weigh heavily external evidence for other ancient documents; if NT scholars followed suit for their own discipline, they might well treat this apostle as the probable author. Gnostic and mainstream Christian authors alike regarded the son of Zebedee as the author. Some later writers (Eusebius and Dionysius) distinguished John the apostle from John the elder (a distinction less clear in Eusebius's own early source, Papias). On this basis, some scholars today argue that John the elder (i.e., a "different John") composed this Gospel. This view, however, still differs from the ancient tradition, which occasionally attributed the authorship of Revelation to the elder but always credited the authorship of this Gospel to the apostle.

The most difficult problem for apostolic authorship is that the earliest orthodox writers, unlike early gnostics, neglect it (though clearly it is part of the established four-Gospel canon throughout the orthodox churches by about A.D. 170 to 180, as attested by Tatian in Syria and Irenaeus in France). It may have enjoyed at first a narrow circulation in Asia Minor, not immediately comparable to established earlier works. This slow reception would seem unusual for a prominent apostle's status. Nevertheless, the appearance of an early second-century A.D. manuscript as far away as Egypt, and allusions to Johannine language in Polycarp, suggest that Johannine works were in circulation more widely than our randomly preserved corpus of early second-century A.D. orthodox sources (particularly Ignatius) might imply.

Although it has become fashionable to highlight the differences between the Johannine Gospel and Epistles in order to postulate different authors for each, the differences are too minor, and the similarities too great, to have suggested different authors to classicists studying comparable ancient documents. Indeed, one finds some of the same differences in style or theological emphasis in varying undisputed letters of Paul (say, 1 Thessalonians and Galatians); how much more would one expect differences between a Gospel (a finished and carefully edited literary work) and a sermonistic epistle or brief letters? In any case, all scholars attribute these works to the same circle, recognizing comparable style and the likelihood that 1 John assumes its audience's knowledge of the Fourth Gospel.

3. Johannine Theology.

A key preliminary question is that of John's purpose(s). Some read John's own statement of purpose in John 20:30-31 as evangelistic: he has recorded Jesus' signs (often calculated as seven in number) so "that you may believe" and "have life" (Jn 20:31). A larger number of scholars, however, read this passage as a call for believers to persevere in faith (regardless of the textual variant chosen here). Throughout the Fourth Gospel signs call forth a basic level of faith, but only as an invitation to a deeper, persevering faith (cf. Jn 2:23-25; 8:30-32).

Moreover, the content of this faith is crucial for John. The immediate context involves the climactic confession of faith in this Gospel: not only is Jesus God's lamb (Jn 1:29) and holy one (Jn 6:69), king of Israel (Jn 1:49; 12:13) and the world's savior (Jn 4:42; cf. 1 Jn 4:14); he is "my Lord and my God" (Jn 20:28). John commends this confession, especially for those who believe on others' testimony (Jn 20:29), as he now summons his audience to do (Jn 20:30-31). Regardless of opposition from the synagogue (and perhaps the state), John's audience must persevere in trusting Jesus as divine.

From start to finish this biography of Jesus communicates theology (ancient historical and biographic works, unlike most novels, sought to communicate moral, political and/or theological perspectives). Christology, soteriology and pneumatology are among the central features of his message.

3.1. Christology. John frames both his prologue (Jn 1:1, 18) and the main body of his Gospel (Jn 1:18; 20:28) with confessions of Jesus' deity; therefore we should expect high Christology to figure prominently in this Gospel. Jesus' exalted status is explicit already in the prologue, which most scholars today accept as an original part of this Gospel. In this passage Jesus is the logos, usually translated as the "Word." In John's day this title was rich in nuances, from Greek philosophy as well as Jewish tradition; some, like the Alexandrian Jewish philosopher Philo, combined both kinds of elements. The most important background that John shared with his audience, however, was the Greek translation of earlier Scripture, in which God's "word" involved especially prophetic revelation and Scripture itself, most notably the Torah. In Jewish tradition the image of Torah also coalesced with God's *Wisdom (e.g., Bar 3:36—4:1).

John's image moves beyond Wisdom or Torah; rather than being "created" in the beginning (like Wisdom [Prov 8:22]), the Word "was." Nevertheless, he clearly plays on this line of Jewish tradition, which often personified Wisdom as God's agent; Wisdom was the closest Jewish image available to John for an entity divine yet distinct from the Father (see Jn 1:1-2, 18, which also emphasize the distinction). Like Wisdom and Torah, Jesus was creation's agent in the beginning (Jn 1:1-3), as well as life and light (Jn 1:4-9; cf. Jn 8:12; 12:35-36, 46). Like Wisdom, Jesus is the perfect image of the Father (Jn 1:18; 14:9; cf. Wis 7:26). Other details of John's portrayal of the Word also fit Jewish traditions about Wisdom and Torah (such as its rejection among the nations [Jn 1:10]), although his observation about Israel's rejection is more distinctive (Jn 1:11).

The comparison becomes most relevant, however, in John 1:17-18. Although grace and truth were present in the law (Ex 34:6), Jesus explicitly reveals these aspects of God's character in a fuller manner than Moses' law had (Jn 1:17). This was because Moses' revelation of God's *glory was partial hence incomplete; even Moses could not see God's face (Ex 33:20-23). Thus, John says, no one has ever beheld God (Jn 1:18; cf. Jn 6:46); but now the unique God, who is with the Father, has fully revealed the Father (Jn 1:18). The law revealed God's character partially; Jesus has revealed it completely. The ensuing narrative of this Gospel describes how Jesus revealed this glory of God's character in various beneficial acts (e.g., Jn 2:11; 11:4), but especially in the cross (Jn 12:23-24).

Following the prologue, the narrative continues to develop christological themes. Thus, for example, John prepares the way for Yahweh (Jn 1:23) and proclaims Jesus' preexistence (Jn 1:30). Jesus descends from heaven like divine Wisdom (Jn 3:13, 31); he is the bread of life (Jn 6:48), an image also applied to divine Wisdom. Jesus perfectly reveals the Father (Jn 14:8-10), and he shared the Father's glory before creation (Jn 17:5, 24). Jesus raises and judges the dead eschatologically, a divine prerogative (Jn 5:17-29 [though emphasizing his submission to the Father]).

At significant length, Jesus is shown to be the Father's commissioned "agent," one "sent" by him (e.g., Jn 3:17, 34; 4:34; 5:23-24, 30, 36-38). Scholars often compare the Jewish institution of the šāliah (an "agent"); beyond this comparison, the agency principle that the šāliah embodies was pervasive in the ancient Mediterranean world. Agents carried the full authority of their senders, to the extent that they accurately represented their commission; one's response to recipients revealed one's attitude to the sender (cf. Jn 5:38; 6:29). Jewish people understood biblical prophets as God's agents; the Synoptics also portrayed Jesus in this light, though not as elaborately as John (Mk 12:2-6; Mt 10:40 // Lk 10:16).

John exegetes Jesus in light of earlier biblical revelation. Jesus is Jacob's ladder (Jn 1:51) and the new *temple (Jn 2:19-22; cf. Jn 14:2-6). Against some, Jesus is not in this Gospel simply a new Adam, a new Jacob or a new Moses, but the God who breathed into Adam (20:22) or revealed glory to Moses and others (1:14). He is greater than Jacob (Jn 4:12), Abraham and the prophets (Jn 8:52-53), and, most critically, *Moses (cf. Jn 3:13 [against Jewish tradition about Moses]; 9:28-29). The disciples behold his glory like Moses beheld God's (Jn 1:14); Jesus also parallels what Moses gave (Jn 3:14; 6:32). Moses produced water from the rock, but Jesus is the rock itself, the foundation of the new temple (Jn 7:37-39). Jesus is the one of whom Moses wrote (Jn 5:45-47). Jesus' first sign, transforming water into wine (Jn 2:11), inverts Moses' first plague of water to blood, and his climactic sign, raising Lazarus, may invert the final plague of the death of the firstborn.

Throughout John's Gospel others confess Jesus' identity. John proclaims him as God's *lamb (Jn 1:29, 36) and Son (or "chosen one," depending on the variant in 1:34); Nathanael confesses him as God's Son and Israel's king (Jn 1:49); Peter confesses him as God's "holy one" (Jn 6:69); the Samaritans confess him as the world's savior (Jn 4:42); Martha confesses him as *Christ and *Son of God (Jn 11:27). The climactic confession in this Gospel, however, belongs to Thomas, who addresses Jesus as "my Lord and my God" (Jn 20:28).

Not only do others confess Jesus' identity; he confesses his own. In a series of "I am" statements Jesus claims to be the *bread of life (Jn 6:35, 48, 51); *light for the world (Jn 8:12); the passageway for the sheep (Jn 10:9) and way to the Father (Jn 14:6); the good *shepherd (Jn 10:11, 14); the resurrection and the *life (Jn 11:25); and the authentic vine (Jn 15:1, 5). Most of these claims evoke biblical images: Moses' bread, Isaiah's light, Ezekiel's (and/or Jeremiah's) shepherd, and God's people as a vine (see Bell). Some images invite responses, such as sheep following the shepherd, or people seeing because of light or passing through gates. Some are more organic: one must feed on Jesus as bread and imbibe him as if drinking; one must depend on him for life, as if a branch deriving its life from the vine. Jesus is one's very life now as well as guarantee of resurrection at the last day. Because John also emphasizes the Spirit and intimate relationship with God, he may also think in terms of believers' experience of Jesus as the vine, life and bread (see, e.g., Jn 15:4-5).

Further, Jesus' "I am" statements without a predicate (most clearly in Jn 8:58) evoke biblical self-revelations of Yahweh's deity (in the common Greek version of the OT, esp. Is 43:10). (John is not the first Gospel to use this declaration to evoke Jesus' deity [cf. Mk 6:50], but it seems interesting that, according to a later-recorded Jewish tradition, priests recited Isaiah's "I am" at the very festival [tabernacles] where John reports Jesus speaking these words.) Jesus' declaration "I am" even prostrates his enemies in John 18:6 (in one earlier Jewish tradition Pharaoh is struck prostrate when Moses pronounces the divine name).

Although John's Christology is distinctive, it is not altogether unique. Against those who think that early Christians articulated Jesus' deity only toward the end of the first century, we find indications of Jesus' exalted status already in Q (Mt 3:11-12 // Lk 3:16-17; Mt 7:21-23 // Lk 13:25-27) and each of the Synoptic writers (e.g., Mt 1:23; 18:20; 28:20; Mk 1:2-3, 8; Acts 2:20 with 2:38). Most clearly, Paul uses divine imagery and titles (such as "Lord") for Christ (e.g., Rom 9:5; 10:9-13; 1 Cor 8:5-6; 2 Cor 5:10; Phil 2:6; 1 Thess 3:13), invokes him in prayers (e.g., Rom 1:7; 2 Cor 12:8), and applies to him biblical texts about God (Rom 10:9-13; Phil 2:10-11). John's Gospel and Revelation, however, emphasize and develop this theme more elaborately.

3.2. Revelation and Salvation. In John's theology revelation and salvation involve divine initiative, but also they demand human response. Jesus is the only way to the Father (Jn 14:6), and he must be embraced through persevering faith.

3.2.1. Vision and Knowledge. Divine vision is a key theme running through John's Gospel (e.g., Jn 1:18, 34, 51; 5:37; 6:46; 14:7-9), and in key passages John grounds this theme in Scripture. Both Abraham (Jn 8:56) and Isaiah (Jn 12:41) saw Christ's glory in advance; at the beginning of his Gospel John uses Moses' vision of God's glory as a grid for understanding the disciples' experience of Jesus' glory (Jn 1:14-18). Scholars often note the parallels with Moses in John's prologue, as seen in Table 2. Because Isaiah's and Moses' experiences involved theophanies, we may recognize that John grounds his motif of divine vision in the biblical narrative of theophanies. Yet unlike the Synoptics, John depicts no specific transfiguration of Jesus; theologically, Jesus' entire ministry was a transfiguration, a revelation of God's glory.

Table 2. Parallels with Moses in John's Prologue

Exodus 33–34	John 1:14–18
"The Law"	"The Word"
Moses pled for God's continued presence (Ex 33:15–16).	The Word "tabernacled" among us (Jn 1:14).
Moses beheld God's glory (Ex 33:18–19).	"We [the eyewitnesses] beheld his glory" (Jn 1:14).
The glory was "abounding in covenant love and truth" (Ex 34:6).	The glory was "full of grace and truth" (Jn 1:14).
Grace and truth were present at the giving of the law (Ex 34:6), but Moses' revelation was partial (Ex 33:20, 23).	The law came through Moses, but "grace and truth" through Jesus Christ (Jn 1:17).
No one can see God, so Moses saw only part of God's glory (Ex 33:20, 23).	No one has seen God, but God the unique Son has revealed him (Jn 1:18).

Greek philosophers sought to envision the divine by meditating on the static divine nature; Jewish mystics sought to inculcate visions of the throne chariot (contrast Jn 3:13). By contrast, for John, God can be seen in divine self-revelation in the enfleshed Christ. The climax of this glorious enfleshed revelation is Jesus' death (Jn 12:23–24); here grace and truth are fully revealed (Keener 2003, 247–51, 405–6, 421–23; 2009b).

Just as some philosophers emphasized a vision of the divine, they also emphasized knowledge of the divine. John's language, however, is closer to (and sometimes echoes) biblical language of knowledge, often evoking covenant relationship with God (e.g., Ex 6:7; Jer 24:7; 31:34; Hos 2:20; cf. Jn 8:54–55; the language also appears in the DSS). As in earlier Scripture (e.g., Ex 6:7; 7:5, 17), knowledge of God rests on his prior self-revelation. John employs two Greek terms for knowledge interchangeably (he often uses synonyms for literary variation). According to John, Jesus has established a relationship with his followers as secure as his own relationship with his Father (Jn 10:14–15), and they recognize his voice (Jn 10:3–4). In practice, the Spirit enables Jesus' subsequent followers to remain as intimate with him as the first disciples were (Jn 15:15; 16:13–15). If leaders of their people claimed superior knowledge of the Torah and denounced Jesus' followers as ignorant, they could respond that they knew God personally and knew the Word made flesh (see Keener 2003, 234–47, 805–8, 817–18, 1038).

3.2.2. Faith, Eternal Life and the Cross. In earlier Scripture God is the primary object of *faith; Jesus shares this role throughout John's Gospel. That faith leads to eternal life is a key feature of this Gospel (Jn 3:15–16, 36; 5:24; 6:35, 40, 47; 11:25–26; 20:31), but there is a characteristic ambiguity in how John expresses this promise. Not every level of faith proves adequate for salvation. Signs often lead to faith in this Gospel (Jn 1:50; 2:11, 23; 4:39; 10:41–42; 11:15, 42; 12:11; 13:19; 14:29; 17:21; 20:8, 25, 27). But while faith in response to signs is better than no faith (Jn 10:37–38; 12:37; 13:19; 14:10–11, 29), it must mature, if given time or testing, to full faith (Jn 4:41–42, 48, 50, 53; 6:30, 36; 16:30–31; 20:29–31). Genuine, saving faith must both recognize Jesus' divine identity (Jn 20:28–31) and persevere to the end (Jn 8:30–32).

John speaks often of "eternal life" and usually refers to this even when he uses the shorthand form "life." Beginning from Daniel 12:2, Judaism applied the phrase to the life of the coming age that would begin at the future resurrection; the Synoptics usually apply the term in this standard Jewish sense. John, however, often speaks of eternal life as a present possession (e.g., Jn 3:15–16, 36; 5:24; 6:47, 54; 20:31). Whereas the Synoptics tend to emphasize future eschatology (and the Johannine work Revelation emphasizes that almost exclusively), the Fourth Gospel emphasizes the present realization of eschatology. There is, of course, some future eschatology in John (see esp. Jn 5:28-29; 6:39-40, 44, 54; 12:48), but his emphasis lies on the reality already established by the promised Christ. As life begins with birth, so believers enter the life of the coming age through being born “from above” (Jn 3:3)—from the Spirit (Jn 3:5-8), from God (Jn 1:13). Until being recreated, people remain children of the devil (Jn 8:44); once born from God, they become his children (Jn 1:12-13).

Just as Paul paradoxically finds God’s power and wisdom in the cross (1 Cor 1:18-24), so John finds Jesus’ “glory” not only in his exaltation (Jn 17:5; cf. Jn 12:16) but also in his death as a seed that would bear much fruit (Jn 12:23-24). At the cross Jesus’ mission is “finished” (Jn 19:30; cf. Jn 4:34); although after his resurrection Jesus imparts the Spirit directly (Jn 20:22), there is a sense in which he “gave the Spirit” at his death (the probable wordplay in Jn 19:30; cf. Jn 7:39) (see Holy Spirit). John portrays Jesus’ death in multiple other ways. Combatting predators against his sheep, Jesus lays down his life, but he is authorized to take it again (Jn 10:11, 15-18); on a narrative level, John articulates this theme by Jesus’ control of events in the *passion narrative.

In the Fourth Gospel Jesus’ death is sacrificial (see Death of Jesus). As God’s *lamb (Jn 1:29), Jesus dies sacrificially. This remains true whether the lamb is viewed as a normal sacrifice or as a Passover lamb (cf. Jn 19:36 with Ex 12:46), Passover lambs being understood sacrificially in this period (e.g., Josephus, Ant. 3.248, 294; 11.110; J.W. 6.423). Language from the Isaianic servant also suggests that John concurs with the common early Christian application of this passage to Jesus’ vicarious death; in Jn 12:23-24, 32-33 Jesus is “glorified” and “lifted up” like Isaiah’s *servant (LXX Is 52:13), and in John 12:38 John quotes Isaiah 53:1. In the following chapter Jesus models suffering servanthood by washing his disciples’ feet in the context of his betrayal, and he offers a model for laying down one’s life for one’s friends (Jn 13:14-16, 34-35; 15:13-15). Ironically, even some of Jesus’ enemies envision him dying in place of the people, although they intend a different sense (Jn 11:50-52).

3.2.3. People of God. Whereas “his own [people]” did not receive Jesus (Jn 1:11), whoever did receive him became God’s *children (Jn 1:12-13). Traditionally, Jewish people understood themselves as God’s children (Ex 4:22; Is 43:6) and children of Abraham (Jn 8:33), but in John (as elsewhere in our early sources [e.g., Mt 3:9 // Lk 3:8; Rom 4:1-16; Gal 3:6-18]), such titles apply to Jesus’ followers. That is, saving covenant relationship with God is determined not by ethnicity but rather by covenant loyalty to Israel’s God and to the king he appointed. Israel sometimes was portrayed as a vine (Ps 80:8-16; Jer 2:21; Ezek 15:2-6; 17:5-10; 19:10-14) or vineyard (Is 5:1-7); in John’s Gospel believers’ status as branches is determined by their connection to Jesus as the vine (Jn 15:2-6).

This emphasis becomes clearest in John 9–10. In John 9 Jesus heals a blind man, and leaders of the synagogue put him out because of his loyalty to Jesus. This man contrasts starkly with the man healed in John 5:2-9, not only in the cause of his affliction (Jn 5:14; 9:2-3) but also in his response (Jn 5:12-15; 9:35-38). He also offers a positive paradigm for John’s audience, who probably likewise have faced expulsion from the synagogue by those who claim to “know” more than they do but lack their spiritual experience with Israel’s God (“know” is a key term [Jn 9:12, 20-21, 24-25, 29-31]; cf. the continuing theme, sometimes with a synonym, in Jn 10:4-6, 14-15, 27). By expelling the man, the leaders act as arbiters of Jewish identity.

By contrast, Jesus defends the healed man against these leaders, showing that he does indeed belong to God’s people (Jn 9:40–10:21). Jesus is the good shepherd (Jn 10:11, 14), filling a role most commonly assigned to the Lord himself in earlier Scripture (e.g., Ezek 34:11-16). This healed man, who has heeded Jesus’ voice, is truly one of his sheep (Jn 10:3-5), an image applied to Israel in earlier Scripture (e.g., Ps 100:3). By contrast, those who have abused him are not Israel’s rightful leaders but rather are predators (thieves, robbers, wolves) who do not have the sheep’s best interests in view (Jn 10:1, 5, 8, 10, 12); they resemble the false shepherds of Israel denounced in the prophets (Jer 23:1-4; Ezek 34:1-10). Jesus lays down his life to protect the sheep against these predators (Jn 10:11-18), and the sheep know and heed him (Jn 10:4-5, 14, 16, 27)—earlier biblical language for a covenant relationship with him. They belong to God’s people.

Ultimately, Jesus’ sheep would include those scattered beyond the Holy Land (Jn 11:52); they would become one flock with one shepherd (Jn 10:16). Although this could indicate Diaspora Jews, “Greeks” in John 7:35; 12:20 likely refers to Hellenized Gentiles, who traditionally had often been in conflict with Jewish people. (Gentile God-fearers could visit a festival, and the “Greeks” whom Jesus would teach in Jn 7:35 must be the same “Greeks” among whom Jewish people are dispersed in the same verse.) This mission beyond *Israel is prefigured in Jesus’ ministry to the *Samaritans, who recognize him as the “savior of the world” (Jn 4:42). Thus, Jesus welcomes into God’s people even non-Jews; his “one flock” is to be in unity, including ethnically and cross-culturally. This ideal unity reflects the unity of the Father and the Son (Jn 17:21-23).

3.3. The Spirit. Early Judaism as a whole tended to stress the prophetic dimension of the Spirit (already found in Scripture) in its general sense (prophecy, revealed insight, works like the biblical prophets [e.g., Sir 48:24; 1 En. 91:1; 1QS VIII, 16; CD-A II, 12; Philo, Fug. 186; Josephus, Ant. 6.166]). Nevertheless, some (most commonly those who produced the DSS) also drew on Ezekiel’s association of the Spirit with eschatological purification from *sin (Ezek 36:25-27; cf. Jub. 1:21, 23; 1QS III, 7; IV, 21) (see Keener 1997, 6-48). John emphasizes both of these dimensions of the Spirit, possibly among others.

3.3.1. The Spirit and Purification. The theme of purification is prominent in John’s Gospel (cf. Jn 2:6; 3:25; 11:55) (see Keener 1997, 135-89). Thus, for example, Jesus turns water into wine in pots that were consecrated for ritual purposes (Jn 2:6), thus revealing that he valued the host’s honor above the demands associated with ritual purification. Less clearly, Jesus is greater than water in some other passages: he, rather than the waters of special Jerusalem pools, brings healing (Jn 5:2-9), though he uses such a pool in John 9:7. Greater than a well sacred to the Samaritans, Jesus offers living water springing up within believers (Jn 4:12-14).

In some passages Jesus’ rival purification is associated with the Spirit (Jn 1:31-33; 3:3-5). Although John’s *baptism in water is positive, it cannot prove comparable to Jesus’ baptism in the Spirit (Jn 1:31-33). What this Gospel means by “baptism in the Spirit” (as opposed to the possibly narrower sense in Luke-Acts) probably is explicated in John 3:3-5. In John 3:3 Nicodemus must be born “from above” (the normal sense of the term anōthen in John, reflecting this Gospel’s vertical dualism); this was an acceptable Jewish way of saying “from God.” In John 3:5 Jesus further explains birth from God as birth “from water and the Spirit” or, if we read it as a hendiadys, “from the water of the Spirit.” Later rabbinic sources portray Gentile converts to Judaism as being as new as newborn children; one important demarcation of this new status was proselyte baptism, a washing from one’s former Gentile impurities. Here, however, we seem to read of a spiritual proselyte baptism, a baptism in the Spirit. Jesus is greater than this form of Jewish ritual purification as well.

Most importantly, John explicitly uses water as a symbol for the Spirit in John 7:37-39. At the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7:2) priests carried water each day from the Pool of Siloam (cf. Jn 9:7) into the temple. This ritual was meant to symbolize the future time when rivers would flow from the temple in Jerusalem to bring life to the earth, recalling Ezekiel 47:1-12; Zechariah 14:8 (cf. Zech 14:16; t. Sukkah 3:3-10). Recalling these very texts that probably were read at this festival in Jerusalem, Jesus announces “rivers of living water,” “as the Scripture said” (Jn 7:38). Scholars debate the punctuation of the text in John 7:37-38, hence whether the water flows from the belly of believers or from that of Jesus, but in either case the Spirit comes ultimately from Jesus to believers (Jn 7:39). Believers may be part of the new temple, but Jesus is its foundation stone (cf. Jn 2:21), and the waters will flow from him (Jn 19:34; cf. Rev 22:1).

John also suggests, however, that Jesus’ gift of spiritual purification came at a great price. Jesus washes his disciples’ feet, taking the posture of a servant, in a context pervaded by warnings of the betrayal and Jesus’ imminent execution (Jn 13:12-33). This water motif climaxes at the cross. Of the four Gospels, only John mentions that water flowed with blood from Jesus’ broken heart (Jn 19:34). Scholars sometimes cite plausible medical reasons for this watery substance, but John’s reason for emphasizing this detail may be its function in his larger narrative. When Jesus finally was glorified, the Spirit became available (Jn 7:39).

3.3.2. The Prophetic Paraclete and Divine Presence. The prophetic aspect of the Spirit’s work is also clear in John’s pneumatology, especially in the “Paraclete” (paraklētos) sayings, although these extend beyond most Jewish traditions about prophetism (on the Paraclete material, see Keener 2003, 951-82, 1021-25, 1030-43). In these passages (Jn 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7) the Spirit appears as a distinct person, as Jesus’ successor. Judaism rarely personified God’s Spirit, but sometimes it connected the Spirit with personified *Wisdom; the primary backgrounds of the Spirit’s personhood here in John, however, are likely the careful way that John parallels the Spirit’s activity with that of Jesus earlier in the book, as well as earlier Christian understanding (e.g., Mt 28:19 [see Fee, 839-42]) and experience of the Spirit as a person.

Judaism connected the divine Spirit to the Father, but early Christians associated the Spirit also with the divine Son (Acts 16:7; Rom 8:9). (Although “spirit” [pneuma] is neuter in Greek, paraklētos is masculine, hence masculine pronouns for the Spirit in this section.) Given the common sense of paraklētos as mediator, helper or intercessor, and given the potentially forensic role of the Spirit as *witness (Jn 15:26) and prosecutor (Jn 16:8-11), some see the Spirit here as a sort of defense attorney or advocate for believers (just as Jesus defended the healed man in Jn 9:40-10:21).

The Spirit would continue Jesus' presence, both to his followers and to the world. The Spirit would guide disciples in truth (Jn 16:13), embodied especially in Jesus (Jn 14:6). The Spirit does not speak from himself (Jn 16:13), just as Jesus did not (Jn 5:30; 8:28, 42; 12:49; 14:10); instead, he speaks what he hears from Jesus (Jn 16:13), as Jesus spoke what he heard from the Father (Jn 15:15). Jesus revealed the Father's matters, glorifying the Father; now the Spirit does the same with Jesus (Jn 16:14-15). The Spirit thus continues disciples' experience with Jesus. Many scholars believe that John implies his own inspiration by the Paraclete, empowering his development of Jesus' story and his witness for Christ in this book. In any case, John does not intend the promise of this experience of the Spirit to be limited to the first disciples (cf. Jn 7:39; 17:20; 1 Jn 2:20, 27; 3:24; 4:13).

The Spirit also continues Jesus' presence to the world, convicting it of sin, righteousness and *judgment (Jn 16:8-11), just as Jesus had (Jn 3:19-20; 8:46; 9:39-41; 15:22, 24). This passage does not, however, emphasize the Spirit's direct activity on the world, but rather the Spirit's witness of Jesus through believers (Jn 15:26-27), for the Spirit comes not directly to the world but to believers (Jn 16:7). As Jesus' followers prophetically proclaimed him, inspired by the Spirit, the Spirit would continue to confront the world with Jesus' actual presence.

Jesus' continuing presence is a major emphasis of Jesus' climactic message to his disciples in John 13:31-17:26, especially in John 14:2-15:17. In John 15:4-7 Jesus speaks of remaining with the disciples, and the disciples remaining in him; the verb menō in John can imply more than merely "remaining," suggesting also something more intimate, like "dwelling" (e.g., Jn 1:38-39). The Spirit, who currently was with them through Jesus, would be in them (Jn 14:17). Jesus would not leave them abandoned; he would come to them (Jn 14:18) to give resurrection life (Jn 14:19-20) and make his dwelling in them (Jn 14:23). Later, Jesus does come to them to impart his continuing presence through the Spirit (Jn 20:19-23).

A number of scholars argue that this is the point even of the controversial passage in John 14:2-3. Although John does include some future eschatology (and might think in part of Jesus' eschatological discourse known to us from the Synoptics), John 14:2-3 appears in a context of mostly realized eschatology. The "Father's house" (Jn 14:2) refers not to heaven per se, but rather to the Father's dwelling place (cf. Jn 2:16-21) or household (cf. Jn 8:35). The "dwelling places" in it (Jn 14:2) reflect a Greek term (monē) used nowhere else in the NT but this same context—the Father and Son residing in believers through the Spirit (Jn 14:23). (The cognate verb menō applies to believers dwelling in Jesus, and him dwelling in them, as we noted above.) Jesus promises to "come again" and take them to the Father's presence (Jn 14:3), but his "coming" again in the context refers to his return after the resurrection to impart his presence (Jn 14:16-23; cf. Jn 15:26; 16:8, 13). The "place prepared" (Jn 14:2-3) is in the Father's presence, but it need not belong to the distant future (cf. Rev 12:6; though cf. the implication of death in Jn 13:36).

Although scholars continue to debate the matter, context suggests that John 14:2-3 involves Jesus' presence even in the current age; what Jesus meant was obscure even for the earliest disciples, but he goes on to clarify it for them. Thomas protests that the disciples do not know where Jesus is going or how to get there (Jn 14:5); Jesus explains that where he is going is to the Father and how they will get there is through him (Jn 14:6). He is not saying that disciples come to the Father's house when he returns at the end of the age; he is saying that they enter the Father's presence when they become his followers (see also Jn 14:7-9).

The Spirit, rather than any particular holy site, becomes the true location of God's presence for believers. Samaritans had worshiped on Mount Gerizim before a Judean king destroyed their temple there; Jews worshiped in the Jerusalem temple (Jn 4:20). Yet Jesus explains that the true site of worship will be "neither this mountain, nor Jerusalem" (Jn 4:21), but rather "in Spirit and in truth" (Jn 4:23-24 [or if we read it as a hendiadys, "the Spirit of truth"]). Jesus is Jacob's ladder connecting heaven and earth (Jn 1:51) and is the new temple (Jn 2:21); God's presence is available through him and by the Spirit.

This Gospel, like Matthew (Mt 28:19-20) and Luke (Lk 24:47-49), includes a closing commission (Jn 20:21-23). And as elsewhere in reported sayings of Jesus (Mk 13:11; Acts 1:8; cf. Mt 10:20), it is the Spirit who empowers believers to carry on Jesus' work (Jn 20:22). When imparting the Spirit, Jesus breathed on them (Jn 20:22) as God had breathed into human-kind the breath of life (Gen 2:7). Jesus had also promised that disciples would witness in conjunction with the Spirit (Jn 15:26-27). In John's Gospel John the Baptist is the prototypical witness (Jn 1:7-8, 15, 19;

3:26; 5:33) (on the witness motif, see Trites, esp. 78-127). As the Father's commissioned agent, Jesus also bore witness (Jn 3:11; 18:37); now he sends his followers as the Father had sent him (Jn 17:18; 20:21; cf. Jn 13:20). They carry on his witness by the Spirit (Jn 15:26-27), thus depending on the continuing experience of Jesus to transform some of their hearers. Thus, for example, Philip testifies to Nathanael from his own experience of Jesus and the witness of Scripture, but ultimately he invites Nathanael to "come and see" for himself (Jn 1:45-46). The Samaritan woman likewise testifies to her people en masse from her experience of Jesus, but ultimately she invites them to "come and see" (Jn 4:29, 41-42).

3.4. Johannine Ethics. John does not disclaim Jesus' historical emphasis on loving neighbors (Mk 12:31) and enemies (Mt 5:44 // Lk 6:27, 35), but his focus is on loving fellow believers. Jesus took a servant's role in washing the disciples' feet, while speaking especially about his impending death (Jn 13) (on the footwashing, see Thomas). In this setting Jesus calls on his followers to follow his example by serving one another (Jn 13:14-15) and loving one another (Jn 13:34-35) as he had (Jesus in turn took Mary as a model for the footwashing [Jn 12:3]). The command to "love one another was hardly "new" (Jn 13:34; cf. Lev 19:18; 2 Jn 5); what was "new" was the new standard: "as I have loved you" (Jn 13:34). To love as he had done meant loving even to the point of laying down their lives for one another (cf. 1 Jn 3:16).

The ancient Mediterranean world highly valued friendship that was so close that friends would die for one another; Jesus demonstrates this friendship (Jn 15:13-14), as well as the friendship ideal of intimacy and sharing confidences (Jn 15:15) (see Keener 2003, 1004-15). Loving in this way characterizes Jesus' disciples, who share his character (Jn 13:35). Believers' love and unity reflect the love and unity between the Father and the Son (Jn 17:21-23), a model emphasized throughout this Gospel. The Father and Son are distinct persons, yet in unity (Jn 10:30); the Gospel opens with their mutual intimacy (Jn 1:1-2, 18) and reiterates the Father's love for Jesus (Jn 3:35; 5:20; 10:17; 15:9; 17:23-24, 26), as well as Jesus' love for the Father (Jn 14:31). The Father (Jn 16:27; 17:23) and Son (Jn 11:3, 5, 36; 13:1, 23, 34; 15:9, 12; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20) love believers, and believers must love Jesus (Jn 8:42; 14:15, 21, 23-24, 28; 16:27; 21:15-17). (Contrary to the view of some, I would argue that John essentially uses both his Greek terms for "love" in most of the above categories, hence interchangeable, most obviously in Jn 21:15-17.) Nevertheless, the Johannine Epistles show that the truth about Jesus divides not only ethnic Israel (Jn 7:43; 9:16; 10:19), but also those who claim to be his followers (1 Jn 2:19; 2 Jn 9; 3 Jn 9-11; cf. Rev 2:14, 20).

While disciples were to love one another, they were separated from the world by being consecrated for God (Jn 15:18-25; 17:16-20; cf. 1 Jn 2:15-17). The world would hate them, as it had hated Jesus (Jn 15:18-19, 23-25; 17:14; cf. Jn 7:7; 1 Jn 3:13). Believers never are instructed to reciprocate the hatred of the world's people—they remain the object of God's love (Jn 3:16)—but they must not be shaped by the world's values, recognizing that those values are inimical to the values that Jesus represents. (John and Revelation address a more hostile situation and thus advance a more separatist vision than does Luke-Acts or Paul.)

Politically, although Jesus is Israel's true king (Jn 1:49; 12:13, 15), he is mocked as "king of the Judeans" (Jn 18:33-39; 19:3, 19). His *kingdom is not "from this world" (Jn 6:15; 18:36), and it cannot even be seen, much less entered, apart from divine birth (Jn 3:3, 5) (see New Birth). It is a kingdom advanced by proclaiming truth, not by violence (Jn 18:36-37). This observation does not suggest that John's understanding of Roman political power is neutral; Pilate remains complicit in Jesus' execution, out of fear of the imperial system that Jesus' kingship can appear to challenge (Jn 19:12, 15-16) (on this topic, see Carter, 289-314). Nevertheless, the greater guilt lies with those who have usurped rule over God's own people (Jn 19:11), who should have recognized Jesus from the Scriptures (Jn 1:11; 5:38-40, 45-47).

4. Conclusion.

The Fourth Gospel is an ancient biography, although it is more theologically interpretive than are the Synoptic Gospels, especially in Jesus' speeches. Its central theological emphasis is Christology. This emphasis is compatible with the chief objectives of the biographic genre, narrating a person's life and providing a sense of their character. John probably addressed especially Jewish believers who faced rejection from their people as unfaithful to God and the law for following Jesus as divine. Encouraging them to remain in the faith, John emphasized that by following Jesus through the Spirit, they knew God personally and knew the Word made flesh.

See also ABIDING; BLINDNESS AND DEAFNESS; BREAD; CHRISTOLOGY; GLORY; GOD; "I AM" SAYINGS; INCARNATION; LAMB OF GOD; LAZARUS; LIGHT AND DARKNESS; LOGOS; NEW BIRTH; SHEPHERD, SHEEP; SYNOPTICS AND JOHN; WATER, WINE; WITNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: C. K. Barrett, The Gospel According to St. John: An Introduction with Commentary and Notes on the Greek Text

- (2nd ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978); G. R. Beasley-Murray, John (WBC 36; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); J. A. Brant, John (Paideia Commentaries on the New Testament; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2011); R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John (2 vols.; AB 29, 29A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966-1970); D. A. Carson, The Gospel According to John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); C. S. Keener, The Gospel of John: A Commentary (2 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); A. J. Köstenberger, John (BECNT; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2004); A. T. Lincoln, The Gospel According to Saint John (BNTC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson; London: Continuum, 2005); J. R. Michaels, The Gospel of John (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010); F. J. Moloney, The Gospel of John (SP 4; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1994); L. Morris, The Gospel According to John (rev. ed.; NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); J. H. Neyrey, The Gospel of John (NCamBC; New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007); P. Perkins, "The Gospel According to John," in The New Jerome Biblical Commentary, ed. R. E. Brown, J. A. Fitzmyer and R. E. Murphy (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1990) 942-85; R. Schnackenburg, The Gospel According to St. John (3 vols.; New York: Crossroad, 1982); D. M. Smith, John (ANTC; Nashville: Abingdon, 1999); U. C. von Wahlde, The Gospel and Letters of John (3 vols.; ECC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010); R. A. Whitacre, John (IVPNTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999). Studies: P. N. Anderson, The Fourth Gospel and the Quest for Jesus: Modern Foundations Reconsidered (LNTS 321; New York: T & T Clark, 2006); P. N. Anderson, F. Just and T. Thatcher, eds., John, Jesus, and History (2 vols.; SBLSymS 44; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2007-2009); R. Bauckham, The Testimony of the Beloved Disciple: Narrative, History, and Theology in the Gospel of John (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); D. R. Beck, The Discipleship Paradigm: Readers and Anonymous Characters in the Fourth Gospel (BIS 27; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); D. M. Bell, "I Am" in John's Gospel: Literary Function, Background and Theological Implications (JSNTSup 124; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); C. L. Blomberg, The Historical Reliability of John's Gospel: Issues and Commentary (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2001); R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York: Paulist Press, 1979); G. M. Burge, The Anointed Community: The Holy Spirit in the Johannine Tradition (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); R. A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); D. A. Carson, D. J. Moo and L. Morris, An Introduction to the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); W. Carter, John and Empire: Initial Explorations (New York: T & T Clark, 2008); J. H. Charlesworth, The Beloved Disciple: Whose Witness Validates the Gospel of John? (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995); M. L. Coloe, God Dwells with Us: Temple Symbolism in the Fourth Gospel (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2001); R. A. Culpepper, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, The Johannine School: An Evaluation of the Johannine-School Hypothesis Based on an Investigation of the Nature of Ancient Schools (SBLDS 26; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975); C. H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965); P. D. Duke, Irony in the Fourth Gospel (Atlanta: John Knox, 1985); G. D. Fee, God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Letters of Paul (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); R. T. Fortna, The Fourth Gospel and Its Predecessor: From Narrative Source to Present Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); M. Hengel, The Johannine Question (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989); R. T. Herford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash (Clifton, NJ: Reference Book Publishers, 1966); J. J. Kanagaraj, "Mysticism" in the Gospel of John: An Inquiry into Its Background (JSNTSup 158; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); S. P. Kealy, John's Gospel and the History of Biblical Interpretation (2 vols.; Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 2002); C. S. Keener, The Spirit in the Gospels and Acts: Divine Purity and Power (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997); idem, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009a); idem, "We Beheld His Glory (Jn 1:14)," in John, Jesus, and History, 2: Aspects of Historicity in the Fourth Gospel, ed. P. N. Anderson, F. Just and T. Thatcher (SBLSymS 44; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2009b) 15-25; C. R. Koester, Symbolism in the Fourth Gospel: Meaning, Mystery, Community (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); R. Kysar, John, The Maverick Gospel (Atlanta: John Knox, 1976); J. L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1968); G. R. O'Day, Revelation in the Fourth Gospel: Narrative Mode and Theological Claim (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); D. Rensberger, Johannine Faith and Liberating Community (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1988); F. F. Segovia, ed., What Is John? Readers and Reading of the Fourth Gospel (SBLSymS 3; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); P. L. Shuler, A Genre for the Gospels: The Biographical Character of Matthew (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); G. S. Sloyan, What Are They Saying About John? (rev. ed.; New York: Paulist Press, 2006); D. M. Smith, John Among the Gospels (2nd ed.; Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001); idem, The Fourth Gospel in Four Dimensions: Judaism and Jesus, the Gospels and Scripture (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2008); C. H. Talbert, What Is a Gospel? The Genre of the Canonical Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); T. Thatcher, The Riddles of Jesus in John: A Study in Tradition and Folklore (SBLMS 53; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); J. C. Thomas, Footwashing in John 13 and the Johannine Community (JSNTSup 61; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991); M. M. Thompson, The Humanity of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); A. A. Trites, The New Testament Concept of Witness (SNTSMS 31; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); S. van Tilborg, Reading John in Ephesus (NovTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); E. M. Yamauchi, Pre-Christian Gnosticism: A Survey of the Proposed Evidences (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1973).

C. S. Keener

JOHN THE BAPTIST

John the Baptist occupies a programmatic role as *prophet, baptizer and precursor to Jesus. This article begins with initial remarks regarding sources and studies, followed by a discussion of the Jewish context of John. It then offers an analysis of John as presented in the canonical Gospels, complemented at points by *Josephus's brief account in Jewish Antiquities 18.116-19.

1. Sources and Studies
2. The Jewish Context and John
3. John in Matthew, Mark and Luke: Texts, Topics, Trajectory
4. John in the Fourth Gospel: Witness to the Word

1. Sources and Studies.

The principal sources on John are the canonical Gospels, Acts and Josephus' Jewish Antiquities (Ant. 18.116-19). There are a few brief and secondary references in extracanonical apocryphal works (e.g., the second-century Gospel of Thomas, Gospel of the Ebionites, Gospel of the Nazareans and Protevangelium of James). John is mentioned in the writings of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Origen and other early church fathers, who follow the Gospel accounts. There are brief references in the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions (no later than fourth century) and in later traditions in the Mandaean literature. (In citing biblical sources, this article follows the NRSV.)

Scholars typically regard the principal texts and traditions as generally reliable, while variously noting and proposing certain developments, tendencies and tensions. Some suggest that at points the early church may have modified the materials to subordinate John to Jesus, indeed to "Christianize" him, to counter awkward and embarrassing evidence that his ministry and that of his disciples were more extensive and independent than the Gospels wish to allow (Tatum, 148-49). (For a helpful chart of all references to John in the primary sources of the first and second centuries, see Webb 1994, 185-86; among relatively succinct discussions of the sources, see Scobie, 13-31; Hollenbach, ABD 3:887-90; Murphy, 3-13.) Yet it has been noted that the Synoptic Gospels' respective portrayals of John show no obvious evidence of being an early church construct. The accounts fit well within a Second Temple Jewish context, receive corroboration from Josephus's brief account, and are drawn from traditions that were verifiable or conversely falsifiable by those who were attracted to John's ministry (see Webb 1991b, 87-88). By common consensus, the Fourth Gospel's portrayal of John is quite distinctive, not least in its being more theologically developed; yet its historical value is important, offering its own notable use of traditions regarding John.

Over the past twenty years the scholarly literature on John has continued to grow at a considerable pace, as is well attested in the notes and bibliographies of the select list of entries in the bibliography to this article. One finds variegated and often overlapping studies on the historical John (Ernst, 265-346; Meier, 17-233; Tatum 105-68; Webb 1991b, 1994, 2000; Theissen and Merz, 196-213; Keener 2009, 165-77, 482-88), aspects of John's Jewish context (Webb 1991b; Chilton 1997, 2002; Taylor) and detailed analyses of John in the Gospels and other sources (Wink; Ernst, 1-263; Webb 1991b, 29-91; Lupieri; Tatum, 25-104; Müller, 100-197; Murphy). G. Yamasaki offers a brief history of research (Yamasaki, 12-32).

2. The Jewish Context and John.

2.1. Jewish Immersion and John's Baptism. John preached and practiced water *baptism upon *repentance. Comparisons have usefully been made with Jewish ablutions (washings), including immersions, and among the most comprehensive and helpful works remains R. L. Webb's 1991 monograph John the Baptizer and Prophet: A Socio-Historical Study. He indicates that in the Second Temple Jewish period self-administered and recurring ablutions such as handwashing, footwashing and bathing functioned primarily to cleanse and restore from impurity, and also to maintain purity, and were variously important to the Jerusalem temple priesthood, Pharisees, Essenes and the followers of the prophetic figure Bannus (see Clean and Unclean). Immersion especially could be connected with repentance, forgiveness and conversion; it could take place in rivers (e.g., Sib Or. 4:162-70), including the Jordan, and in some instances may connote criticism of the *temple cult and authorities (e.g., by the Essenes) (Webb 1991b, 108-32). At Qumran immersion was undertaken first to purify from defilement due to *sin, rendered efficacious by virtuous living, and second as initiation into and maintenance within a true/pure *Israel (Webb 1991b, 133-62). (Further on Jewish immersions and John, see Ferguson, 84-89, including proselyte baptism, whose existence prior to A.D. 70 is uncertain.)

John's baptism (see 3.3 below) involved immersion by John himself (rather than being self-administered) in the river Jordan. In view is repentance associated with (1) God's forgiveness mediated via John's baptism (which perhaps carried an implicit critique of the temple sacrificial system and establishment); (2) purification from uncleanness; (3) a new, righteous life before God; and (4) initiation into a distinctive group gathered around John whose practices included *fasting, *prayer and baptism (Mk 2:18; Lk 11:1; cf. Acts 18:24-28; 19:1-7). John's baptism also prefigured and prepared for the greater baptism of a powerful figure who would complete the Baptizer's rite by baptism "with the Holy Spirit and fire" (Mt 3:11; Lk 3:16). John's baptism divided the repentant from the unrepentant; and the former, ready to receive the figure's ministry of restoration, comprise the true Israel (on the above, see Webb 1991b, 163-216; 1994, 187-97; 2000; Ferguson, 89-96). Thus, while in continuity with Jewish ablutions, John's baptism invited corporate repentance and readiness to enter the coming new kingdom and community.

Not everyone follows this view of John's baptism as prophetic, initiatory and eschatological. B. Chilton (1997; 2002, 26-39) is one who rejects various aspects of this assessment—such as that John's baptism was for conversion or permanent purification—and contends that it was a repeatable ritual immersion for purity upon returning to righteousness (see Josephus, Ant. 18.117) (see also Taylor, 49-100). A middle position is outlined by C. Evans, arguing that John's baptismal practice could have been eschatological and prophetic and also included purificatory ablutions without such dimensions.

2.2. Jewish Prophets, Figures of Restoration and Judgment, and John. Central to John's popular profile as a prophet (e.g., Mt 21:26; Mk 11:32; Lk 20:6) is a sociopolitical and religious aspect, in particular the proclamation of an imminent figure, and these elements may be seen in relation to his wider Jewish context. Drawing largely from Josephus, Webb suggests there were three main types of prophetic figures in Second Temple Judaism: (1) clerical prophets, who were priestly and from the upper class; (2) sapiential prophets, from among the intelligentsia (e.g., Essenes, perhaps also Pharisees); (3) popular eschatologically orientated prophets, whether (a) leadership prophets at the head of movements, often recalling Israel's past (e.g., a wilderness-based invocation of the exodus and conquest), offering a sociopolitical critique and predicting imminent divine deliverance, or (b) more solitary popular prophets, often associated with demonstrations against Jerusalem and its temple and predicting a more military liberation (Webb 1991b, 307-48) (see Revolutionary Movements).

That Josephus describes the popular prophets as "commanding," "persuading" and "promising" their followers and uses "commanding" in his brief account of John the Baptist suggests to Webb that John could be classified with this group, and specifically among the leadership prophets (Webb 1991b, 349-78; but cf. Meier, 98-99n188; Chilton 2002, 26-39). Moreover, various aspects of John's baptismal activities—for example, the wilderness location, crowds, initiatory rite into a pure/true Israel, hopes of Israel's purification and restoration and disciples—carried live sociopolitical implications. Indeed, John incurred concerted opposition from Herod Antipas (Mt 14:3-12; Mk 6:17-29), likely the temple establishment and, by implication, their Roman overseers. (On John's prophetic profile, see also the typological and scriptural antecedents examined in Evans, 46-61.)

Additionally, the Synoptic Gospels indicate that the focus of John's preaching concerned one who would follow him and bring restoration and judgment. The precise identity, activity and John's understanding of this figure have received much scholarly scrutiny. Antecedent OT and Second Temple Jewish figures with whom he could be correlated include Yahweh, the Davidic messiah, the Aaronic messiah, Michael/Melchizedek, the son of man, and Elijah redivivus (Webb 1991b, 219-60) (see Christ; Son of David).

2.3. The Essenes/Qumran and John. Much has been made of possible connections between John and the *Essene community at Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls). It has even been suggested that John was at one time an Essene novice (Steinmann, 58-61); but this is speculative and unlikely. To some extent, comparisons may be made on the basis of certain broad similarities—for example, the wider context of Second Temple Jewish sectarianism; proximity in the wilderness and Jordan location; eschatological outlook, such as a vision of divine judgment and a division of the righteous and unrighteous. Other commonalities include Isaiah 40:3 as a text informing identity and destiny (cf. Mt 3:3; Mk 1:2-3; Lk 3:4; and 1QS VIII, 14); the practice of immersion; perhaps a shared asceticism (CD-A XII, 12-14 mentions honey and locusts); and possibly ties to and critique of the Jerusalem temple cult and priesthood. But in many of these cases closer scrutiny reveals considerable differences in the details. Moreover, in various substantial respects John can be differentiated from the Qumran community. For example, he occupied a very public profile as a prophetic figure, and his baptism had dimensions different from immersions at Qumran. (See further the critical assessments in Kazmierski, 25-30; Taylor, 15-48; Stegemann, 221-25; McDonald, 54-61.)

2.4. Josephus and John. It is generally agreed that *Josephus's brief account of John's activities and fate under Herod Antipas, tetrarch of *Galilee and Perea (Ant. 18:116-19), is authentic and reliable (Webb 1991b, 31-45, 165-68; Lupieri, 449-55; Meier, 56-62) (see Herodian Dynasty). John is, though, depicted as more of "a popular moral philosopher in the Greco-Roman mode" (Meier, 61) than the Jewish prophetic figure of the Gospels, consistent with Josephus's downplaying of apocalyptic and sociopolitical elements in his presentation of Jewish matters to Rome. Nor is John ever connected with Jesus, whom Josephus mentions briefly in an earlier disputed passage (Ant. 18.63-64). The account is connected to a wider conflict between the Nabatean King Aretas IV and Herod Antipas (Ant. 18.109-15), precipitated in part by a boundary dispute and Herod's decision to dismiss his wife, who was Aretas's daughter, in order to marry his brother's wife, Herodias (cf. Mt 14:3-13; Mk 6:17-29) (see 3.7 below).

According to Josephus (Ant. 18.116-19), John, surnamed the Baptist, was "a good man" who charged the Jews to live a virtuous life, practice justice toward one another and piety toward God, and gather together in baptism. Baptism was acceptable to God, not as a seeking after pardon for sins, but as purification of the body after the soul is already cleansed by responding to John's call for a righteous life. When others (identity unclear) joined the crowds with John, and the people were stirred by his words, Herod feared strife and so deemed it prudent to act preemptively before an uprising ensued. Thus, John was taken to Machaerus, Herod's fortress and residence east of the Dead Sea in southern Perea, and there put to death. Josephus tells us that the Jewish people viewed the later defeat of Herod's army by that of Aretas as God's vindication of John (Ant. 18.116), an indication of the regard with which they remembered him.

3. John in Matthew, Mark and Luke: Texts, Topics, Trajectory.

John figures prominently in Matthew, Mark and Luke (the Synoptic Gospels) in both common and distinctive ways. The aim of the following is to take account of the various aspects of John's representation in the Synoptic Gospels in terms of the texts, main topics and trajectory in view (cf. Murphy, 41-84).

3.1. John's Origins (Lk 1-2). Only Luke 1 narrates John's remarkable origins, including an angelic annunciation and his conception (Lk 1:8-25), birth, circumcision, naming, his father Zechariah's prophecy, and youth (Lk 1:57-80). This is paralleled in the recital of Jesus' own dramatic earthly origins (Lk 1:26-38; 2:1-52), and the two are connected by the meeting of their mothers and kinswomen, Elizabeth and Mary (Lk 1:39-56) (see Murphy, 42-49). The sequence, length and certain details of the respective accounts clearly signal that John will play a formative though supporting role in the unfolding, Jesus-centered divine drama. Thus, for example, John is from a *priestly family, Spirit-filled, and "the prophet of the Most High" (Lk 1:5, 15, 76); yet Jesus is of royal lineage, conceived by the *Holy Spirit, and "Son of the Most High" and *"Son of God" (Lk 1:32, 35).

The scenario in view encompasses and juxtaposes the heavenly sphere (e.g., Gabriel sent from "the presence of God" [Lk 1:19]) and earthly realm (e.g., a Jerusalem temple setting "in the days of King Herod of Judea" and the Roman emperor Augustus [Lk 1:5, 8-20; 2:1-2]), already intimating disruption of the political and religious status quo (Lk 1:51-53; 2:1-2). At the center stand a fearful Zechariah and barren Elizabeth, caught up in the enormity of it all (Lk 1:6-7). And emerging from their midst is an unexpected son to be named "John" (Lk 1:13, 59-63), forecast to be "great in the sight of the Lord," filled with "the spirit and power of Elijah" and fitted for his role as one who "will turn many of the people of Israel to the Lord their God . . . [and] make ready a people prepared for the Lord" (Lk 1:15-17 [cf. Mal 2:6-7; 3:1; 4:5-6; Sir 48:1, 10]). John's depiction also evokes associations with the temple priesthood, the Nazirites, Samson and Samuel (Lk 1:15; 7:33; cf. Lev 10:8-9; Num 6:1-21; Judg 13:2-7; 1 Sam 1:11) and thus underscores his divinely sanctioned role in advancing the reign of God.

Responding to popular fear and speculation regarding John (Lk 1:65-66), Zechariah's prophecy (Lk 1:67-79) evokes exodus and other imagery in extolling God's promise-keeping, covenant faithfulness and redemption via a Davidic savior and reiterates his son's preparatory and supporting role therein (Lk 1:15-17, 31-38; 3:4-6; see Is 40:3-6; Mal 3:1). The child John, like Jesus, will continue to be strengthened by the Spirit for his vocation, and he is in the wilderness until the time of his public disclosure to Israel (Lk 1:80; cf. Lk 2:40-52; see also Gen 21:20-21; Judg 13:24-25; 1 Sam 2:26).

3.2. John's Appearance in the Wilderness (Mt 3:1-6; Mk 1:2-6; Lk 3:1-6). The Synoptic Gospels vividly recount John's arrival and activity "in the wilderness" (see Mountain and Wilderness). That Matthew can specify "wilderness of Judea" (Mt 3:1), Luke imply a wider area (Lk 3:1), and indeed the Fourth Gospel mention "Bethany across the Jordan" in Perea (Jn 1:28; cf. Jn 3:26; 10:40) and "Aenon near Salim" (Jn 3:23) together suggests that John was widely active in territory around the Jordan. (On sites associated with John, see Murphy-O'Connor.)

John is identified as "the Baptist" (Mt 3:1) or "the baptizer" (Mk 1:4) and also as "son of Zechariah" (Lk 3:2). Essentially, he is "proclaiming a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (so Mk 1:4; Lk 3:3) and urging the people, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has come near [or 'is at hand']" (so Mt 3:2 [cf. Jesus' words in Mt 4:17]). As such, he is seen as the one anticipated by Isaiah, announcing, "Prepare the way of the Lord, make his paths straight" (Mt 3:3; Mk 1:3; Lk 3:4; cf. Is 40:3).

Indeed, Mark's Gospel opens by dramatically declaring that with "The beginning of the good news of Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mk 1:1), that which Isaiah and, by extension, the entire OT (cf. Ex 23:20; Is 40:3; Mal 3:1) foresaw and John now announces, is fulfilled. Together, the OT associations, wilderness setting and ensuing events intimate that Israel's exodus and entrance, *exile and restoration, find their outworking in Jesus' ensuing life and ministry. Moreover, the impact includes the entire Roman Empire, as indicated by Luke's wider geopolitical setting and extended citation of Isaiah (Lk 3:1-6; cf. Is 40:3-5).

Both Matthew and Mark describe John's ascetic appearance and also indicate that the popular response is widespread (Mt 3:4-6; Mk 1:5-6). John's clothing of camel's hair and a leather belt evoke the distinctive dress of OT prophets (e.g., Zech 13:4; Heb 11:37), perhaps Elijah in particular (2 Kings 1:8), and further intimate prophetic rebuke of ungodly rule and a call for repentance and restoration.

The diet of locusts and wild honey likely underscores John's austerity and self-denial and perhaps bears comparison to the prophet Bannus (Josephus, Life 11) (Taylor, 34-35; on John's diet, see Kelhoffer). Some have suggested that John's wilderness asceticism connotes his alienation from and opposition to the temple establishment (see Kraeling, 15-27; Hollenbach 1979, 852-56). In any case, his appearance and activity in the wilderness are a theologically and politically charged event.

3.3. John's Preaching (Mt 3:7-12; Mk 1:7-8; Lk 3:7-18). John preaches baptism-repentance. In so doing, according to Matthew 3:7-10 and Luke 3:7-9, he identifies and rebukes a "brood of vipers"—that is, many *Pharisees and *Sadducees (Mt 3:7) and "the crowds" (Lk 3:7)—seeking baptism and deliverance from the coming wrath by virtue of being children of *Abraham. John warns that God can raise up others as children of Abraham, and that "even now the ax is lying at the root of the trees" (Mt 3:10; Lk 3:9 [cf. Is 10:33-34; 32:19; Wis 4:3-5; Sir 6:3]), and that they stand under imminent judgment (cf. Lk 13:6-9; also Mt 21:18-19; Mk 11:12-14). Heritage, ethnicity and even covenant status in themselves are insufficient.

Capturing the tension and confusion, and further delineating those involved, Luke alone recounts inquiries from the crowds, tax collectors and soldiers (Lk 3:10-14; cf. Lk 7:29). John's polemical response, demanding that they not abuse their possessions, privilege and power, anticipates the ethics and economics of Jesus' kingdom proclamation and provokes questions regarding whether John might be the Messiah (Lk 3:15). (J. Meier correlates this passage and Josephus, Ant. 18:118, in speculating that the tax collectors and soldiers may have been among "the others" mentioned by Josephus [Meier, 61-62].)

John's preaching centers on the imminent arrival of one "more powerful" than John himself, of whom he is unworthy, and who will baptize not with water but with the Holy Spirit (Mk 1:7-8) and fire (Mt 3:11-12; Lk 3:16). Matthew and Luke immediately add an evocative threshing floor illustration (Mt 3:12; Lk 3:17) As noted earlier (see 2.2 above), the identity and activity of this figure are much discussed in conjunction with various antecedent Jewish figures. Of these, foremost is Yahweh, above and beyond all the others, yet working through them, not least the Davidic messiah and the *Son of Man, who receives and possibly bestows the Holy Spirit. This fits well with the fundamentally theocentric dimension of John's proclamation of a powerful yet human agent (as the image of the untying of the sandal suggests) who will baptize with the Holy Spirit and fire.

It is debated whether John envisions a single baptism that purifies and empowers or a twofold baptism of restoration on the repentant/righteous and judgment on the unrepentant/unrighteous (cf. Turner, 115-16; and Webb 1991a; 1991b, 289-300). In any event, John's preaching of the "good news" (Lk 3:18) urged repentance and pointed to an imminent figure whom the Gospels take to be Jesus, and whose own ensuing ministry divides destinies.

3.4. John's Baptism of Jesus (Mt 3:13-17; Mk 1:9-11; Lk 3:21-22). Mark and Matthew attest to John's momentous baptism of Jesus; in Luke his involvement must be inferred. Only Matthew indicates John's deferential attempt to reverse roles and be baptized by Jesus, and Jesus' insistence that his baptism by John is "to fulfill all righteousness" (Mt 3:15; cf. Mt 21:32). Some see here an awkward attempt from within the early church to address embarrassment at Jesus' subordination to John and any implication that Jesus needed to repent of sin (e.g., Tatum 148-49; Murphy, 59-60). Yet the account attests to their respective roles within the unfolding divine drama: God's covenant faithfulness (righteousness) finds focused expression in John's baptism, which is the divine anointing and initiation of Jesus' ministry of redemption and restoration.

That Luke reports John's arrest immediately prior to his account of Jesus' baptism (Lk 3:19-20), and then states that Jesus "had been baptized" without specifying John as the agent (Lk 3:21), is also sometimes taken as further evidence of the early church trying to offset its embarrassment by distancing Jesus from John (Tatum, 148-49). Yet Luke's baptismal account begins by relocating the reader to a scenario that itself precedes John's arrest, and from which it could reasonably be inferred that Jesus was included in a baptism administered by John.

Central to Jesus' baptism is the "revelatory experience" (Murphy, 27) that occurs upon his arising out of the water (Mt 3:16; Mk 1:10), as he "was praying" (Lk 3:21). With some subtle nuances, the Gospels attest to an open heaven ("torn apart" [Mk 1:10]), the Spirit descending and a heavenly voice affirming Jesus thus: "my Son, the Beloved, with you I am well pleased" (Mt 3:16-17; Mk 1:10-11; Lk 3:21-22) (alternatively,

"my beloved Son"; Mt 3:17 has "with whom"; cf. Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7; Lk 9:34-35; see also Ps 2:7; Is 42:1). That in Matthew 3:17 the voice states "this is" rather than "you are" may imply that not just Jesus, but also John and possibly others, heard the divine declaration. In view, then, is a divine disclosure and affirmation of Jesus' sonship; his anointing and commissioning; and the interaction of Father, Son and Spirit. Together, this signals the theopolitical enormity of Jesus' identity and forthcoming *mission.

3.5. John's Disciples, Jesus' Ministry (Mt 9:14-17; Mk 2:18-22; Lk 5:33-39). Both John and Jesus have disciples, and an issue arising during Jesus' Galilean ministry is why John's disciples fast—"frequently fast and pray" (Lk 5:33)—but Jesus' disciples do not. Subtle Synoptic variations in the participants and extent of the discussion intimate confusion as those involved try to determine and differentiate the respective identities and activities of John and Jesus.

In response, Jesus offers three brief illustrations involving a bridegroom, a garment, and wineskins. In this way, he intimates the abundant, irrepressible and celebratory nature of the *kingdom of God, which was announced by John and is now disclosed and activated in his own life and ministry. So viewed, the account need not be seen as a backdated warrant for a stark shift from Jewish (John) to early Christian piety and practice. Rather, in the movement from the old age to the new one, both John (the best man) and Jesus (the bridegroom) play important roles within the providence of a covenant-keeping and immeasurably beneficent God.

From this standpoint, it may be affirmed that John's ministry provided an important initial and overlapping context for that of Jesus. Yet, to say that Jesus was a disciple of John—inferring this from his acceptance of John's baptism, approval of his ministry (see 3.10 below) and interaction with John's baptizing activity (see 4.4 below)—and then later separated himself from the Baptist's movement (see Tatum, 151-53) requires careful and nuanced delineation of evolving terms and categories (e.g., "disciple" and "ministry") and risks constraining the dynamic divine economy within which John and Jesus are together located. (On the issue of Jesus as a disciple of John, see Badke; Meier, 116-30; on their relationship more broadly, see Meier, 100-233; Webb 1994; Dapaah; Allison, 205-20, including interaction with Theissen and Merz, 208-11.)

3.6. John's Question, Jesus' Witness and Their Generation (Mt 11:2-19; Lk 7:18-35). A substantial tripartite section in both Matthew and Luke opens with an imprisoned John responding to news of Jesus' remarkable activities by sending his disciples to ask, “Are you the one who is to come, or are we to wait for another?” (Mt 11:3; twice in Lk 7:19–20; cf. Lk 3:15). In any interpretation of this question—for example, as poignant and agonized for John, or as awkward for the evangelists and the early church in suggesting a perplexed and/or more independent John—much depends on how one regards John’s situation, motivation and intonation, and also the question’s correlation with his earlier remarks on the wrath to come (Mt 3:7–10; Lk 3:7–9) and the imminent agent of God (Mt 3:11–12; Mk 1:7–8; Lk 3:15–18). A reasonable overall assessment is that John’s expectations of restoration and especially judgment require recalibration as the astonishing nature of Jesus’ hospitable and inclusive ministry of renewal unfolds (e.g., Lk 7:1–17).

This is corroborated by Jesus’ forceful response, which evokes Isaiah’s good news of Israel’s exilic rescue and restoration (see Is 29:18–19; 35:5–6; 42:7; 61:1–2; cf. Lk 4:16–20) in pointing to his own mighty deeds—for example, healing the *blind, lame and deaf and raising the dead—and preaching to the poor as evidence of his identity and role as Messiah (Mt 11:2). Jesus’ ensuing beatitude, stated in the singular and so suggesting that John may be particularly in view (Mt 11:6; Lk 7:23), presses for an evaluation that avoids stumbling over the radical new realities of his mission.

Jesus’ ensuing public witness to John is similarly thought-provoking (Mt 11:7–15; Lk 7:24–30). He acclaims John a prophet and more than a prophet. John is the one anticipated in Scripture as he who will prepare the way of Lord (cf. Ex 23:20; Mal 3:1), unsurpassed by any other human being; he is the endpoint of the law and the prophets and also the point of departure for the kingdom of heaven/God; and, adds Matthew, he is the *Elijah who is come (Mt 11:14; cf. Mal 3:1; 4:5).

John’s austere *witness in the wilderness stood in stark and polemical contrast to finely clothed kings living in self-serving luxury. Here the image of “a reed shaken by the wind” (Mt 11:7; Lk 7:24) is likely a thinly veiled critique of Herod Antipas, who used the reed as his symbol (Theissen, 26–42), imprisoned and executed John (see 3.7 below), and typified those violently and vainly seeking to seize God’s kingdom.

As Jesus’ succeeding provocative parable implies (Mt 11:16–19; Lk 7:31–35), this equivocal generation at once berates John’s austerity and demonizes the Son of Man’s purported profligacy, and thus they are in danger of blindly rejecting the wilderness announcement and its outworking in the unfolding kingdom of God.

3.7. John’s Imprisonment and Execution (Mt

14:1–12; Mk 6:14–29; Lk 9:7–9 [cf. Lk 3:19–20]). John’s imprisonment and death have been subject to extensive scholarly scrutiny from historical, tradition-critical, literary and other standpoints (e.g., Hoehner, 110–71; Meier, 171–76; Hartmann; Murphy, 69–73; Cummins). Many scholars affirm a common “historical core” centered on John’s public condemnation of Herod Antipas for his unlawful marriage to his brother’s wife, Herodias (Mt 14:3–4; Mk 6:17–18; Lk 3:19–20; cf. Lev 18:16; 20:21), while recognizing the irreducible theological and narrative dimensions in play.

In the accounts in Matthew and Mark (Mt 14:1–12; Mk 6:14–29) there is an ironic interplay between John, Jesus and Herod Antipas, a “king” in his own eyes (Mk 6:14), though technically only a “tetrarch” (Mt 14:1; Lk 9:7). Herod is among those who confuse the identities and roles of Jesus and John, the latter of whom he had earlier beheaded but now thinks is raised from the dead (Mt 14:1–2; Mk 6:14–16; Lk 9:7–9). In the ensuing account of John’s death at Herod’s birthday banquet, which in Mark is significantly shaped by kingship motifs drawn from the OT Elijah narratives (1 Kings 17—19; 21; 2 Kings 1—2) and Esther (Cummins, 41–45), the Baptist and “king” are contrasted with telling effect.

John is a holy and righteous prophet who confronts a conflicted ruler (Mt 14:5; Mk 6:19–20) and whose execution and burial (Mt 14:10–12; Mk 6:27–29) foreshadow Jesus’ subsequent fate. Herod is entrapped by an opportunistic wife, a dancing daughter and elite Galilean guests (Mt 14:6–9; Mk 6:21–26). That Herod is unable to manage his household, effectively govern Galilee or understand John is representative of the Jewish and Roman authorities’ inability to discern the Jesus-centered rule of God operative in their midst.

3.8. John and Jesus: Identity and Mission (Mt 16:13–23; Mk 8:27–33; Lk 9:18–22). Further evidence of ongoing confusion regarding the respective identities, roles and relationship between John and Jesus is found in Peter’s confession and Jesus’ telling response. Could Jesus be John, Elijah or another of the prophets? Jesus implicitly accepts Peter’s declaration that he is in fact the Messiah (and the Son of the living God [adds Mt 16:16]), but he immediately explicates this designation in terms of a suffering Son of Man (cf. Mt 16:21–23; Mk 8:31–33; Lk 9:22). He thus reinforces what had been prefigured in John’s death under Herod: the kingdom comes at considerable cost—for John, Jesus, his disciples—at the hands of those who are aligned against the redemptive rule of God. Such is the “adulterous and sinful generation”

(so Mk 8:38) that will be judged at the return of the Son of Man (Mt 16:27-28; Mk 8:38—9:1; Lk 9:26-27).

3.9. John, Jesus and Elijah (Mt 17:10-13; Mk 9:11-13). Various associations between John and *Elijah may be evoked or are explicit. Here, for example, one may think of the ascetic depiction of John at the Jordan (Mt 3:4; Mk 1:6; cf. 2 Kings 1:8); popular confusion in connecting John, Jesus and Elijah (Mt 14:1-2; Mk 6:14-16; Lk 9:7-9); and John's Elijah-like role in Mark's account of Herod's birthday banquet (Mk 6:17-29; cf. 1 Kings 17—19; 21; 2 Kings 1—2).

The correlation continues. After Jesus' transfiguration (Mt 17:1-9; Mk 9:2-10; Lk 9:28-36), which includes a divine affirmation of Jesus' sonship and also an appearance by Elijah, Jesus connects John the Baptist with the expected Elijah come to "restore all things" (Mt 17:10-13; Mk 9:11-13; cf. Mal 4:5-6). His remarks, somewhat oblique in Mark but clearer in Matthew, indicate that John is the precursor to Jesus the messianic Son of Man, and both of them suffer and die at the hands of those who do not recognize their respective roles as prophet and Savior within God's restoration of all things (on Elijah, John and Jesus, see further Öhler 1997, 31-100; 1999; and Joynes 1998; 2005).

3.10. John, Jesus and God's Authority (Mt 21:23-27; Mk 11:27-33; Lk 20:1-8). As Jesus' ministry culminates in Jerusalem, he again endorses John's divine commission and its crucial role in relation to his own. Jesus' sharp-edged question "Did the baptism of John come from heaven, or was it of human origin?" (Mt 21:25; Mk 11:29; Lk 20:4) presses the Jewish leaders either to acknowledge their failure to believe John (and hence Jesus himself) or to face popular resistance from those who view John as a prophet of God. Their awkward predicament and calculated response ("We do not know" [Mt 21:27; Mk 11:33]) aligns them with Herod Antipas, who likewise was unable to come to terms with John, and intimates their final action against Jesus.

All this is reinforced by Jesus' parable of the two sons (only in Mt 21:28-32), which condemns the leaders for not receiving John, who came "in the way of righteousness"; likewise the parable of the vineyard (Mt 21:33-46; Mk 12:1-12; Lk 20:9-19), which condemns the abuse and killing of successive slaves—the prophets, latterly John—and the owner's son, Jesus.

4. John in the Fourth Gospel: Witness to the Word.

In the Fourth Gospel John's actions as a prophet and baptizer are incorporated into his more fundamental role as a witness to the incarnate Word, Jesus, who is the Messiah and the Son of God (cf. Jn 20:30-31). His wide-ranging ministry overlaps with Jesus' early activities and includes the ongoing involvement of his own disciples. Some surmise that the Fourth Gospel has tried to counter this by "Christianizing" and constraining John and his followers (construed as a "movement" or "sect") in order to safeguard its characteristic high *Christology. In addition, John's profile may reflect later tensions between the Jewish *synagogue and the early Johannine church regarding John and Jesus (see Webb 1991b, 76-77). Such historical reconstructions can be helpful, but sometimes they are overstated, requiring greater consideration of the narrative and theological dimensions of John's portrayal.

4.1. John's Witness to the Word (Jn 1:1-18). In passages integrated into the prologue (Jn 1:6-9, 15), John, who is never called "the Baptist" or "the baptizer" in this Gospel, is the one sent from God (Jn 1:6; cf. Jn 1:33; 3:28) as the first human witness to Jesus so that all might believe through him (Jn 1:6-7). John himself is not the light, but rather is a witness thereto (Jn 1:8). His role in relation to the incarnate Word is memorably confessed: "He who comes after me ranks ahead of me because he was before me" (Jn 1:15 [cf. Jn 1:30]). It is insufficient to suggest that John is here depicted as inferior (e.g., Scobie, 14); rather, he is represented as having a unique initial and supporting role in the Jesus-centered divine drama now under way.

4.2. John's Witness to the Messiah (Jn 1:19-28). John's public witness must contend with official inquiries from the "the Jews" (Jn 1:19), a cipher for the Jerusalem-based Jewish authorities (the Pharisees are specified at Jn 1:24), who send priests and Levites to inquire insistently after his identity in relation to certain expected eschatological figures. John attests emphatically, "I am not the Messiah" (intimating another who is), nor is he Elijah (compare the Synoptic stress on this association) or the prophet (Jn 1:20-22). Rather, he is "the voice" calling Israel in the wilderness to "make straight the way of the Lord" (Jn 1:23 [with John himself citing Is 40:3]).

Apparently missing much of what is implied, the delegation asks why John baptizes if he is none of the awaited figures (Jn 1:25). As in the Synoptic Gospels, in reply John deferentially delimits his supporting role in stating, "I baptize with water," and alluding to "the one who is coming after me," before whom he is unworthy (Jn 1:26-27). John notes that this one is even now standing unrecognized among them (Jn 1:26), perhaps reflecting the Jewish idea of the Messiah being hidden until divinely disclosed (cf. Jn

1:31-33) (see Brown, 1:53) or a thinly veiled critique of the authorities' unbelief (Wink, 90). All is taking place at "Bethany across the Jordan" (Jn 1:28 [cf. Jn 3:26; 10:40]), though this is but the present focal point of a cosmic scenario encompassing "all things" (Jn 1:3). It is an ironic scene in which anxious inquirers are sent by human authorities to a John sent by God to witness to the coming one, Jesus.

4.3. John's Baptism of Jesus (Jn 1:29-34); John's Disciples and Jesus (Jn 1:35-51). Here John's baptism of Jesus is implied but not explicitly described. The scenario is largely recounted from John's first-person perspective and role as a witness: "I said . . . I came . . . I saw . . . I myself have seen and have testified" (Jn 1:30-34). John's testimony is not on his own strength—"I myself did not know him" (Jn 1:31, 33)—but rather is a divine disclosure and directive that attests to Jesus's identity and vocation as "the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (Jn 1:29 [cf. Ex 12:1-28]), the preexistent and superior one (Jn 1:30; cf. Jn 1:15) and the Spirit-anointed Son of God, who in turn baptizes with the Holy Spirit (Jn 1:33 [no mention is made of "with fire"]). As in the Synoptic accounts, John's baptizing attests to the dynamic interaction of Father, Son and Spirit. John's witness points at least two of his followers toward Jesus, followed by growing recognition of Jesus' remarkable identity (Jn 1:35-51).

4.4. John Decreases, Jesus Increases (Jn 3:22-30, 31-36 [cf. Jn 4:1-2]). Whereas the Synoptic Gospels suggest that Jesus began his ministry after John's arrest (Mt 4:12; Mk 1:14; Lk 4:14), the Fourth Gospel describes overlapping ministries, with Jesus, John and their disciples active in the Judean countryside and at Aenon near Salim respectively, both baptizing (Jn 3:22-23; cf. Jn 4:1-2 [see Keener 2003, 1:575-76, 587-88]). Although John still draws crowds, his role is receding even if increasingly at risk (cf. Jn 3:24), whereas Jesus' ministry is emerging. This development, perhaps together with discussions on purification in relation to baptism as administered by John and Jesus, required some careful processing by John's followers (Jn 3:26). Toward this end, John again differentiates his own supporting role vis-à-vis Jesus as the one sent ahead of the Messiah, and as the friend of the bridegroom who rejoices at his ministry (Jn 3:27-29). Whether the remarks at John 3:31-36 represent the final witness by John or reflections by the evangelist, they may be read in relation to the respective identities and roles of John and Jesus. Having fulfilled his commission, John gives way to the beloved and authorized Son, sent from above to testify to the heavenly sphere, speak God's words, pour out the Spirit and bring eternal life to the faithful and judgment on the disobedient (cf. Jn 1:29-34).

4.5. John's Witness (Jn 5:31-35; 10:40-42). In summoning a series of witnesses regarding himself (Jn 5:30-47), Jesus notes that had the Jewish authorities heeded the truthful *witness of John—"a burning and shining lamp" (Jn 5:35)—they would have accepted the more extensive testimony of Jesus' own deeds, *Moses and the Scriptures, and indeed the Father himself. To the extent that they do not, it is they, not he, who stand on trial and under judgment. Later, following a heated exchange between Jesus and "the Jews" (Jn 10:22-39), Jesus withdraws across the Jordan to where John had baptized, and those who come to him affirm John's role as witness and believe in Jesus (Jn 10:40-42; cf. Jn 1:7; 20:30-31).

See also BAPTISM; ELIJAH AND ELISHA; ESSENES; EXILE AND RESTORATION; ISRAEL; JUDGMENT; REPENTANCE; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS; WITNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison Jr., Constructing Jesus: Memory, Imagination, and History (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); W. B. Badke, "Was Jesus a Disciple of John?" EvQ 62 (1990) 195-204; R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (2 vols.; AB 29, 29A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966-1970); B. Chilton, "John the Purifier," in Jesus in Context: Temple, Purity, and Restoration, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (AGJU 39; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 203-20; idem, "John the Baptist: His Immersion and His Death," in Dimensions of Baptism: Biblical and Theological Studies, ed. S. E. Porter and A. R. Cross (JSNTSup 234; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002) 25-44; S. A. Cummins, "Integrated Scripture, Embedded Empire: The Ironic Interplay of 'King' Herod, John and Jesus in Mark 6.1-44," in Biblical Interpretation in Early Christian Gospels, 1: The Gospel of Mark, ed. T. R. Hatina (LNTS 304; London: T & T Clark, 2006) 31-48; D. S. Dapaah, The Relationship Between John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth: A Critical Study (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2005); J. Ernst, Johannes der Täufer: Interpretation-Geschichte-Wirkungsgeschichte (BZNW 53; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1989); C. A. Evans, "The Baptism of John in a Typological Context," in Dimensions of Baptism: Biblical and Theological Studies, ed. S. E. Porter and A. R. Cross (JSNTSup 234; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002) 45-71; E. Ferguson, Baptism in the Early Church: History, Theology, and Liturgy in the First Five Centuries (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); M. Hartmann, Der Tod Johannes des Täufers: Eine exegetische und rezeptionsgeschichtliche Studie auf dem Hintergrund narrativer, intertextueller und kul- turanthropologischer Zugänge (SBB 45; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 2001); H. W. Hoehner, Herod Antipas (SNTSMS 17; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972); P. W. Hollenbach, "John the Baptist," ABD 3:887-99; idem, "Social Aspects of John the Baptizer's Preaching Mission in the Context of Palestinian Judaism," ANRW II.19.1 (1979) 850-75; C. E. Joynes, "A Question of Identity: 'Who Do People Say That I Am?' Elijah, John the Baptist and Jesus in Mark's Gospel," in Understanding, Studying and Reading: New Testament Essays in Honour of John Ashton, ed. C. Rowland and C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis (JSNTSup 153; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 15-29; idem, "The Returned Elijah? John the Baptist's Angelic Identity in the Gospel of Mark," SJT 58 (2005) 455-67; C. R. Kazmierski, John the Baptist: Prophet and Evangelist (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1996); C. S. Keener, The Gospel of John: A Commentary (2 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); idem, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); J. A. Kelhoffer, The Diet of John the Baptist: "Locusts and Wild Honey" in Synoptic and Patristic Interpretation (WUNT 176; Mohr Siebeck, 2005); C. H. Kraeling, John the Baptist (New York: Scribner, 1951); E. F. Lupieri, "John the Baptist in New Testament Traditions and History," ANRW II.26.1 (1993) 430-61; J. I. H. McDonald, "What Did You Go Out to See? John the Baptist, the Scrolls and Late Second Temple Judaism," in The Dead Sea Scrolls in Their Historical Context, ed. T. H. Lim, L. W. Hurtado, A. G. Auld and A. Jack (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2000) 53-64; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994); U. B. Müller, Johannes der Täufer: Jüdischer Prophet und Wegbereiter Jesu (BG 6; Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2002); C. M. Murphy, John the Baptist: Prophet of Purity for a New Age (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2003); J. Murphy-O'Connor, "Sites Associated with John the Baptist," RB 112 (2005) 253-66; M. Öhler, Elia im Neuen Testament: Untersuchungen zur Bedeutung des alttestamentlichen Propheten im frühen Christentum (BZNW 88; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997); idem, "The Expectation of Elijah and the Presence of the Kingdom of God," JBL 118 (1999) 461-76; C. H. H. Scobie, John the Baptist (London: SCM, 1964); H. Stegemann, The Library of Qumran: On the Essenes, Qumran, John the Baptist, and Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998); J. Steinmann, Saint John the Baptist and the Desert Tradition, trans. M. Boyes (New York: Harper; London: Longmans, 1958); W. B. Tatum, John the Baptist and Jesus: A Report of the Jesus Seminar (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1994); J. E. Taylor, The Immerser: John the Baptist Within Second Temple Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); G. Theissen, The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition, trans. L. M. Maloney (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. J. Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); D. L. Turner, Matthew (BECNT; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2008); R. L. Webb, "The Activity of John the Baptist's Expected Figure at the Threshing Floor (Matthew 3.12 = Luke 3.17)," JSNT 43 (1991a): 103-11; idem, John the Baptist and Prophet: A Socio-Historical Study (JSNTSup 62; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991b); idem, "John the Baptist and His Relationship to Jesus," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. D. Chilton and C. A. Evans (NTTS 19; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994) 179-229; idem, "Jesus' Baptism: Its Historicity and Implications," BBR 10 (2000) 261-309; W. Wink, John the Baptist in the Gospel Tradition (SNTSMS 7; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968); G. Yamasaki, John the Baptist in Life and Death: Audience-Orientated Criticism of Matthew's Narrative (JSNTSup 167; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998). S. A. Cummins

JONAH, SIGN OF. See SIGN OF JONAH.

JOSEPHUS

The importance of the writings of Josephus for the study of Jesus and the Gospels can hardly be overstated. Josephus (born A.D. 37) provides us with invaluable insights into institutions such as the temple, groups such as the *Pharisees, and key individuals such as *Herod the Great, *Pilate and Caiaphas. Indeed, much of what we know about the so-called background of the NT is gleaned from Josephus. His writings are also regularly consulted by students of archeology, Second Temple *Judaism, the Jewish War, and Roman history in the eastern empire. Nevertheless, the writings of Josephus are not without their challenges. Over the years scholars have questioned Josephus's trustworthiness as a historian partly because of his tendency to exaggerate, his apparent biases, and his morally dubious actions during the Jewish revolt against Rome; and the few passages in which he refers to figures associated with early Christianity (including Jesus) show signs of having been tampered with by later copyists.

1. Josephus the Man
2. Works
3. Reception

4. Scholarship
5. Relevance for Jesus and the Gospels

1. Josephus the Man.

While the importance of Josephus's works is undeniable, his character remains controversial for several reasons. His description of himself as a highly educated child prodigy growing up in aristocratic and priestly circles in *Jerusalem (Life 1-9) is perhaps only mildly off-putting to modern readers. His self-congratulatory account of his exploits as a military leader in *Galilee during the early phases of the rebellion against Rome (Life 284-286; J.W. 2.569-3.288; Ag. Ap. 1.48) might be taken for little more than machismo, except for the fact that he was later accused in print, apparently with good reason, of tyranny and brutality by a certain Justus of Tiberias. What is more disturbing is his account of how he came to surrender to the Romans at the Galilean town of Jotapata (J.W. 3.316-391) after allowing his men to fight to the death and then encouraging the last remaining aristocrats in the city to commit collective suicide under the pretext that he himself would immediately follow suit. He would later claim to have been given a divine commission to inform Vespasian, the Roman general against whom he was fighting, that he would soon be elevated to the rank of emperor (J.W. 3.400-402). Whether this is in fact what happened is debatable, but the Romans evidently were more than happy to put about the notion that an eastern prophet had predicted the rise of the Flavian house (e.g., Suetonius, Vesp. 5; Dio Cassius, Hist. 66.1).

Making things worse for his modern-day reputation, Josephus then agreed to work for the Romans as an interpreter and an informant (J.W. 5.325; 6.129; Ag. Ap. 1.49) and to try to persuade the Jewish insurgents in Jerusalem to give up the fight before it was too late (J.W. 5.114, 261, 361-419, 541; 6.94-110, 365). It was in this capacity that he would later present himself as coming to the view, based on the book of Daniel, that God had granted the power of empire to the Romans, and that in resisting them the rebels were in fact fighting against the divine will. In the aftermath of the war, when the vast majority of surviving Jews were forced to endure the most difficult of burdens, including slavery and heavy taxation, Josephus was rewarded with a tract of land in Judea (Life 422, 425), Roman citizenship (hence his name "Flavius" Josephus), Vespasian's former house in Rome to live in, and a pension (Life 422-423). He later also enjoyed the patronage of a certain Epaphroditus in Rome (Ant. 1.8-9; Life 430).

It was during this period that he authored the four works for which he is now known and in which he was particularly concerned to explain Jewish history, religion and customs (what Josephus calls the Jewish politeia, or "constitution") in ways that would commend them to a Roman public who, especially after the First Jewish Revolt, tended to have rather narrow and prejudiced views of Judaism. It is impossible now to ascertain what, if any, contact Josephus may have had with elite literary and intellectual circles in Flavian *Rome, though it is interesting to note that Josephus's works were published during a period when imperial suspicion and antagonism toward such circles was at its highest (e.g. Suetonius, Dom. 10; Tacitus, Agr. 2). This was also a time of intense hostility from certain Jewish individuals in Rome who resented Josephus's conspicuous rise to prosperity (Life 423-425, 428-429). In this context it is possible to understand Josephus's work as a lifelong attempt both to answer his critics and to redefine his own identity as a Jew living in Rome. The date of Josephus's death is not known, though it must have been close to the end of the first century A.D.

2. Works.

2.1. The Jewish War. This work (completed mid-80s A.D.) is made up of seven books covering the buildup to the rebellion against Rome, starting as far back as the second century B.C., and the conduct of the war itself culminating in the destruction of Jerusalem, the burning of the *temple, and the suppression of final resistance at the desert fortress of Masada. In his account of the causes and course of the war Josephus shifts the blame away from the Jewish people as a whole and attempts to place it on the shoulders of a small and unrepresentative group of radicals (J.W. 1.9-12) whose heinous crimes, he said, had alienated God and caused him to abandon the temple and the Jewish cause (J.W. 5.412). Josephus also exonerates Titus of direct responsibility for the destruction of the temple. A shorter version of the work, originally composed in Aramaic (J.W. 1.3), had been written as a Roman propaganda device to discourage rebellion among the inhabitants of Parthia, Babylonia and Arabia (J.W. 1.3, 6). The extant Greek version, based at least partially on imperial war records (Life 342, 358), was composed by Josephus with the help of literary assistants (Ag. Ap. 1.50) in a style suited to the cultured tastes of a Greco-Roman audience.

2.2. The Jewish Antiquities. Josephus's second and longest work (completed around A.D. 93) covers the entire history of the Jewish people from the creation of the world until the outbreak of war in A.D. 66. The first eleven books of the Jewish Antiquities retell the story of the Hebrew Bible in the form of an expansive Hellenizing paraphrase. Despite its many embellishments of the biblical narrative with traditional Jewish materials and his own creative additions, Josephus presents the work as a scrupulous translation of the Scriptures on the model of the Septuagint (Ant. 1.10-17). The rest of the work's twenty books deal with the history of the Jews up until Josephus's own time. This material overlaps with much of the first two books of the Jewish War, though Josephus seems to have changed his mind on a number of individuals and groups in the period between the publication of the Jewish War and the Jewish Antiquities. Herod the Great and some of the Hasmonean rulers, for example, are presented in a much more negative light in the latter than they had been in the former. This material also contains Josephus's only references to some of the most important figures associated with Christian origins, including Jesus, *John the Baptizer and James the brother of Jesus (see 5 below).

2.3. Life. This brief autobiographical work was published as an appendix to the Jewish Antiquities in the early 90s of the first century A.D., but mostly it relates to Josephus's role as the commander of the Jewish forces in Galilee in a four- or five-month period in the early stages of the war against Rome. The work is a response to the accusations of Justus of Tiberias that Josephus had behaved as a cruel and despot tyrant during this period.

2.4. Against Apion. This work in two books (completed A.D. mid-90s) is a defense of Judaism against various slanderous accusations that seem to have been widespread in literary circles in late first-century Rome. Josephus defends his account in the earlier Jewish Antiquities of the long history of the Jews, their laws and their customs (Ag. Ap. 1.1-5), and he counters a number of salacious versions of Jewish origins, especially the ones put about by an Egyptian scholar called "Apion." The work culminates with a summary of Jewish laws and practice and an encomium on the lawgiver Moses. The work is particularly valuable for the ancient sources that Josephus quotes, many of which are no longer extant anywhere else, and as an example of ancient apologetics. Its portrayal of Judaism is also of high quality and usefulness to students of Judaism in this period.

3. Reception.

It is a salient fact of Josephus's writings that they were preserved for posterity for the most part not by Jewish scholars, but by the church. The reasons for this are perhaps not difficult to understand. On the Jewish side, Josephus was perceived as a national traitor who had gone so far as to suggest divine approval and even support of the Roman Empire and its destruction of Jerusalem. Except for a Hebrew paraphrase of the Jewish War and part of the Jewish Antiquities in the tenth century, called Josippon, there is little evidence of Jewish appropriation of Josephus until modern times. Since the establishment of the State of Israel, and especially since 1967, however, Josephus has become a major aid to the resurgent *archeology in the region. On the Christian side, Josephus has been put to major use from ancient times until now. Several church fathers, especially Origen and Eusebius in the third and fourth centuries respectively, quoted extensively from his works, and these along with a Latin adaption by Hegesippus in the late fourth century ensured the ongoing prestige of his works. It is easy to understand the Christian interest in Josephus not least because of his mention of Jesus, John Baptist and numerous other aspects of the biblical narratives. The Christian appropriations of Josephus are highly problematic, though, for they often distort the message of his writings in significant ways. The most egregious of these is the way Christian scholars tended to use the writings of Josephus, especially the Jewish War, to argue that God had turned his back on the Jews in punishment for the death of Jesus. Josephus himself had nothing to say on this subject, of course, and understood the destruction of the temple as a tragedy that could be blamed in significant part on a small and unrepresentative cadre of misguided militants. The fact that Josephus was a devout Jew who continued to champion the antiquity, nobility and legitimacy of the Jewish faith was by and large simply ignored.

4. Scholarship.

Ever since the modern flourishing of biblical studies and especially of the historical-critical method in nineteenth-century Europe, Josephus has come to the fore as a major source of historical information. Unfortunately, many scholars have tended to mine Josephus for "facts" rather than read his works as coherent wholes. This has led to the situation where once again Josephus's own understanding and interpretation of history has been regarded as irrelevant. Further, the Tendenz or bias of Josephus's works has often been misunderstood or naively incorporated into reconstructions of the first-century world. Perhaps the most significant development in more recent scholarship of Josephus, though, has been the growing understanding of Josephus as a complex and nuanced historian whose writings, no less than the Gospels themselves, need to be understood in their own terms and not just as a source of raw material for the benefit of those interested in historical backgrounds. The publication of K. Rengstorff's Complete Concordance to Flavius Josephus (1973-1983) has been of particular importance for understanding Josephus as an author with his own particular use of the Greek language. Insights derived from the study of rhetoric and critical theories such as postcolonialism have also enabled recent scholarship to gain a deeper appreciation of the task that Josephus saw himself engaged in and of the considerable constraints under which he was forced to work as a Jew in Rome.

5. Relevance for Jesus and the Gospels.

The works of Josephus are important for the study of Jesus and the Gospels in numerous ways, though in all cases scholars must be careful to understand the narrative, rhetorical and ideological aspects of Josephus's project. One of the most common uses of Josephus is for establishing the chronological framework for the whole period from the second century B.C. through the latter half of the first century A.D. (see Chronology). The importance of this for the analysis of the birth of Christianity is obvious, though there are a number of places in which Josephus's chronology is at odds with the Gospels. The most notorious of these discrepancies, which makes unlikely that Luke knew the writings of Josephus, relates to the dating of the birth of Jesus in relation to the census under Quirinius and the death of Herod the Great (see Birth of Jesus).

Another vital use of Josephus relates to our understanding of the cultural and religious context within which the stories of the Gospel are set. Josephus gives us our fullest account of the social structures and institutions of late Second Temple Judaism. His writings give insight into the operations of the temple cult, the priesthood, the pilgrim festivals and the place of the law in Jewish life. The relevance of this for understanding Jesus' relationship to the Judaism of his day is obvious (see Judaism, Common).

Josephus's writings also help us to unravel the complex interrelations between the different classes and sectors within Jewish society, including the Herod family, the Hasmonians, the high priests and the various sects (*Pharisees, *Sadducees, *Essenes), as well as the relation of all these to the ruling Romans. The Gospels' account of the trial and execution of Jesus is just one example of how several of these groups come together in ways that would be far less clear were it not for the general orientation provided by Josephus on matters such as the relationship between the temple, with its high priests, and the Roman governors such as *Pontius Pilate (see Trial of Jesus). Josephus also gives insight into the political climate of the first century, of the tensions that ebbed and flowed during the period, and the attitudes of various groups to the Romans. It is in this connection that Josephus also describes various *revolutionary figures, some of whom might be understood as illustrative of expectations that may have attached to the Jesus movement.

Christian readers of Josephus have always been particularly drawn to certain named figures of the time who appear in both Josephus and the Gospels. Such figures include Herod the Great and numerous of his offspring, Pontius Pilate, Annas and Caiaphas, but pride of place goes to the much briefer passages that mention James the brother of Jesus (Ant. 20.200-202), John the Baptist (Ant. 18.116-119) and Jesus himself (Ant. 18.63-64) (see Jesus in Non-Christian Sources). This last passage, referred to as the Testimonium Flavianum, has, unfortunately, been tampered with by early Christian copyists who seem to have embellished the account to make it sound more Christian. Be that as it may, the Testimonium Flavianum is significant because it is our earliest extrabiblical and non-Christian reference to the person and career of Jesus.

See also HELLENISM; HERODIAN DYNASTY; JESUS IN NON-CHRISTIAN SOURCES; JUDAISM, COMMON; PHARISEES; PONTIUS PILATE; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS; ROME; SADDUCEES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Edmondson, S. Mason and J. Rives, eds., Flavius Josephus and Flavian Rome (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005); S. Mason, ed., Understanding Josephus: Seven Perspectives (JSP-Sup 32; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); idem, Josephus and the New Testament (2nd ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); idem, ed., Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary (10 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000-2008); J. S. McLaren, Turbulent Times? Josephus and Scholarship on Judea in the First Century CE (JSPSup 29; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); B. Niese, Flavii Josephi Opera (7 vols.; Berlin: Weidmann, 1885-1895); T. Rajak, Josephus: The Historian and His Society (2nd ed.; London: Duckworth, 2007); K. H. Rengstorff, ed., A Complete Concordance to Flavius Josephus (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973-1983); J. Sievers and G. Lembi, eds., Josephus and Jewish History in Flavian Rome and Beyond (JSJSup 104; Leiden: E. J. Brill 2005); H. St. J. Thackeray et al., eds. and trans., Jo- sephus (10 vols.; LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press; London: Heinemann, 1926-1965).

P. Spilsbury

JOY

Among the wide array of terms used to signify “joy” in the Gospels (see Morrice, 17-81; LN §§25.116-34), two sets of terms are of special consequence. The first includes chara (“joy”), chairō (“to rejoice”) and synchairō (“to rejoice with”); agalliaō (“to be overjoyed”) and agalliasis (“great joy”); and skirtaō (“to leap with joy”), which typically relate to the response of those who are recipients of and participants in God’s saving activity. The second set includes makarios (“happy,” often translated as “blessed”) and its verbal form makarizō (“to be regarded as happy [or blessed]”), which typically refer to the condition of those who live their lives in accordance with God’s saving purpose.

Neither set refers in the first instance to emotions as these are popularly understood today. In Greco-Roman antiquity emotions generally were understood as irrational impulses to be controlled by a rational person. “Joy” and “happiness” refer instead to the complex of proclivities and behaviors associated with human flourishing. This latter perspective is more at home in contemporary research on happiness than in today’s popular understandings of happiness as glib and fleeting. Happiness studies today identify happiness in terms of growth (intrinsic motivation and progress on the path toward realizing one’s life purpose), integrity (the internalization and assimilation of one’s cultural conventions and practices) and well-being (flourishing and contentment) (e.g., Ryan and Deci; Berridge and Kringelbach). In the Gospels this human flourishing is not related to the absence of suffering (as in Epicureanism), but rather is more akin to the Stoic notion of living in harmony with the way things really are—although, of course, for the Gospels, “the way things really are” is determined by the advent of God’s kingdom.

The word euphrainō (“to be glad”) is used sparingly in the Gospels, usually in the sense of hedonic joy (or “merriment”) (e.g., Luke 12:19; 16:19), though in Luke 15:32 it is paired with chairō.

1. Matthew
2. Mark
3. Luke
4. John

1. Matthew.

Matthew’s Gospel associates joy above all with the arrival of and participation in God’s *salvation. The magi seeking to honor the newborn king Jesus were overcome with joy (echarēsan charan) when they found him (Mt 2:10), a response that finds its counterpart in the women’s “great joy” (charas megalēs) at Jesus’ *resurrection (Mt 28:8). When people receive the word (Mt 13:20) and discover the *kingdom (Mt 13:44), they respond with joy, just as the *shepherd rejoices when he finds a lost sheep—a transparent metaphor for the Father who does not want any of “these little ones” to be lost (Mt 18:12-14). In a separate parable the master invites the faithful servants, “Enter into the joy of your master” (Mt 25:21, 23)—an occasion of synecdoche in which the master’s joy signifies eschatological salvation. The association of joy and happiness (see above) in Matthew’s Gospel surfaces in the parallel between this master’s invitation (“Enter into the joy [chara] . . .”) and the outcome of faithful service in Matthew 24:46 (“Happy [makarioi] are those . . .”).

The correlation of joy and happiness is most on display in the last of Jesus’ Matthean beatitudes, where we read the following parallel (Mt 5:11-12):

“Happy [makarioi] are you when people insult you, persecute you, and say all kinds of evil things about you falsely on my account.”

“Rejoice [chairete] and celebrate [agalliasathe], because your reward in heaven is great, because in the same way they persecuted the prophets who came before you.”

It is crucial to consider the whole of this saying, since otherwise one might imagine that Jesus encourages suffering, or that he refers to generic suffering. To the contrary, he refers specifically to suffering as the (potential) outcome of a life that exhibits the qualities sketched in Matthew 5:3-10, qualities by which one is identified with Jesus’ programmatic disclosure of the character of life lived according to the Father’s will (see Mt 6:9-10) and through which one is identified with Jesus himself (cf. 1 Pet 4:13-16) (see Estrada). Matthew’s beatitudes take this form: pronouncement of happiness + description of the group identified as “happy” + the warrant for their happiness. These are less the bestowal of happiness, then, and much less the preconditions for achieving happiness, but rather are the declaration that certain people are happy even though according to conventional wisdom they might be regarded as the unhappiest of all (see Holladay).

2. Mark.

Mark departs from the other Synoptic evangelists in his use of the language of joy. He shares with them Jesus’ *parable of the seed and its explanation, in which Jesus identifies the rocky ground with those who hear the word, receive it with “joy” (chara), but soon wither away (Mk 4:16; cf. Mt 13:20; Lk 8:13). Apart from this, however, chairō is used only with reference to the chief priests’ response to Judas’s willingness to betray Jesus (Mk 14:10–11). A different term, hēdeōs (“gladly”), describes how Herod listens to John (Mk 6:20) and how the crowd attends to Jesus’ teaching in the temple (Mk 12:37).

3. Luke.

The language of joy and happiness is scattered throughout Luke’s Gospel, but it congregates especially at three points: the birth narrative (Lk 1–2); the parables of the lost sheep, lost coin and lost son (Lk 15); and the *Sermon on the Plain (Lk 6) (see Green). Luke 1–2 anticipates and celebrates God’s intervention to restore God’s people. Gabriel announced to Zechariah that he and Elizabeth would have a son, and that “he will be a joy and delight” for them (Lk 1:14). Since *John’s role was to begin the work of the renewal of God’s people, the significance of his birth extends further, so that “many will rejoice at his birth” (Lk 1:14). At Jesus’ birth, the *angel announces to the shepherds, “I bring good news to you—wonderful, happy news for everyone: Your savior is born today in the city of David; he is Christ the Lord” (Lk 2:10–11). The births of John and Jesus thus signal a world transformation, the result of which is the impetus for renewed joy. Indeed, Mary’s song celebrates God’s favor and saving action in the *birth of Jesus (Lk 1:46–55).

Jesus’ beatitudes in Luke (Lk 6:20–23) differ from their Matthean parallel (Mt 5:3–12) in two important ways. First, Luke’s version pairs fortune and misfortune. For example, Jesus’ words “Happy are you who are poor, because God’s kingdom is yours” find their parallel in his words “But how terrible for you who are rich, because you have already received your comfort” (Lk 6:20, 24). This means that Luke’s beatitudes participate in a wider Lukan emphasis on salvation as reversal. Second, whereas in Matthew Jesus’ pronouncements are made in the third person, “Happy are those who . . .,” in Luke both happiness and judgment are in the second person, “Happy are you who . . .” Since blessings and woes are announced to the same people, we may recognize that Jesus is calling people to identify themselves either with the marginal or with the powerful and esteemed. The issue is not whether some in his audience “feel” happy, since happiness is not a passing condition based on one’s good fortune. Rather, Jesus defines life’s assumptions and day-to-day values with reference to God’s kingdom. In this sense, the *blessings and woes in Luke 6 are not so much prescriptive as ascriptive; that is, they communicate how things already are on account of Jesus’ advent (and not how things ought to be). Granted, it is a strange world where the poor can be declared to be happy rather than unlucky or bedeviled, but this only emphasizes the source of Jesus’ vision in his disclosure of God’s kingdom (see Rich and Poor).

Luke juxtaposes the unhappy *Pharisees and legal experts in Luke 15:1–2 with a cascade of references to joy and happiness in Luke 15:5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 23, 24, 29, 32, climaxing in a declaration of the necessity of happiness when the lost are found: “We had to celebrate and rejoice!” (Lk 15:32). This chapter comes in the midst of a longer section concerned with who will participate in God’s kingdom (Lk 13:10–17:10), with God’s kingdom imagined especially in terms of the end-time banquet (Lk 13:29; cf. Lk 14:15)—a vision rooted in the scriptural portrait of God’s restoration as a great feast (e.g., Is 25:6–9; 55:1–2; 65:13–14; Zech 1:7) (see Table Fellowship). Accordingly, in the parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin and the lost son Jesus interprets the positive response of tax collectors and *sinners as that end-time restoration of the lost that results in heavenly joy and mandates earthly celebration. Salvation has come, so this is the time for joy.

4. John.

In John’s Gospel joy is related above all to the salvific presence of Jesus. Early in the narrative John the Baptist is “overjoyed”—indeed, his joy is “completed”—at the *bridegroom’s (i.e., the Messiah’s) arrival (Jn 3:29). Abraham rejoiced at Jesus’ coming (Jn 8:56), and even those Jews who resisted Jesus’ message found in John the Baptist’s mission reason to celebrate the coming of God’s restoration (Jn 5:35). Indeed, according to Jesus, the anticipated time of salvation had broken into the present, “so that the one who sows can rejoice with the one who harvests” (Jn 4:36). Like John the Baptist’s joy, that of the *disciples is described as “completed” (Jn 15:11; 16:24; 17:13), this as a consequence of their union with Jesus. Jesus predicts that their joy will lapse at his death, only to be recovered when he returns (Jn 16:20–22); accordingly, after the resurrection, “when the disciples saw the Lord, they rejoiced” (Jn 20:20).

See also BLESSING AND WOE; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; SALVATION; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. C. Berridge and M. L. Kringelbach, “Affective Neuroscience of Pleasure: Reward in Humans and Animals,” Psychopharma- cology 199 (2008) 457-80; B. Estrada, "The Last Beatitude: Joy in Suffering," Bib 91 (2010) 187-209; J. B. Green, "We Had to Celebrate and Rejoice!": Happiness in the Topsy-turvy World of Luke-Acts," in The Bible and the Pursuit of Happiness: What the Old and New Testaments Teach Us About the Good Life, ed. B. A. Strawn (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012) 169-85; C. R. Holladay, "The Beatitudes: Happiness and the Kingdom of God," in The Bible and the Pursuit of Happiness: What the Old and New Testaments Teach Us About the Good Life, ed. B. A. Strawn (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012) 141-67; J. V. Kozar, "Absent Joy: An Investigation of the Narrative Pattern of Repetition and Variation in the Parables of Luke 15," TJT 8 (1992) 85-94; W. G. Morrice, Joy in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); R. M. Ryan and E. L. Deci, "On Happiness and Human Potentials: A Review of Research on Hedonic and Eudaimonic Well-Being," Annual Review of Psychology 52 (2001) 141-66.

J. B. Green

JUBILEE

Even though the term Jubilee occurs nowhere in the Gospels (or even in the NT), the Jubilee tradition forms an important background for understanding the character of Jesus' mission. Having deep roots in Israel's earliest history, this prescribed socioeconomic institution had become by the postexilic period increasingly linked with idealized visions of the nation's eschatological future. Near or at the time of Jesus, expectations regarding a climactic Jubilee were approaching their height; the same expectations undoubtedly played a role in Jesus' self-understanding, which in turn shaped early Christian reflection on Jesus in the Gospels, particularly Luke.

1. Jubilee in the Old Testament and Second Temple Judaism
2. Jubilee in Luke

1. Jubilee in the Old Testament and Second Temple Judaism.

In the OT, detailed treatment of the Jubilee occurs in Leviticus 25. Immediately preceding instructions on the Jubilee itself (Lev 25:8-55) is a provision relating to land usage, stipulating that every seventh year Israel was to allow the land to lie fallow, with no sowing, pruning or reaping (Lev 25:1-7). By forbidding normal agricultural procedures, the legislation had the effect of enforcing a temporary restoration of Edenic conditions (Gen 1:29-30). On the seventh Sabbath (meaning either every forty-ninth year or every fiftieth year, a question of ongoing debate) Israel was instructed to sound the trumpet on the Day of Atonement so as to declare "liberty" or "release" (dêrôr) (Lev 25:10; a term that also occurs in Is 61:1; Jer 34:8, 15, 17; Ezek 46:17). In addition to entailing the septennial land Sabbath (since Jubilee by definition coincided with the corresponding year), this release ensured that (1) ancestral land that had been alienated (presumably due to debt) would be duly restored to the original family line (with exceptions for property holdings within walled cities); (2) individuals and families who had accordingly been forced to indenture themselves would also be released (although see Harbin). This legislation reflects two principles that were foundational to Israel's self-understanding: (1) the land belongs to Yahweh, and Israel is but a tenant nation on it (Lev 25:23); (2) the Israelites were not to belong to one another (at least not over the long term), since they were servants of Yahweh, who had redeemed them from Egypt (Lev 25:42). By reversing the conditions of slavery and loss of land, Jubilee was designed to signify "the return of cosmic order to Israel" (Kawashima, 372).

The Jubilee would also play a significant role in Israel's prophetic imagination. In his vision of a restored Israel, Ezekiel promises that Jubilee legislation will continue to apply (Ezek 46:17); the notion of Jubilee also underlies his prediction of the land being returned to the twelve tribes (Ezek 48:1-29). Toward the climax of his vision of Israel's return from exile (Is 40-66), Isaiah anticipates a "release." In Isaiah 61:1-4 the prophet foresees a mediatorial figure, anointed by the Spirit and tasked with proclaiming the "good news" of "release" (dêrôr), or "forgiveness" (LXX: aphesis), for the captives. These same captives are set in parallel with the "poor" and the "broken-hearted"; they are the disenfranchised of the remnant community and the chief beneficiaries of the eschatological promises of restoration. For Isaiah, concerns of landlessness and debt cannot be separated from forgiveness.

Although there is no evidence that Israel ever implemented the legal requirements of Leviticus 25, this does not mean that the nation was oblivious to the Jubilee as a sacred, publicly recognized event. Although Second Temple Judaism traced Jubilee back to the moment of creation, since time itself was structured by 49/50-year segments, in some sense the first Jubilee was to be counted from, and notionally associated with, the entry into the promised land (Lev 25:2; 4Q379 XII, 1-7; Jub. 50:4). Earlier, in the preexilic period, the Jubilee seems to have provided the impetus for various important endeavors in Israel's history, including on five separate Jubilee years the building and refurbishing of the *temple (Casperson) (a point that may be related to Jesus' temple action, implying the erection of a new temple [Jn 2:19]). Daniel also presumes knowledge of specific Jubilee dates when he promises that "seventy sevens" (490 years, or ten Jubilee cycles) will transpire between the decree to rebuild Jerusalem and the point at which the holy city exhausts its transgression; at this time, following the cutting off of the "anointed one" and the "abomination that causes desolation," atonement will be secured, and an age of everlasting righteousness will be inaugurated (Dan 9:24-27). If one identifies the beginning of this period with Ezra's return to Jerusalem in 424 B.C., and presumes a Jubilee cycle of forty-nine years, the end of Daniel's ten Jubilees would be A.D. 66 (Barker, 26-27). (The Zealots' burning of the debt records in the same year can hardly be disassociated from this calculus [Josephus, J.W. 2.425-427].) On the same reckoning, this would also mean that Jesus' ministry commenced not long after the beginning of the all-important tenth Jubilee (i.e., A.D. 17).

A similar climactic time frame is envisaged in the Qumran text 11QMelchizedek (11Q13 [mid-first century B.C.]), perhaps the most important extra-biblical text on the function of Jubilee within ancient Jewish apocalyptic expectation. Although fragmentary and at points indeterminate, the document clearly envisions the eschatological Melchizedek as an anointed high priest who, in fulfillment of Isaiah 61:1-4, will soon dispense judgment and free the sons of light from the demonic forces of Belial even as he forgives the "debt of their iniquities" (11Q13 VI). Fascinatingly, this Melchizedek figure not only takes up the role of the anointed messenger in Isaiah 61:1, but also is implicitly identified with Yahweh, where the phrase "the year of Melchizedek's favor" is substituted for "the year of the Lord's favor" (11Q13 IX). Melchizedek's role in this scenario makes sense not only because of his archetypal role in the return of captives (Gen 14), but also on account of his exalted status and role as eschatological judge in Psalm 110 (Bergsma, 284-85).

This in turn may shed some light on the historical Jesus' self-understanding. When Jesus applies Psalm 110 to himself in his final week (Mt 22:41-46 // Mk 12:35-37 // Lk 20:41-44), he may well be styling himself as a similar Melchizedekian figure with similar functions, including the task of implementing the final Jubilee. That the Gospel tradition depicts Isaiah 61:1-4 as a crucial element in Jesus' self-understanding supports this (see 2 below). If Jesus roughly shared the views of at least some of his contemporaries on the timing of the eschatological scenario (per Dan 9:24-27), and if he saw himself as having a unique role within that scenario, this may explain many of his aims and practices as being rooted in his vocation as the priestly inaugurator of the great and long-awaited Jubilee (Perrin, 134-48).

2. Jubilee in Luke.

Among the Synoptic Gospels, Luke is recognized as uniquely presenting Jesus as the herald of the eschatological Jubilee. However, working from texts in which Jubilee resonances are clearly present, it becomes possible to appreciate more fully additional jubiliatory motifs in the Synoptic tradition (e.g., Mt 5:3-5; Mt 26:11 // Mk 14:7).

The development of the Jubilee tradition in the Second Temple period demonstrates that irrespective of actual historical practices of Jubilee, Israel was able to craft from its Jubilee legislation images of restoration from exile (see Exile and Restoration). In Luke's Gospel this vision comes to the fore in Jesus' programmatic sermon in Nazareth, introduced with the words of Isaiah 61:1-2 (italicized text is drawn from Is 58:6):

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me because he has anointed me to bring good news to the poor.
He has sent me to proclaim release [aphesis] to the captives and recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty [aphesis] the oppressed, to proclaim the year of the Lord's favor. (Lk 4:18-19)

After taking his seat, Jesus then declares to his synagogue audience, "Today, in your hearing, this Scripture has been fulfilled" (Lk 4:21). Isaiah 61:1-2 had already taken up the language and imagery of "release" from Leviticus 25 (aphesis occurs 15x in Lev 25), redeploing the term metaphorically in anticipation of Israel's liberation from the oppression of exilic life. The intrusion of the phrase from Isaiah 58:6, which could hardly have been accidental, doubles the reference to the term in Jesus' sermon. Accordingly, Jesus interprets his missional identity in terms of Isaiah's jubiliatory vision of a mediator whose Spirit-endowed ministry would both signal and instigate God's end-time restoration of Israel. His emphatic declaration that this Scripture was fulfilled "today" represents the inauguration of Jesus' mission as the time of Israel's restoration.

Luke interprets this Isaianic material more broadly as his Gospel unfolds. Most explicitly, in Luke 7:21-22 Jesus responds to *John the Baptist's question of whether Jesus was "the coming one" by repeating the list of recipients of the good news in Luke 4:18-19 and extending it in ways that further echo Isaianic interests (e.g., Is 29:18-19; 35:5-6; 42:18; 43:8; 61:1). In addition to the more obvious echoes of Isaiah's interpretation of Jubilee tradition, Jesus' reference to the raising of the dead is of special interest. This is because, reflecting usage in the OT (e.g., Ezek 37) and Second Temple Judaism (e.g., 4Q521), Luke can use *"resurrection" to signify Israel's restoration (e.g., Acts 4:2; 23:6). The introduction of this phrase here, then, advances the understanding of Jesus' ministry in terms of the regathering of God's people and suggests that these other forms of ministry (e.g., healing, casting out demons) are concrete signs that the anticipated end-time liberation is now being realized. Matthew recounts a similar interaction between John the Baptist's disciples and Jesus and provides a similar list (Mt 11:4-5); however, when Jesus responds to John in Matthew, the intimations of Jubilee are not quite as strong.

Less explicitly, but nonetheless significant, are the ways Luke elaborates on Isaiah's vision by associating "the poor" not only with Israel in its subjugation to a foreign overlord but also to an array of persons regarded as marginal in his world (e.g., lepers, widows, children, the destitute), and by associating "release" with liberation from the *demonic, from *economic enslavement, and from the power and consequence of *sin (i.e., aphesis hamartiōn ["forgiveness of sins"]). With this observation, the potential influence of the Jubilee tradition for understanding Jesus' ministry is considerably broadened—for example, to include the Beatitudes (Lk 6:20-22; Mt 5:3-12), the lists of persons whom one should invite to share one's table (Lk 14:13, 21) (see Table Fellowship), and other Synoptic material concerned with possessions and the poor (see Rich and Poor), as well as those accounts in which Jesus extends *forgiveness, such as Luke's account of the forgiveness of a sinful woman from the city (Lk 7:36-50).

See also ECONOMICS; EXILE AND RESTORATION; ISRAEL; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; SABBATH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Barker, "The Time Is Fulfilled: Jesus and Jubilee," SJT 53 (2000) 22-32; J. S. Bergsma, The Jubilee from Leviticus to Qumran: A History of Interpretation (VTSup 115; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2007); C. R. Bruno, "'Jesus Is Our Jubilee' . . . But How? The OT Background and Lukan Fulfillment of the Ethics of Jubilee," JETS 53 (2010) 81-101;

L. W. Casperson, "Sabbatical, Jubilee, and the Temple of Solomon," VT 53 (2003) 283-96; M. A. Harbin, "The Manumission of Slaves in Jubilee and Sabbath Years," TynBul 63 (2012) 53-74; R. S. Kawashima, "The Jubilee Year and the Return of Cosmic Purity," CBQ 65 (2003) 370-89; N. Perrin, Jesus the Temple (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); S. H. Ringe, Jesus, Liberation, and the Biblical Jubilee: Images for Ethics and Christology (OBT 19; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. A. Sanders, "From Isaiah 61 to Luke 4," in Luke and Scripture: The Function of Sacred Tradition in Luke-Acts, by C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 46-69; idem, "Sins, Debts, and Jubilee Release," in Luke and Scripture: The Function of Sacred Tradition in Luke-Acts, by C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993), 84-92; R. B. Sloan Jr., The Favorable Year of the Lord: A Study of Jubiliary Theology in the Gospel of Luke (Austin, TX: Schola Press, 1977).

J. B. Green and N. Perrin

JUDAISM, COMMON

"Common Judaism" is defined by E. P. Sanders as that which "the priests and the people agreed on" (Sanders, 47). The basic characteristics of Judaism in the first century A.D. include unqualified devotion to monotheism as expressed in the Torah and allegiance to the Jerusalem *temple and to *Israel, God's people. Jews were bound together not by a single language or by residing in a single location; instead, they claimed a common heritage, a set of common rites, and a common conviction as to the nature of the one, true God. Common Judaism included elements of what the ancients would have called "philosophy," inasmuch as they held that their divinely revealed *law promoted a way of life. But Judaism also was a religion, for it involved a temple cult with a developed priesthood and system of sacrifices.

1. Common Beliefs of First-Century A.D. Judaism
2. Common Practices of First-Century A.D. Jews
3. Common Institutions: Jerusalem Temple and the Synagogue

1. Common Beliefs of First-Century A.D. Judaism.

1.1. Accepted Doctrines. Although there is no question that Second Temple Judaism included numerous sects, an active Diaspora and various parties engaging political and social realities, it is also the case that Judaism had a central core that generally defined and shaped Jews throughout the Greco-Roman world.

1.1.1. Monotheism. "We have but one Temple for the one God,” declares *Josephus to his Roman readers, explaining a unique quality of Judaism (Ag. Ap 2.193). Jews celebrated this conviction in their recitation of the Shema: “Hear, O Israel, the LORD your God, the LORD is One” (Deut 6:4). Jesus asserts this when asked to identify the greatest commandment (Mk 12:29). Israel’s God created the world, established a people to worship him, and gave a law by which they could live honorably and with holiness. The prohibition against idolatry and the conviction that God works in history are two corollaries to this position.

1.1.2. Purity. The resulting outcome was a firm belief that Jews should live pure, holy lives (Lev 11:45) (see Clean and Unclean). Jews understood purity in two complimentary senses: ritual and moral purity (Klawans, 55-56). The former defined impurity based on natural human activities such as secreting bodily fluids in intercourse and childbirth, handling dead animals or human corpses, and contracting a skin disease. These states of impurity were dealt with by washing and then waiting for a prescribed length of time depending on the person’s status (priest or laity). Moral purity focused on avoiding sinful deeds such as adultery, murder and idolatry. These actions brought pollution to the individual and the land and could not be simply washed away (Lev 18:25). The Jews’ focus on purity was related primarily to temple worship, but it may have extended to a desire to be pure on the *Sabbath in the *synagogue when the law scrolls were read (Haber, 65). Lively disagreements among Jews about the requirements for holy living characterized Second Temple Judaism, and often these focused on identifying those who had greater responsibilities for holiness. Questions in this period centered not on what holiness was, but rather on who was required to achieve particular (usually more demanding) requirements of holiness.

1.2. Contested Doctrines. Central to Jewish debates in the first century A.D. were arguments concerning (1) the nature of God’s kingdom; (2) the proper response to Roman rule; (3) the role of the Messiah; (4) the doctrine of resurrection within the larger conversation about the afterlife and God’s judgment; (5) angels.

1.2.1. Kingdom of God. Jews embraced the idea of God’s *kingdom and recognized God as their king. However, Jews were divided over the matter of how God’s kingship would take shape in their midst. In general, Jews held the following three convictions in tension: (1) God as sovereign over Israel; (2) God as the “eternal suzerain” of the world (1QM II, 10-14); (3) God as Lord of the marginalized and needy (Ps 145:14; Pss. Sol. 5:2-12; Jdt 9:11-12) (Moore, 132). Some sources speak of God’s kingship in relation to wisdom or Torah obedience (Wis 10:10). Jesus spoke often of the kingdom of God (e.g., Mt 13:24-35; Mk 4:26-32; Lk 16:16). In God’s kingdom, Jews believed, there was holiness, peace, prosperity and health, with all people worshiping God in his temple in righteousness (Lk 1:74-75; Sib. Or. 3:371-380; Philo, Praem. 91-93; Jub. 23:27-30; 1QM II, 1-6).

1.2.2. Roman Rule. Attitudes toward Roman rule in Judea and Galilee ranged from mercenary accommodation to violent rejection, from withdrawal away from the wider Jewish community to full engagement in the political arena (see Rome). These reactions are similar to Judaism’s response to *Hellenism introduced several centuries earlier by Alexander the Great. J. Barclay argues that the categories of assimilation, acculturation and accommodation help sort out the variety of options chosen by Jews (Barclay, 92-96). Assimilation relates to social convergence, while acculturation focuses on shared norms and values. For example, Jews often used the Greek language (social convergence) but did not share the value of using Roman sacrifices and rituals or giving great importance to wealth and social prestige. Tobit sounds a common refrain: “Do not be afraid, my son, because we have become poor. You have great wealth if you fear God and refrain from every sin and do what is pleasing in his sight” (Tob 4:21). Accommodation reflects the application of that which is acculturated. For example, a Jewish author such as Aristobulus might use excellent Greek rhetoric to condemn Greek culture (Barclay, 150-56).

A flashpoint of Roman rule was taxation. Jesus’ comments about rendering unto Caesar what is Caesar’s (Lk 20:20-26) at the very least highlight the inflammatory nature of the Jewish leaders’ question. Jesus did not unambiguously endorse paying Caesar’s taxes, and his answer might be interpreted to question whether Caesar deserved any or all that he asked for. During the first century A.D., Jewish gangs repeatedly challenged Roman taxation (Josephus, J.W. 2.275; Ant. 17.213-218; 18.273-275).

1.2.3. Messiah. Some Jews believed that the path to a more holy and just society lay in God’s sending a messiah to lead the people (Sir 51:12 [Hebrew text]) (see Christ). No single understanding of “messiah” existed, in part because Jews disagreed on the nature of their problems and the sort of transformation that God would perform to fix the world. In general, however, Jews expected the Messiah to judge the world, rid it of sin and evil, and restore justice, especially for God’s people (Pss. Sol.

17:24-41; Philo, Praem. 91-97; 1Q28a II, 11-20).

The term "messiah" is found frequently in Second Temple Jewish literature, but without a commonly accepted meaning (Jaffee, 95). For most, the Messiah was a human endowed with extraordinary capabilities for leadership and holiness (Pss. Sol. 17:23-47), although some believed the Messiah was preexistent (4 Ezra 12:32; 13:26). The messianic age might last eternally (1 En. 62:14), or until the establishment of the new heavens and new earth (Is 65:17; 66:22; 2 Bar. 40:3; 73:1; 4 Ezra 12:34; Mt 19:28; Mk 10:29-30; Lk 18:29-30). The new age was believed to be inaugurated by the Messiah (1 En. 45:4-5), or it commenced after the messianic age (4 Ezra 7:29-43; though see 4 Ezra 6:9).

More specific expectations generally ran along three lines that are not mutually exclusive: a royal, a priestly and a prophetic messiah. Prophetic messianism draws on Deuteronomy 18:15-18. Jesus is saluted as a *prophet (Jn 6:14; 7:40). Royal messianism draws on ancient Israel's views of kingship and reflects texts such as Psalm 2:6-12; 2 Samuel 7:8-16; Isaiah 40—66; Jeremiah 33:14-26. A royal messiah is promoted in Psalms of Solomon 17 and 4 Ezra. The DSS look for both a priestly and a royal messiah (1QS IX, 10-11; CD-A XII, 23). In several places Jesus is called *"Son of David," a royal messianic title (Mt 1:1-17; 9:27; Mk 10:47-48; Lk 1:32; 2:4; 3:23-38; Jn 7:41-43). The Gospels note that some Jews looked for the return of an eschatological *Elijah before the Day of the Lord (Jn 1:19-24; cf. Mal 4:5-6), and *John the Baptist is identified as the Elijah who was to come (Mt 11:14; 17:10-13; perhaps Mk 9:11-13). "The variety of messianic expectations found among Jews reflects the variety of ways of being Jewish in the Second Temple period" (Murphy, 365-66).

1.2.4. Life After Death. The study of messiah should be framed in the wider conversation of eschatology. Eschatological deliverance remained central within the Jewish faith in the first few centuries A.D., but rabbinic texts do not include lengthy descriptions of such deliverance (Nickelsburg and Stone, 194). Jews held that a time of great human suffering and confusion in the created order would occur before Elijah and/or the Messiah appeared (4 Ezra 6:24-28; Mt 24:6-42; Mk 13:7-32; m. 'Ed. 8:7). With his appearing, Jerusalem would be renewed, although exactly how that happened was debated. Some believed that the city would be cleansed, others that a more glorious Jerusalem preserved in heaven would descend (4 Ezra 10:44-59; 2 Bar. 4:2-6; Rev. 3:12; 21:2—22:5). Numerous opinions existed about the specifics of life after death some Jews spoke of the immortality of the soul (Jub. 23:31; 1 En. 103:2-4), others of the *resurrection of the body (2 Macc 7:9-36; Josephus, Ant. 18:14; m. Sanh. 10:1). Opinions divided on whether there would be a resurrection of the just only or a resurrection of all (Schürer, 2:543-44). Bodily resurrection reflected a larger story "in which the present state of those who had died would be replaced by a future state in which they would be alive once more" (Wright, 201).

1.2.5. Angels. Many Jews believed in *angels, spiritual beings from God who usually performed functions aiding God's people. Sadducees denied the existence of angels (Acts 23:8). Angels might act as intercessors (1 En. 100:5), teachers (Jub. 1:27-9), heavenly guides (4 Ezra 3—14) or intermediaries between the righteous and God (Tob 12:15). The NT follows this general pattern, with angels informing believers (Mt 1:20; 28:2-3) and serving as intermediaries with messages from God (Lk 1:11-20, 28-38) and as intercessors or helpers, as in Mark's telling of Jesus' temptation (Mk 1:12-13).

2. Common Practices of First-Century A.D. Jews.

2.1. Accepted Practices. Jews lived out their piety based on central decrees in the Torah, including circumcision of male infants, Sabbath rest and dietary restrictions. These practices distinguished Jews from their Gentile neighbors and were fiercely defended to the point of death, as evidenced by numerous stories in 1-2 Maccabees as well as by Josephus.

2.1.1. Circumcision. Discussions concerning circumcision are not recorded in the Gospels, likely because in Jesus' ministry he dealt with circumcised Jews predominantly. Further support for this assessment comes from the NT letters that discuss the Jewish circumcision requirement; had Jesus taught on this topic, the early church would have every reason to reference his words. The silence suggests that the topic was not contested by Jesus and his interlocutors. This matches other evidence that Jews uniformly circumcised their male infants. Indeed, Luke alludes to the circumcision of both Jesus (Lk 2:21) and John the Baptist (Lk 1:59). Philo defended circumcision by arguing that the practice was hygienic and symbolized the soul's need to control passions and avoid conceit (Spec. 1.8-11). In this argument one finds the sharp critique of Hellenism's adoration of the male physical body (Jaffee, 130).

2.1.2. Sabbath. A second well-known act of piety was *Sabbath observance, with Jews resting from their labors on the seventh day (Ex 20:8-11). Sabbath requirements mandated that Jesus be removed from the cross before sundown, the start of Sabbath. They also prevented Jesus' disciples from mourning at his tomb directly following his burial (Lk 23:56). These actions by the disciples suggest that during Jesus' ministry, they rested from work on the Sabbath. Jesus engaged in discussions about proper behavior on the Sabbath (Mt 12:1-14; Mk 2:23—3:6; Lk 6:1-11), and he declared, "The Son of Man is lord of the sabbath" (Mt 12:8; Mk 2:28; Lk 6:5).

2.1.3. Food Laws. A third familiar Jewish piety known widely among Gentiles, and perceived as peculiar by them, was dietary restrictions. These included abstaining from pork and other foods but also involved restrictions on appropriate *table fellowship and food preparation. The Gospels' discussion about Jesus' table fellowship revolves around these latter points of disagreement, specifically the question raised by Pharisees about eating in sacramental purity (Mt 9:10-13; Mk 2:15-17; Lk 5:29-32). Jesus followed the basic food laws consistent with general Jewish practice. Additionally, Peter declares that he has never eaten anything unclean in response to an injunction in a vision to take and eat from a selection of unclean foods (Acts 10:10-16). This suggests that while accompanying Jesus in his ministry, the disciples followed dietary proscriptions. Given that Jesus followed kosher food laws, interpreters have puzzled over Mark's conclusion that Jesus' teachings indicate that all food is clean (Mk 7:19). This bold statement should be set in the larger context of Jewish conversation about ritual and moral purity and the spiritual value of the law codes (see Clean and Unclean). Jesus makes a related argument about the function of the law and purity when criticizing the hypocrisy of the *scribes and *Pharisees by pointing to the lengthy fringe of their garments. The background to this comment is that in Palestine (we have no evidence of this outside Palestine) Jewish men wore distinctive fringe on the corners of their outer garment known as ššit (Num 15:37-38; Deut 22:12; Zech 8:23; see also LXX Num 15:37-38; Zech 8:23 [Gk. kraspedon]). Jesus speaks against the length of this fringe worn by the Pharisees (Mt 23:5), not the wearing of the fringe itself, as his cloak included fringe (Mt 9:20; 14:36; Mk 6:56; Lk 8:44). Jesus distinguishes between the ritual purity informed by the law and the moral mandates of a pure heart that resists confusing ritual for morality.

One particular contested question in Jesus' day involved whether gnats and other swarming creatures were simply forbidden to eat, or were both forbidden to eat and also caused impurity (Lev 11:20-23, 29-31, 41-44; Deut 14:19). Matthew 23:24 notes Jesus' accusation against the scribes and Pharisees that they "strain the gnat and swallow the camel" (in Aramaic, "gnat" is qalma, and "camel" is gamla). This comment reflects a wider conversation about whether touching any swarming insect makes one unclean. The Damascus Document declares all swarming insects (not simply those eight mentioned in Lev 11) as sources of impurity. It prohibits touching or eating not only those creatures that swarm on the earth, but also those that swarm in the water, including insects and larvae (CD-A XII, 12-13, 19-20). Jesus is likely referring to a practice of straining liquids to prevent any accidental ingestion of swarming creatures. The later rabbis allowed the eating of insects and larvae found in water or in fruit, and spoke against straining wine to remove such creatures (t. Ter. 7:11), demonstrating that the question of straining liquids continued into the third century A.D.

2.1.4. Ritual Bathing. Other acts of piety included ritual bathing, attending religious festivals, tithing and offering sacrifices. Jews agreed that they needed to be ritually pure in order to enter the temple and offer sacrifices. Moreover, we can demonstrate that they recognized moral impurity by noting their prayers of repentance and their sin offerings. However, they disagreed on how far the boundary of ritual purity should extend outside the temple and its cult. This disagreement was based on a further question about whether God's presence dwelt only in the temple or was also throughout the land of Israel. If the latter was true, then ritual purity of the sort necessary to enter the temple was imperative in Galilee.

Ritual baths, known as miqwā'ot (sg. miqveh) are found throughout Palestine in this period. An estimated seven hundred of them have been discovered that can be dated between the late first century B.C. and the late first century A.D. (Magness, 16). In the area south of Jerusalem about seventy ritual baths have been excavated, and about 220 ritual baths from 130 sites in the Judean area have been unearthed (Zissu and Amit, 49). The ritual baths provided a convenient source in which to wash, thereby keeping purity codes. The need for baths arose because the climate was often hot and dry, and there were few perennial water sources. Baths could be located in the basement floor of urban elite homes of Jerusalem, and outside and downhill from the rural houses in Galilee, thereby taking advantage of rainfall. They were also found near olive and wine presses, enabling easier purification for the laborers, given that fluids are more at risk of contracting impurities than solids. Community miqwā'ot were built in rural villages, along the major highways to Jerusalem, and within Jerusalem itself. Estimates range from one to seven miqwā'ot in each rural Jewish village. The Pool of Siloam (Jn 9:7) and the Pool of Bethesda (Jn 5:2) were built to handle large numbers of pilgrims. Ritual baths are also located near synagogues, raising questions about whether attendants used them directly before a synagogue service. In most cases, the miqveh was too small to accommodate the presumed size of the congregation in a pre-service ritual (Haber, 68-69). The evidence is too meager to determine whether Jesus washed before he read from the Isaiah scroll in the Nazareth synagogue (Lk 4:16-20). Scholars debate whether purity was a concern in synagogue worship (Levine, 44). If purity was not a concern, perhaps the juxtaposition of miqveh and synagogue was functional and practical, providing a service to the community that did not have the resources for private ritual baths.

2.2. Contested Practices. Jews debated the definition of “work” on the Sabbath and the practices related to table fellowship, even as they agreed on keeping the Sabbath holy, abstaining from unclean food and honoring God against idolatry.

2.2.1. Contested Interpretations of Work on the Sabbath. Divergent definitions of work on the Sabbath between Jesus and other Jewish teachers led to strong disagreements, especially concerning Jesus’ healings done on the Sabbath (Mt 12:9-14). Applying Sabbath rules varied; for example, the statement in Exodus 35:3 against lighting a fire on Sabbath was expanded by the DSS community to prohibit tending a previously lit fire (4Q421 13, 4-5) (see Magness, 86). In a second example, Jeremiah 17:22 prohibits carrying a burden out of one’s house, which is expanded by Jubilees to include moving objects within the house (Jub 2:29-30; 50:8). These debates help situate the questions raised about Jesus’ disciples gathering grain on the Sabbath (Mt 12:1-8; Mk 2:23-27; Lk 6:1-5).

2.2.2. Contested Interpretations of Fasting. It is also possible that Jesus’ defense of the disciples’ actions was intended to be heard within the context of the contemporary debate about fasting on the Sabbath. That some Jews fasted on the Sabbath is evidenced in the writings of Suetonius, wherein Augustus remarks to Tiberius, his stepson and future emperor, that he (Augustus) fasts more meticulously than do the Jews on their Sabbath (Aug. 76.2; see also Martial, Epig. 4.4). The later rabbis spoke against fasting on the Sabbath (Midr. Rab. Lam. 1.16.51; t. Ta’an. 2:6-7). The Essenes fasted only on Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement) (Magness, 96), but other Jews might have fasted weekly (Lk 18:12), perhaps on Mondays and Thursdays (Did. 8:1). Jesus is questioned about his disciples’ failure to fast according to the pattern of the Pharisees and John the Baptist’s disciples (Mk 2:18-20).

2.2.3. Contested Practice of Hand Washing. Related to ritual bathing is the practice of washing hands before meals (Petronius, Sat. 34:4). This practice has no direct biblical mandate, but two passages are pointed to as possible backdrops to the practice. First, Exodus 30:17-21 mandates that priests wash their hands (and feet) before going into the tent of meeting. Second, Psalm 24:3-4 speaks of those who can stand in God’s holy place: those with clean hands and pure hearts. In response to a question from scribes and Pharisees Jesus defends his disciples’ failure to wash their hands by arguing that such rituals do not purify (Mt 15:1-20; Mk 7:1-23). In this answer Jesus demonstrates his distinction between ritual and moral purity that extended throughout his teachings. In a related discussion about pure and impure vessels (Mt 23:25; Lk 11:39-40) Jesus argues that impurity comes from within. The Mishnah records the rabbis arguing that impurity can affect the outside of the vessel but not necessarily the inside (m. Kel. 25:4-6).

3. Common Institutions: Jerusalem Temple and the Synagogue.

The *temple in Jerusalem was the center of Jewish worship life; it was viewed as God’s house, his dwelling place. Thus, “for most [Jews], to see the Temple on earth was to come as close as they ever would to heaven” (Jaffee, 167). Festivals, sacrifices, teachings by the priests—all happened in the temple. Moreover, the Sanhedrin, the official Jewish governing body, met in the temple. Two important exceptions to this overview include the DSS community at Qumran and the Leontopolis temple in Egypt. The Qumran community distanced itself from temple worship because it believed the priesthood to be corrupt and impure (CD-A V, 6-21; VI, 15—VII, 4; 4Q396 IV, 9-11). Instead, the Qumran community believed itself to be God’s temple (1QS VIII, 4-10; 4Q164) (see Wardle, 160). A temple at Leontopolis (near Memphis, Egypt) was established in the early second century B.C. and was shut down by the Romans in the late first century A.D. Josephus has two accounts of its founding: in Jewish War it is Onias III who builds the temple (J.W. 7.420-436), and in Jewish Antiquities it is his son Onias IV (Ant. 13:62-73). Many Jews believed that the Jerusalem temple would be renewed or rebuilt by God in the next or new age (Tob 14:5; 1 En. 90:28; Jub. 1:28). Synagogues housed local assemblies of Jews, providing places of teaching, prayer and community governance. During the first century A.D., Diaspora synagogues were more numerous than synagogues in Palestine.

3.1. Jerusalem Temple. The temple provided the connection between Israel and God, as it was the place of supreme purity and holiness. In the ancient world “religion was sacrifice” (Sanders, 49), and the Jerusalem temple was the only place where Jews could make offerings to God. “The rhythms of the sacrificial seasons transformed the Temple into a kind of heart. Its beat circulated a stream of Jews throughout the body of Israel” (Jaffee, 174). Jews from the Diaspora traveled to the temple especially to celebrate festivals such as Passover/Unleavened Bread, Pentecost, Booths and Yom Kippur. Jesus’ family traveled regularly from Nazareth to Jerusalem for the Passover, and they were joined by a large group of relatives and friends (Lk 2:41-44).

Jews marveled at the temple’s beauty and magnificence. Ben Sira speaks movingly of the awe with which onlookers reacted in worship as the priests made the offering (Sir 50:16-21). He notes that as the trumpets sounded and the singers praised God, all the people fell on their faces in worship and prayer. In the OT the garments of the high priest are given special mention for their magnificence (Ex 28:1-43). Josephus (J. W. 5.231-236), Philo (Mos. 2.109-126) and Ben Sira (Sir 50:11) comment on their glory and splendor. The high priest officiated at festivals, but he did not participate in the daily sacrifices, so average Jews might not see the high priest or the chief priests. Luke describes Jewish worshipers in prayer waiting for Zechariah to finish offering incense. They are puzzled at his delay, and when he finally comes out of the sanctuary, they realize that he has seen a vision (Lk 1:8-22). This would not surprise them, for they believed God’s presence (name) was in the temple (Is 6:1-5).

Twice daily, at dawn and dusk, the tāmīd, or perpetual offering, was made, a year-old lamb (Ex 29:38-42; Num 28:3-8). It was a whole burnt offering, which meant that the priests ate none of it. This type of sacrifice was unique to Judaism; it recognized God’s bounty and the hope of God’s future blessings. The funds to make these and all the other sacrifices came for the most part through the annual half-shekel tax on all adult Jewish males (Ex 30:11-16; Neh 10:32-33). The Exodus passage seems to ask for a single payment, but it might have been understood by 2 Chronicles 24:4-10 to be a yearly payment. Jesus is questioned about paying this tax, which could reflect a conversation about the annual nature of the tax (Mt 17:24-27). Jesus’ actions in the temple (Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46; Jn 2:13-22) might have been in part a response to the establishment of an annual temple tax, which was viewed by some Jews as an expansion of the Exodus passage (4Q159). Moreover, the temple accepted only Tyrian silver coins, which were 92 percent silver, a very expensive coin. This requirement probably was a hardship for poor Jews.

The ordinary priests served in the temple on a rotating basis (1 Chron 24:1-19). There were twenty-four “watches” of men that worked for a week, twice each year, with some doing a third shift. Zechariah was from the order of Abijah (Lk 1:5), and he likely offered sacrifices as prescribed in the Torah and perhaps adjudicated legal questions and applied the legal code to questions from common Jews (VanderKam, 183). Jesus at a young age took advantage of the teaching in the temple (Lk 2:46).

The general political landscape in first-century A.D. Palestine included a strong Roman presence as well as a Herodian presence governing Galilee during the first half of the century. The *Sanhedrin acted as liaison with Rome and had much say on implementing Jewish purity laws in the temple and priesthood. The Sanhedrin could stipulate decisions between Jews on Jewish matters.

3.2. Synagogues. Synagogues dotted the landscape in Galilee, and they were far more numerous in the Diaspora. The term synagogue can refer both to a building and the community that meets in the building (similar to the English meaning of the term church as both a building and a congregation). We have little archeological evidence of first-century A.D. synagogues, but the meager remains point to a relatively undeveloped institution with little distinctive architecture. Synagogue leadership drew from the local community (Lk 13:14). Early synagogues did not have religious symbols such as a menorah, a Torah shrine or inscriptions (Levine, 39). Activities at the synagogue included weekly meetings for teaching, prayer and reading Scripture, as well as conducting community business. Luke notes Jesus reading Scripture and expounding on its meaning in the Nazareth synagogue (Lk 4:16-21). “That the fundamental religious activity in all synagogues centered around the Torah-reading liturgy is explicit in almost every type of source from the Second Temple period in Judea and in the Diaspora—in cities and in villages” (Levine, 41) (see Philo, Spec. 2.62; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.175). The synagogue meeting system had no Gentile analog; this was a unique Jewish activity in the Greco-Roman world.

See also ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB; ANTI-

SEMITISM; CLEAN AND UNCLEAN; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; ELDER; ESSENES; EXILE AND RESTORATION; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM; JOSEPHUS; LAW; MIDRASH; MOSES; PHARISEES; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS; SABBATH; SADDUCEES; SANHEDRIN; SYNAGOGUE; TARGUMS; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. G. Barclay, Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora: From Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE-117 CE) (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996); J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow, eds., Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010); S. Haber, "Common Judaism, Common Synagogue? Purity, Holiness, and Sacred Space at the Turn of the Common Era," in Common Judaism: Explorations in Second-Temple Judaism, ed. W. O. McCready and A. Reinhartz (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008) 63-77; M. S. Jaffee, Early Judaism (Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1997); J. Klawans, Purity, Sacrifice, and the Temple: Symbolism and Supersessionism in the Study of Ancient Judaism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006); L. I. Levine, "Common Judaism: The Contribution of the Ancient Synagogue," in Common Judaism: Explorations in Second-Temple Judaism, ed. W. O. McCready and A. Reinhartz (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008) 27-46; J. Magness, Stone and Dung, Oil and Spit: Jewish Daily Life in the Time of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2011); A. Moore, "The Search for the Common Judaic Understanding of God's Kingship," in Common Judaism: Explorations in Second-Temple Judaism ed. W. O. McCready and A. Reinhartz (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2008); F. J. Murphy, Early Judaism: The Exile to the Time of Jesus (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002); G. W. E. Nickelsburg and M. E. Stone, Early Judaism: Texts and Documents on Faith and Piety (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 2009); E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE-66 CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992); E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), vols. 1-3.2, rev. and ed. G. Vermes and F. Millar, trans. T. A. Burkill et al. (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1973); J. C. VanderKam, An Introduction to Early Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); T. Wardle, The Jerusalem Temple and Early Christian Identity (WUNT 2/291; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010); N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); B. Zissu and D. Amit, "Common Judaism, Common Purity, and the Second Temple Period Judean Miqwa'ot (Ritual Immersion Baths)," in Common Judaism: Explorations in Second-Temple Judaism, ed. W. O.

McCready and A. Reinhartz (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008) 47-62. L. H. Cohick

JUDGMENT

The role granted to judgment in Jesus' understanding of his mission and in his proclamation has sometimes been neglected (see Reiser, 197-205) and sometimes disputed in contemporary scholarship. J. Robinson has argued that the warnings of judgment attributed to Jesus in the Gospels do not go back to Jesus but are later additions (Robinson, 43). E. P. Sanders thinks that Jesus did expect a future judgment but gave no indication that he anticipated an impending national judgment like those that often accompanied prophetic visions of Israel's restoration (Sanders, 113-16) (see Exile and Restoration). For N. T. Wright, by contrast, virtually all of Jesus' declarations of judgment are to be understood as warnings of an imminent national judgment if *Israel fails to embrace his *kingdom vision (Wright, 182-86; 326-36). We may wonder whether any of these positions finally does justice to Jesus; in any case, few would contest the important role that the evangelists grant to judgment in their narratives.

1. Mark
2. Matthew
3. Luke
4. John
5. Jesus and Judgment

1. Mark.

The judgment motif does not often become explicit in Mark's Gospel, but its reality and importance are everywhere assumed.

1.1. Final Judgment. Since, when his mission is launched in *Galilee in the aftermath of *John the Baptist's arrest, Jesus summons his hearers to *repentance in light of the kingdom's arrival (Mk 1:14-15), it will not surprise Mark's readers to learn that judgment is a corollary of the dawning kingdom of God. The concluding echo of LXX Joel 4:13 (ET 3:13) probably suggests that this relationship between the dawning kingdom and consequent judgment is already evident at Mark 4:26-29. But the link between the kingdom of God and judgment becomes more explicit in Jesus' famous *discipleship teaching at Mark 8:34-9:1, where Jesus makes participation in the kingdom life of the age to come dependent on allegiance to him.

The threefold reference to "Gehenna" (Gk. geenna) at Mark 9:42-48 once more implies a future judgment. Originally simply a topographical name for a valley south of Jerusalem (either the "valley of the son(s) of Hinnom" [Josh 15:8; 18:16; 2 Kings 23:10] or the "valley of Hinnom," Heb. gê-hinnôm [Josh 15:8; 18:16]), in Second Temple literature this valley became associated with the place of final judgment (Sib. Or. 1:103-104; 2:292-306; 4:186; 2 Bar. 59:10; 85:13; 4 Ezra 7:36; Apoc. Ab. 15:6, cf. 1 En. 27:1-3; 54:1-6; 56:3) (see Böcher), presumably because of the evil associated with the valley (Jer 7:31-32; cf. 2 Kings 23:10; Jer 19:1-15). In each of its appearances in this pericope Gehenna is one of two destinies set before Mark's readers. The other is described as "life" in Mark 9:43, 45, and as "the kingdom of God" in Mark 9:47. Nevertheless, judgment is not reserved for the eschatological future in this Gospel.

1.2. Judgment Against the Temple. As *prophets of Israel's God, John and Jesus naturally announce the fulfillment of God's promises to Israel and summon Israel to repentance (Mk 1:14-15). While Israel's response to Jesus' *gospel of the kingdom is diverse (see Mk 4:1-9, 13-20), Israel's leaders repeatedly set themselves against Jesus and his message. As early as Mark 3:6 the *Pharisees and the *Herodians resolve to destroy him. When Jesus enters *Jerusalem and the narrative approaches its climax, the temple establishment steps to the fore and provides the principal opposition to Jesus.

For his part, Jesus announces an impending judgment against the *temple. While there is no consensus among Markan scholars about the precise significance of Jesus' demonstration in the temple (Mk 11:15-17) (see Perrin, 80-113), Mark's Jesus interprets his prophetic action by appealing to Isaiah 56 and Jeremiah 7. The latter passage is itself a prophecy of the impending destruction of the (Solomonic) temple. That Jesus cites this text to interpret his symbolic action suggests that it should likewise be understood as a prophecy of this temple's imminent destruction. What Jesus declares symbolically in his demonstration in the temple, he announces cryptically in the parable of the tenants (Mk 12:1-12) (see Brooke) and proclaims explicitly at Mark 13:2. Finally, Mark returns to this motif in his passion narrative, where Jesus' opponents ironically hint at the temple's replacement (Mk 14:57-59; 15:29), probably suggesting that for Mark, the temple is to be destroyed both as an act of judgment of Israel's God and as a sign that it is being fulfilled and replaced by an eschatological temple of God's own making (Mk 14:58).

For Mark, then, judgment is a corollary of the kingdom: it both enters this age against the temple establishment that rejected the kingdom and stands as the final prelude to entry to the kingdom in the coming age.

2. Matthew.

2.1. National Judgment. Both John the Baptist (Mt 3:2) and Jesus (Mt 4:17) confront *Israel with a call to repentance, and both warn that God's people can expect only his judgment if they reject this call (Mt 3:7-12; cf., e.g., Mt 21:28-32). John insists that this judgment will have startling implications for the people of God (Mt 3:7-10).

2.1.1. Judgment and the People of God. In John the Baptist's view, the dawning kingdom (Mt 3:2) would bring with it a judgment in which neither privileged descent (from *Abraham) nor ritual participation (*baptism) but instead only genuine repentance would offer protection (Mt 3:7-10). We meet this intersection of motifs of judgment and people of God once more at Matthew 8:5-13. In Matthew, unlike Luke, the story of a *Gentile centurion's remarkable faith becomes an occasion for Jesus to anticipate the eschatological banquet, at which "many" will "come from east and west" to dine with the patriarchs (Mt 8:11). The image of coming from east and west was a traditional one for Israel's return from exile (e.g., Ps 107:1-3; Is 43:1-7; 49:1-26; Zech 8:1-8; Bar 4:36-37; 5:5-6; Pss. Sol. 11:2; cf. LXX Deut 30:4). But by presenting the Gentile centurion as exemplary of the many who make this pilgrimage and join Israel's patriarchs in the coming kingdom (Mt 8:10-11), Jesus gives the traditional motif a surprising twist (see Olmstead 2003, 77-78; 204-5n34). Moreover, the pericope also refers to final exclusion of the "subjects of the kingdom"—in this context, Israel's sons and daughters (Mt 8:12). Neither in John's preaching nor in Jesus' do we find a replacement of Israel by the nations, but both insist that the final judgment will test faithfulness to the *God of Israel, and that faithfulness will be the defining characteristic of the people of God.

The three *parables in Matthew 21:28—22:14 offer further development of these motifs. In the trilogy's central parable, the kingdom of God is taken from the wicked tenants who reject both Yahweh's servants (Mt 21:33-36) and his son (Mt 21:37-39) and is given to an ethnos ("nation") "that produces its fruits" (Mt 21:43). Although an emerging consensus (e.g., Saldarini, 58-63) finds reference in this ethnos to a new leadership group for Israel, Matthew's wider narrative, in which the production of fruit becomes the mark of the true people of God (see Mt 3:7-10; 7:15-20; 12:33-37), suggests that something more fundamental is afoot. It is not merely the leadership, but the people, that is being reconstituted (see Olmstead 2011).

2.1.2. Judgment Invades This Age: The Temple and "This Generation." As in Mark's Gospel, Jesus announces an imminent judgment: both the temple (Mt 23:37-24:2) and “this generation” face the judgment of Israel’s God. When the prophetic woes that Jesus pronounces in Matthew 23 climax with a sober warning to “this generation” (Mt 23:36), readers of this narrative are already well acquainted with “this generation” (see Mt 11:16-19; 12:38-42, 43-45; 16:4; 17:17; 24:34) (see Lövestam). “This generation” is not to be equated with Israel; rather, it refers to Jesus’ (and John’s) contemporaries who have witnessed God’s mighty acts in his mission and have nevertheless rejected him. At Matthew 23:34-36 Jesus declares that by shedding the innocent blood of the prophets whom he commissions, the Jewish leadership will bring Israel’s rebellion to its climax and elicit the judgment of their God, a judgment that would fall upon Jesus’ unbelieving contemporaries.

The judgment against “this generation” and the temple probably are linked together again in Matthew 27, where Matthew’s “innocent blood” motif reaches its climax (Mt 27:24-26; cf. Mt 21:33-46; 23:29-36; 27:1-10, 19). There, in fateful words so terribly misunderstood in the church’s history, “all the people” accept responsibility for Jesus’ innocent blood (Mt 27:25), so both bringing his mission to completion (Mt 1:21; cf. Mt 20:28; 26:28) and eliciting God’s judgment, a judgment that would find historical expression in the siege of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple.

2.2. Final Judgment. However important the impending national judgment is in Matthew’s Gospel, its role pales in comparison to that granted the final, universal judgment. It is to this judgment that the evangelist points his readers at the conclusion of each of his major discourses (Mt 7:21-27; cf. Mt 10:40-42; 13:47-50; 18:23-35; 25:31-46).

2.2.1. Images of Final Judgment. A number of images of final judgment emerge in this Gospel. Matthew can describe the place of judgment as “outer darkness” (e.g., Mt 8:12), or as the place where “people will weep and gnash their teeth” (e.g., Mt 8:12), or, in the parables of Matthew 13, as “the furnace of fire” (Mt 13:42, 50). Elsewhere, in language more common to the Gospel tradition, those who fare poorly in the coming judgment are assigned a place in Gehenna (Mt 5:21-22)—“the Gehenna of fire,” as Matthew 5:22 has it (cf. Mt 18:8-9), the place where “both body and soul are destroyed” (Mt 10:28). That some of these images of final judgment stand in sharp contrast to others should remind interpreters that they are, indeed, images.

2.2.2. The Criterion of Judgment. Whatever the image of final judgment, however, the criterion of judgment is what one does. Nevertheless, the judgment by works that Matthew envisions offers no hint of a weighing of good versus bad to determine one’s worthiness to enter the final kingdom. Instead, because what one does both depends upon and reveals one’s identity (e.g., Mt 7:15-20; 12:33-37), the judgment of which Jesus speaks is always an assessment of what one’s life declares about allegiance to Jesus and the God of Israel (see Travis, 224-26). At the conclusion of the *Sermon on the Mount Jesus insists that entrance to the kingdom will be granted only to those who “do the will of the Father” (Mt 7:21). The parable that follows proceeds to interpret “doing the will of the Father” as “hearing Jesus’ words and doing them” (Mt 7:24); only this obedience will offer protection in the great storm of judgment that Jesus anticipates (Mt 7:24-27).

2.2.3. The Rhetorical Function of Judgment Language. In Matthew’s Gospel John and Jesus (like Israel’s prophets before them) warn of judgment as they call God’s people to repentance. If, as seems likely, Matthew writes after the fall of Jerusalem, the function of texts that refer to the imminent national judgment naturally changes. It is no longer chiefly hortatory but instead first apologetic, explaining God’s action in history, and second ecclesiological, inviting reflection upon the reconstitution of the people of God. The frequent treatments of final judgment, however, maintain their original hortatory focus. In the light of the coming judgment, these texts call Matthew’s hearers to faithful allegiance to Jesus in this age.

3. Luke.

3.1. Motifs Common to the Synoptic Tradition. Readers familiar with the warnings of judgment in the other Synoptic Gospels will find many of the same traditions in Luke. Luke employs, for example, traditional images for judgment such as fire (Lk 3:16-17), Gehenna (Lk 12:5), graphic punishment (Lk 12:42-46), banishment to the place of “weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Lk 13:28) and an assessment of stewardship (Lk 19:11-27). Like Matthew, but more emphatically, Luke insists that the future judgment will consider knowledge of the master’s will (Lk 12:47-48). As in both Matthew and Mark, judgment is based on deeds that demonstrate genuine repentance (e.g., Lk 3:7-9; 6:43-45, 46-49). And, once more, both the final, universal judgment and the national judgment of which Jesus warns turn on the reception or rejection of Jesus, Israel’s Messiah. “This generation,” which has both witnessed and dismissed God’s acts of power through Jesus, “a prophet mighty in word and deed" (Lk 24:19), will meet both a historical (Lk 11:47-51) and an eschatological judgment (Lk 11:29-32).

3.2. Judgment on Jerusalem. The Synoptic tradition is unanimous in its witness that Jesus warned his contemporaries of God's impending judgment. Nevertheless, Luke's focus upon Jerusalem in this judgment is distinctive. In a saying that only Luke records, Jesus responds to the warning of Herod's desire to kill him by repeating his resolve to go to Jerusalem, "for it is impossible that a prophet should perish outside of Jerusalem" (Lk 13:31-33 [cf. Lk 9:51]). Jesus' lament over the city that refused to embrace his mission follows immediately (Lk 13:34-35; cf. Mt 23:37-39). In another tradition unique to Luke, Jesus pauses to weep over Jerusalem as he anticipates its siege and destruction (Lk 19:41-44). Two chapters later, Jesus repeats his earlier prediction of the temple's destruction, this time including much of Mark's discourse. But where Mark refers to the "abomination of desolation," Luke writes, "When you see Jerusalem surrounded by armies, then know that its desolation has come near" (Lk 21:20). And Luke alone adds "Jerusalem will be trampled down by the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Lk 21:24). Finally, en route to his execution, Jesus warns the mourning "daughters of Jerusalem" to weep not for him but rather for themselves and their children (Lk 23:31). Having failed to recognize the visitation of God in the mission of Israel's Messiah (Lk 19:44), Jerusalem will face his judgment.

3.3. Judgment as Reversal. More than either Mark or Matthew, Luke portrays the final judgment as a time of eschatological reversal. So Luke's (less famous) beatitudes include both blessing for those who suffer now and corresponding indictment for those who know nothing of present suffering (Lk 6:20-26). The kingdom of God ushered in by the final judgment will reverse the oppression of God's faithful people, as the parable of *Lazarus and the rich man strikingly illustrates (Lk 16:19-31). In light of this future reversal, Jesus urges his hearers to care for the poor and needy (e.g., Lk 12:33), who have become the objects of his mission (e.g., Lk 4:18-19); in return, he promises reward at the resurrection of the righteous (e.g., Lk 14:14). Indeed, "whoever exalts himself will be humbled, and whoever humbles himself will be exalted" (Lk 18:14; cf. Lk 14:11; see also Lk 1:46-55; Lk 2:34).

4. John.

4.1. Judgment and the Son. As we have seen, in the Synoptics the criterion by which people are judged is their deeds, but this criterion is nevertheless implicitly christological. As is often the case, what is (usually) implicit in the Synoptics becomes explicit in John. In the Fourth Gospel the criterion of judgment is simply *faith in the Son. This point is made repeatedly, but perhaps nowhere more sharply than in John 3: "The one who believes in him is not condemned, but the one who does not believe is already condemned" (Jn 3:18; cf. Jn 3:36).

Not only is the criterion of judgment one's response to the Son; the Son is himself the judge. In John 5:19-30 Jesus argues that because of the Father's loving self-revelation, the Son does "whatever" the Father does (Jn 5:20) (on John's christological monotheism, see Bauckham, 18-59). This "whatever" includes exercising judgment. In fact, Jesus insists that the Father judges no one, but rather has entrusted all judgment to the Son "because he is the Son of Man" (Jn 5:22, 27 [cf. Dan 7:13-14]). This does not mean, however, that the Son's mission is judgment. Although appointed judge and commissioned to a work that would reveal human allegiances and so elicit judgment (Jn 3:19-21), the Son's fundamental mission is not judicial but salvific (Jn 3:17; cf. Jn 12:47-50).

4.2. Judgment and Eschatology. If John's depiction of judgment gives readers a window into his Christology, it offers an equally clear glimpse of his eschatology. Well known for its realized eschatology, this Gospel simply declares, "The one who believes in the Son has life eternal" (Jn 3:36). Not only the life, but also the judgment of the age to come, enters this age: "The one who does not believe is already condemned" (Jn 3:18). It is not the case, however, that realized eschatology swallows up all future elements in John's eschatology. John 5:24-29 is especially instructive at this point. The paragraph opens with two classically Johannine expressions of realized eschatology (Jn 5:24-25). But Jesus continues in John 5:28-29 with a potent declaration of the future, universal resurrection to life or condemnation. For John, judgment, like life eternal, is both a present experience and a future expectation.

4.3. The Trial of Jesus and the Judgment of the World. Each of the canonical Gospels offers a carefully constructed *passion narrative in which the *trial of Jesus features prominently. John's Gospel devotes particular attention to Jesus' trial before Pilate. As Pilate sits on the judgment seat (Jn 19:13), weighing the charge brought against Jesus—he set himself up against Caesar as a rival king (Jn 19:12; cf. Jn 18:33-40; 19:1-3, 14-15, 19-22)—John's readers recall that a series of characters is complicit in this judgment (Jn 18:1-14; cf. Jn 13:2, 21-30; 18:35; 19:16). But John's readers also recall that as the world unites in judgment against the innocent Jesus, it pronounces a second guilty verdict, this one a self-indictment. Earlier in John's narrative Jesus announces the arrival of the "hour" that had been on the horizon since the early scenes of the Gospel (Jn 12:23; cf. Jn 2:4; 7:31; 8:20). It is the hour of his "glorification" (Jn 12:23), the hour of his "exaltation" on a Roman instrument of execution (Jn 12:32; cf. Jn 3:14; 8:28). Of this hour Jesus says, "Now is the judgment of this world; now will the ruler of this world be cast out" (Jn 12:31 [cf. Jn 16:8-11]). John's Gospel underlines this paradox, that even as "this *world" pronounces judgment on Jesus and hangs him on a cross, it seals its own judgment and the expulsion of its ruler. At the same time, at the cross Jesus "draws all people to himself" (Jn 12:32). Probably John means both that the cross is God's means of conquest and that those who reject Jesus' mission, which culminates at the cross, thereby reject his provision of life. The trial of Jesus turns out to be the trial, and indictment, of the world.

5. Jesus and Judgment.

However uncomfortable the notion seems to contemporary Western readers of the Gospels, there is little doubt that Jesus both assumed and taught the reality of divine judgment. Not only is it the case that each of the evangelists bears witness to this, but also declarations of impending judgment are found in every layer of the Gospel tradition (see Reiser, 302-4). None of this, however, should surprise us. Jesus was heir to Israel's sacred traditions in which Yahweh is judge, both of Israel (e.g., Ps 50:1-7; Is 65:1-25) and of the world (e.g., Pss 9:1-8; 96:10-13; 98:8-9; Is 66:13-24).

In Israel's sacred writings Yahweh's judgment is often linked both to his covenant with his people (e.g., Deut 28-30; Hos 11:1-7) and to the establishment of his universal kingship (e.g., Pss 96:10-13; 98:6-9). Both of these motifs find echoes in the Jesus tradition. Jesus comes to Israel announcing the dawn of the long-anticipated reign of Yahweh (Mk 1:14-15), and his call to repentance (Mk 1:15b) is tightly tied to the establishment of that kingdom. Although Jesus apparently did not agree with John the Baptist in every particular (especially with respect to the timing of this judgment [Mt 3:7-12; cf. Mt 11:2-6; 13:24-30, 36-43]), we have no indication that he disagreed with John that the rejection of Yahweh's establishment of the kingdom would elicit judgment. On the contrary, he repeatedly affirmed this. Here, on the one hand, John and Jesus simply fall in line with Israel's prophets as they announce the inevitable judgment that awaits the people if they fail to turn to their God and, on the other hand, go beyond them in announcing that the climactic moment in Yahweh's history with Israel has arrived.

An heir to Israel's traditions of judgment, Jesus nevertheless developed them creatively (see Bryan). Convinced that Yahweh was at work in his own mission to restore Israel, Jesus understood Israel's response to him to be the criterion of judgment. This is true both of the national judgment of which Jesus warns and of the final, universal judgment. Not surprisingly, then, language about the coming judgment becomes simultaneously language about the true people of God. The final judgment would reveal a people of God defined by response to Jesus himself.

See also APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING; BLESSING AND WOE; ESCHATOLOGY; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison Jr., "The Problem of Gehenna," in Resurrecting Jesus: The Earliest Christian Tradition and Its Interpreters (London: T & T Clark, 2005) 56-110; R. Bauckham, Jesus and the God of Israel: "God Crucified" and Other Studies on the New Testament's Christology of Divine Identity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); O. Böcher, "ἡ ἐκείνη," EDNT 1:239-40; G. J. Brooke, "4Q500 1 and the Use of Scripture in the Parable of the Vineyard," DSD 2 (1995) 268-94; S. M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions of Judgement and Restoration (SNTSMS 117; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); E. Lövestam, Jesus and "This Generation": A New Testament Study (ConBNT 25; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1995); W. G. Olmstead, Matthew's Trilogy of Parables: The Nation, the Nations and the Reader in Matthew 21.28-22.14 (SNTSMS 127; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003); idem, "A Gospel for a New Nation: Once More, the ἔθνος of Matthew 21.43," in Jesus, Matthew's Gospel, and Early Christianity: Studies in Memory of Graham N. Stanton, ed. J. Willits, R. A. Burrige and D. M. Gurtner (LNTS 435; London: T & T Clark, 2011) 115-32; N. Perrin, Jesus the Temple (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); M. Reiser, Jesus and Judgment: The Eschatological Proclamation in Its Jewish Context, trans. L. M. Maloney (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997); J. M. Robinson, "The Critical Edition of Q and the Study of Jesus," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann (BETL 158; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001) 27-52; A. J. Saldarini, Matthew's

Christian-Jewish Community (CSHJ; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); S. H. Travis, Christ and the Judgement of God: The Limits of Divine Retribution in New Testament Thought (2nd ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2008); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996). W. G. Olmstead

JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS

The concepts of justice and righteousness are prominent in the OT for describing both divine and human activity. So it is not surprising that the Gospels draw upon them to narrate Jesus' life and teachings. Although these concepts are evident beyond the use of particular terms, justice is often expressed by the words krisis and dikaïosynē (and ekdikeō in Luke). The concept of righteousness is typically communicated with some form of the dikaio- root (adjective dikaïos; noun dikaïosynē). Given that justice and righteousness emerge most prominently in Jesus' teachings in the Synoptics, Matthew and Luke feature the themes more than Mark and John do (e.g., dikaïos/ynē: Matthew 24x; Luke 12x; Mark 2x; Jn 5x).

1. Backgrounds for Justice and Righteousness Concepts
2. The Concepts of Justice and Righteousness in the Gospels

1. Backgrounds for Justice and Righteousness Concepts.

The concepts of justice and righteousness are important ones in the context of Judaism and the broader Greco-Roman world of the first century A.D. There is a certain amount of overlap from these vantage points, but the concepts have a decidedly covenantal framing in their Jewish setting.

1.1. Justice and Righteousness in the Greco-Roman World. Justice (dikaïosynē) is an important concept in Greco-Roman philosophical discourse. In The Republic Plato refers to dikaïosynē as the cornerstone of the city-state. Justice, in turn, consists of three foundational virtues: self-control, courage and wisdom. Aristotle, Plato's student, understands justice (dikaïosynē) as both a general virtue and the specific virtue of fairness or equity (e.g., Eth. nic. 5.1) (Thom, 319-24). As a general virtue, Aristotle acknowledges justice as a relational concept, which provides "the norm for all [behavior] and for all relationships" (Thom, 320). In its particular form, justice is about equity and involves its preservation and restoration.

This broader conceptual backdrop establishes (1) the importance of the concept of justice in the first-century A.D. world; (2) the flexibility of dikaïosynē to indicate the concept of righteousness (as behavioral norm) or justice (as equity).

1.2. Justice and Righteousness in Jewish Understanding. The themes of righteousness and justice in the OT are often associated with the šedeq-word group (šedeq, šēdāqā), along with mišpāṭ ("judgment" or "justice," among other possible denotations [HALOT 452]). The terms šedeq and šēdāqā, which often refer to a behavioral norm—divine or human—can have a covenantal, and so relational, cast to them (HALOT 1005; Voth, 328). Noting this common facet of the language helps to avoid framing the concept of righteousness in simply binary terms, as either legal norm or divine gift, which is a tendency in some discussions (Przybylski). By means of šedeq/šēdāqā, God can be described as righteous—that is, faithful to Israel (e.g., Deut 32:4)—and as one who exercises righteousness in relation to all peoples (e.g., Jer 9:24 [MT 9:23]). Correspondingly, people are often described as righteous when they put their trust in God and obey God's laws (e.g., Ps 37:12; Is 26:2-3, 7-10, contrasting "the wicked"). As in Psalm 5:8, for example, righteousness "springs from the relationship between Yahweh and his people, from his leading . . . them and their following him" (Riches, 196 [for a covenantal viewpoint from Qumran, see Kampen, 486]). So šedeq/šēdāqā may be used to denote right behavior in line with a communal standard of behavior (NIDOTTE 750; see Przybylski, 10-11) and frequently, especially in the Psalms and the Prophets, to emphasize human covenant faithfulness to God and other people (i.e., obedience, justice [e.g., Ps 7:8 [MT 7:9]] or God's covenant faithfulness to Israel (i.e., deliverance [e.g., Ps 51:14 (MT 51:16)]).

In Isaiah an important intertextual backdrop for the Gospels, šedeq/šēdāqā is often used to describe God's activity, with the accent falling on divine actions that bring "eschatological salvation and vindication for God's people" (Hagner, 112) (e.g., Is 51:5; 59:9; 63:1). As such, these occurrences can be understood in line with God's faithfulness to promises made to Israel to bring restoration and deliverance. And, as J. Olley notes, the LXX translator of Isaiah uses dikaïosynē (rendering šēdāqā) to reflect the concept of God's salvation for Israel as "justice" (Olley, 126).

Justice in the OT also falls within a covenantal framework, with mišpāṭ, and at times šedeq/šēdāqā, communicating this theme. "Both concepts [in Ps 97:2] express YHWH's ordering relationship to the world" (Hossfeld and Zenger, 474). Justice is at times expressed by a hendiadys of šedeq and mišpāṭ (e.g., Gen 18:19; 2 Sam 8:15; Ps 97:2; Is 9:7 [MT 9:6]; Jer 22:15) (see Voth, 328). Additionally, šedeq/šēdāqā and mišpāt often occur in structural parallelism with each other, indicating that they may be used more or less synonymously. For example, Amos 5:24 reads, “Justice must roll down like a river, and righteousness like a stream of water that never stops” (cf. Is 1:21; 5:7; 28:17; Amos 6:12).

2. The Concepts of Justice and Righteousness in the Gospels.

2.1. Matthew. The themes of righteousness and justice in Matthew are signaled primarily by the following terms: krisis and dikaïosynē for “justice” (BDAG 247) and, for “righteousness,” dikaïosynē and dikaïos, along with phrases such as “doing God’s will” and “producing fruit” (on the verb dikaioō, which usually denotes vindication, see 2.3.1 below).

There has been significant discussion of dikaïosynē in Matthew, given its sevenfold occurrence (cf. Mark 10; Luke 11; John 21) and its clearly redactional use in each case. It is often argued that all seven uses of dikaïosynē have the same sense (e.g., Przybylski; Kampen; for a review of positions, see Hagner, 107–10). Nevertheless, it is more likely that Matthew draws on a range of its possible senses (Hagner, 119; Reumann, 125–26). If Matthew’s use of dikaïosynē is best understood in light of šedeq/šēdāqā in the OT (see 1.2 above), then dikaïosynē may at one point highlight *God’s covenantal obligation or loyalty (e.g., Mt 6:33) and, at another, reflect human covenantal response (e.g., Mt 5:20; 6:1). Such a reading avoids a binary frame that relegates dikaïosynē to either “gift” or “demand,” a common dichotomy drawn more from Reformation debates than Matthean evidence (Riches, 195).

2.1.1. Righteousness in Matthew. Matthew highlights the concept of righteousness and relates it primarily to his emphasis on the *law. Jesus, as the fulfillment of the Torah (Mt 5:17), calls his disciples to covenant faithfulness—that is, Torah obedience (e.g., Mt 5:18–20). Foundationally, for Matthew, God proves faithful to covenant promises made to Israel and so demonstrates covenant righteousness in the Messiah.

God’s own righteousness is communicated in two uses of dikaïosynē that occur in relation to *John the Baptist. Jesus’ speaks of the purpose of his own *baptism by John “to fulfill all dikaïosynē” (Mt 3:15). Here dikaïosynē can hardly refer to Jesus’ own adherence to the law; baptism was not such a requirement. Instead, given the promises to Israel from Isaiah 40 (with Is 40:3 quoted in Mt 3:3), it is likely that dikaïosynē refers to God’s covenant faithfulness to promises of restoration begun in the ministries of John and Jesus (Meier, 225; Hagner, 116). Similarly, John’s “way of righteousness” (Mt 21:32) probably evokes the “way of the Lord” from Matthew 3:3 and so “suggests a salvation history sense” (Reumann, 133). Matthew 6:33 also references divine righteousness: “seek first . . . [God’s] righteousness.” The coupling of dikaïosynē with “kingdom” supports understanding this occurrence similarly to Matthew 3:15, referring to God’s covenantal loyalty to promises made. D. Hagner understands God’s righteousness here as virtually equivalent to the preceding phrase, “*kingdom of God” (Hagner, 114). To seek first God’s dikaïosynē is to seek first the kingdom and its values.

Righteousness as Torah faithfulness is a theme that introduces the body of the *Sermon on the Mount: Jesus has come to fulfill the law and the prophets, and followers of Jesus must have a righteousness (dikaïosynē) that surpasses even that of *scribes and *Pharisees (Mt 5:17, 20). Here, the term dikaïosynē “designates the Jewish way of life developed for the followers of Jesus” (Kampen, 485). This standard of covenantal obedience is illustrated in the six subsequent comparisons (Mt 5:21–48 [traditionally called “antitheses”]), in which Jesus provides an intensification of an OT command in accordance with the Jewish interpretive practice of making a fence around the Torah (e.g., m. ’Abot 1:1). Central to Jesus’ interpretation is his understanding of the Torah through the lens of its central values of mercy, justice and faithfulness (Mt 9:13; 12:7; 23:23) (see Snodgrass). Additionally, practicing righteousness (dikaïosynē [Mt 6:1]) involves covenant actions of almsgiving, *prayer and *fasting, which should be done for God’s approbation and not for human attention and honor (Mt 6:1–18).

Matthew also communicates that covenant righteousness should typify Jesus’ followers by highlighting the motifs of doing God’s will (Mt 7:16–23; 12:48–50), bearing good fruit (Mt 7:16–20; 12:33–37; 21:43) and putting into practice Jesus’ teachings (Mt 7:24–27; 28:20). Matthew reinforces the theme of righteousness by referencing the category of “the righteous” (e.g., Mt 25:37), sometimes paired with “the prophets” (Mt 10:41; 13:17; 23:29) or in contrast to “the wicked” (adikos [e.g., Mt 5:45; 13:49]) (on an ironic use of dikaïos at Mt 9:13, see on Mk 2:17 in 2.2 below).

Additionally, Matthew presents various characters in his narrative as “righteous” (dikaïos), with emphasis on their covenantal obedience. Joseph is referred to as “righteous,” although the exact connotation is ambiguous (Mt 1:19). Some suggest that

Joseph is righteous because he plans to divorce Mary: "Because he was righteous . . . he intended to divorce her" (for the virtual requirement to divorce in this case, see Keener, 91). Others connect Joseph's righteousness to his merciful concern to avoid disgracing Mary by divorcing her "privately" (the adverb introduces the Greek clause and so receives emphasis). The latter is more likely, given Matthew's choice to join justice and mercy together elsewhere (Mt 23:23) (see Hinkle Edin). Abel is also referred to as "righteous" (dikaïos) in an indictment of those of Jesus' contemporaries who would shed innocent (dikaïos) blood like that of all the scriptural martyrs, from Abel to Zachariah (Brown, 51-52). This indictment foreshadows Jesus' own innocent death, and, not surprisingly, at least one character in the narrative, Pilate's wife, explicitly identifies Jesus as dikaïos (Mt 27:19 ["righteous" or "innocent"] cf. Mt 27:4).

2.1.2. Justice in Matthew. Matthew highlights the theme of justice at key moments, especially in relation to God's coming reign in Jesus. In Jesus' first "sermon" he announces blessings on those experiencing the arrival of God's kingdom (Mt 5:3-10). The two uses of dikaïosynē in the Beatitudes are typically understood as referring to human obedience; that is, God's eschatological blessings are announced for those "who hunger and thirst for [personal] righteousness" and "who are persecuted because of [their] righteousness" (Mt 5:6, 10).

Yet, the Beatitudes themselves suggest an alternate reading. Specifically, those who long deeply for justice (dikaïosynē) because it has been denied them will receive it (Mt 5:6) (Hagner, 112; Brown and Roberts). And people persecuted because they stand in solidarity with those denied justice also experience God's blessings (Mt 5:10). In the first case (Mt 5:6), people who are "starved for justice" are pronounced blessed (Powell, 468). This reading fits better the first four beatitudes, which paradoxically announce blessing on the spiritually destitute, the grieving and the lowest in status (Mt 5:3-5). The final four beatitudes (Mt 5:6-10) announce blessing on those who show solidarity with the destitute: those who practice mercy, integrity, peace and justice toward people in need will also receive God's blessing (Powell).

Matthew highlights justice at another important juncture. To summarize Jesus' entire Galilean ministry, Matthew draws on Isaiah 42:1-4 (Mt 12:18-21). Justice (krisis) is central to the citation, indicating that Jesus' ministry involves the proclamation and enactment of justice (Mt 12:18, 20). Thus, Jesus' own ministry of bringing God's promised justice to the Israel and the nations (Mt 12:18) is consonant with Jesus' expectation that his followers pursue and enact justice (Mt 6:10). This expectation is reemphasized at Matthew 23:23, where Jesus critiques scribes and Pharisees for ignoring the weightier matters of the Torah: justice (krisis), *mercy (eleos), faithfulness (pistis) (cf. Mic 6:8). The final teaching of Jesus in Matthew is set in the context of eschatological *judgment (Mt 25:31-46). The criterion of judgment in this parabolic scene is deeds done for "the least of these" (Mt 25:40, 45)—actions rightly understood as embodying justice and mercy (Via, 84).

2.2. Mark. Mark's Gospel gives little explicit attention to the themes of justice and righteousness. In addition to Herod's description of John the Baptist as "a righteous and holy man" (Mk 6:20 [with dikaïos and hagios being in part mutually defining]), specific language appears only at Mark 2:17. In Mark 2:13-17 Jesus visits the home of Levi, a tax collector and newly minted disciple. When "scribes from the sect of the Pharisees" see Jesus eating with "tax collectors and sinners" (Mk 2:16), Jesus responds to their concern with this aphorism: "The healthy do not need a doctor; the sick do. I came not to call the righteous but sinners" (Mk 2:17) (see Sin, Sinner). This saying provides Jesus' rationale for associating closely with "sinners," those whom the Pharisees consider lax on Torah adherence, but it does more. The aphorism is very likely an indictment of the latter group, given that their own adherence to the Torah is called into question in Mark 7:8-9, where Jesus accuses Pharisees of neglecting the commands of God in their desire to keep human traditions. So the term "righteous" at Mark 2:17 is "used ironically of those who thought themselves respectable before God" (Reumann, 23).

The concept of righteousness is implied in the identification of those doing God's will as Jesus' family (Mk 3:31-35), with Jesus modeling obedience to God's will (Mk 14:32-42). And although krisis is not used in Mark, the theme of (in)justice appears in Jesus' indictment of scribes who practice ostentatious piety yet "devour the houses of widows," who should secure their compassion (Mk 12:38-40; cf. Deut 14:28-29).

2.3. Luke.

2.3.1. Righteousness in Luke. Luke frequently draws on the adjective dikaïos in his Gospel to express loyalty to God's ways and commandments, in concert with OT covenantal understandings (see 1.2 above). This is most explicit at Luke 1:6, where dikaïos occurs in apposition to "walking blamelessly in all the commands and regulations [dikaïōma] of the Lord." It is also clear in the pairing of dikaïos with "devout" (eulabēs [Lk 2:25]) and "good" (agathos [Lk 23:50]), as well as dikaioō with “piety” (hosiotēs [Lk 1:75, which has Luke’s sole use of dikaioō]). Finally, dikaioō is defined in contrast to disobedience (Lk 1:17).

At times, Luke uses the plural of dikaioō generically to refer to “the righteous” (Lk 1:17; 14:14) in similar fashion and in direct contrast to his use of “evildoers” (adikos, adikia [Lk 13:27; 18:11]). The evangelist also portrays various characters in his narrative as “righteous:” Zechariah, Elizabeth, Simeon and Joseph from Arimathea are described as dikaioō and are exemplary for Luke’s reader (Lk 1:6; 2:25; 23:50). Additionally, Luke, like Matthew, can express the expectation for righteousness or covenantal obedience through the imagery of bearing fruit (Lk 3:8-9; 6:43-45; 13:6-9) as well as references to putting into practice God’s word (Lk 8:19-21) and Jesus’ teachings (Lk 6:46-49). Jesus himself is described as dikaioō in Luke. At the moment of Jesus’ death, a centurion exclaims, “Surely this man was righteous!” (Lk 23:47 [cf. Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14]). Here dikaioō may denote innocence specifically (Bock, 2:1863). Alternately (or additionally), the identification of Jesus as dikaioō may allude to LXX Isaiah 53:11, where God’s righteous servant justifies many through suffering (Green, 827) (see Servant of Yahweh).

Luke also uses dikaioō ironically to speak about Jesus’ ministry to sinners, not “the righteous” (Lk 5:32 [as in Mk 2:17; Mt 9:13]). In Luke the aphorism “I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance” gains particularity by the preceding call of Simon, self-identified as a “sinner” (harmartōlos [Lk 5:8]). To this Synoptic saying Luke adds “repentance,” a theme in his Gospel. Ironical use of dikaioō continues at Luke 15:7: “There will be more joy in heaven over one sinner who repents than over ninety-nine righteous who have no need of repentance.” In both passages sinners and the righteous are “represented in parodic ways—the former as repentant, the latter as unaware of their need for good news” (Green, 575). The delusion of those oblivious to their need recurs in Jesus’ parable of the tax collector and Pharisee, spoken to “some who were convinced that they were righteous and looked with contempt on everyone else” (Lk 18:9).

The verb dikaioō indicates proving oneself or others right—that is, vindication (Lk 7:29, 35 [similarly, Mt 11:19; 12:37]). Luke narrates unsuccessful attempts to justify oneself by a lawyer and by Pharisees (Lk 10:29; 16:15). Although these uses do not directly connect to Lukan themes of righteousness or justice, dikaioō at Luke 18:14 may be applicable. Jesus concludes the parable of the Pharisee and tax collector by saying that the latter rather than former went home “justified.” Some have argued that here Luke approaches a Pauline usage of justification (righteousness). But it is more likely that dikaioō refers to God’s acceptance of the tax collector’s prayer for mercy; that is, it found favor with God (Bock, 2:1465).

2.3.2. Justice in Luke. The theme of justice in Luke can be traced through a combination of specific language (krisis and ekdikeō), narrative attention to covenantal responsibilities among people, especially where power differentials exist, and indication that the arrival of the kingdom of God brings justice.

In a woe directed at Pharisees Jesus warns of judgment because they “neglect justice [krisis] and love for God” (Lk 11:42). Justice is a centerpiece of Jesus’ parable of the persistent widow and the unjust (adikia) judge (Lk 18:1-8). A widow pleads for justice (ekdikeō) in a contested matter with an adversary. Although not interested in doing the just thing, the judge grows tired of her repeated requests and decides to give her justice (Lk 18:6). Jesus applies the parable to God’s chosen people, whose continual cries for justice will be heard and answered (Lk 18:7-8). B. Reid suggests that the widow, as the parable’s figure who acts most like God, is exemplary for believers in their “unflagging efforts” to accomplish justice (Reid, 32).

Attention to justice in Luke’s narrative also occurs at points where people are called to address injustice. In response to the preaching of John the Baptist, the crowds ask what they should do to evince the fruit of repentance (Lk 3:8, 10). John tells them to share a spare shirt with the person who has none. In response to tax collectors who ask the same, John restricts them to collecting only what is owed, and no more. Addressing soldiers, John prohibits extortion and blackmail (Lk 3:12-14). Later, Jesus warns against scribes who pursue human honor while practicing injustice by “devour[ing] the houses of widows” (Lk 20:45-47).

Finally, Luke’s vision of God’s reign includes justice as a central value and action. As Mary’s song announces, injustices that have left God’s people hungry and destitute will be reversed, so that “the hungry [are filled] with good things,” while the rich go away empty handed (Lk 1:53 [for other reversals of injustice, see Lk 6:20-26; 16:19-31]) (see Zorilla). Zechariah’s hymn speaks of the tender mercies of the covenant-keeping God, whose messianic light will “guide our feet in the way of peace” (Lk 1:79). J. Green notes that “the way of peace” is “a cipher for lives marked by shalom, peace and justice, within the community of God’s reign” (Green, 119).

2.4. John. Justice and righteousness are not prominent Johannine themes. The few occurrences of the dikaio- word group focus on Jesus' rightness in judgment and his vindication as the Messiah (the lone exception is *dikaio*s in Jesus' prayer addressing God as "righteous Father" [Jn 17:25]). The vindication motif fits the law court setting of John, in which the world rejecting Jesus is "put on trial" before God (Lincoln).

Jesus describes the prerogative given him to judge by the Father (Jn 5:22, 27) and speaks of his "judgment" (krisis) as "right" (*dikaio*s) (Jn 5:30 [cf. Jn 7:24]). In John 7:18 Jesus obliquely refers to himself as a "person of truth" (alēthēs) with no "unrighteousness" (adikia). This portrayal predisposes the reader to understand the two uses of *dikaio*synē in John 16 to refer to Jesus.

John 16:8-11 focuses on the "advocate" (paraklētos), who "will convict the world about sin, about righteousness [*dikaio*synē], and about judgment [krisis]" (Jn 16:8). John 16:10 expands on *dikaio*synē: "concerning righteousness because I am going to the Father and you will no longer see me." Although it is possible that *dikaio*synē refers to human righteousness (Lindars; Aloisi), the previous references (Jn 5:30; 7:18) and the lawsuit context suggest that Jesus' *dikaio*synē—his vindication—is in view (O'Day, 772). "[John] tells the story of Jesus in such a way that it is precisely in his death that Jesus' witness is vindicated" (Lincoln, 34). The reference to Jesus' departure to the Father is a reference to his glorification and so his vindication (Jn 13:31-33), what A. Lincoln calls "the divine seal of approval on his death" (Lincoln, 119). In spite of appearances, Jesus' departure from this world at his death is proof of the authenticity of his claims and identity.

See also GOD; JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; LAW; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Aloisi, "The Paraclete's Ministry of Conviction: Another Look at John 16:8-11," JETS 47 (2004) 55-69; D. L. Bock, Luke (2 vols.; BECNT 3; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994); J. K. Brown, "Genesis in Matthew's Gospel," in Genesis in the New Testament, ed. M. J. J. Menken and S. Moyise (LNTS 466; New York: T & T Clark, 2012) 42-59; J. K. Brown and K. A. Roberts, Matthew (THNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, forthcoming); J. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); D. A. Hagner, "Righteousness in Matthew's Theology," in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church: Essays in Honour of Ralph P. Martin, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (JSNTSup 87; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992) 101-20; M. Hinkle Edin, "Learning What Righteousness Means: Hosea 6:6 and the Ethic of Mercy in Matthew's Gospel," WW 18 (1998) 355-63; F.-L. Hossfeld and E. Zenger, Psalms 2: A Commentary on Psalms 51-100, trans. L. M. Maloney, ed. K. Baltzer (Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); J. Kampen, "Righteousness' in Matthew and the Legal Texts from Qumran," in Legal Texts and Legal Issues: Proceedings of the Second Meeting of the International Organization for Qumran Studies, Cambridge, 1995; Published in Honour of Joseph M. Baumgarten (STDJ 23; Leiden: Brill, 1997) 461-87; C. S. Keener, A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); A. T. Lincoln, Truth on Trial: The Lawsuit Motif in the Fourth Gospel (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2000); B. Lindars, "ΔΙΚΑΙΟΣΥΝΗ in Jn 16.8 and 10," in Mélanges bibliques en hommage au R. P. Béda Rigaux, ed. B. Rigaux, A.-L. Descamps and A. de Halleux (Gembloux: Duculot, 1970) 275-85; J. P. Meier, Matthew (NTMes; Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1980); G. R. O'Day, "John," NIB 9:493-865; J. W. Olley, "Righteousness" in the Septuagint of Isaiah: A Contextual Study (SBLSCS 8; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1979); M. A. Powell, "Matthew's Beatitudes: Reversals and Rewards of the Kingdom," CBQ 58 (1996) 460-79; B. Przybylski, Righteousness in Matthew and His World of Thought (SNTSMS 41; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980); B. E. Reid, "A Godly Widow Persistently Pursuing Justice: Luke 18:1-8," BR 45 (2000) 25-33; J. Reumann, "Righteousness" in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); J. K. Riches, Conflicting Mythologies: Identity Formation in the Gospels of Mark and Matthew (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2000); K. Snodgrass, "Matthew and the Law," in Treasures New and Old: Recent Contributions to Matthean Studies, ed. D. R. Bauer and M. A. Powell (SBLSymS 1; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996) 99-127; J. C. Thom, "Justice in the Sermon on the Mount: An Aristotelian Reading," NovT 51 (2009) 314-38; D. O. Via Jr., "Ethical Responsibility and Human Wholeness in Matthew 25:31-46," HTR 80 (1987) 79-100; S. M. Voth, "Justice and/or Righteousness: A Contextualized Analysis of ḥēdeq in the KJV (English) and RVR (Spanish)," in The Challenge of Bible Translation, ed. G. G. Scorgie, M. L. Strauss and S. M. Voth (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2003) 321-45; W. T. Wilson, "A Third Form of Righteousness: The Theme and Contribution of Matthew 6.19-7.12 in the Sermon on the Mount," NTS 53 (2007) 303-24; C. H. Zorilla, "The Magnificat: Song of Justice," in Conflict and Context: Hermeneutics and the Americas, ed. M. L. Branson and C. R. Padilla (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986) 220-37.

J. K. Brown

K

KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN

According to the Synoptic Gospels, proclamation of the kingdom of God, in word and deed, was central to Jesus' mission.

1. The Kingdom of God in Context
2. The Kingdom of God/Heaven in Matthew
3. The Kingdom of God in Mark
4. The Kingdom of God in Luke
5. The Kingdom of God in John

1. The Kingdom of God in Context.

1.1. Initial Linguistic Considerations. The term basileia ("kingdom, reign, rule, domain") is used 126 times in the four NT Gospels (Matthew 55x; Mark 20x; Luke 46x [plus Acts 8x]; John 5x). The vast majority of these have to do with the kingdom of God/heaven, though reference can also be made to the world's or the devil's kingdom(s) (Mt 4:8; 12:25-26; 24:7; Mk 3:24; 13:8; Lk 4:5; 11:17-18; 21:10) or to Herod's kingdom (Mk 6:23). The Gospels assume a basic equivalence among related expressions—for example, the kingdom, kingdom of God, kingdom of heaven (see further 2 below), kingdom of the Father, kingdom of Jesus, and kingdom of the *Son of Man.

Statistically, what happens most frequently with respect to God's kingdom is that it is entered (Mt 5:20; 7:21; 8:11; 19:23, 24; 21:31; 25:34; Mk 9:47; 10:23, 24, 25; Lk 18:17, 24, 25; Jn 3:5; cf. Mt 11:12; Luke 16:16 [forcibly entered]), with the result that people can be in (Mt 5:19; 11:11; 13:43; 18:1, 4; 20:21; 26:29; Mk 14:25; Lk 7:28; 13:28, 29; 14:15; 22:16; 22:30), not far from (Mk 12:34) or out of the kingdom (Mt 23:13). The second most pervasive usage identifies the kingdom as a message that can be proclaimed (Mt 4:23; 9:35; 10:7; 13:19; 24:14; Lk 4:43; 8:1; 9:2, 11, 60; 10:9, 11). The kingdom also appears as an object that can be desired (Mt 6:33; Lk 12:31) or anticipated (Mk 15:43; Lk 23:51). The kingdom is a possession (Mt 5:3, 10; 19:14; Mk 10:14; Lk 6:20; 18:16) or gift (Lk 12:32) that one can receive (Mk 10:15; Lk 18:17); it can be granted (Lk 22:29) or inherited (Matt 8:12; 25:34); or it can be taken from someone (Mt 21:43). One can become a *disciple for the kingdom (Mt 13:52), receive the keys to the kingdom (Mt 16:19) or suffer on account of the kingdom (Mt 19:12; Lk 18:29). The kingdom is mysterious (Mt 13:11; Mk 4:11; Lk 8:10), so it must be explained in parabolic terms; for example, it grows (Mt 13:24, 31; Mk 4:26, 30; Lk 13:18), permeates (Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20), can be found and purchased (Mt 13:44, 45); it involves sifting (Mt 13:47), the settling of accounts (Mt 18:23; 20:1), preparation (Mt 22:2; 23:1; cf. Lk 9:62) (see Parables). The kingdom also appears sometimes as the subject of verbs; thus, the kingdom comes, draws near, has come upon people, is among people and appears (Mt 3:2; 4:17; 6:10; 10:7; 12:28; 16:28; Mk 1:15; 9:1; 11:10; Lk 10:9-11; 11:2, 20; 17:20; 19:11; 21:31; 22:18; 23:42).

From this initial syntactical foray, we observe immediately that the kingdom of God, a central concern of the Gospels, does not depend for its existence on human activity; humans do not create, build, construct, extend or render present the kingdom. The kingdom originates with *God, it draws its character from God, and it precedes any human response to it, even though its presence invites (or demands) human response.

How exactly one enters the kingdom is not transparent, however. The most natural sense of the verb "to enter" depends on a portrait of the kingdom as a container or place, as though one might move from one location to another, but it is equally possible to imagine entering a sphere—that is, entering a field of influence, activity and/or operation—in this case, then, experiencing, identifying with, participating in, coming under the influence of, and joining the community formed in relation to God's kingdom. As will become clear, this latter option makes better sense of the reality that God's kingdom cannot be confined to a particular region or set of borders, not because God's rule lacks a sense of place (as in the older, erroneous view that focused God's kingdom on its subjective realization in the hearts of those who serve him), but rather because God's rule is not subject to any geographical boundaries.

1.2. The Kingdom of God in Recent Scholarship.

Recent scholarship on the kingdom of God has focused especially on a small number of central questions.

1.2.1. When Is God's Kingdom? Since the nineteenth century, no question concerning the kingdom of God has been more discussed than the one asked of Jesus by the *Pharisees according to Luke 17:20: "When is the kingdom of God coming?" That this question appears on the lips of those generally antagonistic toward Jesus, and that Jesus' response itself snubs the question of when before denying how the kingdom will come, has not dissuaded scholarly interest. Instead, scholars have struggled, first, to locate the discussion squarely in the biblical data and, second, to make sense of the diversity of those data.

Initial attempts among NT exegetes to explain the temporality of the kingdom were cast as reactions against the claims of nineteenth-century theologians (especially A. Ritschl) that characterized the kingdom of God largely as a present, this-worldly, humanistic moral program. At the turn of the twentieth century, NT scholars sought to relocate inquiry away from the role of the kingdom in theological and/or ethical systems and more closely in relation to the portrait of Jesus found in the NT Gospels. On this basis, J. Weiss countered that Jesus' vision of God's kingdom could not be reduced to a moral cause centered on present life, but rather must be understood as utterly future and radically transcendent. And A. Schweitzer responded with a portrait of Jesus as an *apocalyptic preacher for whom the coming of God's kingdom was imminent. C. H. Dodd would follow with his work on the parables, in which he argued instead for a realized *eschatology in which God's kingdom was experienced within Jesus' own ministry. Scholars then offered various attempts at a synthesis, according to which the kingdom of God might be understood as both present and future (e.g., J. Jeremias; W. Kümmel). In Anglo-American scholarship this synthesis (often referred to as "inaugurated eschatology," captured well in the expressions "the presence of the future" or "now and not yet") has been most identified with the works of G. E. Ladd and G. R. Beasley-Murray. Some have championed other ways to balance these two streams of Jesus' message in the NT Gospels, however; for example, C. Caragounis has spoken of God's kingdom as potentially present in Jesus' ministry—"potential eschatology" (Caragounis 1989)—and B. Smith has refused any synthesis, arguing instead that, when met with rejection, Jesus' message shifts from a present to a future orientation.

1.2.2. In What Way(s) Is Proclamation of God's Kingdom Integral to Israel's Life in the Second Temple Period? Two key figures set the stage for contemporary study of the kingdom of God by tying Jesus' message to *Israel's life: N. T. Wright, with reference to "Israel's story," and B. Chilton, with reference to Israel's liturgical heritage. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God (1996) was a watershed in study of the historical Jesus for the way it situates Jesus, his mission and his message so fully vis-à-vis the politics of his Jewish world. Part 2 of the book (some 325 pages) centers especially on Wright's understanding of the kingdom of God. Although complex in its interaction with various aspects of the Gospel tradition, the point is easily summarized. Wright thinks that when Jesus referred to the "kingdom of God," he was using a kind of shorthand for Israel's story, that both Jesus and his listeners knew this story well, and that Jesus' formulation of the story was intended to recall that story so as to transform it. That is, Jesus "engaged in that characteristically Jewish activity of subversively retelling the basic Jewish story, and adjusting the other worldview elements accordingly" (Wright, 201).

Wright's approach is illustrated by his comments on Luke 11:20: "If I by the finger of god [sic] cast out demons, the kingdom of god has come upon you." This reference to the kingdom, he maintains, invokes an "implicit narrative": "Israel's god will one day become king; the establishment of this kingdom will involve the defeat of the enemy that has held Israel captive; there are clear signs that this is now happening; therefore the kingdom is indeed breaking in. YHWH really is becoming king; Israel really is being liberated" (Wright, 228). Wright works out this understanding with reference to a wide range of data, including the parables of Jesus, for example, but also Israel's most treasured symbols: *Sabbath, food, people and *family, possessions. In this way, Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom belonged thoroughly within the complexities of Second Temple Judaism, whose intertwined threads of religious, political and social interests could (and should) never be disentangled. God was coming as king, so the whole world would be set right.

Since the publication of God in Strength: Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom (1979), Chilton's name has practically been synonymous with study of the kingdom. His numerous studies demonstrate his remarkable familiarity both with over a century of study of God's kingdom and with the Jewish contexts informing how Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom might be heard. For Chilton, the kingdom of God is, above all else, "God's activity in the world," which effects change in the world; moreover, "the point of speaking of God's kingdom is that God makes his realm ours" (Chilton 1996, 10). In his book Pure Kingdom Chilton maps the kingdom along five coordinates identified from the psalms: eschatology, transcendence, judgment, purity, radiance. He then locates these within the message of Jesus: a kingdom that both is and is to come (eschatology), is both immanent and one day to be comprehensive (transcendence), is an impetus already at work in the present so that entry into the kingdom is a current opportunity (judgment), promotes a new understanding of what constitutes God's people (purity), and radiates outward while also requiring a response of performance (radiance). Jesus' vision of God is thus firmly anchored within Israel's liturgical life.

In different ways, then, Chilton and Wright provide a practical starting point for ongoing reflection on the grounding in Israel's life of Jesus' message concerning God's kingdom.

1.2.3. Is "Kingdom of God" in Any Sense a Political Statement? Although no one today argues for Jesus' kinship with Jewish freedom fighters (see Brandon; and the corrective in Bammel and Moule) (see Revolutionary Movements), recent study has increasingly emphasized the degree to which Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom would have been implicated in first-century politics. In part this is due to a growing recognition that modern ideas about separation of church and state (or religion and politics) had uncritically set the terms for engaging questions about Jesus' ministry; as a result, scholarship tended to highlight Jesus' "spiritual" message and to assume his indifference on political matters. Scholars now recognize generally that politics and religion were inextricably interwoven in the ancient Mediterranean world. This emphasis has also arisen through the introduction of approaches to historical study that take more seriously sociological and socio-political perspectives. More recently, some approaches to "postcolonial study" (e.g., de Certeau; Scott 1985; 1990) have cast new light on what might count for evidence of political interests, inquiring as they do into the often implicit and unspoken scripts by which minority peoples maintain and cultivate their identity in imperial contexts.

The results of this line of inquiry are various. For

R. Horsley, for example, Jesus' call to covenant renewal was inseparable from his prophetic denouncement of Roman imperial rule. Accordingly, the message of Jesus cannot be domesticated by ethereal or individualistic interests, nor can the prophetic, judgmental edge of his words be tamed. Moreover, this two-edged message is to be embodied in communities of Jesus followers, whose practices serve God's restorative action in economic and political, and not only "religious," ways. In response, C. Bryan has urged that Horsley's categories are too sharply drawn, and that his perspective is insufficiently shaped by the witness of the OT. For Bryan, "The biblical tradition challenges all human power structures not by attempting to dismantle them or replace them with other human power structures but by consistently confronting them with the truth about their origin and purpose" (Bryan, 9). An altogether different approach has been taken by M. Beavis, who locates Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom in the context of Greco-Roman and Jewish utopia traditions; against this backdrop, she argues for an "anti-political" Jesus, since the "kingdom" sayings of Jesus do not associate God's kingdom with a hoped-for national, political entity.

These studies help to sharpen the question of the political character of Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom, even if they demonstrate a lack of scholarly consensus on how best to answer that question.

1.3. The Kingdom of God in Israel's Scriptures. In the past, some scholars tended to think of Jesus' message of the kingdom in terms of his striking originality, as though Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom in word and deed marked a new era distinctive from the old. Evidence for Jesus' novelty was easily found in the absence of the phrase "kingdom of God" in Israel's Scriptures. The extent of Jesus' innovation has been mitigated and its character clarified by decades of research demonstrating the presence of the language of the kingdom in the literature of Second Temple Judaism (see 1.4 below) and the pervasive concept of God's kingdom in the OT. In fact, the phrase "kingdom of Yahweh" appears twice (1 Chron 28:5; 2 Chron 13:8), and a variety of expressions communicate the idea of God's kingdom: Yahweh bears the title "king" (some 45x), Yahweh reigns as king (13x), Yahweh rules (8x), Yahweh sits on a throne (20x), Yahweh convenes an army (yhwh šēbā'ôt, "Lord of heavenly forces" [CEB]), and so forth (Pigott 1988, 5-6).

Images of God prevalent in Genesis, as creator, provider and guide, are expanded in Exodus as a consequence of God's intervention on behalf of Israel under Egyptian domination. God's activity at the Red Sea is celebrated in the Song of Moses with this confession: "The LORD will reign forever and always!" (Ex 15:18). J. Goldingay observes the contextual nature of this affirmation: "A king [i.e., Pharaoh] confronts Israel, so Yhwh becomes a king in order to confront this king and play him at his own game, as king delivering Israel from Egypt with powerful decisive acts. . . . Yhwh has dethroned that king. He no longer reigns over Israel as he did. Instead of being ruled by the king of Egypt, henceforth Israel will have the benefits of being ruled by Yhwh, the world ruler" (Goldingay 2003, 331-32). Captured here are further entailments: (1) Yahweh is presented as God of the universe, whose rule is exercised locally. In fact, reference to Yahweh's kingship in Israel's Scriptures moves back and forth on this continuum, so that Yahweh rules the world, rules Israel, and/or rules the world from Israel. (2) Yahweh's rule occupies two semantic domains: God the warrior and God the merciful. In this instance, God's rule is evident in the liberation of Israel from its oppressor, but elsewhere in the OT God the warrior can adopt a stance over against Israel on account of its idolatry. (3) Yahweh's rule is cast more in dynamic terms than territorial, according privilege to the notion of God's activity as king and de-emphasizing the reduction of that rule to a particular set of boundaries. (The spatial sense of Yahweh's rule is not completely evacuated from the concept of "kingdom," however [see O'Neill 1993; contra Dalman 1902]). (4) To affirm Yahweh's rule is less to assert his authority and more to recognize his power—a difference emphasized in references to the exercise of his power in "signs and wonders" in the exodus story (e.g., Deut 4:34), in reminiscences of exodus (Neh 9:10) or in the book of Acts (e.g., Acts 2:22, 43). The paradigmatic nature of the exodus story for understanding Yahweh's kingship is evident in a text such as Isaiah 33, in which God's redemptive activity is cast in terms reminiscent of exodus, leading to this affirmation: "For the LORD is our judge, the LORD is our ruler, the LORD is our king; he will save us" (Is 33:22).

Scriptural affirmations of God's rule are especially on display in Psalms, 1–2 Chronicles and Daniel. In Psalms Israel recognizes and celebrates what is truly real: the Lord is king (e.g., Pss 24:8, 10; 29:10; 47:2; 84:3; 95:3; 98:6) (see Mays). His reign is manifest in his creation of the cosmos, over which he continues to exercise royal sovereignty (e.g., Pss 29; 93; 104). And his reign is manifest in relation to Israel's liberation from Egypt and formation as a people (e.g., Pss 47; 68; 98; 114). The Chronicler affirms

God's rule of Israel in the hands of human kings (to whom Yahweh bestows the kingdom) and affirms that Yahweh's reign includes the entire cosmos and at the same time is associated with the Davidic dynasty and Israel's worship, leading us to understand that Yahweh's universal sovereignty included his direct involvement with a particular kingdom, Israel (e.g., 1 Chron 16:31; 17:14; 20:6; 29:10-13) (see Selman, 163-71). For Daniel, the chief emphasis falls on distinguishing God's reign (universal, everlasting) from all earthly kingdoms (temporary, limited), this in spite of the reality that God's reign is active in the context of these failed kingdoms; in fact, God's eternal kingdom can and does encroach on the exercise of earthly authority (cf. Dan 4; 6). According to Daniel, upon the downfall of earthly kingdoms, God will give his kingdom as a possession to human beings, to the son of man and the holy (Dan 7) (see Selman, 171-74).

The prophets too refer to God's reign. For our purposes, perhaps no references are more significant than those grounded in Isaiah's anticipation of the end of *exile and restoration of Israel, the goal of which would be God's enthronement in a restored Zion (e.g., Is 44:24-28; 52:7-8). At this time the wilderness herald will proclaim the good news: "Here is your God!" (Is 40:9); and the messenger announcing peace and salvation will bring this good news to Zion: "Your God reigns!" (Is 52:7; cf. Is 44:1-6). It is difficult not to hear these words in the background of Jesus's announcement of the "good news" concerning "God's kingdom" (see Gospel: Good News).

1.4. The Kingdom of God in Second Temple Judaism. Conceptualizations of God's kingdom in the Second Temple period were shaped profoundly by the context within which Israel found itself. It was difficult to square the affirmation of God's kingdom as universal and everlasting with the manifest reality that God's people lived under foreign rule. How should Israel understand the nexus between the promise of God's peaceable kingdom and such realities as the suffering of the righteous and the flourishing of the wicked, and Israel's subjugation under a series of non-Jewish empires? Strategies for mitigating this dissonance included scenarios that (1) highlighted God's eschatological intervention to establish his kingdom, whether through his direct intervention or by means of a messianic figure (e.g., Sibylline Oracles; 1 Enoch; Testament of Moses; Psalms of Solomon; DSS; Targum Jonathan on the Prophets); or (2) relegated God's rule to the spiritual and ethical (e.g., Wisdom of Solomon; Philo) (see Campanovo; Collins).

With regard to the first category, a text from

Psalms of Solomon holds particular interest:

Lord, you are our king forevermore, for in you, O God, does our soul take pride.
 How long is the time of a person's life on earth?
 As is his time, so also is his hope in him.
 But we hope in God our savior, for the strength of our God is forever with mercy.
 And the kingdom of our God is forever over the nations in judgment.
 Lord, you chose David to be king over Israel, and swore to him about his descendants forever, that his kingdom should not fail before
 you. . . .
 See, Lord, and raise up for them their king, the son of David, to rule over their servant Israel
 in the time known to you, O God.
 Undergird him with the strength to destroy the unrighteous rulers, to purge Jerusalem from gentiles who trample her to destruction; in wisdom and in righteousness to drive out the sinners from the inheritance. (Pss.
Sol. 17:1-4, 21-23 [OTP 2:665, 667])

A number of affirmations surface in this eschatological scenario. For example, God continues to rule even when that rule is not self-evident and even when God's people fail to live faithfully under his rule; and God's rule will be manifest in a Davidide who will deal in a decisive way with Israel's foreign overlords. Indeed, this broad stream of kingdom theology underscored the already-present reign of God that would in the future be revealed universally, marking God's intervention to vindicate his people and to establish justice and peace in the cosmos. Sometimes implicit and sometimes explicit in this literature is the further corollary that just as Israel had found itself in exile on account of its idolatry, so in proclaiming and celebrating God's kingdom Israel voices its yearning to return to God and serve him alone. If God's sovereign rule is basic to a true understanding of the cosmos, so does God's rule call for the concomitant human response to God's rule: allegiance, worship, service. Combining exodus images with expectations for God's restoration of his people, Zechariah's song captures this thought world: "[The Lord God of Israel] has shown the mercy promised to our ancestors, and has remembered his holy covenant, the oath that he swore to our ancestor Abraham, to grant us that we, having been rescued from the hands of our enemies, might worship him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all our days" (Lk 1:72-75).

1.5. The Kingdom of God and the Advent of Jesus.

When Jesus characterized his mission in terms of God's kingdom, he did so by working within a Jewish context notable for its diversity, but generally united in its vision of God's comprehensive, peaceable rule. Moreover, the eschatological expectation held by many would have focused on God's coming in power to restore and vindicate his people. Speaking generally, then, Jesus worked very much within the contours of the kingdom theology to which the OT and at least major streams of Second Temple Jewish literature would have borne witness: God's kingdom as God's activity—creating, providing, leading, sending, calling, liberating, judging, conquering, caring; God's kingdom as God's domain, inclusive of the whole cosmos, though centered on Israel; God's kingdom as evoking responses from God's subjects—responses cast either as allegiance or rebellion and that provide the basis for royal judgment; and God's kingdom as a datum of present existence, so that it was none other than God's already-present reign that would be revealed universally in the future. At the same time, the Gospels clearly locate Jesus in that stream of eschatological thought that tied the actualization of God's rule to the messianic hope. The advent of Jesus as God's Messiah (that is, the anointed king), then, is both simply and profoundly the decisive disclosure of God's royal rule, together with the consequent unmasking of all rules, all authorities, all powers that would compete with God's sovereignty.

As with God the king in the exodus story, so Jesus the king in the gospel story initiates no direct claims to his authority as king, even if his ministry prompts questions concerning his authority (e.g., Mt 7:28-29; 21:21-27; Mk 5:41; 6:2; the lone exception is Jesus' reference to his having received authority from God so that he is able to bestow authority on his disciples [Mt 28:18; Lk 22:29-30]). Instead, divine power is evident in his *teaching, *healing and exorcism—all manifestations of an (implicit) *authority derived from his relation to God (e.g., Mt 9:2-8; cf. Acts 2:22). Crucial to appreciate, however, is the way in which Jesus' kingship characterizes royal power: not like the "rulers of the Gentiles" or "their great ones," who "lord it over" and tyrannize others (Mt 20:25; Mk 10:42; Lk 22:24-27); rather, Jesus demonstrates through his ministry that royal power is defined by its orientation to the marginal, to the least and to the lost. The nature of God's kingdom is exhibited through the character of Jesus the king's engagement with people.

Since God's kingdom is restricted neither by space nor by time, the questions of when and where lose their force in Jesus' ministry. Occupying center stage instead is the question "To serve or not to serve?" Accordingly, Jesus' message of the kingdom is tethered to the call to repent, and thus to align oneself with God's rule, to engage in the practices of the kingdom, and to serve as recruits who through word and deed participate in the mission of making evident what is otherwise unclear or hidden from view—God's royal rule—and in this way unmasking those powers that compete with God's rule.

Although there is at times significant overlap in their presentations, each of the Gospels represents in its own way the character of Jesus' royal mission. In the following discussion redundancy will be minimized in favor of representing what is most characteristic of each Gospel's presentation of Jesus and the kingdom.

2. The Kingdom of God/Heaven in Matthew.

2.1. Linguistic Considerations. The term "kingdom" (basileia) occurs fifty-five times in Matthew's Gospel: thirty-two times in the phrase "kingdom of heaven" (basileia tōn ouranōn, "kingdom of the heavens"), nine times without a modifier ("the kingdom" [Mt 4:23; 6:33; 8:12; 9:35; 13:19, 38; 21:43; 24:14; 25:34]), three times in the phrase "kingdom of God" (basileia tou theou [Mt 12:28; 19:24; 21:31]), three times as the Father's kingdom (Mt 6:10; 13:43; 26:29), twice as the Son of Man's kingdom (Mt 13:41; 16:28; cf. Mt 25:31-46), once as Jesus' kingdom (Mt 20:21) and five times with reference to the kingdoms of others (Mt 4:8; 12:25, 26; 24:7 [2x]). Additionally, the term "king" (basileus) occurs twenty-two times, six of which refer to Jesus, however ironically (Mt 2:2; 21:5; 27:11, 29, 37, 42). (Note that statistics such as these invariably involve judgment calls. For example, in many English translations Mt 6:33 refers to "kingdom of God," even though the text is uncertain; the absence of tou theou in codices \aleph and B, the use of basileia alone in sixteen percent of its references to God's kingdom, and the scribal tendency to improve awkward constructions all suggest that the initial text read basileia without the modifier tou theou.)

The significance of the kingdom to Matthew's narrative is suggested not only by the presence of this vocabulary, but also by the strategic location of these terms. King or kingdom language is spread throughout the Gospel, appearing in twenty-five of its twenty-eight chapters. The ministries of *John the Baptist, Jesus and the disciples are introduced with the same proclamation: "The kingdom of heaven is near!" (Mt 3:2; 4:8; 10:7). Matthew summarizes Jesus' message with the phrase "the good news of the kingdom" (Mt 4:23; 9:35), and Jesus uses the same phrase to refer to missionary proclamation (Mt 24:14). As a biographical narrative, Matthew's Gospel broadcasts and celebrates Jesus' kingship above all by showing the centrality of the kingdom to his message and by interpreting his deeds as manifestations of the heavenly kingdom.

Among the Synoptic Gospels, Matthew is unique in his use of the phrase "kingdom of heaven." The usual explanation given for this novelty is that this most Jewish of Gospels uses "heaven" as a respectful circumlocution for "God." On the positive side of the ledger, this claim has led students of Matthew to insist that the phrases "kingdom of heaven" and "kingdom of God" do not refer to two different entities, and especially do not specify a heavenly versus an earthly kingdom or a present reality versus a future destination. That Matthew can collocate "kingdom of heaven" with "kingdom of God" (Mt 19:23-24), and that he uses "kingdom of heaven" where the other evangelists use "kingdom of God," are enough to invalidate distinctions of that nature (e.g., Mt 4:17 // Mk 1:15; Mt 5:3 // Lk 6:20; Mt 8:11 // Lk 13:28). However, appeals to Matthew's aversion to the divine name in the phrase "kingdom of God" fail to make sense of Matthew's use of the term "God" (theos) some fifty times and do not easily account for the fourfold appearance of the phrase "kingdom of God" in Matthew. Moreover, as J. Pennington has demonstrated, this explanation has too easily allowed readers of Matthew to bypass inquiry into the significance of the modifier "of heaven."

According to Pennington, Matthew prefers the language of "kingdom of heaven" on account of the influence of Daniel 2-7, which accentuates the disparity between earthly kingdoms and the heavenly kingdom. Daniel's emphasis on the God of heaven—who is "the king of heaven" (Dan 4:34)—in contrast with earthly kings and kingdoms has in Matthew's hands morphed into a programmatic presentation of God as the heavenly Father and God's kingdom as the heavenly kingdom, over against earthly kings and kingdoms. Note, for example, how the first three appearances of the term "kingdom" contrast the heavenly kingdom in John's and Jesus' proclamation (Mt 3:2; 4:17) with the devil's displaying for Jesus "all the worldly kingdoms" (Mt 4:8). Pennington has also demonstrated that the pair “heaven and earth” is thematic for the first evangelist, whose narrative highlights the present contrast between these two realms and anticipates the time when this contrast will be resolved (e.g., Mt 6:9-10; 19:28; 28:18). The kingdom is “of heaven” in terms of its origin and attributes; that is, the kingdom draws its character from the Father’s domain (cf. Mt 5:34; 6:1-21). Accordingly, the kingdom proclaimed by John, Jesus and Jesus’ disciples is distinguished from earthly kingdoms and the patterns of life associated with and determined by them. In short, Matthew prefers “kingdom of heaven” not because of his aversion to referring to Yahweh as God, but rather to emphasize the heavenly origins and nature of the kingdom.

2.2. The Heavenly Kingdom. Even if the advent of Jesus is marked as the arrival of the king and he discloses in a decisive way the heavenly kingdom in his message and deeds, it is also true that, for Matthew, God’s kingdom spans all times. This is immediately obvious in part from the essential continuity that runs from John (Mt 3:2), to Jesus (Mt 4:17, 23; 9:35), to the mission of the twelve (Mt 10:7), to the ongoing mission of Jesus’ followers (Mt 24:14), to the eschaton itself (Mt 25:1, 34; 26:29). In addition, the introduction of Jesus as king is set within a *birth narrative accentuating God’s past activity on behalf of God’s people and shows Jesus’ continuity with and consummation of that history (Mt 1—2) (see Hanan, 21-32).

The beginnings of John’s ministry, and then Jesus’, are associated with the announcement of the kingdom, particularly with respect to the demands of the kingdom, abbreviated in the single term “Repent!” (Mt 3:2; 4:8) (see Repentance). Both John and Jesus thus associate the coming of the heavenly kingdom with the restoration of Israel that brings with it the mandate that God’s people reorient their allegiances toward the God whose *Son brings near the heavenly realm. Jesus has come to actualize the law and the prophets (Mt 5:17), to forgive and heal (Mt 9:6), to call sinners (Mt 9:13), to bring division (Mt 10:34-35), to befriend tax collectors and sinners (Mt 11:19) and “to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many” (Mt 20:25-28); and he will come in eschatological judgment (Mt 24:37-44), exhibiting in these ways the nature of the kingdom and articulating the character of the lives of those disciplined for the kingdom. We know who repents, since their lives display dispositions and behaviors (“fruit” [cf. Mt 3:8; 21:43]) appropriate to a changed heart and life. This includes recognizing one’s powerlessness and concomitant desire for God to act (Mt 5:3) and attracting harassment on account of one’s identification with Jesus (Mt 5:10), as well as the other dispositions and behaviors outlined in the Beatitudes, all of which are framed with reference to those to whom the kingdom of heaven belongs (Mt 5:3-10). Allegiance to the kingdom is realized in holiness, righteousness and obedience to the Father’s will (e.g., Mt 5:20; 7:16-23; 22:1-14). Orientation to the kingdom relativizes all other needs and priorities and all other claims on one’s life (Mt 6:33; 13:44-46).

Matthew never provides a dictionary-type definition of the kingdom, but rather works out its character in terms of its origins (so it takes its character from heaven and not this world) and its king (so its character is on display in Matthew’s biography of Jesus). More particularly, the nature of the kingdom is disclosed through descriptions of Jesus’ mission, which he shares with his followers and in his (often parabolic) instruction. The summary of Jesus’ mission in Matthew 4:23 includes teaching, preaching and healing as demonstrations of the good news of the proximity of the kingdom of heaven; significantly, then, this good news unfolds, first, through the *Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5—7) and, second, in a chain of powerful deeds through which a leper, the slave of a Gentile army officer, an old woman, the *demon-possessed, a paralytic, a tax collector, a young girl and the *blind are restored (Mt 8—9). Such missional activity actually draws the battle lines in a clash of kingdoms, whether with Satan’s kingdom (e.g., Mt 12:22-28) or with Jesus’ opponents who seem possessed of earthly rather than heavenly allegiances (Mt 12:10-14). In a lengthy section of parables (Mt 13:1-53) Jesus holds *ethics and *eschatology in tension. *Judgment will come, but in the meantime the good and bad, wheat and weeds, will exist side by side. His followers are to use the calculus of the end-time judgment as they work out the nature of present faithfulness, discerning and performing God’s will, and can anticipate hostility and rejection as aspects of present life for those who live faithfully among “this evil generation.” In the midst of harassment and charlatanism, aligning oneself with the kingdom is worth any price. Jesus further emphasizes in his interactions with others the implications of one’s entry into the heavenly realm for family relations and marriage, mutual forgiveness, and possessions, and toward society’s marginal people (e.g., Mt 12:46-50; 19:1-30). The nature of the heavenly empire determines the basis of eschatological judgment (Mt 7:21; 25:31-46; cf. Mt 13:24-30, 37-43, 47-50). Without calling for an assault on the Roman Empire or registering people for an anti-imperial insurgence, through his own example and in his teaching Jesus has thus identified and authorized a series of life scripts—patterns of believing and behaving—that unmask and defy earth-bound and earth-determined kingdoms like that of *Rome.

Finally, Jesus enters *Jerusalem as Israel's king (Mt 21:5). Here the clash of kingdoms reaches its apex as the way of Jesus (God's heavenly kingdom drawn near) and the ways of the kingdoms of this world (represented by the temple elite and the Roman governor) face off (cf., e.g., Mt 26:47-56, 64). There he is executed, ironically, as a pretender to the throne (Mt 27:11, 28-29, 37, 42). Jesus' resurrection from the dead signals God's vindication of Jesus; he is the one who disclosed and embodied authentically the Father's kingdom. In the final scene of the Gospel we find that in Jesus the distance between *heaven and earth is bridged (Mt 28:18).

2.3. Keys of the Kingdom. Unique among the Gospels is a kingdom saying in Matthew that presses a question about the relationship between the heavenly kingdom and the church: "And I tell you that you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church. The gates of the underworld will not be able to stand against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven" (Mt 16:18-19). Since Matthew is the only evangelist to use the term *"church" (ekklesia), it is not surprising that this issue is raised overtly only by his Gospel. Here Jesus portrays the kingdom as a city that one enters by means of gates, and he names wielding the keys to the kingdom's gates as the means by which Peter would function as the rock on which the church is built and by which people would be freed from the grip of the underworld (i.e., from death [hadēs, "the place of the dead"])). What might this mean? First, in Matthew's narrative "entering" the kingdom is predicated on one's conformity to the covenant with God, particularly on doing the Father's will, for example, with regard to children and the poor (Mt 5:20; 7:21; 18:1-4; 19:23-24). Second, the nature of the wordplay in Matthew 16:18, from the masculine noun petros ("rock") to the feminine noun petra ("rock"), makes it difficult simply to equate Peter (petros) the apostle with the petra ("bedrock") on which the church is built; Jesus' point is focused rather on the foundational apostolic testimony to Jesus' identity as "Messiah, Son of the living God," a revelation originating with the heavenly Father (Mt 16:16-17) (see further Hannan, 141-45; Caragounis 1990). The keys to the heavenly kingdom are thus identified with the apostoloc message, which points toward the commission that Peter and the others receive from Jesus to make disciples of all nations (Mt 28:18-20; that the others share this role, see Mt 18:18). For Matthew, then, the church is the faithful remnant of those who have now entered the sphere of God's heavenly rule through living conversionary lives and then carry on Jesus' mission of disclosing in word and deed the character of the kingdom as they confess him as *Christ and *Son of God.

3. The Kingdom of God in Mark.

3.1. Linguistic Considerations. The term "kingdom" (basileia) occurs twenty times in Mark's Gospel: fourteen times in the expression "kingdom of God" (basileia tou theou [Mk 1:15; 4:11, 26, 30; 9:1, 47; 10:14, 15, 23, 24, 25; 12:34; 14:25; 15:43]), once with reference to "the coming kingdom of our ancestor David" (Mk 11:10), and five times with reference to other kingdoms (Mk 3:24 [2x]; 6:23; 13:8 [2x]). The term "king" (basileus) occurs twelve times: five with reference to *Herod (Mk 6:14-29), once with reference to those "governors and kings" before whom Jesus' followers will testify (Mk 13:9), and six times in Mark's passion account, where "King of the Jews/Israel" (Mk 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32) is collocated with "Christ/Messiah" (Mk 14:61; 15:32) in an ironic presentation of the reason for which Jesus is condemned to die.

3.2. Kingdom and Christology. The stage is set, both for the Gospel as a whole and for Mark's understanding of God's kingdom, in Mark 1:15a: "The decisive time [kairos] has been fulfilled; God's kingdom has drawn near." In a startling paraphrase, D. Wenham captures the significance of this summary: "The longed-for revolution is now underway" (Wenham 1989, 22). With this intriguing image Wenham draws attention to OT prophetic expectations for *peace and *justice, the restoration of a people and a world out of step with their God, and God's kingship over the whole earth. For Mark, the advent of Jesus is synchronized with the kingdom's drawing near, so that Jesus decisively unveils the presence and character of God's kingship; and the call to believe and repent (Mk 1:15b) is a call, as it were, "to join the revolution."

Mark has structured the preface to his Gospel with dual references to the "good news": the "good news of Jesus Christ, God's Son," which is grounded in Scripture (Mk 1:1-3; cf. Ex 23:20; Is 40:3; Mal 3:1), and "the good news of God," which is proclaimed by Jesus (Mk 1:14-15). As the evangelist draws particular attention to Isaiah and, in fact, constructs his preface with repeated echoes of Isaiah 40-66, it almost goes without saying that his understanding of God's kingdom builds on the Isaianic portrait of God's restoration of Israel from *exile, the new exodus, the eschatological disclosure of God's reign (e.g., Is 40:1-9; 53:7) (see Watts). This means, first, that the coming of Jesus signals the new exodus; second, that the times have changed so that the structure of the cosmos must now be gauged through fresh lens; third, that the whole of what follows in Mark's Gospel expounds on Jesus' announcement of God's kingdom.

The synchrony of Jesus' entry into the scene and the decisive disclosure of God's kingdom (Mk 1:9-15) is matched by a later synchrony in Mark's Gospel. The words of those who lead Jesus' parade into Jerusalem (see Triumphal Entry) are set in parallel:

Hosanna!

Blessed is the one who comes [ho erchomenos] in the name of the Lord!

Blessed is the coming [hē erchomenē] kingdom of our father David!

Hosanna in the highest heaven! (Mk 11:9-10)

The twofold use of present participial forms of the verb "to come" (erchomai) ensures that the coming of Jesus signifies the coming of David's kingdom, identifying Jesus with the Davidic dynasty (see Son of David) and, at the same time, with Israel's end-time restoration.

The christological interests of Mark's theology of the kingdom are emphasized further by the observation that Jesus is the only person within the Mark narrative who uses the phrase "kingdom of God." No one else, not even his disciples, uses this phrase, even though they otherwise participate in a mission modeled on his (Mk 6:7, 12-13). In conveying his story, the evangelist himself uses the phrase only once: Joseph of Arimathea awaited God's kingdom (Mk 15:43). We recognize then that others may hope for God's kingdom, and still others may receive authority to heal, exorcise demons and call for repentance in light of the kingdom now revealed in Jesus' person and mission, but Jesus alone renders the kingdom near.

It follows that Jesus alone demonstrates the nature of the kingdom. Thus, the arrival of the kingdom entails an assault on Satan and his minions (Mk 1:12-13, 21-27; 3:22-30), calls for an overturning of norms with regard to honor and status (Mk 10:13-16), and prioritizes *love of God and love of neighbor (Mk 12:28-34). Consequently, Mark's "revolution" cannot be identified with any human movement or program; rather, it is an inversion of conventional values realized through the intrusion of the conventions, values and standards of God's empire, which, it must be said, undercuts all human-originated and human-led systems.

Moreover, Jesus sets out the appropriate human response to the inauguration of God's kingdom. They are to trust that, indeed, God's kingdom has come; and, trusting, they are to repent (Mk 1:15). Trusting may be a complicated affair because the kingdom may not be readily apparent to those with untrained eyes and ears (see Mk 4:9, 11, 23, 30-32). It is significant, then, that on the mountain of transfiguration Jesus provides three disciples with a visionary experience of God's kingdom having "come with power" (Mk 9:1, 2-9). What form does belief and repentance take? The calling of the first disciples in Mark 1:16-20—Jesus' first act in the Gospel narrative proper—demonstrates the appropriate response: setting aside one's way of life (cf. Mk 8:34), means of livelihood, even family obligations in order to follow Jesus and participate in his mission. Even proper responses like these do not bring the kingdom nearer, help to build the kingdom, or advance the kingdom, however. The kingdom grows quite apart from human contributions (Mk 4:26-29 [note Mk 4:28: automatos, "by itself"]); even grasping the message of the kingdom and entering the kingdom are quite impossible apart from divine initiative (Mk 4:11; 10:23-27).

The importance of Mark's christologically grounded presentation of God's kingdom comes to the fore in one more way, in the *passion narrative's picture of Jesus as Christ, a king (Mk 14:61; 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32). Jesus receives these titles from his opponents, but in thus naming him they act with an irony that can hardly be lost on Mark's audience. Those responsible for Jesus' death sentence mock him as king and Christ, but Mark's audience recognizes in their sarcasm the truth, the truth communicated by the evangelist himself (Mk 1:1) and by the divine voice at Jesus' *baptism and *transfiguration (Mk 1:9-11; 9:7), and, finally, recognized by a Roman centurion (Mk 15:39). Jesus' suffering and *death thus signify the truly radical nature of this revolution, for Jesus' passion defines the powerful coming of God to restore and rule with reference to sacrificial service, suffering and death (cf. Mk 10:35-45) (see Matera).

4. The Kingdom of God in Luke.

4.1. Linguistic Considerations. Although Matthew uses the language of the kingdom more often than does Luke, the latter draws on a wider vocabulary. The term "kingdom" (basileia) appears forty-six times in Luke's Gospel (plus Acts 8x, where it is generally identified with Jesus [Ziccardi]): thirty-two times in the phrase "kingdom of God" (basileia tou theou [Lk 4:43; 6:20; 7:28; 8:1, 10; 9:2, 11, 27, 60, 62; 10:9, 11; 11:20; 13:18, 20, 28, 29; 14:15; 16:16; 17:20 [2x], 21; 18:16, 17, 24, 25, 29; 19:11; 21:31; 22:16, 18; 23:51; plus Acts 6x]), four times explicitly with reference to Jesus' kingdom (Lk 1:33; 22:29, 30; 23:42) and twice implicitly (Lk 19:12, 15 [a parabolic presentation of Jesus' kingship]), twice with reference to the Father's kingdom (Lk 11:2; 12:31), once without a modifier ("the kingdom" [Lk 12:32; plus Acts 2x]), and five times with reference to other kingdoms (Lk 4:5; 11:17, 18; 21:10 [2x]). Additionally, Luke uses the terms "king" (basileus) eleven times (plus Acts 20x), "queen" (basilissa) once (Lk 11:31; plus Acts 1x), "to act as a king" (basileuō) three times (Lk 1:33; 19:14, 27), and "royal" (basileios) once (Lk 7:25, with reference to a "royal palace"). One may also want to consider Luke's use of terms for "ruler" (dynastēs, archōn), whether alone, in phrases (e.g., archon tōn Pharisaion, "ruler of the Pharisees") or in compounds (e.g., archisynagōgos, "synagogue ruler"; architelōnēs, "ruler of tax collectors"), as these often appear in contexts that emphasize different conventions for exercising power.

4.2. The Politics of God's Kingdom. Given the array of related vocabulary Luke uses, it is clear that he is concerned with "politics"—that is, the nature, distribution and wielding of power, all of which are profoundly theological issues for Luke. What are the politics of God's kingdom?

Luke can summarize Jesus' message with reference to God's kingdom (Lk 8:1; 9:11; cf. Acts 1:3), but this is not how he introduces Jesus' public ministry. Jesus is well into the Galilean phase of his ministry when he explains to the crowds, "I must announce the good news of God's kingdom to the other cities as well; this is the reason I was sent" (Lk 4:43). This text, then, allows us to analyze retrospectively what is entailed in the phrase "kingdom of God."

First, the phrase "to bring or announce the good news" (euangelizomai) recalls the angel's announcement of Jesus' birth (also using the term euangelizomai), in which he names Jesus as "Christ the Lord" and associates him with the Davidic dynasty (Lk 2:10-11). This in turn recalls Gabriel's announcement to Mary regarding Jesus: he would be God's Son, occupy David's throne, reign over Jacob's house, and rule his kingdom forever (Lk 1:32-33). Moreover, "to announce the good news" embeds Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom in his programmatic statement of his mission, taken from the words of Isaiah, which he exegetes with reference to the stories of *Elijah and Elisha (Lk 4:16-30; see Is 58:6; 61:1-2). The "good news of God's kingdom" is thus (1) tied specifically to Jesus' kingship and royal mission, (2) grounded in Isaiah's promise regarding Israel's end-time restoration ("fulfilled today, in your hearing" [Lk 4:21]), (3) concerned above all with "release," a metaphor for the end of Israel's exile, as well as an anticipation of Jesus' ministries of healing and exorcism and his message regarding faith and wealth, and (4) oriented toward the marginal (the poor, the blind, the enslaved [Lk 4:18-19], including women, widows, lepers and Gentiles [Lk 4:25-27]). Second, Jesus' words in Luke 4:43, "to the other cities also," draws attention to what Jesus has already been doing in the present city, Capernaum: teaching, expelling demons, healing (Lk 4:17-41; cf. Lk 4:23). This, apparently, is the sort of activity through which God's kingdom is realized as good news. And third, this first appearance on Jesus' lips of the phrase "kingdom of God" contrasts sharply with the worldly kingdoms that the devil had revealed to Jesus and over which the devil claimed authority (Lk 4:5-8). This underscores in yet one more way that Jesus' announcement of the good news would be conducted in the arena of opposition, including battle with the cosmic forces and earthly institutions aligned against God's kingdom. This "kingdom" is "of God" thus in the dual sense that it originates with God (who gives it to Jesus [Lk 1:32-33; cf. Lk 12:32; 22:29-30]), and that it takes its character from God (underscoring the significance of the choice to worship either the devil or God [Lk 4:5-8]).

Working now with a wide-angle lens, we see more broadly that God's kingdom in Luke's Gospel is the presence of divine power to liberate people from diabolic bondage. This takes the form of healing people from their maladies (e.g., Lk 4:39; 9:2, 11; 10:8-9; cf. Acts 10:38: "healing all who were being dominated by the devil"); note, for example, how Jesus' releasing the bent-over woman from eighteen years of satanic bondage leads immediately into the question "What is God's kingdom like?" (Lk 13:10-18). It also takes the form of liberating the demonized, a point made with particular clarity in Jesus' response to the charge that he is in league with the ruler of demons: "If I expel demons by the finger of God, then the kingdom of God has come to you" (Lk 11:20). God's power is focused on releasing Satan's captives, and this power is executed in Jesus' ministry.

Jesus' words "the kingdom of God has come to you" identify his person and mission as the out-working of God's kingdom in the present (see Carroll, 76-87; Wolter; Woods). This is not simply because Jesus is God's instrument, but because Jesus is himself king or, better, co-regent with God. This is obvious from Acts 2:22-36, where Jesus' *ascension (Lk 24:50-51; Acts 1:9-11) is interpreted as his enthronement, but God's making Jesus Lord and Christ at his exaltation does not signify that God caused Jesus to be what he was not already, as the birth and transfiguration accounts make clear (Lk 1:31-35; 2:11; 9:28-36). Instead, God's exaltation of Jesus is the ultimate means by which misconceptions of Jesus' identity and nature can be overturned.

The present identification of God's kingdom with Jesus' mission and person is also exhibited in Luke 17:20-21, Jesus' response to the Pharisees' question about the timing of God's kingdom: "In fact, God's kingdom is among [entos] you!" Although the preposition entos could be translated as "within," the fact that Jesus is here responding to his opponents (who are manifestly not agents of God's kingdom), the fact that nowhere else in Luke-Acts is the kingdom represented as a subjective, inner reality, and the fact that Luke otherwise associates God's kingdom with the person of Jesus urge that we read Jesus' response as an indictment of the Pharisees: God's kingdom is already among you, and you have not recognized it! This does not mean, however, that Luke has no interest in the end-time disclosure of God's kingdom, as texts such as Luke 21:31; 22:16, 18 make clear. Indeed, A. Prieur has argued that for Luke, it is best not to tie the disclosure of God's kingdom to a particular point in time, but instead to emphasize the need for the eyes of faith by which to discern the presence of God's kingly rule.

The interchange between those who charge Jesus as an agent of Beelzebub casts Jesus' mission as a clash of kingdoms (Lk 11:15, 17-23). This recalls Luke's juxtaposition of worldly kingdoms, under the devil's authority, with Jesus' kingship (Lk 1:33; 4:5, 43) and anticipates Luke's characterization of the series of events from Jesus' arrest to his execution as a manifestation of "the power of darkness" (Lk 22:53; cf. Lk 23:44; Acts 26:18). The temple elite and Rome itself are thus implicated in Satan's sphere of influence, and this means that their mockery of Jesus as a prophet (Lk 22:63-65); indictment of Jesus as a false prophet, would-be Messiah and pretender to the throne (Lk 23:1-5, 14; cf. Deut 13); ridicule of Jesus as "God's Messiah" (Lk 23:35); and ironic execution of Jesus as "King of the Jews" (Lk 23:37) represent nothing less than the climax of this conflict, God's kingdom versus the devil's. What Luke already made clear in Jesus' predictions of his death and resurrection (Lk 9:22; 18:31-33) and demonstrated proleptically on the mountain of Jesus' transfiguration (Lk 9:27, 28-36), a criminal crucified alongside Jesus now recognizes: Jesus' suffering and death do not signal Satan's triumph, but rather are the path that Jesus takes on the way to vindication and glory. Thus, this unnamed criminal can request of someone who, like himself, is suffering an ignoble death on a Roman cross, "Jesus, remember me when you come into your kingdom" (Lk 23:42).

Jesus' own journey through humiliation to glory epitomizes the topsy-turvy nature of God's kingdom in Luke, with its pervasive emphasis on reversal. As *Mary says of God at the angelic announcement that she will give birth to Jesus, "He has dethroned the powerful and lifted up the lowly. He has filled the hungry with good things and sent the rich away with nothing" (Lk 1:52-53). Similarly, the kingdom of God belongs to the poor (Lk 6:20) and to little *children (Lk 18:16). One's desire for the kingdom supersedes all other wants and worries; moreover, the Father's gift of the kingdom makes friendship with the poor possible (Lk 12:31-34) (see Rich and Poor). Indeed, the economic demands of the kingdom are such that it is hard for the wealthy to enter God's kingdom (Lk 18:24-25) (see Moxnes).

Finally, the politics of the kingdom are evident in Luke's Gospel in meal scenes (see Table Fellowship). The eschatological kingdom is envisioned as a great banquet (Lk 13:23-30; 14:15; cf. Is 25:6-9), and, in a series of scenes in Luke 13-16, Luke's narrative turns the table on the expected concern. The question is not "Will I have a seat at the table?" but rather "To whom do I extend invitations to shared meals?" That is, "To whom do I extend hospitality?" Luke's point is that heavenly rejoicing over finding the lost (Lk 15:7, 10) and the inclusion even of Gentiles at the end-time feast (Lk 13:29) ought to mold the character of present life. Thus, Jesus shares table fellowship with tax collectors and sinners (Lk 15) and urges the Pharisees to set aside conventional concerns with status and reciprocal invitations and instead welcome to their luncheons and dinners the poor, the crippled and the blind (Lk 14:1-24). To do so is to include in one's circle of table intimates the very persons to whom Jesus' own mission is directed (cf. Lk 4:18-19; 7:21-22); indeed, to do so is only to put into practice the words of Moses and the prophets (Lk 16:19-31).

Jesus himself does not go on the direct offensive against imperial Rome or display placards calling for the resignation of the Jerusalem leadership, but this does not make him apolitical. The binary choice sometimes presented—either governmental overthrow or political indifference—must be resisted, just as it would be wrongheaded to read the modern segregation of religion and politics back into a first-century writing such as Luke's Gospel. Luke's thoroughgoing, theological critique of imperial Rome is a given, and it is from this supposition that the important questions follow. If Roman ways of possessing, distributing and wielding power are abandoned, what politics are embraced in their stead? Jesus' person, mission and message disclose the politics of the kingdom—a politics that refuses to enter the political game on Roman terms and instead sets out a set of commitments and practices that make sense under the general heading of "good news to the poor."

5. The Kingdom of God in John.

5.1. Linguistic Considerations. The term "kingdom" (basileia) occurs six times in John's Gospel: twice in the phrase "kingdom of God" (basileia tou theou [Jn 3:3, 5]) and three times in Jesus' references to "my kingdom" (Jn 18:36 [3x]). The term "king" (basileus) appears sixteen times: fourteen times in references to Jesus (Jn 1:49; 6:15; 12:13, 15; 18:33, 37 [2x], 39; 19:3, 14, 15, 19, 21 [2x]), and twice with reference to Roman imperial rule (Jn 19:12, 15). The term "royal" (basilikos) is used twice, both with reference to a "royal official" in Capernaum (Jn 4:46, 49). As C. Koester and W. Carter have demonstrated, other terms may be relevant as well, since John's presentation of Jesus as "Savior," "Lord" and "God" parallels literary and epigraphical portraits of Roman emperors from Augustus to Hadrian.

5.2. Jesus, the Sovereign King. The first person to identify Jesus as king is Nathaniel, who interprets Jesus' status as God's Son (cf. Jn 1:32-34) with the acclamation "You are the King of Israel" (Jn 1:49). Nathaniel thus understands Jesus in terms borrowed from the Psalms (e.g., Pss 2:6-7; 89:26-27), but in a way that has far-reaching ramifications within John's world. After all, Jesus' Jewish opponents recognize that there can be only one king. Therefore, anyone claiming to be a king opposes the Roman emperor (Jn 19:12), himself the king even if he might exercise his authority to install client kings under him. Rejecting Jesus' kingship, the chief priests go on to confess, "We have no king other than Caesar!" (Jn 19:15). This contradicts Nathaniel's declaration, a point made all the more interesting by Jesus' characterization of Nathaniel as a genuine Israelite, pure and lacking deceit (Jn 1:47). Apparently, true Israelites recognize who their king really is. With the benefit of hindsight, the disciples would understand Jesus as Israel's king, the fulfillment of Zechariah 9:9 (Jn 12:13-16).

In light of this wider development of Jesus' kingship, Jesus' references to God's kingdom in John 3:3, 5 come into clearer focus. Jesus explains to Nicodemus, "No one can see God's kingdom without being born from above," and then he observes, "No one can enter God's kingdom without being born of water and Spirit." Using the verb "to see" (horaō), Jesus makes an epistemological claim: no one can understand God's kingdom unless through faith they know God as Father (i.e., unless they are "born of God" [see Jn 1:12-13]). Since "God's kingdom" is otherwise known as Jesus' kingdom in John's Gospel, this claim has a corollary: apart from faith, no one can recognize Jesus as king, nor can they grasp the nature of his kingship. As the interchange between Nicodemus and Jesus unfolds, "seeing the kingdom" is set in parallel not only with "entering the kingdom," but also with eternal life (Jn 3:15-16) and receiving *salvation (Jn 3:17). Hereafter in John's Gospel references to "life" or "eternal life" will replace the language of God's kingdom.

In his *trial before Pilate, Jesus does not reject the title "King of the Jews," but interprets it: "My kingdom is not of this world" (Jn 18:36). The phrase "of this world" means, first, that Jesus' kingship does not originate with this world (just as he himself is not "of this world" [cf. Jn 3:13; 6:33, 41, 50, 51, 58; 8:23; 13:3; 17:14]). In other words, Jesus has not been set over a kingdom by Rome, for example, or put forward as ruler by the Jerusalem leadership. His kingdom is God's kingdom. This phrase means, second, that Jesus' kingdom derives its nature from God, with whose purposes Jesus is aligned. Were it otherwise, would his "officers" (hoi hypēretai) not be "taking up weapons" (agōnizomai) on his behalf (Jn 18:36)? In fact, he has disciples instead of officers, and at his arrest Jesus both negotiates their release and rejects Peter's efforts at resisting the posse that has come out to take Jesus into custody (Jn 18:8-11).

Only those with the eyes of faith are able to grasp that Jesus is king and share in his kingdom. Those who do so also recognize that his saving activity stands in tension with the Roman social order. Indeed, it is precisely as a royal pretender that Jesus is rejected by the Jews who oppose him, and that he is finally executed (Jn 19:3, 14, 15, 19, 21). In a final irony that underscores the distance between imperial Rome and Jesus' kingdom, however, Jesus' crucifixion is an honorable death that brings life (Jn 3:14-15; 8:28-29; 12:32).

See also APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING; CHRISTOLOGY; DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS OF JESUS; EXILE AND RESTORATION; GOSPEL: GOOD NEWS; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; PARABLES; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN; THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE GOSPELS; TRIUMPHAL ENTRY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Y.-S. Ahn, The Reign of God and Rome in Luke's Passion Narrative: An East Asian Global Perspective (BIS 80; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); D. C. Allison Jr., The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); A. M. Ambrozic, The Hidden Kingdom: A Redaction-Critical Study of the References to the Kingdom of God in Mark's Gospel (CBQMS 2; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1972); E. Bammel and C. F. D. Moule, eds. Jesus and the Politics of His Day (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); G. R. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Kingdom of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986); M. A. Beavis, Jesus and Utopia: Looking for the Kingdom of God in the Roman World (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2006); S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967); C. Bryan, Render to Caesar: Jesus, the Early Church, and the Roman Superpower (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005); O. Campanovo, Königtum, Königsherrschaft und Reich Gottes in den frühjüdischen Schriften (OBO 58; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1984); C. C. Caragounis, "Kingdom of God, Son of Man and Jesus' Self-Understanding," TynBul 40 (1989) 3-23, 223-38; idem, Peter and the Rock (BZNW 58; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1990); J. T. Carroll, Response to the End of History: Eschatology and Situation in Luke-Acts (SBLDS 92; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); W. Carter, John and Empire: Initial Explorations (New York: T & T Clark, 2008); B. D. Chilton, God in Strength: Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom (SNTU B1; Freistadt: Plöchl, 1979); idem, ed., The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (IRT 5; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); idem, Pure Kingdom: Jesus' Vision of God (SHJ; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); B. D. Chilton and J. I. H. McDonald, Jesus and the Ethics of the Kingdom (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); J. J. Collins, "The Kingdom of God in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha," in The Kingdom of God in 20th-Century Interpretation, ed. W. Willis (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1987) 81-95; G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus Considered in Light of Post-biblical Jewish Writings and the Aramaic Language, trans. D. M. Kay (Edinburgh: T & T Clark,

1902); M. de Certeau, The Practice of Everyday Life, trans. S. Rendell (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984); C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (rev. ed.; London: Collins, 1961); R. T. France, Divine Government: God's Kingship in the Gospel of Mark (London: SPCK, 1990); J. Goldingay, Old Testament Theology, 1: Israel's Gospel (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003); M. Hannan, The Nature and Demands of God's Sovereign Rule in the Gospel of Matthew (LNTS 308; London: T & T Clark, 2006); R. A. Harrisville, "In Search of the Meaning of 'The Reign of God,'" Int 47 (1993) 140-51; M. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer, eds. Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult im Judentum, Urchristentum und in der hellenistischen Welt (WUNT 1/55; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1991); R. A. Horsley, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Disorder (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (3rd ed.; London: SCM, 1972); W. H. Kelber, The Kingdom in Mark: A New Place and a New Time (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); C. Koester, "The Savior of the World' (John 4:42)," JBL 109 (1990) 665-90; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment: The Eschatological Message of Jesus, trans. D. M. Barton (2nd ed.; SBT 23; London: SCM, 1961); G. E. Ladd, The Presence of the Future: The Eschatology of Biblical Realism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); G. Lundström, "The Kingdom of Heaven According to the First Gospel," NTS 27 (1981) 211-32; E. S. Malbon, "Markan Narrative Christology and the Kingdom of God," in Literary Encounters with the Reign of God, ed. S. H. Ringe and H. C. P. Kim (New York: T & T Clark, 2004) 177-93; F. J. Matera, The Kingship of Jesus: Composition and Theology in Mark 15 (SBLDS 66; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); J. L. Mays, "The Language of the Reign of God," Int 47 (1993) 117-26; H. Moxnes, The Economy of the Kingdom: Social Conflict and Economic Relations in Luke's Gospel (OBT 23; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); J. C. O'Neill, "The Kingdom of God," NovT 35 (1993) 130-41; M. Pamment, "The Kingdom of Heaven According to the First Gospel," NTS 27 (1981) 211-32; J. T. Pennington, Heaven and Earth in the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1963); idem, Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); S. M. Pigott, "The Kingdom of the Warrior God: The Old Testament and the Kingdom of Yahweh," SwJT 40 (1998) 5-20; A. Priour, Die Verkündigung der Gottesherrschaft: Exegetische Studien zum lukanischen Verständnis von βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ (WUNT

- 2/89; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1996); H. Ridderbos, The Coming of the Kingdom, ed. R. O. Zorn (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1962); R. D. Rowe, God's Kingdom and God's Son: The Background in Mark's Christology from Concepts of Kingship in the Psalms (AGJU 50; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); R. Schnackenburg, God's Rule and Kingdom, trans. J. Murray (rev. ed.; New York: Herder & Herder, 1968); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. F. C. Burkitt (London: A & C Black, 1910 [1906]); J. C. Scott, Weapons of the Weak: Everyday Forms of Peasant Resistance (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985); idem, Domination and the Arts of Resistance: Hidden Transcripts (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1990); M. J. Selman, "The Kingdom of God in the Old Testament," TynB 40 (1989) 161-83; B. D. Smith, Jesus' Twofold Teaching About the Kingdom of God (NTM 24; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 2009); R. E. Watts, Isaiah's New Exodus and Mark (WUNT 2/88; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997); J. Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God, trans. and ed. R. H. Hiers and D. L. Holland (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971 [1892]); D. Wenham, The Parables of Jesus (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1989); W. Willis, ed., The Kingdom of God in 20th-Century Interpretation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1987); M. Wolter, "'Reich Gottes' bei Lukas," NTS 41 (1995) 541-63; E. J. Woods, The "Finger of God" and Pneumatology in Luke-Acts (JSNTSup 205; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); C. A. Ziccardi, The Relationship of Jesus and the Kingdom of God According to Luke-Acts (TGT 165; Rome: Editrice Pontificia Università Gregoriana, 2008).

J. B. Green

L

LAMB OF GOD

The phrase “lamb of God” occurs in the Bible only in John 1:29, 36. John’s term for “lamb,” amnos, occurs two other times in NT passages that liken Jesus’ suffering and death to the lambs (probaton and amnos) in LXX Isaiah 53:7 (Acts 8:32) and to a lamb without defect (1 Pet 1:19). With regard to John 1:29, there continues to be considerable debate about the meaning of the declaration “the lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world.” The debate largely centers on the possible background(s) of the phrase “lamb of God.”

1. Interpretations
2. The Lamb of God in John’s Gospel

1. Interpretations.

1.1. The Apocalyptic Lamb. C. H. Dodd argued that the lamb in John 1:29 must be understood as the apocalyptic, warrior lamb as found in Revelation (Rev 5:6, 12; 7:17; 13:8; 17:14; 19:7, 9; 21:22–23; 22:1, 3) and in some Jewish apocalyptic texts (1 En. 90:9–12; T. Jos. 19:8; T. Benj. 3:8). Thus, Jesus as the Lamb of God is the apocalyptic messiah-leader who would deal with the world’s sin not by sacrifice but by powerfully “taking away” or “removing” (airō) *sin (Jn 1:29) for those who believe in him. But, it is not at all certain that the Testament of Joseph 19:8 and Testament of Benjamin 3:8 are pre-Johannine or of Jewish origin, nor is it clear that any of the lambs in 1 Enoch 89–90 can be understood as apocalyptic messianic redeemers (Johns). Furthermore, the function of and the terminology used for the lamb in Revelation (arnion) and the lamb in John (amnos) are different (Johns; Nielsen). Nevertheless, Jesus as the lamb in Revelation is pictured as “slaughtered” (sphazō) (Rev 5:6, 12; 13:8), and the lamb’s blood “ransoms” (agorazō) (Rev 5:9) and “frees” (lyō) God’s people from sins (Rev 1:5).

1.2. The Lamb of Isaiah 53. Others point to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 as the likely background to John’s “lamb of God” because the servant in Isaiah 53:7 is described as a “lamb” (amnos) who is slaughtered and one who “bears” the sins of others (Is 53:4, 11) (Schnackenburg, 1:298–99) (see Servant of Yahweh). But if John intended to identify Jesus with Isaiah’s servant in John 1:29, why did he not write, “the servant [pais] of God”? J. Jeremias’s answer was to argue that John’s amnos is a mistranslation of the original Aramaic term ṭalyâ, probably spoken by *John the Baptist, a term that can mean both “servant” and “lamb.” Thus, what the Baptist said was, “Behold, the servant of God.” But, there is no evidence that ṭalyâ (or its Heb. counterpart, ṭāleh) was used to mean “servant,” nor is ṭāleh ever translated with amnos in the LXX (Dodd, 235–36). Another problem with this view is the different imagery used: in Isaiah the servant “bears” (pherō/anapherō) sins (Is 53:4, 11), but the Johannine Lamb of God “takes away” (airō) sin (Brown, 1:61).

1.3. Sacrificial Lambs. Some scholars point to the fact that John’s term amnos is used numerous times in the OT for various kinds of sacrificial offerings, such as continual (tāmīd) daily offerings (Ex 29:38–46) and other offerings (including the burnt, guilt, peace and sin offerings). It must be recognized, though, that “lamb” (amnos) was not the characteristic animal used in most of these expiatory offerings.

1.4. The Passover Lamb. Probably the most cited background to John 1:29 is that of the Passover lamb. This is particularly supported by the Passover context of Jesus’ death in John’s passion narrative (Jn 18:28, 39; 19:14, 29, 31–37), which suggests to many that the lamb in John 1:29 should be identified as the Passover lamb, whose atoning death deals with sin (Metzner; Keener, 2003). Most scholars, however, would not rule out other backgrounds as playing a role (Brown; Keener; Nielsen). Two problems are often leveled against this view. First, the term used for the Passover lamb in LXX Exodus 12 is probaton, not John’s amnos. Second, the Passover lamb was not an expiatory sacrifice for sin, although some would argue that in first-century A.D. Judaism and Christianity the Passover took on sacrificial functions (Morris, 127) (cf. 1 Cor 5:7).

2. The Lamb of God in John's Gospel.

In order to understand "lamb of God" on Johannine terms, John 1:29 must first be read in the light of the totality of John's narrative. The Baptist's declaration in John 1:29 is embedded in John's first chapter, which functions to introduce Jesus and his mission. Jesus is identified as the unique "Son of God" (Jn 1:14, 34), the Messiah (Jn 1:17) (see Christ) and the Lamb of God (Jn 1:29). As such, Jesus' mission will be to "remove" (airō) sin (Jn 1:29) (Ridderbos, 74-75; Metzner, 129) and to inaugurate the Isaianic restoration (Jn 1:23, 33; cf. Is 40:3; 11:2-4), a crucial part of which is in fact the removal of Israel's sin (cf. Is 27:9; 40:2; 53). This narrative introduction, which includes John 1:29, is the backdrop through which John's entire narrative portrayal of Jesus' mission is to be understood. In the ensuing narrative we find that the primary means of effecting eternal *life—that is, of delivering people from the bondage of sin, death and the devil (cf. Jn 3:16-17; 8:31-44)—is Jesus' salvific *death. The Fourth Gospel understands this death in varied but complementary ways: Jesus' death will effect life "for" (hyper) others: "The bread that I will give for the life of the world is my flesh" (Jn 6:51; cf. Jn 3:14-15; 10:11, 15; 11:51-52). Jesus' death is also the fulfillment of Israel's Passover (Jn 19:36; cf. Ex 12:46), so that as the Passover lamb in Exodus 12 functioned as an apotropaic sacrifice that protected Israel from death (Ex 12:23-37), so also Jesus' as the final Passover lamb will inaugurate a second exodus deliverance from sin, the world and the devil (Dennis) (see Demon, Devil, Satan). Furthermore, Jesus' death is the event that brings judgment on the world and "throws out" (ekblēthēsetai exō) the "ruler of this world" (Jn 12:31). The bondage to rebellion and sin will be broken for those who believe. Jesus' death "for others" and as the Passover lamb is certainly part of the narrative outworking of his mission as described in John 1:29. But perhaps it is his death as the event that "throws out" the ruler of this world that most directly functions as the narrative fulfillment of Jesus' mission to "remove" sin in John 1:29. A more direct relationship between John 1:29 and John 12:31 is especially apt in light of the fact that sin, the world and the devil are closely connected in this Gospel (Jn 1:10; 8:34, 41, 44; 12:31; 14:30; 16:8-11) (Dennis). Therefore, the Lamb of God in John 1:29 removes or deals with the world's sin in various ways in John's Gospel.

Finally, it is Jesus as the Lamb of God who removes sin in John 1:29. In a Gospel that is so saturated with OT/Jewish imagery, this unique combination of the concepts of an animal (lamb) and of removing sin surely would evoke some kind of sacrificial (expiatory and/or apotropaic) connotation, even though there is nothing explicitly said about sacrifice or death in the context of John 1:29. If the connection between John 1:29 and John 12:31 noted above is valid, then perhaps the apocalyptic lamb should be brought to the fore. But even this lamb, it must be remembered, "frees" (lyō) his people from sins by his death (Rev 1:5; 5:9). With the designation "Lamb of God," then, John seems to have coalesced together a number of "lamb" figures so that "memories of several lamb figures in the OT" (Morris, 129-30) are evoked. Therefore, pinning on John's Lamb of God just one background unjustifiably restricts John's otherwise thick and varied portrayal of Jesus and his mission.

See also DEATH OF JESUS; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; SIN, SINNER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Brown, The Gospel According to John: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (2 vols.; AB 29, 29A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966-1970); J. Dennis, Jesus' Death and the Gathering of True Israel: The Johannine Appropriation of Restoration Theology in the Light of John 11.47-52 (WUNT 2/257; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965); L. L. Johns, Lamb Christology of the Apocalypse of John: An Investigation into Its Origins and Rhetorical Force (WUNT 2/167; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003); C. Keener, The Gospel of John: A Commentary (2 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003-2010); A. Lincoln, The Gospel According to St. John (BNTC 4; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2005); R. Metzner, Das Verständnis der Sünde im Johannevangelium (WUNT 122; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); L. Morris, The Gospel According to John (rev. ed.; NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); J. Nielsen, Die kognitive Dimension des Kreuzes: Zur Deutung des Todes Jesu im Johannevangelium (WUNT 2/263; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009); H. Ridderbos, The Gospel According to John: A Theological Commentary, trans. J. Vriend (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); R. Schnackenburg, The Gospel According to St. John (3 vols.; New York: Crossroad, 1987).

J. Dennis

LANGUAGES OF JESUS. See LANGUAGES OF PALESTINE.

LANGUAGES OF PALESTINE

Ancient Palestine was culturally and linguistically diverse in the time of Jesus. The principal languages used in Palestine in this period were Aramaic, Greek and Hebrew. Through understanding the languages of first-century Palestine we can obtain a clearer picture of Jesus' cultural context and a more precise understanding of the Gospels as literature. This article begins with a brief survey of the roles played by the main languages employed in Palestine in Jesus' day. Then it looks at the Gospel accounts of Jesus' words and interactions and considers what they tell us about Jesus' language usage. Finally, it addresses questions related to the language of the Gospels: What kind of Greek is "New Testament" Greek? Were there Semitic (Aramaic or Hebrew) sources used by the Gospel writers?

1. Preliminary Considerations
2. Languages of Palestine
3. The Language of Jesus
4. The Languages of the Gospels

1. Preliminary Considerations.

1.1. Studies of Multilingual Societies. Not everyone in Palestine spoke more than one language, but evidence suggests that many people were multilingual. Social-scientific studies of modern multilingual cultures have provided numerous models and categories that can assist in elucidating the linguistic situation of ancient Palestine. Two areas of research that have been especially helpful are represented by the terms bilingualism and diglossia.

Studies of bilingualism have provided models to describe the relationship between two languages spoken by an individual in a multilingual environment. For example, for a Palestinian Jewish woman of the first century who grew up speaking Aramaic and picked up Greek as a young teenager, her native Aramaic might impact the specific character of her Greek. At the same time, if Greek was the more prestigious language in her cultural context, Greek expressions may have affected her hometown Aramaic.

The concept of diglossia relates to the coexistence of two forms of a language, or else two different but related languages, one of which is used for informal communication (the "low" form) and the other reserved strictly for formal usage (the "high" form). Generally speaking, studies of diglossia have brought into sharper focus how a multilingual individual might use one language for a given purpose and another language for a different purpose. Thus, a first-century Jewish male living in Jerusalem might speak Aramaic at home and in other conversational settings, but may use Hebrew in connection with his activities at the temple or in discussing matters of Torah interpretation.

1.2. Limits of Research. Among many points of uncertainty related to the languages of ancient Palestine, the most significant problem is that our evidence is preserved in writing, and it is difficult to identify what languages people actually spoke. As an example, some scholars have suggested that inscriptions on ossuaries (boxes in which bones were placed for secondary burial) were of such a personal nature that they must reflect the spoken or colloquial language of the family; conversely, others have argued that burial was a formal setting, and that ossuary inscriptions represent not the colloquial language but rather the language of cultural identity (similar to Latin inscriptions today in public places where no one speaks Latin). This is the kind of interpretive difficulty with which we are constantly faced. Although we have significant positive evidence for the use of Aramaic, Greek and Hebrew, when it comes to ascertaining who used which languages for what purposes, we often must content ourselves with explanations that are possible but not certain.

Latin was also employed in a limited way in the first century A.D. for administrative purposes, and it appears on the notice that *Pilate fastened to the cross (Jn 19:20). But its use was so limited that it will not be treated in this article.

2. The Languages of Palestine.

2.1. Aramaic. Aramaic belongs to the Northwest Semitic family of languages, the other major branch of this family being Canaanite (including Ugaritic, Moabite and Hebrew). Aramaic was spoken by the inhabitants of Aram, the region north and northwest of Canaan. Aram and Arameans are mentioned in the patriarchal narratives of Genesis (e.g., Gen 24:10; 25:20; cf. Deut 26:5), and Aramaic inscriptions from northern Syria and Mesopotamia have been discovered that date as early as the ninth century B.C.

In the late eighth century B.C. the Neo-Assyrian Empire adopted Aramaic as its international language of commerce and diplomacy. At this point, most Judeans spoke Hebrew and could not understand Aramaic (2 Kings 18:26). But Aramaic persisted as an international language under the Neo-Babylonian (ca. 626–539 B.C.) and Persian (ca. 539–332 B.C.) Empires. This created a standardized literary form of the language known as Imperial Aramaic, which came to be used throughout the ancient world from India to Asia Minor and into Egypt. Imperial Aramaic is reflected in the Aramaic sections of Ezra dealing with Persian administrative affairs (Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12–26) and also in the Aramaic letters, contracts and other documents from fifth-century B.C. Jews in Elephantine Egypt. Aramaic probably was spoken by many of the peoples that the Assyrians settled in Samaria after the fall of the northern kingdom (2 Kings 17:24–33), and the Judeans who returned from the Babylonian exile appear to have adopted Aramaic as a colloquial language, as illustrated by the Aramaic court tales of Daniel 2:4b–7:28 and the need for explanation and perhaps translation to accompany the Hebrew Torah reading in Nehemiah 8:8. Aramaic ostraca (broken pieces of pottery used for writing) from the fourth and third centuries B.C. show the continuing significance of Aramaic among Jews in Palestine. Starting in the third century B.C., we begin to find documents and inscriptions that reflect both Aramaic and Greek, as Greek became the new language of administration.

Beginning in the second century B.C., when Aramaic was no longer an imperial language, we find written evidence for distinctive dialects of Aramaic used in various regions, including Nabatean Aramaic from South Arabia and Palestinian Aramaic, the closest dialect to the older Imperial Aramaic. After the third century A.D. further developments appear in Aramaic, such as the emergence of Syriac in the east and the Aramaic of the Palestinian Talmud in the west. Consequently, the evidence most relevant for understanding the language of Jesus comes from Palestine between 200 B.C. and A.D. 250, although certain Aramaic Targumim (biblical translations) known only in later manuscripts are also relevant because they are based on language that goes back to the first century A.D.

Epigraphic evidence from this period generally supports the idea that Aramaic was the primary language in the first century A.D. for much of Palestine, and certainly for Galilee. Aramaic is represented in more epigraphic sources from this time than Hebrew or Greek (Horsley, 164). There are numerous Semitic inscriptions on ossuaries, but since most are only proper names, it is impossible to tell whether they are Hebrew or Aramaic. Yet, longer inscriptions exist that clearly use Aramaic, such as eight stone blocks marking the boundary of Gezer written in Aramaic and Greek, a stone slab from a burial tunnel in Jerusalem identifying the resting place of the bones of King Uzziah and warning people not to disturb them, and an ossuary lid with an Aramaic inscription that uses the word qorbān (cf. Mk 7:11). These were public inscriptions clearly meant to be understood. Greek was the official language of the governing authorities, and Hebrew was the language of Scripture and temple, so there is no reason for Aramaic to appear so prominently unless it was the language that people actually used.

Similar observations can be made regarding the many private documents (e.g., letters, contracts, inventories) in Aramaic that have been found at Wadi Murabbaʿat and Naḥal Ḥever. Many of these documents reflect the setting of the Bar Kokhba revolt (A.D. 132–135), a movement that placed particular emphasis on the use of Hebrew as part of its political ideology. Even still, at Naḥal Ḥever forty identifiable documents are in Aramaic, seventeen in Hebrew, and fifty-one in Greek. The numbers are similar at Wadi Murabbaʿat (sixteen Aramaic, seventeen Hebrew, seventy-five Greek, one Nabatean). The prevalence of Greek reflects the culture of Hellenistic and Roman rule, the Hebrew reflects nationalistic sentiment, and the Aramaic reflects the most natural mode of expression. This interpretation is supported by the thirty-five papyri written between A.D. 93 and 132 that make up the legal records of Babatha, daughter of Simeon: most are in Greek, as they are legal documents, but three are in Aramaic, and six are in Nabatean Aramaic, so as to be easily understood (Babatha came from just south of the Dead Sea, where Nabatean was spoken). One fascinating document is a receipt written in Greek with an Aramaic summary, and then a Greek translation of the Aramaic. The Greek is the official language of the receipt, and the Aramaic is given to make the contents intelligible.

Although Hebrew is more common than Aramaic at Qumran, much of the nonsectarian literature among the *Dead Sea Scrolls is in Aramaic, such as the Genesis Apocryphon and the Prayer of Nabonidus, as well as parts of the Testament of Levi and 1 Enoch. Most instructive are fragments of Aramaic translations of Job and Leviticus at Qumran, which suggest that although the community was devoted to classicizing Hebrew, Aramaic translations still were needed for some members. Indeed, already in the Mishnah (compiled ca. A.D. 225) it is assumed that Aramaic translations are being given for the Scripture reading (e.g., m. Meg. 4:4). Further *rabbinic evidence for Aramaic in first-century A.D. Palestine includes Aramaic quotations ascribed to figures such as Hillel (e.g., m. ʾAbot 1:13), marriage contracts written in Aramaic (m. Ketub. 4:7–12) and references to the first-century A.D. Aramaic work Megillat Taʿanit. Although the traditional written Targumim come from a later date, the earliest layers of phraseology contained within Targum Onkelos and Targum Jonathan, and perhaps also the so-called Palestinian Targums, probably reflect the kind of Aramaic used in the first century A.D.

Greek sources from the first century A.D. also shed light on the use of Aramaic in Palestine. *Josephus transliterates many common Aramaic terms such as “Sabbath,” “Passover” and “high priest.” Moreover, Josephus explains in his preface to Jewish War that he wrote an earlier account of the war in his “native language” so that it might be read by those of his own race beyond the Euphrates, in Syria and in Arabia (J.W. 1.3-6); this means that Josephus must have written his original account of the Jewish War in Aramaic. In referring to Aramaic as his “native language,” Josephus does not mean to exclude Hebrew. In reality, Josephus appears to make no distinction between Hebrew and Aramaic, as is also true of the NT, which uses the adverb “in Hebrew” (hebraisti) to describe words that are clearly Aramaic (e.g., “Gabbatha” in Jn 19:13). Thus, although some Jews (e.g., at Qumran) showed interest in using the classical language of Scripture (Hebrew) rather than Aramaic, for many Jews Aramaic and Hebrew were considered a single language—that is, the language of the Jewish people (e.g., in opposition to Greek).

Aramaic seems to have been the most commonly spoken language in Palestine in the first century A.D. The extensive use of Greek and the particular functions of Hebrew in this period can be described against the backdrop of Aramaic as the widely spoken vernacular.

2.2. Greek. Classical Greek was made up of various dialects spoken in different regions. Because of the leading role played by Athens in fifth-century B.C. Greek culture, Attic prose developed into the most prominent expression of the Greek language. After the unification of the Greek-speaking world under Philip of Macedon (338 B.C.) and the subsequent expansion of Greek culture under Alexander the Great, Attic prose gave way to a common form of Greek called “Koine” (meaning “common”). Koine Greek became the language of administration for Greek cities and kingdoms that were established throughout the Mediterranean region, and it also served as the common basis of education in the Hellenized world (see Hellenism).

Following Alexander’s death (323 B.C.), Palestine was governed by the Ptolemaic kingdom of Egypt (third century B.C.) and then the Seleucid kingdom of Syria and Babylon (beginning in 198 B.C.), both of which were Hellenistic in culture and administration and promoted Hellenism within their spheres of influence. By the early second century B.C. many Jews had become conversant with Greek through economic or political dealings, and some Jews adopted significant elements of Greek culture (see, e.g., 1 Macc 1:11-15; Josephus, Ant. 12.240). Seleucid rule in Palestine continued until around 165 B.C., when Jewish resistance led by the Maccabees weakened Seleucid control, leading to an independent Jewish state known as the Hasmonean kingdom (142–37 B.C.), which ended when the Romans gave power to Herod the Great.

Hellenization in Palestine only increased under Herod the Great and his successors, who built many cities or refounded older towns as Greek cities, minted Greek-only coins, and left behind many Greek inscriptions. From the Hellenized cities in Palestine, Greek language spread into the countryside through administrative and economic contacts.

Of course, Hellenistic culture did not penetrate all regions of Palestine equally. Coastal cities such as Gaza and Ashdod had been predominantly Gentile before the Hasmonean period, and they remained so afterwards. Moreover, Galilee may have had a larger number of Greek speakers than did Judea. “Galilee of the nations” (Is 9:1; 1 Macc 5:15; Mt 4:15) was primarily Gentile before the Maccabean Revolt (cf. 1 Macc 5:23), and although many Jews had settled there during Hasmonean rule, Hellenistic cities around Galilee (Scythopolis, Acco-Ptolemais, Tiberias, etc.) were restored or built anew by the Romans.

There are many Greek inscriptions from the first and early second centuries A.D. Well-known examples include the stone block from Jerusalem warning Gentiles not to enter the temple, the “Ordinance of Caesar” from Nazareth written on stone forbidding anyone from robbing tombs, and the inscription found in Jerusalem from the first or early second century A.D. honoring Theodotus, who was “priest and synagogue ruler.” It is logical for the warning at the temple to be in Greek, since it was intended for Gentiles, but the Greek inscription found in the small town of Nazareth and the synagogue inscription in Greek exemplify the penetration of the Greek language into Palestine.

Greek also was used for everyday affairs within segments of Palestine. The numerous Greek ossuary inscriptions found around Jerusalem show that even among Jews who followed this distinctively Jewish practice Greek was an acceptable language for a memorial. Buyers and sellers of goods outside the temple used balances with Greek markers, and bone counters with Greek writing were used as theater tickets. Mention has already been made of the multitude of Greek letters, contracts and receipts found in the Judean wilderness in places such as Wadi Murabba'at and Naḥal Ḥever. It is remarkable that even among the documents connected with the Bar Kokhba Revolt, which emphasized Hebrew as an identity symbol, some of the letters were composed in Greek. In one letter requesting that preparations be made for celebrating Succoth, it is said, "This is written in Greek since [no one] was found to write it in Hebrew" (5/6Ḥev 52). It appears that the writer wanted the letter to be composed in Hebrew, but since this was not possible, he turned to Greek, perhaps because Greek was the language normally used for practical correspondence.

Most Jewish Greek literature from this time period comes from outside of Palestine, but a small number of texts can be identified with our region. A few Greek biblical texts have been discovered among the manuscripts of the Judean wilderness, the most important of which is the Minor Prophets Scroll of Naḥal Ḥever. The Jewish Greek author Eupolemus lived in the second century B.C. in Palestine. From the same century is Jason of Cyrene, author of the Greek history of the Maccabean Revolt of which 2 Maccabees is a summary. Two Jewish historians from first century A.D. Palestine are Justus of Tiberius and Flavius Josephus. Josephus grudgingly praises Justus's command of Greek, which Justus learned at Tiberias (Life 9.34-42; 65.336-360), and Josephus, while living in Palestine, knew Greek well enough to translate for Titus (J.W. 5.360-361; 6.96).

At the end of his Jewish Antiquities Josephus states that he has endeavored to write in good prose style, even though his native tongue hinders his pronunciation of Greek, and people of his country do not generally master other languages or adorn their style with pleasantries, since they reckon that anyone can learn to do this. Instead, Jews value study of the law, and few of them have succeeded in their study of Greek (Ant. 20.263-265). Josephus's point is not that few Jews knew Greek, but rather that few Jews attained the ability to write Greek at a high stylistic level. Josephus could speak Greek when he lived in Palestine, but he did not develop his abilities as a Greek stylist until he came to Rome (Ag. Ap. 1.50).

Since Josephus had to translate for Titus from Greek into Josephus's "native language," hebraizōn (i.e., Aramaic), we may assume that not all Jews were conversant in Greek. Aramaic still was the first language for most Jews in Palestine, and Greek was a secondary language used for business, getting around the city, or dealing with officials. The major exception to this was Jews who came to Judea from the Diaspora, many of whom spoke Greek as their first language and perhaps knew no Aramaic. These Diaspora Jews are the "Hellenists" referred to in Acts 6:1; 9:29, and probably they account for the disproportionately high number of Greek ossuary inscriptions found at Beth Shearim. Thus, there were Jews from the Diaspora living in Palestine who primarily spoke Greek, but otherwise Greek was a widely used but still secondary language behind Aramaic.

2.3. Hebrew. Hebrew is part of the Canaanite branch of the Northwest Semitic language family. It was the language adopted by the ancient Hebrews and was the main language of Judah before the Babylonian *exile (the "language of Canaan" in Is 19:18; yēhūdīt in 2 Kings 18:26). A few short texts written in preexilic Hebrew are known from inscriptions (e.g., the eighth-century B.C. Siloam inscription), but most of our evidence for Classical Biblical Hebrew (CBH) comes from the Hebrew Bible itself. Aside from the Aramaic parts of Daniel and Ezra, Jewish works written after the exile that became part of the Bible were still written in Hebrew, but the grammar of this Late Biblical Hebrew (LBH) differs slightly from CBH. Books reflecting LBH include Esther, Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah.

By the time the Jews returned from exile, Hebrew was in decline as the common spoken language in Judea—a fact seen as troubling in Nehemiah 13:24. Eventually, Aramaic replaced Hebrew as the vernacular. Still, knowledge of Hebrew persisted in Judea because of the continued importance of the Torah and other sacred writings, which were read and probably discussed in Hebrew, and also because of the prayers and rituals associated with the *temple in Jerusalem. As Aramaic came to be more widely spoken, Hebrew may even have taken on a character of prestige, especially since temple and Torah were promoted in Judea by the Persian Empire (Ezra 6:3-12; 7:12-26).

As Greek became more and more culturally significant under the Ptolemies and Seleucids, some Jews deemphasized traditional Jewish ways of living and adopted Greek customs that were seen by traditionalists as antithetical to Judaism. But in the early second century B.C., in the time of the Maccabean Revolt against the Seleucid Empire, a sense of Jewish cultural identity led to a revival of fresh literary compositions in classicizing Hebrew (close to LBH), such as Sirach, 1 Maccabees and Jubilees. Whereas the Ptolemies and Seleucids issued coins inscribed with Greek, the Hasmonean ruler John Hyrcanus (134-104 B.C.) issued coins in Hebrew. This symbolic gesture was repeated during the First (A.D. 66–70) and Second (A.D. 132–135) Jewish Revolts against Rome, when the Jewish fighters employed Hebrew but no Greek on their coins.

Until the discovery of the DSS, the most important body of literature showing the continuation of Hebrew beyond LBH was the corpus of rabbinic texts from the Tannaitic period, especially the Mishnah, which was written in a distinctive form of Hebrew known as Middle Hebrew (MH). MH is not simply the historical continuation of LBH, but neither is it a totally artificial language made up of LBH and Aramaic, as was once thought. It is now generally agreed that MH represents the later form of a colloquial version of Hebrew that dates back to the time when LBH books were written, since elements of MH can be seen in the linguistic developments found in LBH. By the second century B.C. LBH was merely a classicizing literary language, but MH was used orally, both in the service of the temple and in the context of Torah interpretation. In the second century A.D. the rabbis were still using MH alongside of Aramaic, which had a significant impact on MH (e.g., in the masc. pl. ending -n instead of -m). By the third century A.D. Aramaic began to be used even by the rabbis in their discussions of Torah, but MH survived in literary form in the Mishnah.

With the discovery of numerous Hebrew works among the DSS, we can now get a better picture of what Hebrew looked like from the second century B.C. to the first century A.D. Was this Hebrew more like earlier LBH, or more like later MH? And why did the community at Qumran write so much in Hebrew?

Even discounting the biblical manuscripts, the majority of texts found at Qumran are written in Hebrew. Out of some seven hundred nonbiblical texts, 120 are in Aramaic, twenty-eight in Greek, and the rest in Hebrew, including well-known works such as the Temple Scroll and the Damascus Document. Almost all of these Hebrew works are written in a classicizing style similar to LBH. The only two exceptions are (1) the Copper Scroll, a list of sites where gold or silver is buried, apparently connected to the temple and thus not “Qumranite,” and (2) a legal text, 4QHalakhic Letter (4QMMT), which deals with ritual purity in connection with liquids and is reminiscent of discussions found in the Mishnah. Both the Copper Scroll and 4QHalakhic Letter share characteristics with MH. This evidence is best interpreted in light of the linguistic ideology expressed in several Qumran texts.

The sectarian religious community at Qumran regarded temple Judaism as corrupt and saw itself as a purified holy community. Purity of Hebrew appears to be part of this ideology, as seen in 4Q464, which mentions the “holy language” and quotes Zephaniah 3:9, “I will restore to the peoples pure speech” (note also 1QH^a XV, 10: “my language is as one of your disciples”), and also texts such as 1QH^a X, 7, 18–19; XII, 16; CD-A V, 11–12, which charge the enemies of the Qumran community with corrupting God’s speech and using blasphemous and uncircumcised language. The Qumranites took the general pro-Hebrew sentiment of the early Maccabean era to the extreme, and they attempted to create a religious community that employed Hebrew as much as possible. The vast majority of the texts they produced aimed at imitating Biblical Hebrew (BH), which was thought to be the purist form.

The Copper Scroll, which is closer to MH, probably represents a written version of the Hebrew spoken in connection with temple functions, and the MH flavor of 4QHalakhic Letter probably represents the kind of spoken Hebrew used by Pharisaic Jews in discussing the Torah. Perhaps the Qumranites tried to speak MH as a daily language. In any case, the large number of Hebrew texts at Qumran does not suggest that most Jews in Palestine normally spoke Hebrew; rather, it reflects the commitment of the Qumran community to Hebrew purity, which meant the classicizing language of Scripture (BH) as much as possible, and perhaps MH as a spoken language.

The basic picture of Hebrew as the language of the temple is supported by the various Hebrew inscriptions discovered in and around Jerusalem. At the same time, Hebrew documents from Masada and from the Judean wilderness show that at least some who were committed to Hebrew were capable of using it for regular communication. Jews competent enough in Hebrew to discuss Torah in MH could also be enlisted to compose Hebrew documents for other purposes, especially in times of national crisis. This is why the Hebrew Bar Kokhba letters resemble MH rather than LBH.

Aramaic was the common language for most Jews in first-century A.D. Palestine, but Hebrew was still quite alive through the temple, the reading and study of Torah, and the desire of some Jews at certain times to express their identity by using not simply the common Jewish language (i.e., whether “Hebrew” or “Aramaic”), but Hebrew itself.

2.4. Summary. Most Jews in Judea and Galilee spoke Aramaic as their primary language, although there were Jews in both regions from the Diaspora who spoke primarily Greek. Generally, the number of Greek speakers was greater in Galilee than in Judea, but Greek was used throughout Palestine by Jews of all levels of society who interacted with the economic or political spheres controlled by Roman authorities. Hebrew was still used actively in connection with temple rituals and by those who studied and interpreted the Torah. Although for most Jews Hebrew or Aramaic could be considered the “native language” of the Jews without distinguishing between the two, some Jews consciously chose to use the “proper” form of the Jewish language, Hebrew, for public inscriptions or in times of great religious or political significance.

3. The Languages of Jesus.

3.1. Introduction. The Gospels are written in Greek, but on a few occasions Jesus is presented as speaking a Semitic language. Furthermore, the Gospels record other Semitic words and phrases that reflect Jesus’ linguistic environment. Where they can be identified, most of these Semitic words appear to be Aramaic. It is improbable that Jesus spoke Aramaic only on rare occasions. It is much more likely that Jesus normally spoke Aramaic (or sometimes Hebrew), and that the Gospel writers only occasionally offer Semitic words because these words were preserved in their sources, or because they wanted to communicate the “feel” of the authentic world of Jesus to their readers. Although Aramaic seems to have been the primary language of Jesus, based on his interactions as presented in the Gospels we can infer that he probably had some proficiency in Hebrew and Greek as well.

3.2. Semitic Words of Jesus. The Gospel of Mark preserves the greatest number of direct Semitic sayings of Jesus. At Mark 15:34 Jesus cries out from the cross, elōi elōi lema sabachthani, which is rendered (in Mark’s Greek) as “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” This is a quotation of Psalm 22:1, which in Hebrew reads ’ēlī ’ēlī lāmā ’āzabtānī. The form given by Mark for “my God” (elōi) is Aramaic, as is the verb used for “forsake” (šbq). The fact that Jesus quoted Psalm 22:1 from the cross in Aramaic strongly suggests that this was his “natural” language. Similarly, Jesus’ statement in Mark 5:41, talitha kōum, employs the Aramaic word for “little girl” (ṭalyā’ [talitā with the Aramaic emphatic ending]), and an Aramaic (cf. Syriac) pronunciation of the verb (qūm for fem. sg. instead of qūmī). The command ephphatha in Mark 7:34, translated as “Be opened,” could be Hebrew (Niphal impv. masc. sg. with the h sound not written) or Aramaic (Itepel impv. masc. sg. with the tāw assimilated). The word korban in Mark 7:11, translated as “gift,” is known from an Aramaic ossuary inscription from first-century A.D. Palestine in the phrase “gift to God” (qorbān), and abba in Mark 14:36 (cf. Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6) is Aramaic (’āb [’abbā’ is emphatic]). In sum, the speech of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark is consistently Aramaic.

The Gospel of Matthew also preserves Jesus’ words from the cross (Mt 27:46), although in Matthew the phrase “my God” (ēli) is closer to the original Hebrew (and also matches the form used in the Targum to Psalms). The form raka in Matthew 5:22 is Aramaic, and māmōnas in Matthew 6:24 (cf. Lk 16:9, 11, 13) could be either Aramaic (e.g., the Palestinian Targum to Gen 34:23) or Hebrew (e.g., Sir 31:8) and apparently had a close cognate in Punic (see Augustine, Serm. Dom. 2.14.47; Serm. 113.2). Overall, the evidence in Matthew generally supports and does not contradict the idea that Jesus spoke Aramaic.

3.3. Other Semitic Words in the Gospels. Many other Semitic words are preserved in the Gospels, and they help to fill out the picture of Jesus’ language environment. Some of these words are translated into Greek by the Gospel writers. This is especially common in the Gospel of John, in which “Cephas” (Jn 1:42), “Bethesda” (Jn 5:2), “Gabbatha” (Jn 19:13) and “Golgotha” (Jn 19:17; cf. Mk 15:22; Mt 27:33) are Aramaic, whereas rabbouni (Jn 20:16; cf. Mk 10:51) and “Messiah” (Jn 1:41) could be Aramaic or Hebrew, and “Siloam” (Jn 9:7) is an old Hebrew place name. In Luke-Acts the translated words “Akeldama” (Acts 1:19), “Barnabas” (Acts 4:36) and “Tabitha” (Acts 9:36) are Aramaic; the derivation of “Elymas” (Acts 13:8) is uncertain. Matthew alone gives and translates “Emmanuel,” a Hebrew name from Isaiah 7:14.

Other Semitic words are not translated, and many of these may simply have been adopted into Greek as loan words. Such words include pascha (“Passover”), sabbaton (“Sabbath”), satanas (“Satan”), rabbi, and amēn. The first three reflect Aramaic in their transcription, rabbi could be either Aramaic or Hebrew, and amēn is Hebrew in origin. Worth mentioning in this context are two expressions from the NT that probably were used in early Christian liturgy: hōsanna (Mt 21:9, 15; Mk 11:9-10; Jn 12:13) and maranatha (1 Cor 16:22; Did. 10:6; cf. Rev 22:20). Hōsanna (“Save, please!”) is the Aramaic pronunciation of the petition found in Psalm 118:25, and maranatha (“Our Lord, come!”) is patently Aramaic (mārānā’ [“our Lord”] tā’ [“come”]).

3.4. Jesus, Greek and Hebrew. Although Aramaic appears to have been Jesus’ “native language,” we know that Greek and Hebrew were also used in various contexts in first-century A.D. Palestine, and there are hints in the Gospels that Jesus was functional in both languages. Luke 4:16-30 describes Jesus reading from a biblical scroll in a synagogue on the Sabbath, which indicates that he could read BH. Moreover, if discussions of the legal significance of Torah took place in some version of MH, as is suggested by 4QHalakhic Letter and the Mishnah, then Gospel passages such as Matthew 19:3-12 make it likely that Jesus spoke Hebrew, at least for that purpose.

As for Greek, if people from the Decapolis followed Jesus (Mt 4:25; Mk 7:31), this may imply that he could converse with them in Greek. Also, certain conversations that Jesus had with individuals who were not likely to know Aramaic suggest that he may have spoken Greek with them—for example, Jesus and the centurion (Mt 8:5-13), Jesus and the Syro-phoenician woman (Mk 7:25-30), and Jesus and Pilate (Jn 18:33-38; 19:8-11). Yet caution must be exercised in drawing linguistic conclusions from the details of these stories. What appears to be a direct conversation between Jesus and the centurion in Matthew 8:5-13 is said to take place through intermediaries in Luke 7:1-10. In the same way, someone may have served as a translator in the conversation between Jesus and Pilate but perhaps was omitted from John's account to make the story more vivid. Still, since Jesus was from Galilee, his father was a tradesman, and he seems comfortable traveling throughout all regions of Palestine, it is quite plausible that Jesus was able to speak some Greek.

4. The Languages of the Gospels.

4.1. The Greek of the Gospels. The language of the Gospels (and the NT generally) differs from the language of most literary works preserved from the classical Greek world. As a generalization, the Gospels are written in a simpler style and contain some expressions that stretch the limits of what might be considered "proper" Greek. Some of these features of style could be ascribed to the Semitic background of the NT. In this line of thought, the native Aramaic language of NT authors colored their Greek style, so that many of the grammatical constructions and word usages that seem unusual as Greek are simply Aramaic (or Hebrew) idioms coming literally into Greek. Some scholars have even talked about a specifically Jewish Greek dialect used by the authors of the NT.

A different perspective on NT Greek has come in the past century from the corpus of nonliterary papyri (private letters, contracts, inventories, etc.) discovered in Egypt written in a simple and sometimes grammatically imprecise version of Koine Greek. Many constructions that were once considered Semiticisms in the NT are now known from these papyri, which seem to represent the vernacular style of Greek. From this perspective, the Gospels are not written in a Jewish dialect of Greek but rather in something close to the vernacular Koine Greek of the times.

If any consensus has emerged, it is that NT Greek is not a unique dialect of Greek, but that individual expressions found in the NT can be ascribed to the writers' Semitic background. Thus, one can describe the Greek of the Gospels in terms of the stylistic options available for Greek authors generally, but one can also identify Semitic idioms within the standard Greek style employed. In a bilingual context the prestige language (Greek) is not likely to be changed by the language of the foreign learner (Aramaic), but the particular Greek expressions spoken or written by the learner might contain isolated words or idioms taken from the native language.

As to the stylistic level of the Gospels, it is important to note that not all Koine prose was the same. Some authors tried to reach the high stylistic level of great Attic authors of the past. This was a more artistic level of prose, as represented by Diodorus Siculus before the NT and Aelius Aristides afterwards. Most authors, however, wrote in some version of the Koine style; but even within Koine a distinction existed between literary Koine (e.g., Plutarch, Epictetus), which also included certain kinds of technical writing, and strictly popular Koine, which was closer to vernacular speech (e.g., Bion the Cynic, certain papyri).

Among NT books, the book of Hebrews is closest to Attic prose. Most of the NT, however, is written in the popular Koine, but without the pervasive solecisms indicative of the most vulgar papyri. Mark and Matthew reflect this popular Koine. As observed by Jerome (Vir. ill. 7), the Gospel of Luke was composed in a slightly higher style, closer to the literary Koine. The superior style of Luke can be seen in the complex period with which Luke begins (Lk 1:1-4), Luke's practice of replacing Mark's loan words with more literary words (e.g., Luke's epistatēs ["master"] for Mark's rabbi in Mk 9:5, Lk 9:33), and the participial and relative clauses that Luke employs where Mark uses simple parataxis. As for the Gospel of John, it is written in the popular Koine, but it has a distinctive stylistic feel due to its simple vocabulary and use of repetition.

Semitic idioms in the Gospels may be due to various causes. First, native speakers of Aramaic who learn Greek as a second language may introduce elements from their native language into their acquired language, as when Greek words take on new meanings under Semitic influence (e.g., angelos as “angel” and not simply “messenger”). Second, Semitic idioms may come about because the Gospel writers were consciously imitating the “biblical” style of the LXX. An example is the construction kai egeneto (“and it came to pass”). Third, certain Semitic idioms may be found in the Gospels because the Gospel writers made use of Semitic sources in composing their accounts.

4.2. Semitic Originals of the Gospels? A number of NT scholars have suggested that Semitic (usually Aramaic) sources underlie at least some of the Greek material in our canonical Gospels. In some cases textual problems in the Gospels are said to be resolved by recognizing an Aramaic source. Perhaps the most interesting (and controversial) of these proposals involve reconciling differences in Synoptic parallels by postulating a Semitic original. Thus, whereas Luke 11:41 has “but give as alms what is inside,” Matthew 23:26 has “cleanse first what is in the cup,” and the variants “give alms” and “cleanse” can be explained as different readings of the Aramaic, as either zky (“to give alms”) or dky (“to purify”). Likewise, “you build” in Luke 11:48 and “you are sons” in Matthew 23:31 could simply be different ways of interpreting the Aramaic consonants bny.

In other cases parallels with ancient Aramaic literature suggest the possibility of a Semitic source. An example based on both shared language and exegesis is found in Mark 9:47–48, where Jesus interprets Isaiah 66:24 as a reference to Gehenna, agreeing with the Targum Isaiah, which adds “in Gehenna” at Isaiah 66:24. A similar example is Luke 10:25–28, where Jesus appears to allude to Leviticus 18:5 (Lk 10:28) in addressing the question of eternal life, and Targum Onqelos at Leviticus 18:5 adds the words “in eternal life” (cf. the Tannaitic midrash Sifra, ‘ahārē môt, paragraph 9, pereq 12, which uses the phrase “in the world to come” when quoting Lev 18:5).

These lines of research are intriguing but also raise many questions. First, are the presumed Semitic sources to the Gospels written or oral? Second, can Aramaic Targumim written down centuries after the NT be used to suggest possible sources for the NT? Or should NT scholars restrict themselves to Aramaic documents found at Qumran and similarly early material? Finally, if the language of the canonical Gospels is Greek, is it theologically fruitful to search for underlying Aramaic phrases behind the Gospels?

The question of Semitic sources opens out into a larger puzzle in the history of the canonical Gospels.

Numerous early Christian writers, including Papias (according to Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.16), Irenaeus (Haer. 3.1.1), Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 2.9.45), Origen (according to Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.25.4), Epiphanius (Pan. 29.9.4; 30.3.7) and Jerome (Vir. ill. 3) mention the existence of one or more Hebrew Gospels. A number of early Christian writers even give quotations from a supposed Hebrew Gospel source (e.g., Clement, Strom. 2.9.5; Origen, Comm. Jo. 2.6; Epiphanius, Pan. 30.13.6). Although several authors, such as Papias (early second century A.D.), connect the Hebrew Gospel with Matthew, the idea that the canonical Gospel of Matthew is based on a Semitic original has received little acceptance among NT scholars. Still, it is possible that the Hebrew Gospel referenced in these early Christian authors was a source for one or more of the canonical Gospels, perhaps Matthew (following Papias) or Luke (Edwards 2009). It has also been suggested that the purported source document that NT scholars call *Q was translated from an Aramaic original (Black 1998).

See also GALILEE; HELLENISM; JERUSALEM; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS; SCRIBES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. R. Adrados, A History of the Greek Language: From Its Origins to the Present (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005); M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts (3rd ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1998); J. Edwards, The Hebrew Gospel and the Development of the Gospel Tradition (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); J. A. Emerton, “Did Jesus Speak Hebrew,” JTS 12 (1961) 189–202; J. A. Fitzmyer, “The Languages of Palestine in the First Century A.D.,” in The Semitic Background of the New Testament, 2: A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Livonia, MI: Dove, 1997) 29–56; C. Hezser, Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine (TSAJ 81; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001); R. A. Horsley, Archaeology, History, and Society in Galilee (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996); S. A. Kaufman, “Languages (Aramaic),” ABD 4:173–78; H. Koester, History, Culture, and Religion of the Hellenistic Age (2nd ed.; New York: de Gruyter, 1995); M. McNamara, Targum and Testament Revisited: Aramaic Paraphrases of the Hebrew Bible; A Light on the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010); A. Millard, Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus (BibSem 69; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); T. Muraoka and J. F. Elwolde, eds., Diggers at the Well: Proceedings of a Third International Symposium on the Hebrew of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Ben Sira (STDJ 36; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000); G. Mussies, “Greek in Palestine and the Diaspora,” in The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural, and Religious Life and Institutions, ed. S. Safrai and M. Stern (2 vols.; CRINT 1/1; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974-1976) 2:1040-64; S. E. Porter, ed., The Language of the New Testament: Classic Essays (JSNTSup 60; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991); idem, ed., Diglossia and Other Topics in New Testament Linguistics (JSNTSup 193; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); A. Sáenz-Badillos, A History of the Hebrew Language, trans. J. Elwolde (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), rev. and ed. G. Vermes, F. Millar and M. Black (3 vols. in 4; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1973-1987) 2:1-28; S. Schwartz, “Language, Power and Identity in Ancient Palestine,” Past and Present 148 (1995) 3-47; P. W. Van der Horst, “Greek in Jewish Palestine in Light of Jewish Epigraphy,” in Hellenism in the Land of Israel, ed. J. J. Collins and G. E. Sterling (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2001) 154-81; B. Z. Wacholder, “The Ancient Judaeo-Aramaic Literature (500-614 BCE): A Classification of Pre-Qumranic Texts,” in Archaeology and History in the Dead Sea Scrolls: The New York University Conference in Memory of Yigael Yadin, ed. L. H. Schiffman (JSP-Sup 8; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990) 257-81; S. Weitzman, “Why Did the Qumran Community Write in Hebrew?” JAOS 119 (1999) 35-45; M. Wilcox, “Semiticisms in the New Testament,” ANRW II.25.1 (1984) 978-1029. M. Graves

LAST SUPPER

The Gospel accounts of the Last Supper (Mt 26:26-29 // Mk 14:22-26 // Lk 22:14-23; Jn 13-17) have proved over the course of history to be some of the most exegetically scrutinized passages within the fourfold Gospel *canon, if not within the NT as a whole. Given the foundational role of these texts (along with 1 Cor 11:17-26) in the church's evolving understanding of the Lord's Supper, this is hardly surprising. Despite such attention, these same passages and the life behind the texts—the precise intentions of the evangelists and indeed of the historical Jesus himself—remain fraught with mystery. While one might be forgiven for thinking that the considerable agreement across the traditions would enable historians and theologians alike to arrive at a broadly shared understanding of the Last Supper, the brevity of the reports of the meal, together with their highly allusive quality, renders interpretation difficult on a number of levels.

Among the accounts there are some family resemblances. Mark's version, the shortest, shares much in common with Matthew; Luke's text lines up most closely with Paul's instructions to the Corinthians. The report of John's Gospel is unique and as such brings its own set of critical issues that have engendered considerable discussion. Whereas in an earlier day such an intricate synopsis had piqued scholarly interest in determining which of these might be the earliest (H. Schürmann offered the classic study for Luke's priority [Schürmann, 82-132], even as J. Jeremias stood by Mark [Jeremias, 189-91]), this interest, with increasing recognition of the complexities involved, has since waned. In any case, the unique perspectives of the individual evangelists must be considered alongside the historical event standing behind their respective accounts.

1. Mark
2. Matthew
3. Luke
4. John

1. Mark.

For much of the twentieth century the history-of-religions reading of Mark 14:22-25 remained dominant, maintaining that the evangelist's account of the meal was a “cult legend” developed within Pauline circles as part of a communal attempt to lend ideological support to ongoing eucharistic practice. From here it was but a short step to conclude that the Gospel accounts were in fact little more than whole-cloth fabrications. More recent scholarship has generally frowned on such skepticism. Written less than twenty years after the event, Paul's witness to the “night that Jesus was betrayed” (1 Cor 11:17-26) is now generally, though not universally, considered as solid confirmation of Mark's report. Although various components of the passage have been attributed to post-Easter oral tradition or Markan redaction (e.g., some scholars have suggested that the cup sayings are relatively late), it is now seldom doubted that the historical Jesus did indeed sit down with his *disciples for a solemn meal the night before his death. At the same time, Mark's historical interest in the event does not mean that his presentation remained untouched by his consciousness of contemporary eucharistic practices. Much less are we to assume that the pericope stands at odds with his purposes as a storyteller. On the contrary, a close reading of the text demonstrates that precisely through his account of the Lord's Supper, Mark, like Matthew and Luke, has skillfully woven together several of his most important themes.

Quite clearly, Mark sets up the Last Supper as a Passover meal (Mk 14:12-21). In characterizing the meal in this way, Mark is seeking to highlight the redemptive nature of Jesus' impending death. Passover was the most significant of all Jewish festivals (see Feasts), commemorating Israel's release from the bondage of Egypt through the spreading of lamb's blood on the doorframes. Given the recurring themes of (new) exodus in Mark's narrative, the ominous intimations of Jesus' *death punctuating Mark's Gospel (e.g., Mk 3:6; 8:31; 9:31; 10:32-34) and Jesus' self-identification as a "ransom for many" (Mk 10:45), the reader is prepared for Jesus' symbolically revealing himself through the meal as a Paschal lamb. Occurring on the eve of Jesus' execution, Mark's Last Supper becomes to the cross what the Passover ritual was to Israel's miraculous sea crossing. This is consistent with the early church's conviction that Jesus was "our Passover lamb" (1 Cor 5:7).

Upon examining Jesus' actions in Mark 14:22, the careful reader finds that his taking (labōn), blessing (eulogēsa), breaking (eklasen), and giving (edōken) of the bread follow the pattern established in the feeding of the five thousand ("taking" [labōn] . . . "blessed" [eulogēsen] . . . "broke" [kateklasen] . . . "gave" [endidou]) at Mark 6:41 and in the feeding of the four thousand ("taking" [labōn] . . . "blessed" [eucharistēsa] . . . "broke" [eklasen] . . . "gave" [endidou]) at Mark 8:6. Although some scholars have maintained that these actions would have been standard etiquette and thus their threefold repetition is hardly noteworthy, it is more likely that the verbal pattern serves to establish a common narrative thread. On this reading, if the two feeding miracles are indeed proleptic messianic feasts, indicative of Jesus' messianic identity and mission, then the Last Supper also promises to confirm Jesus' messianic role and his disciples' new calling in light of that role (see Table Fellowship). Thus, Mark's larger twofold preoccupation with establishing who Jesus is (Mk 1:1–8:29) and how he and his disciples are to play out their role of service and suffering (Mk 8:30–10:52) now come together climactically in the gesture of the Last Supper.

Focusing on the phrase "this is my body" as it might have been understood in the first century A.D., one might propose at least two layers of meaning. First, since Mark recounts the scene as a Passover meal, this suggests simply that the disciples' partaking the bread signals their own participation in the redemption of the new exodus, just as any first-century A.D. Jew would have signified participation in the first exodus by eating the Passover lamb (cf.

m. Pesah 10:5). Second, it is likely that Jesus intentionally laid hold of the aphikomen, the piece of bread traditionally set aside for the expected messiah and later identified with the messiah. If this is true, and if Mark and the other evangelists understood and sought to preserve this symbolism, then all three accounts are essentially depicting a scene in which Jesus is offering himself as the messiah, while the disciples, in ingesting the bread, are climactically confessing him as such. Such an explanation is consistent with Mark's intense interest in Jesus' messianic identity.

After distributing the *bread, Mark's Jesus takes up the cup and repeats the actions of taking, blessing and distributing (Mk 14:23). Whereas Jesus "blesses" (eulogēsa) the bread (Mk 14:22), now he "gives thanks" (eucharistēsa) over the cup. Between the two terms there is considerable overlap; the latter may have been employed simply to reinforce the connection with Mark 8:6 (where eucharistēsa also occurs). Some commentators understand this cup to be the fourth and last cup of the Passover ritual, which may be supported by Paul (1 Cor 11:25) and Luke's (Lk 22:20) agreement that Jesus took the cup "after the meal." However, others despair of linking Jesus' handling of the bread and cup with any particular moment in the Paschal ceremony. Part of the question here is whether Mark 14:22-25 is to be understood chronologically following Mark 14:17-21, where the meal itself is obviously under way. Nothing in either the syntax or the narrative logic of the text demands this.

Since our earliest evidence indicates that Seder participants had their own cups (Marshall, 83-84), we can, despite the paucity of data regarding first-century A.D. Passover practices, be reasonably confident that Jesus' offer of a common cup was an innovation. This creativity may have been part of an attempt to attach new significance to the gesture, perhaps emphasizing its socially integrative character (cf. 1 Cor 10:17). Jesus was giving a sharpened focus and a renewed cohesiveness to the fictive kin group that he had constituted. It is interesting that whereas Mark's Jesus interprets the bread and then invites the disciples to eat, when it comes to the cup, interpretation follows ingestion (Mk 14:24), a point that militates against the text's allegedly having been scripted as a liturgy (Collins, 656). Jesus then declares that the cup contains "my blood of the covenant which is poured out for many" (Mk 14:24). Whereas some have objected to the authenticity of this saying on the grounds that such phrasing would be linguistically impossible in Aramaic, objections of this sort have been persuasively refuted (see Casey). In any case, the statement, rich with scriptural allusions, usually has been judged to cohere well with both the aims of the historical Jesus and the narrative interests of Mark. At least three sets of scriptural references have been recognized, none of which are mutually exclusive.

First, an appeal to Zechariah 9:11 (“As for you also, because of the blood of my covenant with you, I will set your prisoners free from the waterless pit”) is arguably at play. Zechariah 9 has already proven seminal for at least two events in Mark 11: the *triumphal entry (Mk 11:1-10), where in the style of the messianic *shepherd of Zechariah 9:9 Jesus enters Jerusalem on a colt; and the *temple action (Mk 11:11-17), where in accordance with Zechariah 9:8 Jesus defends his “house” (Mk 11:17) and “keeps watch” (Mk 11:11). If it is also correct to identify “on that day” in Mark 14:25 as an echo of Zechariah 14:9 (Marcus, 1:156-57), then the cup saying’s link to the deeply eschatological text of Zechariah 9—14 is even more secure. The Zecharian context serves to cast Jesus’ mission in return-from-exile terms and suggests that the cup is somehow instrumental in that restoration (see Exile and Restoration).

Jesus’ cup saying reflects an even stronger connection with Exodus 24:8: “Moses took half of the blood and put it in basins, and then half of the blood he poured against the altar. . . . Moses then took the blood and poured it on the people, and said, ‘See the blood of the covenant that the LORD has made with you according to all these words.’” That this subtext involves the establishment of the Mosaic covenant, coinciding with Israel’s national formation, is hardly incidental. Mark has already shown concern to model Jesus’ ministry on the exodus narrative. Now, as he relates the final hours of that ministry, the evangelist capitalizes on recounting the meal as a covenantal meal, at least on par with the covenant issued through Moses. Even if the text-variant reading of “new covenant” (instead of simply “covenant”) at Mark 14:24 is spurious (which is likely), this does not alter what is essentially the case: in sharing the cup, Mark’s Jesus is in fact inaugurating a new covenant. For Mark, the Last Supper is an epochal moment, marking out a new redemptive-historical era.

Finally, the phrase “poured out for many” returns to the figure of the Isaianic Suffering Servant, who “poured out his life” for the sake of “many” (Is 53:11-12) (see Servant of Yahweh). This same Suffering Servant has been linked with Jesus earlier in Mark’s narrative, not least in the programmatic Mark 10:45. Whatever the precise nature of the atonement presented in Isaiah 53, it is clear that the cup saying associates Jesus with the Suffering Servant figure and therefore ascribes to Jesus’ body and blood, soon to be given up on a Roman cross, an atoning function. In associating atonement with the bread and cup, Mark’s Jesus may also be designating both as sacrificial food (the Didache understands the Eucharist in just this way). This in turn may constitute his disciples, as those who now handle sacrificial food, as priests. That the Last Supper was understood as such is supported by Paul’s warning against those who eat of the meal unworthily and thereby “sin against the body and blood of the Lord” (1 Cor 11:17), an argument that perhaps follows on the Jewish insistence that priestly partakers of sacrificial food be ritually pure. These implications certainly are consistent with the evangelist’s determination to depict the burgeoning Jesus movement in cultic terms. If all three scriptural allusions are sustainable, then Mark 14:24 attaches at least a twofold theological significance to the cross: Jesus’ death not only would atone for Israel’s covenantal unfaithfulness but also would seal the terms of a new covenant, affording a fresh basis for a new salvific economy.

Whereas Jesus elaborates only briefly on the bread, he has more to say in regards to the cup, adding that he will not drink of the fruit of vine a second time until he drinks it in the kingdom (Mk 14:25)—that is, at the *resurrection, when “the vine shall yield its fruit” (Zech 8:12 [cf. Is 25:6-8, 1 En. 62:13-16; 2 Bar. 29:5; 1Q28a II, 17-22; 1QS VI, 4-6]) (see Wine). As Second Temple Judaism understood it, the messianic feast was a celebration not only of Yahweh becoming king, but also of the people of God being ordained into a priestly order. Thus, Mark’s presentation of the Jesus movement as a burgeoning *temple order and the inaugural manifestation of the *kingdom of God blends elegantly with the priestly and royal aspects of the Last Supper.

2. Matthew.

Between Mark and Matthew there is a good deal of overlap in the Last Supper accounts. Like Mark, Matthew embeds his pericope within the context of a Passover meal (Mt 26:26 // Mk 14:22). Likewise, there is a recurrence of the verbs “take,” “break,” “bless” and “give,” also invoking Jesus’ earlier feeding *miracles (Mt 14:13-21; 15:29-39). Both evangelists connect the cup with “my blood of the covenant” (Mt 26:28 // Mk 14:24); both recount Jesus’ expectation of partaking the fruit of the vine again (Mt 26:29 // Mk 14:25). Such similarities have led scholars to conclude that whatever the precise relationship between the differing accounts of the Lord's Supper, Matthew and Mark remain very closely related.

Yet there are a number of minor differences, several of which may help illuminate Matthew's distinctive agenda. First, whereas Mark has "Take. This is my body," Matthew, perhaps under liturgical influence, includes a second imperative, "Eat" (Mt 26:66 // Mk 14:22). Liturgical practice may also have a hand in the change from Mark's description, "They drank from it—all of them," to Matthew's quotation of Jesus, "Drink from it—all of you" (Mt 26:27). Second, in Matthew the blood being poured out "for [peri] many" (Mt 26:28) differs from Mark's "on behalf of [hyper] many" (Mk 14:24). Even though Matthew may have a general preference for peri, the choice of preposition nonetheless intensifies the atoning idea, especially as it links with LXX Isaiah 53:10 (Davies and Allison, 3:474). Third, Matthew adds a new phrase to the "cup" saying, unique among the Last Supper accounts: "for the forgiveness of sins." The phrase has a number of functions: it (1) alludes to one of the staple terms of the new covenant (Jer 31:31-34; cf. Mt 2:18); (2) fills out the introductory promise that Jesus will save his people from their sins (Mt 1:21); (3) provides closure to an earlier plea for divine *forgiveness (Mt 6:12); (4) gives significant backing to Jesus' controversial act of forgiveness (e.g., Mt 9:1-8). Fourth, Matthew inserts the phrase meth' hymōn ("with you"), which in a theologically powerful move ties the Last Supper to his special interest in the "Emmanuel principle" (cf. Mt 1:23; 17:17; 24:31; 25:34; 28:20) (Luz; Smit). Fifth, Matthew has "the kingdom of my Father" (tē basileia tou patros mou) in place of Mark's "the kingdom of God" (tē basileia tou theou), not only reflecting the first evangelist's limited use of the phrase "kingdom of God," but also recalling once again the Lord's Prayer, which asks for the ushering in of the "kingdom" of the "Father" (Mt 6:9-10) (see Prayer). Indeed, the many intertextual connections between the Lord's Prayer and the Lord's Supper, including the request for "daily bread" (Mt 6:11), have led a number of commentators, particularly patristic commentators, to interpret the former in light of the latter.

Matthew's editorial shaping of the Last Supper account may in part be explained by certain christological interests. Matthew's decision to preserve the verbal echoes of Exodus 24:8, Isaiah 53:10 and possibly Zechariah 9:11, already discernible in Mark's text, reinforces his presentation of Jesus. By modeling Jesus' actions on the covenant-making activity of Moses (Ex 24:8), Matthew seems to round out the Moses-Jesus typology, which figures so prominently in the opening chapters: Jesus is the new *Moses, the inaugurator and mediator of a new covenant for a new-covenant people. Jesus is also decisively shown to be the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 (cf. Mt 8:17). Even if scholars disagree as to the significance of this identification, it would be hard to dispute, especially in view of the Matthean leitmotif of blood (e.g., Mt 23:30, 35; 27:4, 6, 8, 24-25), intimations of Jesus' role as righteous sufferer (Ham, 67-68). Finally, the additional possible nod to the Zecharian shepherd builds on earlier intertextually derived themes (e.g., Mt 9:36; 21:5, 12-16; 23:35), even as it anticipates further revelations of Jesus' identity as the stricken and betrayed shepherd (Mt 26:14-16, 31; 27:3-10) (Moo, 173; Wright, 560-61; Ham, 63).

Other, broader Matthean themes also intersect with his presentation of the Lord's Supper. First, if the ancients expected righteous rulers to provide food for their people, then Jesus' provision of bread in the wilderness (Mt 14:13-21; 15:32-39), following his earlier indictment of the current age (under the current authorities) as one of "hungering and thirsting" (Mt 5:6), has already marked itself off as a religio-political gesture. Now the same gesture is repeated and more tightly focused at the Last Supper (see Smit, 255-58). Second, recurring reference to the eschatological banquet (Mt 8:11-12) and more specifically to the eschatological wedding banquet (Mt 22:1-14; 25:1-13) now comes into view together in the final meal. At this point it becomes clear that Jesus' mixed *table fellowship, the source of so much criticism (Mt 9:9-13), was itself a harbinger of the heavenly banquet. Those who belong to this inaugurated banquet are those who have faith (Mt 8:10-12), who wear the appropriate garments (Mt 22:11-14) and who are sufficiently "ready" (Mt 25:11-12); these are the blessed righteous who take their places as guests of Jesus at the Last Supper (Mt 26:29). Third, and on a related point, the Last Supper scene crystalizes Matthew's interest in community self-definition, apparent from the very start (Mt 1:1-16) yet continuing through several nodal points (e.g., Mt 16:18; 18:15-35). In Matthew's composition the Lord's Supper becomes a unifying point for various important threads.

3. Luke.

Luke's version of the Lord's Supper (Lk 22:14-20) most closely aligns with Paul's (1 Cor 11:23-26), even as it shares certain features of the Markan-Matthean tradition, both in agreement with the Corinthian text and against it. Shared across the board is the fourfold action of taking the bread, giving thanks, breaking it and giving it; likewise, Jesus' identification of the bread with his body also obtains in all four records (Lk 22:19 // Mt 26:26 // Mk 14:22 // 1 Cor 11:23-24). Between Luke and Paul alone one finds strikingly similar phrases bearing on the injunction “Do this in remembrance of me” (Lk 22:19 // 1 Cor 11:24) and the words “And he did the same with the cup after supper, saying, ‘This cup that is poured out for you is the new covenant in my blood’” (Lk 22:20 // 1 Cor 11:25). Lacking in Paul but present in the triple tradition is Jesus’ statement regarding his drinking from the vine in the future (Lk 22:28 // Mt 26:25 // Mk 14:25) and his blood being “poured out” (Lk 22:20 // Mt 26:28 // Mk 14:24). As in Matthew and Mark, the future drinking from the vine will take place in the kingdom (Lk 22:18 // Mt 26:29 // Mk 14:25). This leaves a good amount of material unique to Luke, including the notice that Jesus and his apostles were reclining at the table (Lk 22:14), Jesus’ statement regarding his eagerness to consume this meal before his suffering (Lk 22:15) and the expectation of eating the bread again at the fulfillment (Lk 22:16). This makes Luke’s version the longest of the accounts, quite apart from Luke 22:19b-20 (which is omitted in the premier Western text but generally recognized as authentic).

Luke’s Last Supper is one of a number of meals, which are of special thematic interest to this evangelist. It is, of course, a meal that is distinctive in its own right. For example, even more so than in Mark and Matthew, the Lukan scene is stylized as part of a larger *farewell discourse (Lk 22:1-38), leading readers to expect a focal figure who in anticipation of his death reflects on the past and issues exhortations and promises about the future (Kurcz; Sellew, 75-77). At the same time, the Last Supper falls in line with *Mary’s expectation that the Messiah would “fill the hungry with good things” (Lk 1:53) and with the association, made explicit several times in Luke, between meals and the kingdom of God (Lk 13:29; 14:15). Luke’s reader surmises that this final meal is similar to other meals not only for *repentant sinners (Lk 5:30-32; 7:34; 15:2, 23-32; 19:7), but also for the socially outcast (Lk 14:16-24; 16:22). It also stands in contrast to other meals, particularly those with Jesus’ opponents (Lk 7:36-50; 11:37-54; 14:1-24), who give expression to and reinforce their social hierarchy through the Greek-style symposium (Smith). It is, of course, precisely this hierarchy, which through his own meals with sinners and quintessentially through the Last Supper, that Jesus seeks to deconstruct.

Within Luke’s narrative the Last Supper is a centerpiece within a triptych of meal scenes: the feeding of the five thousand (Lk 9:10-17), the Last Supper itself (Lk 22:14-20) and the incident on the Emmaus road (Lk 24:28-35). Like Matthew and Mark, Luke forges a link between Jesus’ specific actions at the Last Supper (taking, blessing, breaking, giving) and the same actions at the feeding miracle (Lk 9:16; 22:19); the same four verbs also occur in the meal at Emmaus (Lk 24:30). For Luke, as for Matthew and Mark, the connection between the feeding of the five thousand and the Last Supper serves to define the latter as a kind of messianic banquet to which the marginalized are invited.

For some scholars, Jesus’ eating at Emmaus—as well as the subsequent meals in Acts—is Luke’s attempt to cash out Jesus’ promise that he would eat with the disciples again in “fulfillment in the kingdom of God” (Lk 22:16). However, the very fact that Jesus promises to eat “it” (auto [Lk 22:16])—that is, precisely “this Passover” (touto to pascha [Lk 22:15])—in the kingdom militates against the suggestion: the last Passover consumed in Luke-Acts is that of the Last Supper. Like the other evangelists, Luke considers the kingdom as having already arrived yet awaiting full arrival; therefore, neither the kingdom nor Jesus eating in it can be said to be “fulfilled.” This, however, is not to disassociate the Last Supper from the Emmaus meal and the subsequent meals in Acts; rather, they are to be understood as occupying the same trajectory, heightening eschatological expectation and casting the post-Easter meals as emblems of the arriving kingdom (Green 1997, 760-61). Yet it remains appropriate that in Luke the Lord’s Supper situates itself between the feeding miracle and the Emmaus revelation, for, much like the Passover itself, it both looks back to the exodus of the past (of which the feeding is an antitype) and looks forward to the exodus to come (initiated already through Jesus’ resurrection).

Among other features distinctive of Luke’s account is the use of the word “apostles” (Lk 22:14) in reference to the disciples. True, compared to the other evangelists, Luke is relatively fond of the word (Luke, 6x; Matthew, 1x; Mark, 2x; John, none); nevertheless, inasmuch as the term draws attention to the disciples’ status as sent ones, Luke seems to be drawing a particular connection between the Twelve’s participation in the Last Supper and their call to evangelize, which is a central concern of Acts. Among the Synoptics, only in Luke do we find the disciples reclining (anapiptō), the posture of Passover because reclining was the posture of freedom. It is perhaps for this reason, despite the warnings issued to his disciples about the possible moral dangers of reclining (Lk 14:10; 17:7), that Luke is careful to specify the disciples' physical position.

It is also noteworthy that in the words of institution Luke alone among the evangelists makes repeated reference to the kingdom of God (Lk 22:16, 18). In the same context he uniquely mentions the word "Passover" (Lk 22:15), and indeed this Passover is said to be fulfilled in the kingdom. Such language not only is a function of Luke's particular interest in the theme of fulfillment (Lk 1:1; 4:21; 9:31; 18:31; 21:22, 24; etc.) but also underscores the evangelist's determination to equate new exodus with the arrival of the kingdom (Lk 1:68-79; 9:28-36) (see Pao, 95-96). Assuming that the allusion to Exodus 24:8, which obtains for Mark and Matthew, is equally operative for Luke in Luke 22:20 ("blood which is poured out"), one gathers that for Luke, the Last Supper proleptically represents the unfolding climax of the kingdom, representing Jesus' sacrificial death, his resurrection, his *ascension and the parousia.

Luke's eagerness to fuse the concepts of Passover and Jesus' new exodus also comes to fore in his phrasing, paralleled in Paul (1 Cor 11:24) but lacking in Matthew and Mark, that the disciples are to "do this in remembrance of me" (Lk 22:19). Inasmuch as "remembrance" of the exodus was a key feature of the Passover (m. Pesah 10:5), Jesus' exhortation that the disciples re-perform the supper as a ritualized marker of a new Passover makes good sense. Yet it would be a mistake to restrict the sense of "remembrance" to mere cognition. D. Senior's remarks are worth quoting at length: "The command to 'Do this in remembrance of me' means more than continuing Jesus' practice of life-giving meals with disciples and outcasts. . . . Jesus had stated that the bread broken and cup poured out is himself in the act of dying for others. It is this central act of Jesus' mission . . . which the community is to 'do in remembrance of me'" (Senior, 64).

Finally, whereas Matthew and Mark have only the word "covenant," Luke, along with Paul (1 Cor 11:25), retains the phrase (from Jeremiah) "new covenant" (Lk 22:20), sharpening the connection with Jeremiah 31:31-34. Two key components of this new covenant are the inscribing of the law on the hearts of the renewed humanity (Jer 31:33) and the promise of forgiveness (Jer 31:34). If the former is given expression through Luke's extensive treatment of the Spirit in both Luke and Acts (see Holy Spirit), the latter also emerges through the Lukan theme of forgiveness (e.g., Lk 1:77; 4:18; 6:37). Arguably, there is no evangelist more conscious of Jesus' inaugurating the Jeremianic new covenant than Luke, and the words of institution confirm this.

4. John.

Like the Synoptic Gospels, John has an account of the Last Supper. Indeed, John's Gospel has a particular interest in the event. Wherever the supper may be thought to leave off in the narrative (a number of commentators see Jn 14:31 as its proper terminus), the essential thematic unity of the discourse of John 14-17, which naturally ties to John 13, constitutes roughly one-fifth of this Gospel, making John's account of the Last Supper by far the most expansive of any of the four. This, together with extended treatment of Jesus' flesh and blood in John 6 (see 4.3 below), may well suggest, despite some scholarly opinion (Bultmann; Lohse) to the contrary, that the meal in John's Gospel assumes a heightened theological significance vis-à-vis the triple tradition.

Of course, between John on the one side and the Synoptic tradition on the other there are notable points of difference. While John's Gospel appears to locate this meal on the evening before Passover, the Synoptics univocally describe the meal as a Passover meal and therefore on the night of the Passover. John omits the words of institution (cf. Mt 22:26-29 // Mk 14:22-25 // Lk 22:15-23) but includes instead a symbolic footwashing as a conspicuous piece (Jn 13:1-20); in the triple tradition the words of institution are pushed to the forefront with no mention of any footwashing. Whereas in the Synoptic tradition the feeding of the five thousand closes with little comment, John's narrative contains at the same point an extensive discourse, seemingly fraught with eucharistic allusions (Jn 6:51-58). Differences such as these require explanation.

4.1. The Dating of the Last Supper. While the inconsistencies between the John's Gospel and the Synoptic tradition may at first blush incline us to see these two meal accounts as portraying two distinct occasions, the shared components (a solemn farewell meal accompanied by predictions of denial and apostasy, all occurring shortly before Jesus' arrest) militate against such a conclusion. Still, there is a rather pressing problem, as the Synoptics clearly convey the Last Supper as a Passover meal, in which case we would expect that event to have occurred on the night of Nisan 15, whereas John gives various indications that Jesus was executed before the evening of the Passover (Jn 13:1; 18:28; 19:14), implying a discrepancy of roughly twenty-four hours between John's account and the Synoptics. What are we to make of this?

One possibility is that John has preserved the correct dating, which means that Jesus expired on the afternoon of Nisan 14, as the Passover lambs were being slaughtered in preparation for the proscribed evening meal. (Recall that ancient Jews regularly counted sundown as the start of the day.) If so, this then raises the question of whether the Synoptic tradition has led centuries of readers down a garden path by presenting the meal as a Passover. J. Jeremias's definitive study, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, presents an impressive list of reasons why this is unlikely. Among other lines of argument, he points out that the meal (1) takes place in Jerusalem (a requirement for those eating the Passover); (2) occurs at night, as proscribed by Passover tradition, as opposed to the normal mealtime of late afternoon; (3) includes an interpretation from the host, an element that would have been expected, though certainly in different terms and with different references, in the Passover haggadah. Details such as these are hardly superficial and unlikely to have been merely tacked onto an antecedent tradition.

An alternative solution is to take the Synoptic record at face value, leading us to believe that the Last Supper was indeed a Paschal meal, and that John has left a misleading impression. A common explanation in support of this position is that John has moved the date of Jesus' death to Nisan 14, so that, even as the Passover lambs were being slaughtered at the temple, Jesus might become the replacement Passover lamb more fully. A variation on this approach is to harmonize John in the direction of the Synoptic account by giving a fresh reading of the relevant chronological indicators (e.g., Jn 13:1; 18:28; 19:14), which generally have been misunderstood as entailing Jesus' death falling before the Passover. Although arguments along this line have succeeded in making at least a partial case, one wonders whether this approach requires too much special pleading (see Marshall, 68-70).

A third general line of approach seeks to reconcile John and the Synoptics by positing either that Jesus intentionally took his Passover early (France; Wright) or that he adhered to a calendrical reckoning that was different from that of the temple (Jaubert; Strack and Billerbeck, 2:847-53). While no explanation is ironclad, the arguments of A. Jaubert and P. Billerbeck continue to find sanguine support in current scholarship (see Instone-Brewer; Nodet). Harmonizing proposals, if not strained, have the advantage of dispensing with the dubious assumption that the evangelists sat loose to chronological details, which, on account of the foundational nature of the event, would come to matter so deeply to the earliest believers (cf. 1 Cor 11:23-26) (see Synoptics and John).

4.2. John's Omission of the Words of Institution.

Given John's interest in the Last Supper, the absence of the words of institution is all the more conspicuous. This omission has been explained in various ways. One possibility is that the author of the John's Gospel was simply unaware of the tradition (Kysar, 259; Koester, 432-33). Alternatively, it has been suggested that John, unlike the Synoptic writers, was keen to preserve the words of institution as a secret mystery, preventing casual outside readers from becoming privy to the ritual (Jeremias, 125-37; Ball, 65). A third approach, quite popular for the better part of the twentieth century, ascribes John's silence to his supposedly antisacramental stance, which, according to this interpretation, is hardly undermined by rather clear allusions to the sacrament in John 6:51-58, since the same passage is to be explained as a late interpolation (Bultmann, 154-57; Lohse). A fourth approach, a softer version of the preceding option and one that allows for the essential unity of John 6, argues that John is not rejecting the sacrament wholesale but rather is emphasizing the meal's christological focus in the face of an overly high sacramentology, discernible in, for example, the early second-century writing of Ignatius (Ign. Eph. 20:2) (Dunn; Marshall, 133-39). Finally, it is also possible that John is aware of the Synoptic accounts and/or an oral eucharistic liturgy and is simply assuming as much on the part of his readership without polemical intent (Petersen, 207-8).

The foregoing competing explanations for John's failure to produce the words of institution have won varying numbers of adherents in the current discussion. That John was simply ignorant of the Eucharist is a position that, though maintained by several reputable Johannine scholars, is not generally supported. Neither has the second model, that John was intent on perpetuating the eucharistic tradition as a secret tradition, commanded a broad following. The third approach, which sees the text contained in John 6:51c-58 (plus or minus a verse or two) as late redaction, has also fallen on hard times; today the overall unity of John 6 seems all but secure (Culpepper 1997, 257; Petersen, 201-11). This leaves in play the final two approaches cited above: either John deliberately chose to omit the words of institution as part of a larger attempt to (re)direct his readers' attention to Christ (as opposed to the sacrament), or the evangelist simply presupposed the tradition, and consequently a polemical background can hardly be inferred from its omission. Here the possibility also remains open that John omitted the words of institution as part of a larger, positive theological point that was not necessarily polemical.

Toward resolving the problem of John's omission, it may be relevant that scholars have found eucharistic undertones at various locations within this Gospel. Not surprisingly, these undertones occur at various "volumes" and enjoy varying levels of scholarly support. For example, some detect allusion to the Eucharist in the wedding at Cana (Jn 2:1-11), even if the more skeptical line on this question (represented by, e.g., Macgregor; Lindars) seems to have held the day. Suggestions and doubts (but mostly doubts) have also swirled around the putative eucharistic character of John 19:34; 20:19-29. Such passages betray only the softest hints of eucharistic theology, if present at all.

Yet there are also passages that carry a higher degree of resonance and thus also more probative weight as intentional allusions to the sacrament. For example, it is not out of the question that eucharistic allusion is bound up in Jesus' statement to be the "true vine" (Jn 15:1, 5) (Barrett; Scholtissek, 350). In favor of this position, it is a priori unlikely for Jesus to have invoked "the vine" in connection with the eucharistic cup (cf. Mt 26:29 // Mk 14:25 // Lk 22:18) and then a second time—assuming a harmony between the Johannine and Synoptic accounts—in the same meal setting (Jn 15:1-8) with no association whatsoever; against this suggestion is the problem of how Jesus' self-identification with the vine in John 15 relates to the eschatological vine of the Synoptics. For a number of readers of John 21, who find impressive links between John 21 and John 6, the meal-setting restoration of Peter is even more deeply tinged with shades of Eucharist (Culpepper 2006, 400). Here, it may be argued that when John 15 and John 21 are triangulated with John 6, one may discern an accumulation of evidence that the evangelist interpreted certain elements of the Jesus story through sacramental lenses. Interestingly, in both chapters a common thread is found in the notion of utter self-giving (Jn 15:12-13; 21:15-19).

This observation in turn may shed some light on why John includes the footwashing scene precisely where one would expect the words of institution. In John 13 Jesus, after performing the menial task of washing his disciples' feet, interprets his action as a norming pattern for his followers to follow (Jn 13:14-17) (see Slave, Servant). On the assumption (again commonly accepted) that John knew the words of institution and self-consciously "replaced" these with Jesus' highly symbolic footwashing, it may be surmised that the evangelist intended the humble action as a kind of dramatic commentary on the Lord's Supper (Schnackenburg; Beasley-Murray 1987, 225-26; Henrici, 148-50). John seems to imply that just as Jesus indicated his self-giving death through the bread and cup, so too should Jesus' followers order their lives along the pattern of ultimate self-giving, instantiated in very concrete terms in the act of footwashing. Some have expanded the point, arguing that it may be not just the footwashing scene (Jn 13) but indeed this chapter, together with the whole of Jesus' discourse (Jn 13-17), that constitutes John's creative re-presentation of the Lord's Supper (Beasley-Murray, 474). The appeal of this overall explanation lies not only in its apparent heuristic value for a more robustly theological reading of John, but also in its willingness (often missing in earlier, more narrowly focused approaches) to appreciate the narrative contours of the evangelists' theological strategy (Schröter). Whether this explanation or another wins the day remains to be seen.

4.3. The Bread Discourse in John 6 (Jn 6:51c-58).

Quite apart from John 6 as a whole, John 6:51c-58 remains one of the most debated passages in Johannine studies. This is understandable because the text not only has remained at the center of eucharistic debates (at least from the time of Trent) but also involves a set of interpretive issues requiring separate judgments regarding the function of metaphor within John's Gospel. On the one side are those who maintain that Jesus' mention of his flesh and blood refers strictly to the Eucharist, either sitting uneasily alongside the christological content of John 6:35-51b, prompting speculation regarding its composite nature, or introducing a new line of thought ultimately compatible with the same passage. On the other side are those who insist that the author's primary interest is christological. Within this latter camp are (1) those who see a christological focus with absolutely no reference to the Eucharist (an older position seldom held today); (2) those who see a christological focus rhetorically served by the use of well-established eucharistic terms; (3) those who see a christological focus signified by eucharistic terms as part of a secondary strategy to convey teachings on the Eucharist.

The eucharistic reading tends to rely on the following exegetical considerations. First, on a general level, since John's audience would have likely recognized these terms as eucharistic, the burden of proof falls on those who wish to dispute the face-value reading of the text, which is that in John 6:51c-58 the evangelist has in mind nothing less than the Eucharist itself. Second, whereas the bulk of the discourse identifies Jesus as the bread come down from heaven, in the section beginning with John 6:51c the bread of heaven is now, quite differently, identified as Jesus' flesh and blood. Third, there is a contrast between the Father giving the bread of heaven (Jn 6:32) and Jesus giving the bread (Jn 6:51c): the distinction of source suggests that these breads are distinct in kind. Fourth, the use of "eat" (phagō [second aorist of esthiō]) in the early part of the discourse requires a metaphorical interpretation, but the introduction of "chew" (trōgō) suggests a concrete reality and therefore suggests a literal as opposed to figurative bread. Such exegetical points, less than exhaustive, certainly are weighty enough to merit careful consideration.

Those who advocate a christological reading of the same passage in turn advance their own arguments. The following are representative. First, given the historical backdrop, John is almost certainly alluding to the Second Temple Jewish belief that manna contained within itself the life-giving *wisdom of Yahweh (Philo, Leg. 2.86; Mut. 253-263; Mek. Exod. 13:17; CD-A VI, 4); thus, his point is to identify Jesus as the true and superior bread, true wisdom—that is, true food and drink (Jn 6:55) (Borgen, 61-67; Petersen, 208-25). Along these lines, the images of bread and blood introduced in John 6:51-58 need not introduce an entirely new field of reference but may instead be understood as a metaphorical elaboration on the theme of belief already initiated in John 6:47. Second, if John was primarily interested in invoking the eucharistic tradition, it is unclear why he makes recurring use of sarx ("flesh") (Jn 6:51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 63) rather than employing what would have been the much more familiar synoptic/Pauline term sōma ("This is my body"), which presumably was the standard liturgical term as early as the mid-first century. Third, it is urged that the use of sarx in John 6 should be interpreted in light of the prologue, where the same term is most naturally to be identified with the incarnate Lord (Jn 1:14), who gives himself on behalf of the world (Jn 3:16) (Moloney, 115). Fourth, if John has the Eucharist foremost in mind, then he is also proposing the Eucharist as a sufficient condition for eschatological resurrection. But if this is his intent, then certainly he does himself no favors by including John 6:40, which makes *faith the sole condition for resurrection. Even more difficult to reconcile is the phrase "the flesh [sarx] counts for nothing" (Jn 6:63).

In recent decades commentators have been increasingly persuaded by both John 6:51-58's organic connection with John's Gospel as a whole and the merits of the christological reading. Yet given that this Gospel was written at a time when the Lord's Supper was already well established within the early church, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the passage is performing a kind of double duty, illuminating first and foremost the nature of Jesus' death and secondarily at least certain aspects of the Eucharist. Whereas in the first three Gospels (and Paul) the Lord's Supper was understood simultaneously as a covenantal meal and a meal of remembrance, here in John familiar sacramental terms are deployed to express the spiritual activity of believing and *abiding, signifying and perhaps even in some sense effecting a divine transaction. Along these lines, R. Daly rightly remarks that in John's treatment of the Lord's Supper "the Eucharist has become a 'sacrament'" (Daly, 13).

See also BREAD; DEATH OF JESUS; FAREWELL DISCOURSE; FEASTS; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; TABLE FELLOWSHIP; WINE; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. M. Ball, "Saint John and the Institution of the Eucharist," JSNT 23 (1985) 59-68; C. K. Barrett, The Gospel According to St. John: An Introduction with Commentary and Notes on the Greek Text (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978); G. R. Beasley-Murray, John (WBC 36; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); idem, "John 13-17: The Community of True Life," RevExp 85 (1988) 473-83; P. Borgen, Bread from Heaven: An Exegetical Study of the Concept of Manna in the Gospel of John and the Writings of Philo (NovTSup 10; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1965); R. Bultmann, Das Evangelium des Johannes (16th ed.; KKNT; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1959); M. Casey, "The Original Aramaic Form of Jesus' Interpretation of the Cup," JTS 41 (1990) 1-12; A. Y. Collins, Mark: A Commentary (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); R. A. Culpepper, "Current Research in Retrospect," in Critical Readings of John 6, ed. R. A. Culpepper (BIS 22; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 247-58; idem, "Designs for the Church in the Imagery of John 21:1-14," in Imagery in the Gospel of John: Terms, Forms, Themes, and Theology of Johannine Figurative Language, ed. J. Frey et al. (WUNT 200; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006) 369-402; R. J. Daly, "Eucharistic Origins: From the New Testament to the Liturgies of the Golden Age," TS 66 (2005) 3-22; W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew (3 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988-1997); J. D. G. Dunn, "John 6: A Eucharistic Discourse?" NTS 17 (1971) 328-38; R. T. France, "Chronological Aspects of 'Gospel Harmony,'" VE 16 (1986) 33-59; J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); idem, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative (WUNT 2/33; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988); C. Ham, "The Last Supper in Matthew," BBR 10 (2000) 53-69; P. Henrici, "Do This in Remembrance of Me': The Sacrifice of Christ and the Sacrifice of the Faithful," Communio 12 (1985) 148-59; D. Instone-Brewer, "Jesus's Last Passover: The Synoptics and John," ExpTim 112 (2001) 122-23; A. Jaubert, The Date of the Last Supper (Staten Island, NY: Alba House, 1965 [1957]); J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, trans. N. Perrin (New York: Scribner, 1966); C. R. Koester, "John Six and the Lord's Supper," LQ 4 (1990) 419-37; W. S. Kurz, "Luke 22:14-38 and Greco-Roman and Biblical Farewell Addresses," JBL 104 (1985) 251-68; R. Kysar, Fourth Evangelist and His Gospel: An Examination of Contemporary Scholarship (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1975); B. Lindars, "Word and Sacrament in the Fourth Gospel," SJT 29 (1976) 49-63; E. Lohse, "Wort und Sakrament im Johannesevangelium," NTS 7 (1961) 110-25; U. Luz, Matthew: A Commentary, trans. J. E. Crouch, ed. H. Koester (3 vols.; Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989-2005); G. H. C. Macgregor, "Eucharist in the Fourth Gospel," NTS 9 (1963) 111-19; J. Marcus, Mark: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (2 vols.; AB 27, 27A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); I. H. Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); S. McKnight, Jesus and His Death: Historiography, the Historical Jesus, and Atonement Theory (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005); F. J. Moloney, The Gospel of John (SP 4; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1998); D. J. Moo, The Old Testament in the Gospel Passion Narratives (Sheffield: Almond, 1983); E. Nodet, "On Jesus' Last Supper," Bib 91 (2010) 348-69; D. W. Pao, Acts and the Isaianic New Exodus (BSL; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2002); S. Petersen, Brot, Licht und Weinstock: Intertextuelle Analysen johanneischer Ich-binnen-Worte (NovTSup 127; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008); B. J. Pitre, Jesus and the Jewish Roots of the Eucharist: Unlocking the Secrets of the Last Supper (New York: Doubleday, 2011); R. Schnackenburg, The Gospel According to St. John, trans. K. Smyth (HTKNT; New York: Herder & Herder, 1968); K. Scholtissek, "Abschied und neue Gegenwart: Exegetische und theologische Reflexionen zur johanneischen Abschiedsrede 13,31-17,26," ETL 75 (1999) 332-58; J. Schröter, "Nicht nur eine Erinnerung, sondern eine narrative Vergegenwärtigung: Erwägungen zur Hermeneutik der Evangelien-schreibung," ZTK 108 (2011) 119-37; H. Schürmann, Der Einsetzungsbericht, Lk 22,19-20; II Teil, einer quellenkritischen Untersuchung des lukanischen Abendmahlsberichtes, Lk 22,7-38 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1955); P. Sellew, "The Last Supper Discourse in Luke 22:21-38," Forum 3 (1987) 70-95; D. Senior, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Luke (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1989); P. Smit, Fellowship and Food in the Kingdom: Eschatological Meals and Scenes of Utopian Abundance in the New Testament (WUNT 2/234; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); D. Smith, "Table Fellowship as a Literary Motif in the Gospel of Luke," JBL 106 (1987) 613-38; H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch (6 vols.; Munich: Beck, 1922-1961); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996). N. Perrin

LATINO/LATINA CRITICISM

Latino/Latina criticism in the United States is concerned with interpreting the biblical text from the perspective of Latinos and Latinas. The terms Latino (masc.) and Latina (fem.) are the Spanish words for the term Latin, and they refer to people of Latin American origin. "Latino/a criticism" refers not to a particular method but rather to a critical perspective applying a plurality of approaches. Latino/Latina criticism as a whole has been dominated by the intention to respond to the socioeconomic realities of Latinos/as in the United States. It considers the sociocultural context of Latinos/as as the focal point of interpreting the biblical text and finds the social configurations within the Hispanic American reality as its departure point. Latino/a criticism is a relatively young area of study, emerging within for only the last four decades. Not all Latino/a theologians use this perspective. This article surveys the development of Latino/a criticism, methodologies and major themes/characteristics.

1. Development of Latino/a Criticism and the Study of the Gospels
2. Methodologies
3. Major Themes/Characteristics
4. Conclusion

1. Development of Latino/a Criticism and the Study of the Gospels.

1.1. Beginnings. As a discipline, Latino/a criticism began to surface in the 1980s probably with the writings of V. Elizondo, a Roman Catholic priest; J. González, a Methodist theologian; and O. Costas, a missiologist and Baptist pastor. Their writings became the origins of what was later called "Latino/a perspective." Their research was based on the Gospels.

In his 1983 book Galilean Journey Elizondo deals with the subject of the prejudices and marginalization by Judean Jews against *Galilean Jews in the Gospels (e.g., Mk 14:70; Lk 22:59). Elizondo compares the marginalization of Galilean Jews (who had a particular accent) by the Jews who lived in Judea with the experience of Mexican Americans in the United States. Around the same time, González, working on a series of sermons based on the story of Jesus' passion, discovered the theme of the marginalization of Galileans by Judeans and how it played an important role in the text. Likewise, Costas's essays "Evangelism from the Periphery: A Galilean Model" and "Evangelism from the Periphery: The Universality of Galilee" were published in 1982. These three theologians developed the theme of Galilean marginality from different perspectives and unbeknownst to each other.

1.2. From the 1980s to the 2010s. In the 1980s an important window opened up for the development of a Latino/a perspective in theology with the publication of the journal Apuntes, in 1981, under the editorial direction of J. González and through the Mexican American program of Perkins School of Theology. O. Espín states that Latino/a theology in the United States was born in the 1980s and the 1990s "at the intersection" of European, European American, and Latin American theology and within the "diverse context of the U.S. Latino/a communities" (Espín, 22). Espín recognizes that Latino/a theology "borrowed heavily from Latin American liberation theology" (Espín, 22), but it is clearly different in "methodological styles" and in "categories of analysis and topics" (Espín, 48-49). The same differences exist with regard to European and European American theologies.

Around the 1990s Latino criticism began to locate itself within the field of theology. The creation of La Asociación para la Educación Teológica Hispana (1991), founded by J. González, and the publication of the Journal of Hispanic/Latino Theology (1993) also promoted theological reflections among Latino/a theologians. The creation of La Comunidad (the Community) of Hispanic Scholars in Theology and Religion (1990) within the American Academy of Religion placed Latino theology in the academe. The last several decades have witnessed a rapid development of Latino/a criticism, resulting in a transformation within a globalized Latin American culture as well as within the field of Latino/a criticism.

2. Methodologies.

Various methodologies are used by Latino/a theologians, among them liberation hermeneutics, social-science methodologies, social location, *postcolonial criticism, cultural studies, literary criticism (especially reader-response), epistemology and *feminist criticism. According to Espín, the "first generation of Latino/a theologians were educated in either U.S., European, or Latin American universities" (Espín, 48). Therefore, the methodological tools of this first generation of theologians were from those schools and were predominantly European and American. Over time, the essays and articles that treated Latino/a criticism from different perspectives have proven to be literatures of various methodologies. This section surveys three main methodologies used by Latino/a theologians.

2.1. A Liberation Hermeneutic. Latino/a criticism in the United States has emerged in dialogue with Latin American liberation theology. Latin American liberation theology is interested in the socio-political situation of the poor, popular culture and religion. Vatican II, lead by Pope John XXIII, brought fundamental changes to the Catholic Church. It had an impact in Latin America with its liberationist themes on human dignity, freedom and social justice. These movements occurred in the Catholic and Protestant churches in Latin America. In 1971 G. Gutiérrez, a Catholic priest, first published his book Teología de la liberación: Perspectivas ("Liberation Theology: Perspectives"). He emphasizes the development of a theology based on God's interest in and relationship with the poor, and a theology that calls for a liberating praxis. The argument of God's identification with the poor is supported by the prophetic writings in the OT and by the NT, especially the Gospels. Jesus himself identifies with the marginalized and the poor, and by his cross he liberated them. Liberation figures prominently in Jesus' message and mission, especially in the Gospel of Luke (e.g., Lk 4:16-21). Liberation theology seeks to restore human dignity, justice and equality.

The social picture of the Latino/a community in the United States is one of marginalization. Given this social situation, the voices of Latino/a theologians have been inclined to embrace liberation theology and its preference for the poor, the oppressed and the marginalized. Although Latino/a criticism in the United States was born out of the development of liberation theology in South America, its foundational insight is based on the United States contexts. Latino/a criticism formulates an interpretation in the context of experience of marginalization and identifies struggles of the Latino/a community in the United States. J. González discusses three *parables: the lost sheep (Lk 15:3-7), the lost coin (Lk 15:8-10) and the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32). He asserts that these parables originally were spoken not to the marginalized people, but rather to “those who have never been lost,” the *Pharisees and the *scribes (González 1996, 45). Jesus “is not merely speaking of God’s love for the margin, but he is speaking of those who think they belong at the center” (González 1996, 45). To be true servants of God, those who are at the center have to seek the lost. Studying these parables from a Latino perspective allows us to identify matters that are pertinent to the situation of marginality of Latino/a community.

2.2. The Interpreter’s Social Location and Social-Science Methodologies. The social location of the interpreter and his or her community plays a significant role in Latino/a criticism. It is a highly contextual criticism that incorporates the analyses of socio-cultural, sociohistorical, economic and political locations. Latino/a criticism does not seek for a sole meaning of the text or universal truths. Rather, it searches for an interpretation of the text influenced by the social location of the interpreter and for the people within those particular locations. Also Latino/a criticism does not claim total objectivity, in line with R. Bultmann’s principle affirming that objective interpretation is impossible to achieve. What the interpreter finds in the text depends on what he or she brings to the text. The Mexican American theologian L. Guardiola-Saenz uses identity as a hermeneutical lens. She studies the story of the Canaanite woman (Mt 15:21-28) as an encounter of “two cultures in contest” (Guardiola-Saenz, 92). She proposes that “it is a story of borderland conflicts between the original inhabitants and those who have dispossessed them” (Guardiola-Saenz, 94). She interprets this story from her own sociohistorical condition of being dispossessed from the borderlands of the United States. The Canaanite woman, who is used by the author to affirm Israel’s election, is also used “to confront the one who has advised his disciples to “go nowhere among the gentiles” (Mt 10:5) (Guardiola-Saenz, 95). Guardiola-Saenz holds that the Canaanite woman is not a humble dog begging for crumbs; she is a dispossessed woman who has awakened from her position as oppressed and now demands the right to be treated as human (Guardiola-Saenz, 95). Guardiola-Saenz’s Latina perspective brings other possible interpretations of this passage about the Canaanite woman.

The importance of social location can be seen in the work of J. González. He has developed a theology of mañana (“tomorrow”), in which Latino/as in the United States are the “people of the exile.” Its central element is what he calls a reading of the Bible “in Spanish,” which means “reading it with the clear awareness that we are not before a dead text, for the text that we address addresses us in return”; it is a “reading of ourselves and our situation” (González 1990, 86-87). González also studies the Gospel of Luke, and he asserts that the central theme of this Gospel is its “subversiveness” or “upsidedownness” that questions the existing order (González 2010, 127). This reversal appears also in Mark and Matthew. In Luke there is a contrast between the powerful, who cannot hear the message (Lk 2:1-2), and the powerless, who do (Lk 2:8-18). The Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55) and the passage describing the beginning of Jesus’ ministry (Lk 4:16-30) are subversive. In particular, in Luke 4:16-30 Jesus is rejected when he gives the “example of God’s preferring the Syrian Naaman and the Sidonian widow over the people of Israel” (González 2010, 129). From a Latino/a perspective, Jesus is rejected not for what he claims to be; rather, he is rejected by those who considered themselves to be in a position of advantage (González 2010, 129). Another upsidedownness that appears in Luke, Matthew and Mark is that Jesus has come to those who are considered inferior and disobedient to the law. It is in opposition to the strictly religious people and the Pharisees. González says that this reversal is important for Latinos/as, who often are dubbed “illegal” (González 2010, 129). Latino/a criticism proposes a new reading of the Bible from the perspective of the marginalized.

The social sciences are very important for Latino/a criticism, precisely because of the emphasis of Latino/a theology on social location. Latino/a criticism uses social-science methodologies as a means of accessing the social reality of Latinos/as in the United States and then “theologize[s] from the reality described by the social data” (Espín, 26).

2.3. Teología en Conjunto. Teología en conjunto (“collaborative theology”) is a collaborative dialogue among Latino/a theologians, scholars in other fields, and the faith community. It is the practice of gathering together to discuss a particular topic. Scholars bring their own expertise to the discussion, and the community discusses the text out of its own experience. Therefore, teología en conjunto goes beyond the academic setting. Through dialogue, the issues, concerns and struggles faced by Latino/as are addressed. This collaborative endeavor seeks to develop a theology grounded in the situation of marginalized people and to transform the church in order to be agents of change. Not all Latino/a theology has been developed in conjunto. But Latino/a theologians emphasize the communal over an individual style of doing theology. Latino/a criticism sees the Bible as the possession of a community rather than an individual interpreter (González 2010, 125). There is also a greater sense of and opening to ecumenism, especially among Protestant and Catholics. The collaborative and ecumenical dialogue of Latino/a theologians is framed by a common objective of cultural and social struggle.

3. Major Themes/Characteristics.

3.1. Mestizaje. Mestizaje is one of the major themes in Latino/a criticism. This term refers to the blending of people and culture. It generally is used to refer to the mixture of Spanish and Native American cultures. J. Vasconcelos, a Mexican philosopher, educator and politician, developed the concept of mestizaje (which had been a negative label with a connotation of illegitimacy) as a philosophical idea. In his treatise La raza cósmica ("The Cosmic Race") Vasconcelos presents the mixed cultural identity of Mexican and Latin American as a challenge to theories of racial superiority based on Western elitism. For Vasconcelos, the mixing of races is a natural direction for humankind.

Within this framework, V. Elizondo was the first to develop a theology of mestizaje based on the historical and cultural realities of Mexican Americans in the borderlands between the United States and Mexico. Elizondo uses the concept to develop a theology of identity. Mestizo persons make up their identity from their heritage cultures. Mexican Americans experience cultural marginalization because they are not totally accepted by either of their heritage cultures, Mexican and Anglo-American. Elizondo's theology is rooted in the writings of the NT, especially the Synoptic Gospels. He compares the Mexican American experience with Jesus' experience as a mestizo from Galilee who was marginalized by many Jews and Gentiles. The Galilean mestizo became the redeemer of those marginalized and of humankind. In Jesus, God becomes "the marginated, shamed, and rejected of the world" (Elizondo 1995, 19). God chose Jesus, who had a Galilean identity, to be the Savior, transcending ethnic boundaries that divide human beings. Jesus' message and work were liberating and inclusive, and they anticipated the experience and liberation of Mexican Americans.

Elizondo proposes that Mexican Americans, as rejected and chosen people, can be instruments to bring "unity between the people of the two Americas" (Elizondo 1983, 100). Bilingualism and biculturalism as social location allow one to engage in cultural critique, formation and change and to point the way to the new life. Other Latino/a scholars have built upon Elizondo's work, with multiple appropriations (types, views, meanings) of mestizaje (e.g., satos and mulatos) (Martell-Ortero, 675).

3.2. Praxis and Popular Religiosity. Latino/a theologians seek to locate the theological task within the praxis of their communities. One of the main characteristics of Latino/a criticism is its ongoing dialogue with the experiences of the people and the Latino/a church. It produces a theology that emerges from the church; it intertwines the thought of Latino/a scholars with the church and its needs. It is a "praxis-based theology" (Goizueta, 71).

Another characteristic of Latino/a theology is that it takes into account the religious nature of the culture and faith expressions of the people. "Popular religiosity" can be defined as those practices, rituals, symbols and expressions that derive from the community of faith in which they enhance their awareness of the gospel and their faith in Christ. O. Espín states that popular Christianity is "a bearer of culture and identity"; for Espín, the rites and symbols of popular Christianity are "like doors" through which one may sense the faith of the people and their struggles (Espín, 35). Through cultural and religious symbols the marginalized express their experiences of oppression and their hopes. The expressions of popular religiosity are more present in Catholicism than in Protestantism.

Popular religiosity reveals praxis as "inherently communal" and "celebratory, or aesthetic" (Goizueta, 67). Popular religious praxis affirms community in the face of the experience of marginalization, and it becomes a "crucial source of empowerment and liberation" (Goizueta, 69).

3.3. Emphasis on Scripture. Latino/a criticism places "great stress on Scripture"; in particular, Protestant interpreters give priority to Scripture (González 1998, 12). J. González says that Latino/a Protestant theologians begin their interpretation of a particular text by "the actual reading of Scripture"; it is the first stage (González 2010, 119). Latino/a criticism sees the Bible as "an effective weapon in the struggles against marginalization and discrimination and a faithful ally in the struggle for liberation" (Segovia 1992, 49).

4. Conclusion.

Latino/a criticism has made distinctive contributions to theological fields. Latino/a perspectives and approaches to the Gospels may enable readers to identify values and discover meanings that might be unclear or not identifiable with other approaches. A Latino/a perspective and its different approaches unveil marginality and challenge traditional approaches of interpretation. Latino/a scholars who use this criticism ground their interpretation in their culture, creating a theology that responds to the Latino/a social realities and brings insights that can serve the church in general. Latino/a criticism also has helped move biblical interpretation toward becoming more globalized and “less eurocentric or Western” (Segovia 1998, 20).

At the same time, this criticism emerging from the social context of Latino/a Americans needs to be addressed “in full dialogue with contemporary theology and biblical hermeneutics” (Segovia 1992, 49). Latino/a criticism needs to become self-conscious and aware that the experience of marginalization will not become the only or the normative context for the interpretation of the Scripture.

See also AFRICAN-AMERICAN CRITICISM; FEMINIST AND WOMANIST CRITICISMS; POSTCOLONIAL CRITICISM; THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Agosto, “Latino/a Hermeneutics,” in Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation, ed. J. B. Green (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010) 350-71; O. E. Costas, “Evangelism from the Periphery: A Galilean Model,” Apuntes 2 (1982) 51-59; idem, “Evangelism from the Periphery: The Universality of Galilee,” Apuntes 2 (1982) 75-84; M. A. De La Torre and G. Espinos, eds., Rethinking Latino(a) Religion and Identity (Cleveland: Pilgrim Press, 2006); V. Elizondo, Galilean Journey: The Mexican American Promise (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1983); idem, “Mestizaje as a Locus of Theological Reflection,” in Mestizo Christianity: Theology from a Latino Perspective, ed. A. J. Bañuelos (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1995) 8-25; O. O. Espín, “The State of U.S. Latino/a Theology: An Understanding,” Perspectivas 4 (2000) 19-55; R. S. Goizueta, “Rediscovering Praxis,” in We Are a People! Initiatives in Hispanic American Theology, ed. R. S. Goizueta (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 51-78; J. González, Mañana: Christian Theology from a Hispanic Perspective (Nashville: Abingdon, 1990); idem, Santa Biblia: The Bible Through Hispanic Eyes (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996); idem, “Characteristics of Latino Protestant Theology,” in Hispanic Christianity Within Mainline Protestant Traditions: A Bibliography, ed. P. Barton and D. Maldonado (Decatur, GA: Asociación para la Educación Teológica Hispana, 1998) 12-13; idem, “A Latino Perspective,” in Methods for Luke, ed. J. B. Green (MBI; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010) 113-43; L. Guardiola-Saenz, “Reading from Ourselves: Identity and Hermeneutics Among Mexican-American Feminists,” in A Reader in Latina Feminist Theology: Religion and Justice, ed. M. P. Aquino, D. L. Machado and J. Rodríguez (Austin: University of Texas Press, 2002) 80-97; G. Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation, trans. C. Inda and J. Eagleson (rev. ed.; Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1988); L. I. Martell-Ortero, “Liberation Theology,” in Hispanic American Religious Cultures, ed. M. A. De La Torre (2 vols.; Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2009) 2:671-67; J. D. Rodríguez and L. I. Martell-Ortero, eds., Teología en Conjunto: A Collaborative Hispanic Protestant Theology (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); F. F. Segovia, “Hispanic American Theology and the Bible,” in We Are a People! Initiatives in Hispanic American Theology, ed. R. S. Goizueta (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 21-49; idem, “Introduction: Pedagogical Discourse and Practices in Contemporary Biblical Criticism,” in Teaching the Bible: The Discourses and Politics of Biblical Pedagogy, ed. F. F. Segovia and M. A. Tolbert (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1998) 1-28; J. Vasconcelos, The Cosmic Race: A Bilingual Edition, trans. D. T. Jaén (Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1997).

A. González-Tejera

LAW

The issue of the law in the NT, the Jewish law, the Torah, has usually been focused on the writings of Paul. Paul was the one who, in opening the *gospel to all who believe, including *Gentiles, refused to demand that Gentile believers become proselytes—that is, accept circumcision and conform to the law. In consequence there has been a strong tradition in interpreting the NT that infers from Paul’s letters that gospel and law are antithetic, polar opposites. But what was the attitude toward the law of Jesus and the Gospels?

1. The Controversy over Jesus and the Law
2. Jesus the Pious Jew
3. Disputes on Points of Law (Mark)
4. More Disputes (Q and Matthew)
5. Love as Motivation
6. The Impact of Jesus’ Teaching

1. The Controversy over Jesus and the Law.

A regrettable feature of the history of Christianity has been a tendency to distance itself from *Judaism. In the modern quest of the historical Jesus this was expressed in the unwillingness to recognize the Jewishness of Jesus. The key issue was Jesus' attitude toward the Torah, the Jewish law. The controversies with the *Pharisees attested in all four Gospels, which will be examined below, provided reason to conclude that Jesus had rejected the law and even "broken" with Judaism. Even eminently responsible critics such as J. Jeremias found that Jesus had "criticized" the Torah, abolished some of its precepts, and "rejected" the halakah (the Pharisaic interpretations of the law) "in a radical way" (Jeremias, 204-11). And M. Hengel could assert Jesus' "sovereign liberty over against the letter of scripture, indeed over against the Mosaic Torah in general" (Hengel, 47).

The whole picture was darkened by the conviction, stemming from the Reformation, that the Judaism of Jesus' time was legalistic in character, with the Pharisees being seen as the representatives and enforcers of a religion unhealthily dominated by the law. The Gospels' representation of Jesus' confrontation with Pharisees could then be seen as already embodying the gospel's rejection of the law, of Judaism's legalism. And, typically through most of the twentieth century, Jesus could be portrayed as the one who proclaimed the nearness of God in contrast to a Judaism, which interposed the law between God and his worshippers. The law was seen as essentially a problem, and the Judaism that centered on the law was seen as passé ("late Judaism" = the last Judaism!).

The last generation, however, has seen a fresh assessment of Jesus and the law, largely, though not exclusively, due to E. P. Sanders. Sanders pointed out, with greater effect than his protesting predecessors, that the Judaism of Jesus' time was not at all so legalistic as had been represented in Christian scholarship. The keeping of the law was what Israel had committed itself to as its response to and part in the covenant that God had made with Israel. To be obedient to the law given at Sinai was to be faithful to the covenant, to be a good Jew, much as Christians believed themselves to be similarly obligated to live lives expressive of their commitment to Christ as Lord and obedient to his lordship. The motivation of Pharisees, as desiring to show how the law applied to the different circumstances of Second Temple Judaism, more liberal than the ruling Sadducees, were more to be applauded than denigrated. Consequently, Jesus could be seen as a dialogue partner to various Pharisees, in arguing about how the law should be interpreted (Sanders; Vermes). Or he could even be regarded as a Pharisee himself (Falk; Maccoby).

When such diametrical opposition in opinion is possible, it becomes all the more important to consider the evidence with care and with as little presupposition, prejudicial or otherwise, as possible. In this instance it is desirable to avoid the more traditional method of inquiry, which looks for what distinguished Jesus and set him apart from his context within Second Temple Judaism. Rather, the more recent approach, sometimes designated the "third quest of the historical Jesus," indicates the desirability of seeing Jesus within that context. Some of this will be unavoidably speculative, but quite a lot can be said with confidence about the context within which Jesus came to adulthood. And since that will also be the context within which Jesus conducted his mission and taught regarding the Torah, it will in any case be important for any evaluation of the motivation and impact of his teaching.

2. Jesus the Pious Jew.

We can be confident that Jesus was brought up as a pious Jew. His parents gave his brothers names that evoked Israel's famous patriarchs ("James/Jacob," "Joses/Joseph," "Judas/Judah," "Simon/Simeon" [Mk 6:3]), and Jesus himself was named after Joshua. In his childhood and youth he no doubt attended the local *synagogue regularly and learned Torah, together with attendant prophets, psalms and other writings. The picture painted in the Gospels of his knowledge of and familiarity with Israel's Scriptures is entirely plausible (e.g., Mk 2:25-26; 7:6-8; 10:5-8; 12:26).

At least some pilgrimage to Jerusalem for the great *feasts can be assumed of Jesus. The story in Luke 2:41-51 suggests that (preparation for) Jesus' transition to manhood was regarded as a particularly appropriate occasion for a pilgrimage. At any rate, he would have been familiar with the *temple and its functionaries, *priests who served locally as teachers and magistrates (Mk 1:44), and the requirements of tithing (Mt 23:23 // Lk 11:42) and purity (Mk 1:40-44; 7:15-23; Mt 23:25-26 // Lk 11:39-41). In attending the temple, he would, of course, have observed the necessary purity rituals. We can also assume that the adult Jesus observed the *Sabbath, attended the synagogue, and "gave every seventh day over to the study of our customs and law" (Josephus, Ant. 16:43), even though only Luke 4:16 indicates that synagogue attendance was his normal custom. The references to the "tassels" of Jesus' garment (Mt 9:20 // Lk 8:44; Mt 14:36 // Mk 6:56) suggest that he was a pious Jew who took his religious obligations seriously. He certainly would have encountered Pharisees and have been familiar with their concerns to interpret the Torah for their own time.

The same degree of what may properly be called “Torah piety” is evident in Jesus’ own mission. He is remembered as observing the law on leprosy (Mk 1:44 par.; Lk 17:14; cf. Lev 13:49), and as directing the rich young man who inquired regarding eternal life to the second table of the Ten Commandments (Mk 10:19 par.). He is depicted as basing his own teaching foursquare on the Torah (Mk 7:10; 10:6-7; 12:26, 29-31). Matthew records a saying in which Jesus assumes continued participation in the temple sacrifices (Mt 5:23-24). Another passage has him being consulted on what was an issue of inheritance law (Lk 12:13). And overall, the Jesus tradition’s many echoes of Scripture, Isaiah and Psalms in particular, attest the extent to which “Jesus lived in the Old Testament” (Jeremias, 205-6). As will become evident, Matthew’s portrayal of Jesus as so devoted to the law must be rooted to at least a fair degree in such memories of Jesus’ Torah piety.

At the same time, Jesus is remembered as ignoring accepted tradition and practice with regard to the Sabbath, accepting physical contact with those thought to be virulently unclean (Mk 1:41; 5:1-34), and welcoming *table fellowship with “sinners”—that is, those regarded as condemned by the law (Mt 11:19; Mk 2:16-17; Lk 15:2). These attitudes and practices provoked Pharisaic criticism and pose the issue of Jesus and the law more sharply.

3. Disputes on Points of Law (Mark).

The most relevant passages in the Gospels are the accounts where Jesus is engaged by Pharisees on whether his teaching or conduct (or that of his disciples) was in breach of or disregard for the law. The sequence of episodes described by Mark provides the agenda.

3.1. The Sabbath. All three Synoptic Gospels relate two vivid episodes in which Jesus or his disciples were criticized for failure to observe the Sabbath: plucking grain on the Sabbath (Mt 12:1-8 // Mk 2:23-28 // Lk 6:1-5) and healing a man with a withered hand on the Sabbath (Mt 12:9-14 // Mk 3:1-5 // Lk 6:6-11). In addition, Luke recalls two other or variant episodes (Lk 13:10-17; 14:1-6), and John retains the memory of criticisms made of Jesus for failure to observe the Sabbath (Jn 5; 7; 9).

Although the vividness of the retelling could indicate some early Christian enhancement of the issues, we know from pre-Christian Jewish texts that Sabbath halakic rulings had already been well developed by the time of Jesus (Jub. 2:17-33; 50:8-12; CD-A X, 14—XI, 18). For example, CD-A XI, 12-17 includes these rulings: “No one should help an animal give birth on the Sabbath. And if [it falls] into a cistern or a pit, he should not take it out on the Sabbath. . . . And any living man who falls into a place of water or into a [reservoir?], no one should take him out with a ladder or a rope or a utensil.” Thus, when Jesus responds to Pharisees’ criticism by pointing out that they themselves would rescue a sheep that had fallen into a pit on the Sabbath (Mt 12:11 // Lk 14:5), the reader is immediately transposed into the halakic disputes of Jesus’ time, in which it seems that Pharisaic Sabbath halakah was not so strict on this point as *Essene or Qumran halakah (cf. m. Yoma 8:6).

So the episodes fit well into the context of Jesus’ mission and give us a vivid impression of the sort of halakic disputes that must have been a feature of the factionalism of Second Temple Judaism. In this case, the most obvious probability is that some Pharisees who had come down from Jerusalem to gain a first-hand impression of the teacher from Nazareth criticized Jesus for a latitude with regard to Sabbath halakah that they judged to be in breach of Sabbath law.

Jesus’ response highlights two aspects of his attitude to the law. First, Jesus had a high regard for the Sabbath as a gift from God: “The sabbath was made for humankind” (Mk 2:27). There is no hint that he ignored the Sabbath completely or wanted to abolish the Sabbath law. The fundamental point was that the Sabbath was provided for Israel’s benefit; to make Israel subservient to the Sabbath was to miss the point of the Sabbath. Given this role of the Sabbath, then, the issue was simply about what conduct was appropriate on the Sabbath in that role.

Second, Jesus’ response to the second criticism, “Is it lawful to do good or to do harm on the Sabbath, to save life or to kill?” (Mk 3:4), highlights the danger of allowing traditions that have gathered around a particular law to obscure more fundamental concerns and responsibilities. It surely could not be wrong, never be wrong, to do good or to save a life on the Sabbath! The danger, then, is that an over-protective attitude toward an important law or legal ruling can actually constitute an abuse of the law itself. Secondary laws should not be allowed to obscure or hinder the fundamental obligations of relationship to God and to others.

3.2. Qorban. In Mark 7 three disputes on matters of Jewish law are run together. The middle one, in which Jesus is recorded as entering into a broader debate about “tradition of the elders,” focuses on a practice that presumably had begun with a halakic ruling (“tradition”) and was in effect running counter to one of Israel’s most basic covenant obligations (Mk 7:9-13 // Mt 15:3-6). The obligation was that of children to honor and respect their parents (Ex 20:12; 21:17). But a prevalent ruling evidently allowed a child to say to the parents, "What you would have gained from me is Qorban" (i.e., a gift [to God]); in this way, the child became free from the obligation to the parents. This would be based on the law regarding vows: "When a man vows a vow to the Lord, or swears an oath to bind himself by a pledge, he shall not break his word; he shall do according to all that proceeds out of his mouth" (Num 30:2). Evidently, there was some dispute as to whether and how far the strict principle enunciated in Numbers 30:2 could be alleviated (m. Ned. 9:1 bears directly on the present case). But at the time of Jesus, it seems that a dominant ruling prevailed among some or most Pharisees to the effect that a vow made in the circumstances indicated could not be retracted.

Here again Jesus is remembered as pressing through the halakic debate to what he regarded as more fundamental, particularly the Decalogue's commandment that children should honor their parents. If Numbers 30:2 was in the background, then in effect Jesus was ranking that commandment, or at least rulings that could be drawn from it, as secondary to the Decalogue's commandment. The implication that there has to be a prioritizing between different laws within the Torah became a crucial hermeneutical key for the first Christians.

3.3. Hand Washing. The main issue dealt with in Mark 7 is a debate about purity halakah, sparked off by the issue of whether individuals should wash their hands before partaking of a meal (Mk 7:1-8 // Mt 15:1-3). It is not clear from *rabbinic sources whether the related halakah was already being observed. But the fact that an entire Mishnah tractate, Yadayim ("Hands"), is devoted to the subject indicates a long tradition history of halakic concern. And Mark obviously is drawing on earlier material, since he has to explain the concerns being expressed, including the uniquely Jewish sense of the word "common"—that is, not set apart to be holy and therefore "unclean, defiled" (Mk 7:2, 5). So the representation of a tradition ("the tradition of the elders") that was already well established in Pharisaic table fellowship is entirely plausible, even if Mark exaggerates in attributing the practice to "all the Jews" (Mk 7:3).

According to Mark, Jesus does not immediately address the purity issue, but rather he highlights once again the danger of "traditions of men" replacing or obscuring "the commandment of God" (Mk 7:8). In particular, quoting from Isaiah 29:13, he focuses on the danger of an expanding halakic tradition that actually interferes with or even prevents genuine *worship of God. (The point could have been made as well by reference to the Hebrew text rather than the Greek LXX, though Mark naturally quotes the Greek). Of course, the defense would have been mounted that the traditions of the fathers (the halakah) were a way of spelling out what the commandment of God required. But Isaiah had already warned of the danger of superficiality in worship and of treating human formulations too unquestioningly (Mk 7:6-7; cf. Is 29:13). And Jesus added his warning that "the tradition of the elders" was succumbing to that danger in the case in point.

3.4. Purity. In the second half of the same sequence the subject returns to the issue of purity (Mk 7:14-23 // Mt 15:10-20), whether one should be greatly concerned about ritual impurity caused by the eating of impure foods (see Clean and Unclean). The question of what Jesus actually said becomes of particular importance because the versions of Mark and Matthew diverge. According to Mark, Jesus explicitly denied that food coming from outside a person could defile that person: "There is nothing from outside a person that by going into him can defile him" (Mk 7:15). Jesus goes on to explain, "Whatever goes into a person from outside cannot defile him, since it enters, not into the heart but into the stomach, and goes out into the sewer" (Mk 7:18-19). To this Mark adds an interpretative gloss: "Thus he declared all foods clean" (Mk 7:19). In Mark's version, then, Jesus affirms that impurity is caused not at all by what a person eats, but instead entirely by the evil that comes "from within" that person. In which case, Mark infers, the laws of clean and unclean (see Lev 11:1-23; Deut 14:3-21) are no longer relevant.

Matthew avoids the sharp either/or of Mark's version and omits Mark's interpretative addition. Instead, the contrast is simply between inner and outer purity, with the clear implication that the ritual impurity of unclean food is nothing in comparison with the impurity that comes from the heart. The contrast is similar to the warning of the prophets that observation of feasts and sacrifice is of no avail if they serve as a cover for injustice. Such a warning was not a call to abandon feast or sacrifice, but rather to get priorities right.

The problem with Mark's presentation (and interpretation) is that if Jesus so taught, then the law-abiding character of the Jerusalem church (including observance of the laws of clean and unclean) is hard to explain. As also Luke's account of Peter's protest in Acts 10:14: "I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean.” As we will see, Mark’s version is more readily explained as the reading/interpretation of the episode that became current in the *Gentile churches. Matthew, on the other hand, probably tells it the way it was told in Jewish churches.

In modern inquiry after the historical Jesus it has often been assumed that the version in Mark (the earliest written Gospel) was a faithful representation of Jesus’ teaching. Indeed, the Markan version became the principal support for the long-standing prevalent view that Jesus had abrogated the law and renounced it as a way of defining or determining a person’s relation with God. But if so, once again the puzzle remains of how such an unyielding loyalty to the laws of clean and unclean could be attributed to Jesus’ leading disciple (Acts 10:14). Equally puzzling is how Matthew could present Jesus as similarly so unyielding in his loyalty to the law (Mt 5:18-19). A more plausible explanation is that Jesus did indeed contrast ritual purity and inner purity and emphasized that the latter was important above all, as other Jewish teachers emphasized that circumcision of the heart was more important than circumcision of the flesh. Mark and Matthew show how the teaching was interpreted in different contexts and churches.

Here again, then, we probably see Jesus, when confronted with a matter given importance by the law, and by those whose religious praxis was determined entirely by reference to the law, ready to go behind the law to issues and principles more important than the particular rulings of the law or of the halakic interpretations drawn from the law. He did not assume that God’s priorities could be read straightforwardly from the law, particularly not from specific laws given priority in defining (in an either/or way) what counted as covenant loyalty. Such focus on the obedience expressed in spoken formula and ritual act could distract from and prevent recognition of what was of first importance in relationship with God and in living in community with his people.

3.5. Divorce. A last episode in Mark of direct relevance to us at this point is Jesus’ teaching on *divorce (Mk 10:2-12 // Mt 19:3-9). Again some Pharisees initiate a debate on a point of law, in this case on the law regarding divorce. Jesus refers them to *Moses’ ruling on the point: “Moses allowed a man to write a certificate of dismissal and to divorce” his wife (Mk 10:4; cf. Deut 24:1). But Jesus points out that from the beginning of creation, “God made them male and female” (Gen 1:27), and further adds, “For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh” (Gen 2:24). From which he concludes, “So they are no longer two, but one flesh,” and “Therefore what God has joined together, let no one separate.”

The memory is of Jesus in debate with Pharisees with regard to the interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1, which evidently was in some dispute. What was the nature of the “indecency” (erwâ*) in his wife that would permit a husband to dismiss her as his wife? Apparently, erwâ* could be interpreted very liberally (from the husband’s perspective): “even if she spoiled a dish for him” (m. Giṭ 9:10). Jesus, however, does not allow the debate to focus on the interpretation of the word used in Deuteronomy. Once again he cuts behind the Torah ruling to the more fundamental issue of the relation of man and woman: the creation of humankind as man and woman (Gen 1:27; 2:21-23) and the characterization of marriage in Genesis 2:24.

From this principle or ideal of male-female relation and of marriage, Jesus evidently concluded that divorce was a falling short of that ideal and turned his face against divorce and remarriage in principle. As harsh as this may seem, it should be recalled that in a patriarchal society, where only a husband could initiate divorce and could dismiss his wife for very little reason, an absolute prohibition of divorce was a way of protecting the wife. That Jesus was remembered as teaching on divorce is also attested in Q (Matthew and Luke’s other source [Mt 5:32 // Lk 16:18]), and Paul refers to Jesus’ teaching on the subject (1 Cor 7:10-11).

4. More Disputes (Q and Matthew).

Two passages in the non-Markan material shared by Matthew and Luke (Q) call for some attention.

4.1. Tithing. Tithing was also important within Judaism (Lev 27:30-33; Num 18:24-32; Deut 14:22-29; 26:12-15), and it became a matter of significant concern for the later rabbis (see especially the Mishnah tractate Demai). Matthew and Luke share a tradition on the subject (Mt 23:23 // Lk 11:42), which suggests that there was debate already current in the pre-A.D. 70 period on tithing certain herbs (mint, dill, cumin). According to the passage, Jesus is remembered not as denouncing such concerns as overly trivial or wrong, but rather, once again, as reminding his hearers that there are more important things to be concerned about—notably “justice and mercy”—wholly in the spirit of and with a probably intended echo of Micah 6:8. To the same effect is Jesus’ attitude as implied in the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (Lk 18:9-14). The Pharisee’s practice of tithing is not criticized, any more than is his praying. But Jesus makes it clear that neither the prayer nor the tithing forms a basis or reason for the Pharisee's acceptability to God. Once again, there are more important issues than formal obedience to a particular law.

4.2. Filial Duty. Whereas Sanders disagrees that Jesus was entirely at odds with Pharisees on matters of the Torah, he is willing to recognize that Jesus "superseded the requirements of piety and the Torah" in one passage: Jesus' command to the would-be disciple, "Leave the dead to bury their own dead" (Mt 8:21-22 // Lk 9:59-60). "Disobedience of the requirement to care for one's dead parents is actually disobedience to God" (Sanders 1985, 253). The claim may be weakened if the man's response, "Let me go and bury my father," to Jesus call to follow him actually meant "Let me go and serve my father while he is alive, and after he dies I will bury him and come," or if there was a general recognition that a special religious duty could transcend even basic family obligations. Even so, the episode gives us still another example of a situation where a law-enscribed duty was deemed less important than what Jesus deemed to be God's priority of proclaiming and living for the *kingdom of God.

4.3. Antitheses. The antitheses in Matthew 5:21-48 form a major part of the contribution from Matthew regarding Jesus' attitude toward the law. The sequence may well be the work of Matthew himself, perhaps gathering and framing Jesus tradition for catechetical use. The introductory formula of each antithesis ("You have heard that it was said") appears nowhere else within the Jesus tradition, so it may be a stylistic marker of the teacher who made this collection of Jesus' teaching (Matthew himself?). But there is wide agreement that the Matthean collection is based on earlier tradition (Mt 5:21-22, 27-28, 33-37) that recalled teaching that Jesus himself gave and to which Matthew has appended other dominical sayings. The sequence is quite consistent with the sort of teaching that, as we have seen, Jesus was remembered as giving in dispute with particular Pharisees.

The point is that the antitheses are best understood as pressing behind several specific laws to more fundamental issues. Several of the antitheses are best seen as a radicalization, not an abrogation, of the law. Not just murder is condemned, but unjustified anger, insult or sneering dismissal of another (Mt 5:21-22); not just adultery, but lust (Mt 5:27-28); not just false oaths, but casual oath taking and calculating equivocation (Mt 5:33-37). Similarly, the teaching on divorce, as already indicated, looks not for a slackening, far less an abandoning, of the law, but looks rather for a stricter application of the law (Mt 5:31-32). The one antithesis that seems to "abolish" a law (Mt 5:38-42), the lex talionis—the law on retaliation (Ex 21:24; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21)—is again better heard as pressing behind the law to reinforce the social principle behind it. The antithesis in effect makes the point that behind a law that was specifically intended to limit retaliation and to prevent blood feuds from developing lies the more fundamental issue of right and responsibility as expressed in a practice of nonretaliation and positive response when personally threatened.

Overall, the antitheses call for a more fundamental reorientation of human and social relationships than can be achieved or maintained by legislation. Doing what is right cannot be reduced to outward acts and set formulae. This strongly suggests that Jesus' Torah piety was not "letter of the law" piety, limited to surface observance, but rather sought to realize the inner spiritual principle expressed in the particular law. Nor should it cause surprise that he reacted strongly against those who did limit their Torah obedience to the letter, especially when elaboration of the letter ran counter to the inner spirit of the law in question. The attitude expressed in all this is not best described in terms of Jesus setting himself over against Moses and the Torah (Käsemann) or of Jesus' "sovereign liberty" (Hengel) in relation to the Mosaic law. It is not a libertarian disregard for the law, far less a denial of its continuing relevance and importance. It is more a matter of digging deep into the law to discern the divine rationale (justice) in its particular mišwōt (commandments). To do the will of God was still the primary goal (Mk 3:35 // Mt 12:50; Mk 14:36 par.; Mt 6:10; 7:21; 21:31; Lk 12:47), with the reminder that God's will could not be discerned simply by reference to the letter of the Torah or its halakic elaboration.

Finally, if it remains likely that Jesus' own emphases were determined in large part by his eschatological perspective (the imminence of the coming kingdom of God), we should also note that this factor has not left many distinctive marks on the tradition at this point. What is commended in all this is not a pattern of conduct necessary for entry into the kingdom, nor an "interim ethic" (Schweitzer) required only for the interval before the coming of the kingdom, but instead (by implication) a quality of kingdom life, the character of living appropriate for those who look for the kingdom's coming and who seek to live already in its light.

5. Love as Motivation.

Probably the most distinctive feature of Jesus' teaching on the law was the prominence that he gave to *love, love of neighbor, as the way to do or fulfill the law, presumably as the only way to do it effectively, in accordance with its inner spirit.

5.1. Matthew 22:35-40 // Mark 12:28-31 // Luke 10:25-28. Various told, all three Synoptic Gospels narrate Jesus' response to the challenge to say what is the greatest or first *commandment, the key to eternal life. In each case Jesus replies by pointing to the immediate corollary of Israel's basic creed, the Shema ("Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God, the Lord is one" [Deut 6:4]), probably recited by most Jews on a regular basis (cf. Deut 6:7): "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength" (Mk 12:29-30; cf. Deut 6:5). But in all three Synoptic Gospels Jesus continues by pointing to a further corollary, a second commandment: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18). In different ways, the Synoptic evangelists stress the importance of both commandments: "There is no other commandment greater than these" (Mk 12:31); "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Mt 22:40); "Do this, and you will live" (Lk 10:28). Luke also appends the parable of the good Samaritan as illustrating what loving your neighbor as yourself can involve in practice (Lk 10:29-37). In John's Gospel the emphasis is somewhat different—to love one another—but the emphasis on love is the same, indeed presented as a "new commandment," a love modeled on Jesus' sacrificial love, a love that should identify Jesus' disciples (Jn 13:34-35).

What is so striking about the Synoptic Gospels' accounts is that Jesus was clearly remembered as doing something that had not been done previously. He had selected one commandment from a diverse sequence in Leviticus 19 and exalted it above all others, giving it a status, as the key to doing the will of God, to living as God intended in giving the law, a status that it had not hitherto received. Explicit references to Leviticus 19:18 are lacking in Jewish literature prior to Jesus, and such allusions as there are give it no particular prominence. Consequently, the subsequent opinion attributed to Rabbi Akiba (early second century A.D.), that Leviticus 19:18 is "the greatest general principle in the Torah" (Sipra on Lev 19:18), may owe more to the innovation and precedent established by Jesus than has usually been recognized.

We can therefore be confident that Jesus did indeed exalt the importance of loving one's neighbor as well as loving God as the heart of the law, as the epitome of a life oriented to doing God's will, as the character of living that God looked for in his covenant people. The love command sums up Jesus' attitude toward the law, as penetrating behind particular commandments to the inner motivation that should always drive the concern for obedience and should enable discernment as to when particular rulings are running counter to the love command (as in the Sabbath controversies).

It is important to note that in Jesus' response the command to love one's neighbor is put second to the primary command, to love God with all one's being (Mk 12:30). The implication is that the two go together, and perhaps also that the second is only possible in long-term reality as the corollary to the first. Perhaps too Jesus found significance in the fact that each is both a deeply rooted emotional commitment and an act of resolute will ("with all your heart . . . with all your might"). Also worth noting is the realism in the way the command is formulated. It does not call for the disciple to love everyone, as though that might be possible, a vague love for the world. Rather, the call is to love the neighbor—that is, as the good Samaritan illustrates, whomever God gives as neighbor on the road of everyday life. Moreover, it does not call for a love beyond human capacity, or for a love that requires hatred of the self as a corollary, but for the care that one naturally bestows on oneself to be the measure of the love shown to the neighbor.

5.2. Matthew 5:43-48 // Luke 6:27-28, 32-36. More striking still is a passage preserved in the *Sermon on the Mount/Plain, which in Matthew is the last of the antitheses. Jesus is remembered as calling for more even than "love of neighbor" as the acme of Torah obedience. It is not that love of neighbor can be complemented with hatred of enemy, as Qumran taught (1QS I, 10-11), without the love being compromised. The neighbor can include the enemy. So Jesus' call is "Love your enemies" and "Pray for those who abuse or persecute you" (Mt 5:44 // Lk 6:28). Love is not love if it depends on a loving response being returned. Love that does not go beyond gratitude for what has been received is not the love that Jesus called for (Mt 5:46-47 // Lk 6:32-35). Only a love that stretches to embrace the enemy truly reflects the love of God (Mt 5:48 // Lk 6:36).

The unnaturalness of this call to love the enemy is so extreme and counterintuitive that it must have derived from an exceptional religious teacher. In this instance, above all, we catch a glimpse of how radically Jesus was prepared to press a different motivation and ideal for community and for discipleship under pressure. And not just as an individualistic ethic, but as a breaking through a concept of neighbor love determined primarily by mutual belonging (somewhat lost in John's "new commandment" [Jn 13:34]). Love should be the first and the final criterion for conduct and for all social relationships. As Luke's appending the parable of the good Samaritan illustrated the call to love one's neighbor, so the teaching that Matthew puts immediately prior to this, under the preceding antithesis, illustrates the outworking of such an attitude and priority (Mt 5:38-42). For it urges not simply nonretaliation, but rather a positive outgoing generosity ("Let him have your cloak also; go with him a second [mile]"). This is how love responds to provocation.

5.3. Matthew 7:12 // Luke 6:31. The aptly named "Golden Rule" likewise expresses the outreaching motivation for the welfare of others that evidently was at the heart of Jesus' teaching and lifestyle: "Whatever you wish that people should do for you, so also do for them." Matthew adds, "for this is the law and the prophets," indicating that this positive concern for others was seen to be of a piece with Jesus' focusing the law in such concern. The essential principle was well known, both within Second Temple Judaism and beyond, usually in the negative form: "Do not do to others what you would not want others to do to you" (e.g., Tob 4:15; Let. Arist. 207; T. Naph. 1:6; b. Šabb. 31a). But the fact that in Christian tradition (Did. 1:2; Acts 15:20, 29a [Western text]) it is the negative form of the rule that is quoted indicates that there was no great Christian concern to trumpet the positive form of the Golden Rule as distinctively Christian. Nevertheless, the positive form of the Golden Rule, when set in the context of Jesus' other teaching on the love command, can be seen as characteristic of his whole understanding of life lived in the light of the coming kingdom: it is not a grudging admission that some actions/policies might have adverse effect on others, not an assumption that doing the minimum or observing the letter of the law will be sufficient, not a ducking away from responsibility that can be shifted to others, but rather a concern for the benefit of others that goes beyond the conventional and the box-ticking mentality—a concern neatly summed up in terms of doing for others what you would like others to do for you. Self-love is not denounced or ridiculed, but again is set as the due measure for love of the neighbor.

6. The Impact of Jesus' Teaching.

The impact made by Jesus' teaching on the law is most readily visible in the influence of his teaching as evidenced in the earliest Christian writings and by the different ways in which the four NT evangelists present his teaching.

6.1. The New Testament Letters. The greatest impact, understandably, came from the importance that Jesus placed on the love command and from what his self-sacrificial death on the cross exemplified. There is no doubt that the injunction "Love your neighbor as you love yourself" became a central principle and key motivation in earliest Christian paraenesis; the attestation puts that beyond question (Rom 13:8-10; Gal 5:14; Jas 2:8; Did. 1:2; 2:7; Barn. 19:5). That love of neighbor was seen consistently as fulfilling the law, indeed as the summation of the whole law (Gal 5:14), is clear testimony that the chief point in Jesus' attitude toward the law had been well taken in early Christian paraenesis. Such a consistent singling out of just this commandment (Lev 19:18) can hardly be coincidental. Nor is it likely that the emphasis was due to some unknown teacher, or that it arose spontaneously at the same time in several Christian circles; as already noted, there was no known precedent for such a singling out of Leviticus 19:18. So, when the Jesus tradition contains such a clear memory that Jesus had elevated Leviticus 19:18 to such prominence, the most obvious explanation is that it was the impact of just that teaching that ensured its continuing importance among those who named Jesus as Lord.

Paul's characterization of active concern for others as "fulfilling the law of Christ" (Gal 6:2) probably is an expression of the same conviction that Jesus' love command and life revealed what the law was all about (Rom 15:2). And in the same spirit is the consistent Pauline exhortation to consider others (as in Rom 12:9-10; 15:1-2; Phil 2:1-5). Likewise, the consistent emphasis on love of brother and sister in the Johannine writings attests the same impact (Jn 13:34-35; 15:12; 1 Jn 3:11, 14, 23; 4:7-12), with 1 John 4:20-21 confirming the symbiotic relation between love of God and love of others implied in Jesus' original teaching.

Similarly, Jesus' elaboration of his call to love one's enemies, requiring a positive response to the enemy and persecutor, is recalled in early Christian teaching. Both Romans 12:14 and Didache 1:3 clearly echo the Lukan form of the call to bless the persecutor (Lk 6:28); the same teaching seems to have influenced the formulation of 1 Corinthians 4:12 and 1 Peter 3:9. Likewise, the strong echo of the fourth of Matthew's antitheses in James 5:12, “Do not swear either by heaven or by earth, but let your ‘Yes’ be yes and your ‘No’ be no,” indicates that Jesus’ teaching on the subject (Mt 5:34-37) had been heard and was held up as a measure to be aspired to in community relations.

The impact of Jesus’ teaching was not lost even when circumstances called for modification of particular teachings. Mark’s account of the Sabbath controversies indicates that Sabbath was still a matter of concern for many Christian communities, the question still being not whether the Sabbath should be observed, but rather how it should be observed. This in itself is a decisive indication that the stories drawn on by Mark took their present shape in a firmly Jewish context. Had Jesus disowned the Sabbath, it is unlikely that the Jewish Christian missionaries opposed to Paul in Galatia would have been able to insist on it quite so strongly (Gal 4:10). But even when the necessity to observe the Sabbath became a matter of question in Gentile communities (Rom 14:5), the principle that Jesus enunciated in handling his own disputes (acting in love) still applied (Rom 14:15), but now to encourage liberty for those whose conduct was constrained by traditional scruples.

Jesus’ insistence that inner purity was more important than outward ritual purity, as enacted in his readiness to share a table with “sinners,” became a primary justification for the first Christians’ refusal to allow the laws of clean and unclean to determine whether Jewish and Gentile believers could eat together (particularly Acts 10:1-14, 28; 11:2-18; Gal 2:11-16); as Jesus responded to Jewish “sinners,” so Paul responded to Gentile “sinners.” The issue of clean/unclean remained important for many traditionalist Jewish believers (Rom 14:2-3), and though Paul had been persuaded by Jesus’ teaching that nothing is unclean in itself, he recognized that for some, laws of clean/unclean were still important rules of conduct (Rom 14:14). Here again, love of brother and sister was the primary determinant of conduct (Rom 14:15). The related issue of eating meat that had been sacrificed to an idol raised the same sensitivities (1 Cor 7:7-13; Rev 2:14); but for Paul, love more than knowledge or undisciplined liberty pointed the way forward (1 Cor 8:1).

Of particular interest is the way Jesus’ teaching on divorce was handled. Mark retained the ideal formulated by Jesus: the question posed by some Pharisees, “Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife?” (Mk 10:2) is answered in effect in the negative: no divorce (Mk 10:9). But Matthew transposes the discussion by adding to the initiating question the phrase “for any cause” (Mt 19:3). Thus, it is Matthew who indicates that the debate was about the interpretation of the second clause of Deuteronomy 24:1: “if then she finds no favor in his eyes because he has found some indecency [‘erwá] in her.” In effect, Matthew retells the episode as a contribution to the debate between the Pharisaic schools of Hillel and Shammai on how rigorously Deuteronomy 24:1 should be interpreted. In adding to the ruling on divorce, “except for unchastity [porneia]” (Mt 19:9; also Mt 5:32), Matthew shows Jesus to support what was remembered as Shammai’s more rigorous interpretation. But in so doing, he changes a point of ideal principle back into one of practical law.

Paul dealt with the issue somewhat similarly. Asked for advice on divorce and related issues, he quotes Jesus as commanding “that the wife should not separate from her husband (but if she does separate, let her remain unmarried . . .), and that the husband should not divorce his wife” (1 Cor 7:10-11). He thus confirms that Jesus’ teaching a high ideal for marriage was well remembered. However, in Corinth Paul was confronted with the problem of a marriage in which only one partner had become Christian: if the unbelieving partner wished to separate or divorce, the Christian should accept that; the marriage bond (Gen 2:24) had been broken (1 Cor 7:15).

Neither Matthew’s version nor Paul’s counsel should be read as an abandonment of Jesus’ teaching, but rather as a recognition that the ideal he held forth could not always be attained or maintained. In each case the principled assertion of Jesus is retained, even when continuing human “hard-heartedness” once again causes the ideal practice to be hedged around with qualification. It could even be said that the more fundamental principle highlighted by Jesus (concern for the other’s welfare) prevented the ideal from becoming another unyielding law.

6.2. The New Testament Gospels. Very fascinating is the different ways in which each of the NT evangelists presented Jesus’ attitude to the law.

On the assumption that Mark was the first Gospel to be written and was used by Matthew and Luke in the writing of their Gospels, it is notable that Mark presents a radical Jesus. His teaching on purity is clear-cut: nothing from outside can render a person impure (Mk 7:15, 18); Jesus’ teaching amounted to the abrogation of the laws of clean and unclean (Mk 7:19). This accords with Paul’s understanding of Jesus’ teaching (Rom 14:14) and presumably reflects the way Jesus’ teaching had been interpreted in the Gentile mission. Similarly, it is Mark who presents

Jesus' teaching on divorce in its most high-principled mode: divorce is counter to the will of God in ordaining marriage (Mk 10:6-9).

Matthew, however, pulls back from Mark's interpretation of Jesus' teaching on purity and probably is able to draw on a less antithetical version of Jesus' teaching (Mt 15:11, 17). And, as already indicated, he sets Jesus' teaching on divorce within a then current debate as to what divorce "for any cause" could cover (Mt 19:3, 9). This fits with the most strikingly distinctive Matthean presentation of Jesus' attitude toward the law (Mt 5:17-20), in which Jesus explicitly denies any intent to abolish the law and, apparently, reinforces the importance both of the letter of the law (what it actually says) and of even the commandments deemed to be of lesser importance. There is little doubt that Matthew here impresses his own priorities on the tradition, but had his presentation been totally unfounded and at odds with Jesus' elsewhere remembered teaching (Mt 5:18, after all, is drawn from tradition common to Lk 16:17), it is unlikely that Matthew's attempt to redraw the Jesus tradition so conservatively on this point would have been so successful. Rather, for Matthew, Jesus came to "fulfill" the law—that is, presumably as documented in the following antitheses, to bring to light and to reinforce the deeper principles that the individual commandments were intended to safeguard. Nor should it be forgotten that in Matthew's Gospel Jesus' teaching on the primacy of love is stronger than in the other Gospels.

In Matthew the focus of Jesus' criticism in regard to the law seems to be rather directed against the Pharisaic halakot. This is implied in the formulation of the antitheses, in which Jesus sets himself against not the law as such, but rather against the traditions that had gathered round the law ("what had been said to those of past times") (Mt 5:21, 33), and is implied also by the sharp critique of Pharisaic halakot in Matthew 23:16-26. And it is Matthew who presents Jesus as voicing again earlier prophetic critique on the point, by inserting two references to Hosea 6:6: "I desire mercy, not sacrifice" (Mt 9:13; 12:7). Matthew evidently saw Jesus' stance on the Sabbath as making the same critique, and his presentation of Jesus' teaching on purity and divorce fits well into the same picture. Reflected in all this, presumably, is the fact that Matthew wrote his Gospel for Jewish Christian communities, for whom Torah loyalty continued to be a prime concern, and for whom dispute with the post-A.D. 70 rabbis was a major factor in communal life.

Luke's approach to the issue of Jesus and the law is somewhat curious. He omits/ignores two of the most important passages in Mark (Mk 7:1-23; 10:2-11). This probably is part of his strategy to leave important issues (the law and the temple) to emerge in the course of his second volume (Acts 6-7; 10-11). But though he does give more prominence to Jesus' concern for "sinners" than do the other evangelists (Lk 5:29-32; 7:34, 37-50; 15:1-10; 18:10-14; 19:1-10), and though he also emphasizes Jesus' love command (Lk 6:27, 35; 7:47; 10:25-37; 11:42), it appears that Jesus' attitude toward the law was not a primary concern for Luke.

In John's Gospel controversies regarding the law seem to have fallen into the background. The criticisms of his healing on the Sabbath are still present, with Jesus pointing to other anomalies in traditional keeping of the law (Jn 7:22-23). But in other episodes the fact that Jesus healed on the Sabbath (Jn 5:9-10, 16; 9:14) becomes the occasion for the much more important debate about the status of Jesus (Jn 5:18; 9:16). This underscores the point that for John, the law, important as it was, has been eclipsed by the coming of Christ (Jn 1:17). In relation to Christ, the law's chief function is to testify to Jesus (Jn 1:45; 5:45-47).

See also BLASPHEMY; CLEAN AND UNCLEAN; COMMANDMENT; DIVORCE; ETHICS OF JESUS; FASTING; JUDAISM, COMMON; MOSES; OATHS AND SWEARING; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; RABINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS; SABBATH; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Balla, "Did Jesus Break the Fifth (Fourth) Commandment?" in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011) 4:2947-72; R. Banks, Jesus and the Law in the Synoptic Tradition (SNTSMS 28; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1975); G. Barth, "Matthew's Understanding of the Law," in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, by G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, trans. P. Scott (London: SCM, 1963) 58-164; K. Berger, Die Gesetzauslegung Jesu: Ihr historischer Hintergrund im Judentum und im Alten Testament (WMANT 40; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1972); H. D. Betz, The Sermon on the Mount: A Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, Including the Sermon on the Plain (Matthew 5:3-7:27 and Luke 6:20-49), ed. A. Y. Collins (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); M. Bockmuehl, Jewish Law in Gentile Churches: Halakhah and the Beginning of Christian Public Ethics (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2000); R. P. Booth, Jesus and the Laws of Purity: Tradition History and Legal History in Mark 7 (JSNTSup 13; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus,

Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (London: SPCK, 1990); idem, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); H. Falk, Jesus the Pharisee: A New Look at the Jewishness of Jesus (New York: Paulist Press, 1979); V. P. Furnish, The Love Command in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); R. A. Guelich, The Sermon on the Mount: A Foundation for Understanding (Waco, TX: Word, 1982); M. Hengel, The Charismatic Leader and His Followers, trans. J. C. G. Greig (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1981); T. Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking (BIS 55; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001); idem, "Jesus and the Purity Paradigm," in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011) 3:2709-44; T. Holmén and S. E. Porter, eds., Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011); H. Hübner, Das Gesetz in der synoptischen Tradition: Studien zur These einer progressiven Qumranisierung und Judaisierung innerhalb der synoptischen Tradition (Witten: Luther-Verlag, 1973); J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM, 1971); E. Käsemann, "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," in Essays on New Testament Themes, trans. W. J. Montague (London: SCM, 1964) 15-47; T. Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? (ConBNT 38; Almqvist & Wiksell, 2002); C. S. Keener, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Eerdmans, 2009); B. Lindars, "All Foods Clean: Thoughts on Jesus and the Law," in Law and Religion: Essays on the Place of the Law in Israel and Early Christianity, ed. B. Lindars (Cambridge: James Clarke, 1988) 61-71; W. R. G. Loader, Jesus' Attitude Towards the Law: A Study of the Gospels (WUNT 2/97; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997); idem, "Jesus and the Law," in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011) 3:2745-72; H. Maccoby, Jesus the Pharisee (London: SCM, 2003); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4: Law and Love (New York: Doubleday, 2009); H. Merkel, "The Opposition Between Jesus and Judaism," in Jesus and the Politics of His Day, ed. E. Bammel and C. F. D. Moule (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984) 129-44; D. J. Moo, "Jesus and the Authority of the Mosaic Law," JSNT 20 (1984) 3-49; E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); idem, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (London: SCM, 1990); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (2nd ed.; London: SCM, 2000 [1906]); G. Vermes, Jesus in His Jewish Con- text (London: SCM, 2003); S. Westerholm, Jesus and Scribal Authority (ConBNT 10; Lund: Gleerup, 1978).

J. D. G. Dunn

LAZARUS

This article concerns the Lazarus of John's Gospel, the brother of Martha and Mary, who lived in Bethany and was raised from the dead by Jesus (Jn 11:1—12:11). It begins with the question of the historicity of the raising of the dead Lazarus and then focuses on the identity of Lazarus and the literary features of the Lazarus account as a Johannine sign.

1. Historicity of the Lazarus Story
2. Identity of Lazarus
3. Literary Features of the Lazarus Account

1. Historicity of the Lazarus Story.

The story of the raising of Lazarus is found only in *John's Gospel, and some have questioned its historicity. The question of what really happened cannot be established with certainty (for discussion, see Meier, 798-873). It seems appropriate, however, to place it on a par with other *miracle stories of Jesus in general and stories of raising the dead in particular, which include the raising of the daughter of Jairus in Markan tradition (Mk 5:21-43 // Mt 9:18-26 // Lk 8:40-56), the raising of the son of the widow of Nain in Lukan tradition (Lk 7:11-17), and Jesus' saying that "the dead are raised" in the *Q tradition (Mt 11:5 // Lk 7:22). The absence of the Lazarus story in the Synoptic tradition seems to indicate that it belongs to the Johannine tradition of the miracle stories.

The Lazarus account is sometimes described as "the Fourth Gospel in miniature" (Lincoln, 232), but it cannot be explained completely as the editorial work of the Fourth Evangelist. The narrative seems to go back to some experience in the life of Jesus and Lazarus, which early Christians believed to be real (Henneberry, 64; Torrance). That the story appears toward the end of Jesus' public ministry, leading to his passion and death, is the work of the evangelist (Rochais, 137). The story becomes a powerful means for both the self-revelation of Jesus as the source of life, which in turn reveals the *glory (doxa) of God, and the presentation of the Johannine theology of death and eternal *life.

2. Identity of Lazarus.

Lazarus is one of the named disciples in John's Gospel. The name "Lazarus" is derived from the shortened Hebrew name "El-azar" ("God helps"). Another person named "Lazarus" appears in the Lukan parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31), but he is not to be identified with the Lazarus in John's Gospel. Lazarus appears twice in John's Gospel: first as the dead man raised by Jesus (Jn 11:1-44), then as one of those present at the meal when Mary anointed the feet of Jesus (Jn 12:1-11). Although he has a name, his characterization is underdeveloped (see Lincoln, esp. 212). The miracle seems to have been performed for the benefit of others: God, Jesus, the disciples, Mary and Martha and the Jews in the story. Moreover, the narrator shows no interest in Lazarus's personal responses to the act of Jesus.

John presents Lazarus as one who was loved by Jesus (Jn 11:3, 5, 36) and as a friend of Jesus (Jn 11:11). Only two male figures in John's Gospel are explicitly said to be loved by Jesus: Lazarus and the anonymous "disciple whom Jesus loved." Some commentators identify Lazarus with the *Beloved Disciple of John's Gospel (for discussion, see Charlesworth, 185-92, 288-91; Stibbe, 77-82, 154-58). There are six references in this Gospel to the "disciple whom Jesus loved" (Jn 13:23-26; 19:25-27; 20:2-10; 21:7, 20-23, 24). All of these references to the disciple whom Jesus loved occur after the raising of Lazarus, whom Jesus loved. The question in John 21:20-23 as to whether the Beloved Disciple would die makes better sense in the case of the resuscitated Lazarus. But the identification of Lazarus with the Beloved Disciple seems unconvincing. It is difficult to believe that the named Lazarus in John 11-12 is mentioned anonymously as the Beloved Disciple in the subsequent chapters of John 13-21 (Brown, xcv). If Lazarus is the Beloved Disciple, the one who is responsible for the Fourth Gospel, then why should the later redactors make him anonymous? It seems more probable that the two are distinct figures. The Beloved Disciple is someone known to the readers but is not named in John's Gospel.

Lazarus seems to be better understood as a representative figure in John's Gospel (Esler and Piper, 80-36). Lazarus is called by name and hears the voice of Jesus, and so he is depicted as belonging to the sheep of Jesus (cf. Jn 10:14-16). The Lazarus whom Jesus loved seems to be a representative figure of all those whom Jesus loves, the *sheep or the beloved disciples of Jesus—that is, Christians (cf. 3 Jn 15).

3. Literary Features of the Lazarus Account.

The raising of Lazarus, the seventh miracle in John's Gospel, functions as a transitional episode. Preceded by the public ministry of Jesus and followed by his farewell discourses, it concludes the first part of this Gospel (Jn 1-12) and introduces the second part (Jn 13-21). The Lazarus account fulfills the prophecy of Jesus in John 5:25 ("The dead will hear the voice of the Son of God, and those who hear will live"). The raised Lazarus reveals Jesus' life-giving power and anticipates the end-time resurrection (Lincoln, 214; see also Thompson, esp. 242). As a Johannine sign, the narrative is highly symbolic. The point of a sign is to invite the readers to respond to the significance of the event in the narrative (Lincoln, 215-16). Meant to reveal the glory (doxa) of God, it has christological overtones and implications (Jn 11:4). By raising Lazarus, Jesus continues the life-giving activity of God. The miracle here is not primarily the restoration of Lazarus to physical existence; it directs the readers to *God as Jesus, who has God's life in himself (Jn 5:26), bestows God's life on Lazarus (Thompson, 243-44). The sign reveals the nature of God as life-giving and testifies to the life everlasting.

The sign evoked two different responses among the crowd: some believed in Jesus, and others became more hostile to Jesus. On the one hand, the raising of Lazarus causes the disciples and some of the bystanders to believe in Jesus (Jn 11:15, 45), and on the other hand, the faith response generated by the raising of Lazarus caused the authorities to decide that Jesus must die (Jn 11:47-50) (see Schneiders, esp. 47-52). Jesus' death is understood in this Gospel as his glorification, as it reveals God's immense *love. In sum, Lazarus's sickness, death and subsequent resuscitation are the means by which the glory (doxa) of God is revealed, the faith of the disciples is deepened, and Jesus is glorified.

See also GLORY; MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bauckham and C. Mosser, eds., The Gospel of John and Christian Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John I-XII: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB29; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966); J. H. Charlesworth, The Beloved Disciple: Whose Witness Validates the Gospel of John? (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995), 185-92, 288-91; P. F. Esler and R. A. Piper, Lazarus, Mary and Martha: Social-Scientific Approaches to the Gospel of John (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 2006); B. H. Henneberry, "The Raising of Lazarus (John 11:1-44): An Evaluation of the Hypothesis That a Written Tradition Lies Behind the Narrative" (Ph.D. diss., University of Louvain, 1983); A. T. Lincoln, "The Lazarus Story: A Literary Perspective," in The Gospel of John and Christian Theology, ed. R. Bauckham and C. Mosser (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 211-32; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew:

Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message and Miracles (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994); G. Rochais, Les récits de résurrection des morts dans le Nouveau Testament (SNTSMS 40; Cambridge University Press, 1981); S. M. Schneiders, "Death in the Community of Eternal Life: History, Theology, and Spirituality in John 11," Int 41 (1987) 44-56; M. W. G. Stibbe, John as Storyteller: Narrative Criticism and the Fourth Gospel (SNTSMS 73; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); M. M. Thompson, "The Raising of Lazarus in John 11: A Theological Reading," in The Gospel of John and Christian Theology, ed. R. Bauckham and C. Mosser (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 233-44; A. J. Torrance, "The Lazarus Narrative, Theological History and Historical Probability," in The Gospel of John and Christian Theology, ed. R. Bauckham and C. Mosser (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 245-62. R. M. Chennattu

LEPROSY

The Greek term lepra, which appears only in the Synoptic Gospels in the NT, is commonly translated as "leprosy" in English translations (e.g., NRSV). Nowadays, however, there is general agreement among scholars that it denotes neither Hansen's disease nor other specific skin diseases. The conditions in view rendered people (and objects) ritually unclean according to Jewish law.

1. The Problem of Translation
2. Lepra as Unclean
3. Lepra / Lepros in the Gospels

1. The Problem of Translation.

It is rarely thought that the Hebrew term šāra'at ("leprosy") in the OT includes Hansen's disease, since the symptoms of šāra'at in persons described in Leviticus 13 are different from those of Hansen's disease. According to Leviticus 13–14, lepros refers to a variety of conditions of the surfaces of persons (Lev 13:1-46), clothing (Lev 13:47-59) and houses (Lev 14:34-53). Leviticus 13–14 consists not of medical directions but rather is a ritual guideline for the diagnosis of "clean" and "unclean." The purpose of the expulsion of a lepros ("a person with a skin disease") is not to prevent the spread of infection in a medical sense but rather to keep the "unclean" out of God's community. Hence, šāra'at is a ritual term, not a medical one (see Clean and Unclean).

The LXX translators use the Greek lepra for the Hebrew šāra'at. In classical Greek lepra refers to a variety of skin conditions but not to a specific disease, while another Greek term, elephantiasis, which does not appear in the NT, may refer to a skin disease similar to Hansen's disease. It is more accurate and appropriate to translate lepra as "serious skin disease" or simply as "skin disease."

2. Lepra as Unclean.

The idea of "clean and unclean" lies behind the expulsion of a lepros. In the Synoptic accounts in which the word lepra appears, the Greek verb katharizō, which means "to make clean," is used for "to heal leprosy" instead of other verbs such as iaomai and therapeuō, both of which mean "to cure." Katharizō is a ritual term for the elimination of ritual uncleanness. Hence, the healing of leprosy carries religious rather than physical implications.

The OT law suggests a variety of causes of defilement such as childbirth, leprosy and discharges from sexual organs. Those who become unclean in these ways are isolated from the community (Num 5:1-3). A lepros pollutes the holiness of God's people. Those whom the priest regards as having "leprosy" must announce their condition and remain outside the community (Lev 13:45-46). It is also true that in the time of Jesus leproi were forced to live outside of cities and were prohibited from having contact with others (see Josephus, J.W. 5.227; Ag. Ap. 1.281-282; 11Q19 XLVIII, 14-17). In Luke 17:12 ten leproi stand "at a distance" from Jesus.

Anthropologists (e.g., M. Douglas) describe why the sufferers of leprosy were recognized as "unclean." Skin disease represents the danger of breaching the boundary of the body. When God created the universe, everything was arranged in order—for example, the water above and below the firmament, and the land separate from the water. Likewise, the body is arranged in order and bordered by its outer walls. Skin is the wall separating the body from the external universe. Therefore, either the emission of the body's vital fluids or the failure of its skin indicates that the body is going counter to what God created.

Beside the idea of purity, the OT often considers that the cause of leprosy is divine punishment for *sins committed against God (note how leprosy appeared in Miriam [Num 12], Gehazi [2 Kings 5:19b-27] and Uzziah [2 Chron 26:19-21]). A sin offering is required for the purification of leprosy. In addition, Philo, who interprets Jewish purity rules allegorically, connects leprosy with voluntary sins (see Deus 123-135).

According to OT laws, only priests have the authority to diagnose one as unclean or clean (Lev 13–14). In the larger OT picture the diagnosis is the task of a priest, and healing is the task of the prophets (e.g., Elisha [2 Kings 5:1-19a]). This bifurcation of duties is observed also in cleansing stories in the Synoptic Gospels. That is, Jesus does not usurp the priest's function but rather plays the role of a *prophet (Mk 1:44 par.; Lk 17:14).

3. Leprosy / Lepros in the Gospels.

In the account of the cleansing of a lepros (Mk 1:40-45 par.), after cleansing the man by touching him, Jesus sends the man to a priest for his cure to be declared as well as for accompanying sacrifices. Furthermore, in the account of ten leproi (Lk 17:11-19) Jesus similarly sends them to a priest, and on their way to the priest they are cleansed. One of them (a *Samaritan) feels no need to go to the priest, so he returns to Jesus and falls upon his face at Jesus' feet to give thanks (Jesus' feet are considered an appropriate place for *worship [cf. Lk 8:35, 41; 10:39; Acts 4:37; 10:26]). Only this cleansed Samaritan recognizes Jesus as the divine agent and his authority over that of the priests.

In reply to a question put by John the Baptist's messengers, "Are you the one who is to come?" (Mt 11:3; Lk 7:20), Jesus lists those to whom the *gospel is announced (Mt 11:5; Lk 7:22). Lepers are listed with the blind, the lame, the deaf, the dead and the poor. Moreover, in Matthew 10:8 Jesus orders his disciples to "cleanse the lepers" as well as "cure the sick, raise the dead" and "cast out demons." The rules of the Qumran community list the blemished among those excluded from their community (see 1Q28a II, 5-7; 1QM VII, 4-6). Those religious outsiders, including the leper, become recipients of the gospel that Jesus proclaims.

In Mark 14:3 (// Mt 26:6) Jesus is a guest of Simon the Leper in Bethany. According to the Temple Scroll of the Qumran community (11Q19 XLVI, 16-18) (see Dead Sea Scrolls), the isolated areas of "the lepers, those suffering from a flux, and men who have had a (nocturnal) emission" are set apart in the eastern section of the city. Bethany, which stands to the east of Jerusalem and toward the east slope of the Mount of Olives, is assumed to be an isolated village for the sufferers of leprosy (Yadin). This suggests that Jesus is willing to enter such a village and stay at the house of the leper.

Despite playing an important role in the Synoptic Gospels, lepros is not referred to in the rest of the NT. However, the sufferers of leprosy appear as the recipients of charity in the sermons of the church fathers (e.g., Gregory of Nyssa).

See also CLEAN AND UNCLEAR; HEALING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. G. Browne, Leprosy in the Bible (London: Christian Medical Fellowship, 1970); M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (New York: Routledge, 1966); J. Milgrom, Leviticus 1-16 (AB 3; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1991); J. J. Pilch, Healing in the New Testament: Insights from Medical and Mediterranean Anthropology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); Y. Yadin, The Temple Scroll: the Hidden Law of the Dead Sea Sect (Random House: New York, 1985).

T. Omiya

LIBERTY. See FREEDOM.

LIFE, ETERNAL LIFE

There are three terms for "life" in the Gospels: bios, which refers to natural or material existence experienced between birth and death; psychē, which speaks of one's basic selfhood, the whole that constitutes a person and the self-consciousness of selfhood; and zōē, the primary NT term that takes on soteriological force in describing the gift of life from *God and eschatological force in depicting the future hope of life in eternity. In the Gospels there is also related terminology, such as "repentance," "forgiveness of sins" (especially in Luke) and "enter the kingdom of God."

1. Mark
2. Matthew
3. Luke
4. John
5. Conclusion

1. Mark.

"Life" in the first written Gospel appears four times as zōē and seven times as psychē, with the concomitant ideas of *repentance and entering the *kingdom appearing in this sense a further ten times. From this, it is easy to see that "life" in this soteriological sense plays an important role in Jesus' kingdom message according to Mark. The concept begins with the messianic forerunner, John, preaching "a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mk 1:5), preparing for Jesus' message, which also centered on "repenting" and "believing the gospel" (Mk 1:15 [cf. Mk 6:12, where the disciples also preach repentance]). This forms the precursor for finding life with God.

Zōē appears in two passages: the warning about causing others to stumble (Mk 9:43, 45), and the interaction between Jesus and the young man who wants to "inherit eternal life" (Mk 10:17, 31). In the first passage the phrase "enter the kingdom of God" in Mark 9:47 parallels "enter life" in Mark 9:43, 45, and it is clear that these refer to the same outcome: entering the kingdom signifies entering eternal life. All three passages contrast eternal punishment in Gehenna/hellfire with the future inheritance of the follower of Christ. In Mark 10:17, 31 the wealthy young man is told by Christ that his desire to experience eternal life at the end of this present existence (note the emphasis on final rather than realized eschatology) is dependent on how faithfully he lives for God in this present life. Still, the hundredfold return in Mark 10:30 of what is sacrificed for Jesus in this life (home and family) has a double function: it promises incredible blessings in this present world (primarily in the church, where the hundred fathers, mothers, etc. will be found), while at the same time serving as a proleptic foretaste of what will be given at the eschaton ("eternal life").

This theme is carried on in the psychē passages. Often it is used anthropologically for "the principle of life . . . over against physical death" (Sand, 501), as in Mark 10:45 ("give his life as a ransom"), or in the contrast, "to save life or destroy" (Mark 3:4). Yet there is double meaning in Mark 8:35-37 ("whoever wants to save their life will lose it"), as Jesus refers both to temporary earthly life and to eternal heavenly life. Life in this world is a precious possession and is to be lived for God rather than self. Moreover, how one's natural life is lived in relation to God and Christ is directly related to future destiny. God has created this life and provides every necessity for living this life, so all is related to him. The priorities in this life will determine one's destiny in the next. Living only for temporary benefits will produce eternal loss. In the other two passages (Mk 12:30: "Love the Lord . . . with all your soul"; Mk 14:34: "My soul is overwhelmed with sorrow") Jesus is referring to the whole person, especially in terms of relationship with God.

In conclusion, for Mark, "life" emphasizes the need to make God and Christ central in one's present earthly existence, for that will determine one's eternal relationship with true "life" in its final sense. Life is a gift from God and entails the reversal of the death and decay that results from sin.

2. Matthew.

The same themes from Mark continue in Matthew, but with the great emphasis on final eschatology in Matthew. The "eternal" aspect receives even more stress. There is an extensive emphasis in this Gospel on the last *judgment (Mt 3:7, 10; 5:22, 29-30; 7:13, 19, 21-23; 8:12, 29; 10:15, 28; 12:36-37, 41-42; 13:40-42, 49-50; 16:24-28; 18:8-9; 19:28-29; 22:13; 24:40-41, 51;

25:12, 30). With this extensive thrust, a strong futuristic sense of "life" is distinctive. In Matthew 7:14, at the conclusion to the "Sermon on the Mount, we find the Jewish metaphor of the two paths, the "narrow" one that leads to "life" and the "broad" one that leads to destruction. Matthew retains the Marcan material on the danger of causing others to stumble (Mt 18:8-9) and the wealthy man (Mt 19:16, 17) but adds to his understanding of zōē two new emphases. First, he removes the present blessings in the conclusion of the interaction with the young man, centering entirely on the promise to "inherit eternal life" (Mt 19:29), which is added to the final promise that the disciples will "sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes" (Mt 19:28). That is, he centers entirely on the final or eternal aspects of God's "payback" for surrendering all for him. Second, he concludes the Olivet discourse with an allusion to Daniel 12:2, establishing the absolute nature of divine justice in the sense that the wicked "will go away to eternal punishment, but the righteous to eternal life" (Mt 25:46). The emphasis is on the future and eternal nature of the two opposite destinies. Here, and throughout the NT, eternal life "is the motivation for a life of sacrificial service to God, the church and the very world that rejects and persecutes God's people" (Osborne, 939).

Passages that use psychē contain both aspects. The section on anxiety in the Sermon on the Mount begins, "Do not worry about your life [psychē]" (Mt 6:25), a clear reference to earthly existence, and this is the theme in other places (Mt 11:29; 12:18 [psychē = "I"]). Several parallel Mark (e.g., Mt 16:25-26 = Mk 8:35-37; Mt 20:28 = Mk 10:45; Mt 22:37 = Mk 12:30; Mt 26:38 = Mk 14:34). Finally, some speak of one's eternal destiny: (1) Matthew 10:28 commands Jesus' followers to fear "the one who can destroy both soul and body in hell"; (2) Matthew 10:39 sums up the discipleship sayings of Matthew 10:32-39 by establishing the eternal parameters of discipleship: "Whoever finds their life [= seeking the world's rewards] will lose it, and whoever loses their life for my sake will find it [for eternity]." To live for present pleasure means to lose the future. The emphasis is on the eternal consequences of rejecting God, eternal punishment versus everlasting life.

The same emphases take place in Matthew's distinctive "kingdom" theology. It has long been recognized that "entering the kingdom of God/heaven" in Matthew is equivalent to the divine gift of eternal life. It is stated negatively (Mt 5:20; 7:21; 18:3; 23:13) and positively (Mt 19:23-24; 21:31), but the meaning combines the realized (life in Christ now) and final (life eternal) aspects of the concept. The metaphor is critical. With Christ, the kingdom has come near (Mt 3:2; 4:17) and indeed has arrived (Mt 12:28). “God’s reign” has begun. Christ’s preaching is kingdom teaching (Mt 13:11, 51-52); indeed, the Sermon on the Mount presents the new *ethic for the kingdom people, and those who follow him are kingdom people. As members of the kingdom community, they must exemplify a higher ethic (Mt 5:20, with “greater righteousness” referring to “right” living based on God’s standards). With belief in Christ and a life lived God’s way, people “enter” the kingdom of God’s reign, and eternal life will be their inheritance.

3. Luke.

In Luke-Acts, with its strong emphasis on soteriology, “repent for the forgiveness of sins” becomes a primary theme, found in Luke 1:77; 3:3; 24:47; Acts 2:38 (“be baptized”); Acts 5:31; 10:43 (“receive”); Acts 13:38 (“proclaim”); Acts 26:18 (“receive”). In addition, repentance is stressed eleven times in Luke-Acts, as opposed to once each in Matthew and Mark (with the verb found fourteen times versus seven times). Repentance and faith are two sides of the same coin, the one entailing the setting aside of sin, the other embracing a life of trust in Christ. Luke states clearly that repentance is correlated with *forgiveness of sins from God, and this redemptive act makes it possible for the believer to receive eternal life, the supreme gift of God. Luke’s ordo salutis (order of salvation) is as follows: first the *gospel is proclaimed and heard (Lk 4:43; 8:1; 16:16; 18:29; Acts 2:37; 4:4; 8:6), leading to repentance and belief (Lk 1:45; 8:12-13, 50; Acts 4:4; 5:14; 8:12; 9:42). With repentance comes forgiveness of sins and then eternal life (Marshall, 192-95).

“Life” entails the presence of salvation in following Jesus and the promise of eternal life in the future. Yet, in Luke it is closely aligned with the process of salvation noted above and centers on finding salvation Jesus’ way, especially in relation to the issue of earthly possessions. The theological point begins with Luke 4:4, where Jesus quotes Deuteronomy 8:3 in response to his first temptation, “One does not live by bread alone,” reiterating Israel’s failure in forgetting God and living for the prosperity of the land (Deut 8:11-17). In the context of the parable of the good Samaritan Jesus commands, “Do this [love God and neighbor], and you will live,” with the new life in God primary. In the parable of the rich fool, in Luke 12:15 Jesus says, “Life [zōē] does not consist in an abundance of possessions,” so that the “fool” is the one whose treasure is the possessions accumulated in this world with no regard for God. Then, in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Abraham told the man, “Remember that during your life [zōē] you received good things and Lazarus bad things.” The point is that the ordo salutis contains a reversal of roles from this life to the next. Those who “live” for temporary wealth and refuse to share (Lk 16:9) will have nothing in the next life. This relation to material possessions is a major emphasis in Luke’s theology of life (see Lk 1:51-53; 3:7-14; 4:18; 6:20-26; 9:62; 10:36-37; 11:42, 46; 12:15, 21, 33-34; 14:18-20; 15:11-32; 16:1-13, 19-31; 17:26-29; 18:18-30; 19:1-10, 11-27).

4. John.

Most studies of “life” in the teachings of Jesus center on John because of the centrality of this theme in his Gospel, where the verb zaō appears seventeen times and the noun zōē thirty-six times. The two primary emphases are Christology (with Jesus both God and the living revealer of God) and soteriology (with John being an “encounter” Gospel, centering on “believing” in Jesus by coming to “know” and “see” him as God’s final “truth,” leading to “[eternal] life”). Thus, “life” culminates the movement of John and appears in nearly every chapter as the goal for all people in God’s mission to the world. “Life” contrasts with death, and in synonymous fashion “light” contrasts with “darkness.” Physical death is a primary reality for all human beings, but in Jesus God’s people have passed “from death to life” and thereby “will never die” (Jn 8:51; 11:26). All this is possible only because Jesus is “the resurrection and the life” (Jn 11:25). Physical death for the believer is a transition to eternal life. Five areas highlighting this motif in John may be noted.

4.1. Jesus as the Embodiment of Life. The divine Jesus embodies life in himself. In John 6:35, 48 he is “the bread of life,” which could be an objective genitive (“the bread that produces life”) but could also be epexegetical (“the bread that is life”). The latter understanding is made viable by John 1:4 (“in him was life”); John 5:26 (“As the Father has life in himself, so he has granted the Son to have life in himself”); John 14:26 (“I am . . . the life”). There is an ontological connection between the Father/Son and life. The life that he has given to those who believe reflects the very being of the Godhead. When Jesus speaks, his words are infused with life (Jn 6:63); by his very essence Jesus contains “the words of eternal life” (Jn 6:68).

4.2. Life as New Creation. There is a dimension of the new creation in the gift of life from Jesus to his followers (see Brown). Jesus “the Word” is the agent of creation, and since he embodies life (see 4.1 above), it is the prerogative of Jesus-God-who-is-life to bestow life on his new-creation community. In John 4:10, 14 Jesus promises the Samaritan woman that he can “give” her “living water” that can “well up to eternal life.” Life is under his control and is a salvific gift presented by the divine giver (Schnackenburg, 1:426) “to anyone he wants” (Jn 5:21); in other words, he has complete authority over its bestowal. Jesus is “the bread of life” (Jn 6:35) who alone can “give eternal life” (Jn 6:27, 33) by yielding his “flesh” “for the life of the world” (Jn 6:51), producing security for the recipients of the gift (Jn 10:28; 17:2). Jesus as the giver of life is portrayed in the two healing miracles in John 4:46–54 (“Your son will live”) and John 11:1–44 (Lazarus raised on the third day). Jesus raises people from both physical and spiritual death. The latter is the greater miracle.

4.3. Life and Light. This life is synonymous with the “light” image in John, as it is clear in John 1:4 (“In him was life, and that life was the light of all human-kind”). This is part of an emphasis on the universal salvific will in John’s prologue, with John 1:5 (the light “shining in the darkness”) leading to John 1:7 (the Baptist coming “as a witness concerning the light”) and then to John 1:9 (Jesus “the true light that gives light to everyone”). Jesus as “the light of the world” makes possible “the light of life” (Jn 8:12; cf. Jn 9:4–5). He is the divine Shekinah fulfilling Psalm 27:1 (“The LORD is my light and my salvation”). In John’s Gospel experiencing salvation is tantamount to leaving the darkness of this world and entering the light of the new realm of Christ (Jn 3:19–21; 12:35–36, 46). As A. Köstenberger states, the life and light images are “inextricably wedded” and “attest to the blessing resulting from Jesus’ coming into the world: new, eternal life resulting from his substitutionary death” (Köstenberger, 348–49).

4.4. Life Through Belief. In John’s Gospel life results from the individual coming to “belief” in Jesus and is the true purpose of the this Gospel (Jn 20:31). Whereas Paul centers on the concrete reality of pistis (“faith”), John uses only the verb pisteuō (“believe” [98x]) to bring out the dynamic nature of the process of the encounter. The divine encounter of the sinner with the light and life of God in Jesus produces conviction of sin, and there ensues a call to believe—synonyms: receiving him (Jn 1:12; 3:11, 33; 4:36; 5:43), coming to him (Jn 5:40; 6:35, 44; 7:34, 37; 8:21), drinking the living water (Jn 4:13–14; 6:35, 53–56; 7:37–38). For this Gospel, “faith” contains its own ordo salutis, for “seeing” (114x) and “knowing” (141x) are not part of the process that results in faith but rather are constituent elements of faith itself. Divine sovereignty and human responsibility function together in the act of coming to faith. The result is life. The basic statement is made twice in a row at the end of Nicodemus’s speech (Jn 3:15) and the beginning of John’s expository summary (Jn 3:16): “everyone who believes may have eternal life.” It is clear: every person without restriction has access to eternal life through faith in Christ. This is stated several times in the “bread from heaven” discourse (Jn 6:40, 47, 51; cf. Jn 6:53–56) (see Bread), where Jesus makes clear that consuming his flesh is concomitant with a deep-seated “belief” in him and enables one to experience “eternal life.” Jesus demands a total encounter with himself as the true meaning of “belief.”

4.5. Eternal Life as Present Possession. There is a strong realized aspect to John’s *eschatology, and this influences his presentation of the doctrine of “life.” It has been said that John’s present-oriented view of salvation has replaced the future eschatology of the Synoptics (Bultmann, 2:75–92), but that is a vast overstatement, for the ideas of future judgment and final salvation/resurrection are firmly presented in John (Jn 5:25, 28–30; 6:39–40; 11:23–26; 12:48; 14:2–4; 21:22). Thus, there is arguably an inaugurated thrust to the presence of the kingdom (Jn 3:3, 5; 18:36) and the reality of *salvation, with a distinct emphasis on the present possession of eternal life by the believer. The “already but not yet” tension in John’s Gospel is distinctly central, for the one who believes “has [present tense] eternal life” (Jn 3:15; 5:24a) and also “will not be [future tense] judged” (Jn 5:24b), because such persons have already “crossed over from death to life” (Jn 5:24c). A change of realms has taken place (cf. Rom 5:12–6:11), and eternal life is a present possession. This is restated in John 6:54, where those who fully encounter Jesus (see 4.4 above) immediately “have eternal life,” and Jesus will “raise them up at the last day” (cf. Jn 10:10; 17:3).

5. Conclusion.

The Gospels echo with the OT theme that all life begins with God, the source and creator of this life. All life is the creation of the living God, who alone is life (Deut 5:26; Is 40:18–26). The view is synthetic: life does not consist of entities such as body, soul and spirit; rather, it is holistic and to be viewed as God’s gift set in opposition to death. With human life viewed as a whole, Jews and Christians did not see it as scientific (as did the Greeks); they viewed life in relation to the world that humans inhabit—not theirs “to dispose of,” but “as duration, the days of a man's life which are granted him by Yahweh, the Lord of life" (Link, 478). God alone is the giver of life, the one who breathes life into existence and who takes it away (Gen 2:7; 6:3, 7). God's word is life; he speaks it into existence ("And God said" before each day of creation in Gen 1—2), and all live on the basis of his words (Deut 8:3) and find true life by obeying them (Josh 1:8; Pss 1:2-3; 119:9-16). Thus, life in both the earthly and the eternal sense is a gift from God, which comes from the Father (Ezek 37:1-14), the Son (Jn 6:27, 33) and the Holy Spirit (Is 44:3-4; Ezek 36:26, 27; Jn 7:37-39).

See also ESCHATOLOGY; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; RESURRECTION; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. K. Brown, "Creation's Renewal in the Gospel of John," CBQ 72 (2010) 275-90; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (2 vols.; New York: Scribner, 1951-1955); D. A. Carson, The Gospel According to John (PNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); B. B. Colijn, "The Life of the Age to Come: Eternal Life," in Images of Salvation in the New Testament (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2010); K. Haacker, "What Must I Do to Inherit Eternal Life?" in Jesus Research: An International Perspective; The First Princeton-Prague Symposium on Jesus Research, Prague 2005, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and P. Pokorný (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); D. Hill, "The Background and Biblical Usage of zōē and zōē aiōnios," in Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms (SNTMS 5; Cambridge: University Press, 1967) 82-201; A. J. Köstenberger, A Theology of John's Gospel and Letters (BTNT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2009); H.-G. Link, "Life," NIDNTT 2:476-84; R. N. Longenecker, ed., Life in the Face of Death: The Resurrection Message of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1989); G. R. Osborne, Matthew (ZECNT 1; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2010); A. Sand, "ψυχῆ," EDNT 3:500-503; R. Schnackenburg, The Gospel According to St. John (3 vols.; New York: Crossroad, 1982); T. Thatcher, What We Have Heard from the Beginning: The Past, Present, and Future of Johannine Studies (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2007); M. M. Thompson, "Eternal Life in the Gospel of John," ExAud 5 (1989) 35-55.

G. R. Osborne

of "light versus darkness" as a root metaphor, a symbol of good versus evil, and the Judeo-Christian tradition is no exception. Consequently, there is debate regarding the proper background against which to understand the use of "light and darkness" imagery in the Gospels, and in John's Gospel in particular.

1. Background
2. Synoptic Gospels
3. Gospel of John

1. Background.

Light and darkness has been attached to the OT tradition, the Qumran sect, Hellenistic philosophy, the Hermetica and any number of Eastern religious traditions. Any combination of those probably is possible; likewise, it may well be that "light versus darkness" is simply a universal, archetypal metaphor that nearly every culture understands, and no particular borrowing needs to be implied. That is, light and darkness appear to be universally recognized symbols for the ongoing struggle between good and evil.

An appreciation for some of the literature nearest the Gospels is, nonetheless, helpful to understanding the use of light and darkness in those Gospels. In the OT these images are found frequently, most notably in creation accounts. Genesis 1 has light created first, overcoming the dark void. The creation psalms employ the same imagery (e.g., Ps 104). One also thinks of darkness as a plague on Egypt, typifying the evil that has fallen upon them, contrasted to the frequent use of "light" in conjunction with "life" (e.g., Job 3; Ps 49; Is 53).

At least some Jewish sects came to use the metaphor of light versus darkness with reference to a grand cosmic battle between the forces of good and evil. The sect at Qumran is worth mentioning, as their texts frequently use the phrases "sons of light" and "sons of darkness" as protagonist and antagonist in this apocalyptic conflict (see esp. 1QM; 4QWar Scroll) (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

One also finds "light" and "darkness" in Greek philosophy (see, e.g., Plato, Resp. 514a-541b; Plutarch, Adv. Col. 1114 b). These terms most typically are used to refer to intellectual enlightenment, which is a kind of "life" and a metaphorical extension of the archetypal meaning. One thinks of Plato's allegory of the cave in which we are said to be living in darkness in this world, but are encouraged to look to the light to understand a more perfect way.

2. Synoptic Gospels.

The Synoptic Gospels do not often use the metaphor of "light," especially in comparison to the John's

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

Light and darkness are two of the oldest and most universally recognized symbols in the world. Nearly every culture and religion in history has some sense Gospel. “You are the light of the world” (Mt 5:14) is typical, along with the surrounding sayings about a city on a hill (Mt 5:14), a light on a lampstand (Mt 5:15) and shining forth one’s own light (Mt 5:16). The standard metaphorical usage of light is employed here: the light is the truth and goodness of Jesus’ message that the disciples are responsible for spreading. The Synoptics also use “light” to accompany revelatory activity. The *transfiguration (Mt 17:1-9 par.) involves imagery of light and brightness. Here, light accompanies the unveiling of Christ’s identity. Similarly, note Luke 2:32, where Simeon declares Jesus to be “a light for revelation to the Gentiles.”

3. Gospel of John.

The Gospel of John is marked by its use of dualities, such as light/darkness, above/below and flesh/spirit. This sort of dualistic worldview reflects a belief in a cosmic struggle between good and evil. It is in John’s Gospel that the metaphor of light and darkness reaches its full fruition in the NT. The metaphor begins in the prologue, where the concepts of “light” and “life”* and logos* are tied closely together. Nearly every commentator notes the obvious echoing of Genesis 1, where it is said that light and life were created by the spoken word. In John’s prologue, foreshadowing the rest of this Gospel, the *incarnate Word brings true light and life, concepts that are regularly paired and equated. It is also notable that the light “shines” (Jn 1:5) and “enlightens” (Jn 1:9), and “the life was the light of all humankind” (Jn 1:4). Light, then, is an active entity, something that brings life and knowledge.

The rest of John’s Gospel continues this trajectory. Jesus claims to be the “light of the world” (Jn 8:12; cf. Jn 9:5; 12:46). Light and darkness are in conflict with one another, and the people find themselves on one side or the other (Jn 3:19-21) based on their good or evil deeds. Jesus commands his followers to “walk in the light” (Jn 12:35) rather than in darkness, which becomes something of an ethical metaphor. There is no middle ground; one is either on the side of light or on the side of darkness. It is here that the phrase “sons of light” (Jn 12:36) is reminiscent of what is found at Qumran, reflecting a cosmic battle between two very distinct sides. The phrase “sons of light” occurs only here in John, and only in Luke 16:8 among the Synoptics.

Jesus is the source of light. *John the Baptist is merely a witness to that light (Jn 1:6-8), as are those who walk in the light (cf. Jn 12:35; see also 1 Jn 1:7), but they themselves are not the light. Jesus is also able to give light to those who have none. Consider the man born blind in John 9. The man has no sight, and thus he lacked light also (see Blindness and Deafness). Jesus heals the man’s sight while making a pronouncement about bringing light to the world (Jn 9:5). All of these examples should be contrasted with characters who appear in the darkness. Nicodemus (Jn 3:2) comes to Jesus at night, and symbolically he is in the dark; Judas (Jn 13:30) leaves at night to betray Jesus; and Jesus is arrested in the darkness of night, and the arresting mob is said to carry “torches, lanterns, and weapons” (Jn 18:3). The Fourth Gospel clearly understands the story of Christ as the playing out of a cosmic conflict between good and evil, most potently expressed as a conflict between light and darkness.

See also BLINDNESS AND DEAFNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John I-XII: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 29; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966); R. A. Culpepper, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); S. R. Garrett, “Lest the Light in You Be Darkness”: Luke 11:33-36 and the Question of Commitment,” JBL 110 (1991) 93-105; J. G. Janzen, “‘I Am the Light of the World’ (John 8:12): Connotations and Context,” Enc 67 (2006) 115-35; E. W. Klink, “Light of the World: Cosmology and the Johannine Literature,” in Cosmology and New Testament Theology, ed. J. T. Pennington and S. M. McDonough (LNTS 355; London: T & T Clark, 2008) 74-89; G. H. van Kooten, “The ‘True Light Which Enlightens Everyone’ (John 1:9): John, Genesis, the Platonic Notion of the ‘True, Noetic Light,’ and the Allegory of the Cave in Plato’s Republic,” in The Creation of Heaven and Earth: Re-Interpretation of Genesis 1 in the Context of Judaism, Ancient Philosophy, Christianity, and Modern Physics, ed. G. H. van Kooten (TBN 8; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005) 149-94; A. Yong, “‘The Light Shines in the Darkness’: Johannine Dualism and the Challenge for Christian Theology of Religions Today,” JR 89 (2009) 31-56.

C. Hartsock

LITERARY CRITICISM. See NARRATIVE CRITICISM.

LITURGY, LITURGICAL FEATURES. See WORSHIP.

LOGOS

Logos is the Greek word for “word, saying, statement, message” and also has the meanings “reason” and “account [to be settled].” While these meanings are found throughout all four Gospels, logos is well known as a designation for Jesus in the opening verses of the Gospel of John. Diverse backgrounds have been suggested for understanding this use of logos. Each possible background offers insight into the function of the term in John's Gospel and the way in which logos is employed in Johannine *Christology.

1. Logos in the Synoptic Gospels
2. Literary Use of Logos in John
3. Background of the Logos in John
4. Logos Christology in John's Gospel

1. Logos in the Synoptic Gospels.

In the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke) logos most often refers to the spoken word, either as a short saying, statement, or message, or as a longer discourse when used in the plural (Mt 7:28; 26:1). Anyone may speak logos or logoi ("words"): the Syrophoenician woman (Mk 7:29), Gabriel (Lk 1:20, 29), Herod (Lk 23:9), the disciples (Mt 10:14; Lk 24:17) and others (Mk 5:36). Logos may indicate an account to be settled (Mt 18:23; 25:19; Lk 16:2), a report about someone or something (Mt 28:15; Lk 5:15; 7:17) and a saying from the OT (e.g., "as it is written in the book of the logoi of Isaiah" [Lk 3:4]). Mark and Luke more often than Matthew use logos to refer to a word spoken by Jesus, but there are only a few instances where the Synoptic Gospels emphasize the logos or logoi as specifically those spoken by Jesus (Mk 8:38 // Lk 9:26; Mk 13:31 // Mt 24:35 // Lk 21:33; Mt 7:24 // Lk 6:47; Mt 7:26, 28) (see Gundry, 6-7). Another significant use is found in the beginning of Luke's Gospel, where logos refers to everything that was handed down from the eyewitnesses about Jesus—the *gospel message (Lk 1:2; cf. Lk 1:4).

All three Synoptic Gospels portray the seed in the *parable of the sower as ho logos ("the word" [Mk 4:14]). Matthew and Luke offer further description of the seed as "the logos of the kingdom" (Mt 13:19) and "the logos of God" (Lk 8:11). This seems to indicate that in this instance logos is used to refer to Jesus' proclamation of the *kingdom. In addition, Luke correlates Jesus' teaching and the word of *God in that those who listen to Jesus hear the word of God (Lk 5:1; 8:21; 11:28).

2. Literary Use of Logos in John.

In the Gospel of John logos can be used to refer to words or speech such as sayings, statements and discourses as in the Synoptic Gospels. Similar to the Synoptic Gospels, there are also examples of logos meaning "report" (Jn 21:23), a saying from the OT (Jn 12:38; 15:25) and the sum total of Jesus' teaching (Jn 8:37; 15:20). In John, Jesus is the main speaker of logos, and the logos often is declared as Jesus' logos (see Gundry, 4-5). For example, Jesus says that anyone who keeps ton emon logon ("my word") will never see death (Jn 8:51; also Jn 4:41; 8:43). When logos is used of Jesus' words, there is an emphasis either on hearing his words (Jn 5:24), keeping his words (Jn 8:51; 14:23) or remaining in his words (Jn 8:31; cf. 5:38) (see Dodd). Similar to Luke's Gospel, but more evident in John, there is overlap between Jesus' logoi and God's logoi because all that Jesus speaks comes from the Father (Jn 8:28; 12:49-50; 17:14). Jesus speaks the logos of God (Jn 14:24).

In what is known as the "prologue" of John's Gospel (Jn 1:1-18), Jesus is called ho logos ("the Word") and is depicted as preexistent, with God, and as God (Jn 1:1-2). The logos acted in creation, has made eternal life possible in that in him was *life (Jn 1:3), and has given those who receive him and believe in his name the right to be called "children of God" (Jn 1:12; cf. 5:24). Grace and truth came through the logos, in contrast to the *law that was given through Moses (Jn 1:17). The most significant aspect of logos in John's Gospel is that the logos has been made flesh, dwelt among his people, and is equated with the human person of Jesus (Jn 1:14) (see Incarnation).

3. Background of the Logos in John.

Although Stoic views of the logos as the rational ordering principle of the world and gnostic understandings of the logos in relation to a gnostic redeemer myth have previously been suggested (see Bultmann), the more plausible backgrounds for the use of logos in the Gospel of John include the OT, *wisdom traditions, Philo's writings, and the memra ("word") of the Lord in the Jewish Targumim.

3.1. Old Testament. The opening of Genesis is unarguably part of the background of the first few verses of John's Gospel (see Evans). Both begin with the phrase "in the beginning," and they share similar themes of light, darkness, life, humanity and, of course, word (Gen 1:1-5, 26-27; 2:7; Jn 1:1-5, 9). Although no term for "word" is used in the Genesis account, God creates through the act of speaking (Gen 1:3). John 1:1-3 declares that all things were made through the logos, who was with God and was God.

However, not all of what is said of the logos in John 1:1-18 has its background in Genesis 1-2. The wilderness wanderings of Israel and the giving of the law to Moses at Sinai are also reflected in the Johannine account. The most obvious connection is the echo of the Lord's descent on the tabernacle in the wilderness with the tabernacling of the logos in John, both of which involve *glory (Ex 40:34; Jn 1:14). Further, there is a noticeable contrast between Jesus the logos and *Moses. Jesus has glory that can be seen and beheld, while Moses requests to see the Lord's glory (LXX Ex 33:18; Jn 1:14; cf. 2:11). The law came through Moses (Ex 34—35), but grace and truth came through Jesus the logos (Jn 1:17) (see Evans, 79–83).

In addition, Isaiah 55:10–11 describes the way in which God's word comes from heaven like rain and snow that cause growth and produces food. This word of the Lord will accomplish what God sent it to do. In John's Gospel Jesus' descent from heaven (Jn 3:13, 31) and his doing and speaking what the Father tells him indicate similarity with Isaiah 55 (Jn 5:30, 36; 8:28; 12:49–50). These OT passages reveal the close connection between the OT and the understanding of logos in the opening verses of John (see Köstenberger, 25–27).

3.2. Wisdom. The wisdom traditions of the OT and of Second Temple Jewish writings also suggest an association between John's logos and sophia ("wisdom") (see Dodd, 274–75). Both the logos and wisdom are preexistent with God (Prov 8:22–31; Jn 1:1), engage in creation (Prov 8:30; Wis 7:22; 9:2; Jn 1:3) and are personified (Prov 8:22; Wis 18:15–16; Sir 24:3–22; Jn 1:1–2, 14). Like the logos, wisdom is said to dwell or encamp (kataskēnoō [Prov 8:12; Sir 24:4, 8]; skēnoō [Jn 1:14]) and is characterized by glory (Sir 24:16–17; Jn 1:14). In addition, there are instances where logos and wisdom are spoken of in parallel (Wis 9:1–2).

Although these links between logos and wisdom exist, there are some differences. Wisdom is created (Sir 1:4; 24:8; Prov 8:22), which is not the case with the Johannine logos (see Scott, 95–96). The wisdom tradition is not consistent on the acceptance of wisdom. In Sirach 24:8–12 wisdom dwells in Jerusalem and takes root among the people, whereas in 1 Enoch 42:1–2 wisdom cannot find a home among humanity (cf. Jn 1:10–11) (see Ashton, 366–83). Further, the logos is equated with *light in John 1:3–4, but wisdom is spoken of as surpassing the light (Wis 7:29–30) (see Tobin, 254–55). Baruch 3:9–12 connects wisdom with the law, while John 1:17 contrasts the law and Jesus as logos. All these connections between logos and wisdom are noteworthy, but still they leave unanswered questions regarding the background of the logos in John 1:1–18.

3.3. Philo. T. Tobin has argued that although there are parallels between wisdom and John's logos, the likely place for the connection between them is found in the biblical interpretation of Philo (cf. Dodd, 276–81). As in Wisdom of Solomon 9:1–2, wisdom and logos are correlated in Philo's writings (Somn. 2.242–245). For Philo, the logos of God is the divine plan of God and is responsible for the creation of the world (Opif. 17–18, 24–25; Cher. 126–27); God's logos is the image of God and the model to which he shaped the world (Fug. 101; Somn. 2.45). Similar to the Johannine logos, the logos of God is referred to by Philo as God's "firstborn" (prōtogenos [Conf. 146]; cf. monogenēs in Jn 1:14, 18), and Philo describes the logos as the second God (ho deuterios theos [QG 2.62]). In addition, Philo argues that the logos of God was intended to guide humans in the ascent of the soul (Conf. 40–41; 62–63; 146–47) (see Tobin, 260–61).

Philo's understanding of the logos shares similarities with the Johannine portrait in the role of the logos in creation (as with wisdom) and as being the firstborn of God. The idea of the logos guiding humans to God resembles the act whereby the Johannine logos gives authority to those who believe in him to be called "children of God" (Jn 1:12).

3.4. Memra of the Lord in the Jewish Targumim. Memra is the Aramaic term for "word" in the phrase "word of the Lord" in the Jewish Targumim, and it functions most often as a circumlocution for the divine name "YHWH." As with the Johannine logos, the memra acted in creation (Frg. Tg. Ex 3:14; Tg. Neof. Gen 1:26–27), and it is through or by the memra that the world was made (Tg. Onq. Deut 33:27; cf. Jn 1:10). The targumic memra was understood to be God (Tg. Neof. Gen 17:7–8; Tg. Onq. Ex 19:17). Light and life come through the memra (Tg. Neof. Gen 1:3; Frg. Tg. Gen 1:3), and the glory of the memra is seen (Tg. Ps.-J. Deut 5:24; cf. Tg. Isa. 6:1, 5, 8). Further similarities with John 1:1–18 can also be established (see Ronning, esp. 13–45; Evans, 114–24).

Some difficulties in understanding the memra of the Lord as the background of the Johannine logos include the later dating of the Targumim and the reality that the memra is primarily a way to refer to God without using the divine name. The memra of the Lord is clearly the same as God, so how can it be "with God" if it is God (Jn 1:1)? There seems to be less of a distinction between the Lord and the memra than we find between God and the logos in the Gospel of John.

3.5. Synthesis. Given the strong verbal and thematic connection between John 1:1–5 and Genesis 1:1–5, undoubtedly the use of logos in John is intended to echo the act of creation through God's spoken word. The narratives of Israel's wilderness wanderings are reflected in the tabernacling of the logos, and the coming of grace and truth through the logos contrasts the giving of the law through Moses. Affinities also exist with the wisdom traditions found particularly in Proverbs 8; Sirach 24; Wisdom of Solomon 7–9, specifically wisdom’s tabernacling, glory and role in creation.

Both Philo’s interpretation of God’s logos and the memra in the Targumim reveal many intriguing parallels with the Johannine logos. These parallels imply that some sort of relationship between them may be posited. However, it is difficult to argue for dependence either way between the Gospel of John, Philo’s exegesis and the memra of the Lord, especially considering their most significant difference: the incarnation of the Johannine logos. It is plausible that their similarities indicate that the description of the logos in the prologue of John’s Gospel coheres well with first-century A.D. Jewish interpretations of the logos of God (see Evans, 144–45). The possibility exists that the author of the Gospel of John was aware of some of these understandings.

4. Logos Christology in John’s Gospel.

Scholars have previously argued for the existence of a Logos hymn (Jn 1:1–18) that was joined to the beginning of the Gospel of John (see Songs and Hymns). The verses John 1:6–8, 15 are seen as insertions into the original hymn that served to relate the hymn with the rest of this Gospel. As a result of this understanding of the Logos hymn, it has been generally considered that the Logos Christology of John 1:1–18 is nonexistent in the rest of John (see Bultmann).

R. Gundry has argued that in actuality there is a strong Logos Christology, which is discernible throughout the Gospel of John (Gundry, 1–50). In other words, there remains an emphasis on Jesus as the logos beyond John 1:18. For instance, Jesus says that God’s word is truth (Jn 17:17), and yet he himself is the truth (Jn 14:6), implying that Jesus is the logos (cf. Rev 19:11–13). In addition, to have God’s logos remain in the believer is equivalent to having Jesus the logos remain in the believer (Jn 5:38; 8:31; cf. Jn 14:23; 1 Jn 1:10; 2:14) (Gundry, 22–23). The Logos Christology is also noticeable in the concentration on Jesus’ act of speaking. Jesus reveals himself to the Samaritan woman and the man born blind as ho lalōn (“the one speaking” [Jn 4:26; 9:37]). His mother tells the servants to do whatever Jesus legē (“tells”) them to do (Jn 2:5). When challenged about his teaching, Jesus says that he has spoken openly (Jn 18:19–20). Even the double “Amen” sayings highlight Jesus’ words (Gundry, 9–10).

Everything that Jesus speaks he has heard from the Father (Jn 8:28, 38; 12:49–50), and like the words that he speaks, he himself has been sent from God (Jn 3:34). Jesus is both the logos of God and the content of his own words (Jn 14:24). He is both the revelation of God and the revealer of that revelation (see Ashton), both the proclaimer and the proclaimed (Gundry, 49). However, because of the tabernacling of God’s logos, the logos of God is no longer merely spoken and heard (see Dodd, 267). The message of the incarnation is that God’s audible logos has become visible and has been revealed (Jn 1:14; 15:22, 24; cf. 1 Jn 1:1). Jesus’ opponents have neither heard God’s phonē (“voice”) nor seen his eidōs (“form”), nor do they have his logos remaining in them (Jn 5:37–38), but Jesus is the audible and visible logos of God, which can be heard and seen and can remain in the believer. The Logos Christology of John’s Gospel emanates through the embodied logos of God and his words.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; GLORY; INCARNATION; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Ashton, Understanding the Fourth Gospel (2nd ed.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007); R. Bultmann, “The History of Religions Background of the Prologue to the Gospel of John,” in The Interpretation of John, ed. and trans. J. Ashton (London: SPCK, 1986 [1923]); C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953); C. A. Evans, Word and Glory: On the Exegetical and Theological Background of John’s Prologue (JSNTSup 89; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); R. H. Gundry, Jesus the Word According to John the Sectarian: A Paleofundamentalist Manifesto for Contemporary Evangelicalism, Especially Its Elites, in North America (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); A. J. Köstenberger, John (BECNT; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2004); J. Painter, “Rereading Genesis in the Prologue of John?” Neotestamentica et Philonica: Studies in Honor of Peder Borgen, ed. D. E. Aune, T. Selander and J. H. Ulrichsen (NovTSup 106; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 179–201; J. Ronning, The Jewish Targums and John’s Logos Theology (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2010); M. Scott, Sophia and the Johannine Jesus (JSNTSup 71; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992); T. H. Tobin, “The Prologue of John and Hellenistic Jewish Speculation,” CBQ 52 (1990) 252–69. B. E. Reynolds

LORD

The term kyrios (“Lord”), the central Christian confession regarding Jesus for the early church (cf. Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 12:3; Phil 2:11), had a wide variety of uses in antiquity. It is necessary to explore some of these before examining how and whether Jesus, the earliest Christians and then the evangelists used this term or its Aramaic equivalent to say something essential or even extraordinary about the central figure of the Christian faith.

1. Greek Usage
2. Jewish Background
3. The Origin of Christian Kyrios Usage
4. Jesus as Kyrios
5. Kyrios in the Gospels
6. Kyrios in Acts
7. Conclusion

1. Greek Usage.

The term kyrios was used both in religious and secular contexts in the NT era. Both national and mystery religions, especially in the East (i.e., Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, but also in Greece and elsewhere), frequently used the term kyrios or its female equivalent, kyria, to refer to gods and goddesses such as Isis, Sarapis or Osiris (see Gods, Greek and Roman). It is quite clear in these contexts that the term kyrios connotes a deity who can answer prayers and deserves thanks for divine help. This development seems to go beyond the use of kyrios in the period of classical Greek, when the term referred to the great power a god had over a person or group of persons but did not yet seem to have been a divine title (cf. Pindar, Isthm. 5.53; Plato, Leg. 12.13).

Equally important for our purposes is the fact that the Roman emperor was, as early as the time of Nero, called kyrios with the sense of divinity (see Rome). Yet even though he was divinized, he was also known to be a human being. For instance, an ostrakon dated August 4, A.D. 63, reads, "In the year nine of Nero the Lord [tou kyriou]. . . ." Even before this time, however, in the eastern part of the empire and in Egypt in particular the emperor was being called kyrios in a more than merely human sense. Thus, for instance, Oxyrhynchus papyrus 1143, which dates to A.D. 1, speaks of sacrifices and libations "for the God and Lord Emperor [Augustus]." Even from 12 B.C. we have an inscription to Augustus as theos kai kyrios, "God and Lord" (BGU 1197, I, 15).

As A. Deissmann long ago argued, it is quite likely that the early church deliberately and polemically ascribed to Jesus titles that had already been applied to the emperor (Deissmann, 349-51). The meaning of the term within the Pauline communities—an absolute divine being to whom one belongs and owes absolute allegiance and submission—becomes all the more evident in light of the Pauline language of self-reference. Paul speaks of himself and others as douloi ("slaves") in order to indicate their relationship to Jesus "the Lord" (Rom 1:1). The doulos who served a kyrios was not free but rather was the property of his or her Lord. This was the normal terminology in various Eastern religions to express the relationship of the adherent to the deity. No doubt to a significant degree this usage was derived from the more ordinary usage in the institution of slavery (see Slave, Servant). The term kyrios had a perfectly normal, nonreligious sense in both classical and Koine Greek, meaning "master" or "owner" of some property (including human property).

The vocative form kyrie frequently was just a polite form of address like the English term "sir." This latter usage is evident not only in secular Greek literature but also in the NT (e.g., Mk 7:28; Jn 12:21). It is likely, however, that the use of māri, the Aramaic equivalent of kyrie, was, at least in the context of Jesus' inner circle of disciples, already taking on a deeper significance than a mere respectful form of address (see Vermes, 109-15).

From these examples we can readily observe the scope of usage of the term kyrios in Greek literature. On the one hand, it can have a perfectly mundane use, referring to the master or owner of slaves or some other sort of property, such as a household or business. The term in the vocative could also be used as a respectful way of addressing a person, in particular a superior, who was not one's owner or employer. This second sort of usage had become so conventional that it often meant little more than our own use of the address "Dear Sir" in a letter. Yet early in the first century B.C., at least in the eastern part of the empire, the term kyrios, in the sense of divinity, was being applied not only to mythological gods, such as Sarapis or Osiris, but also to one particular human being, the Roman emperor. In such a context it is understandable why Paul might say that there are many so-called gods and lords, yet for Christians there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ (1 Cor 8:5-6). Because of the use of kyrios in these more religious senses, W. Bousset argued that it was not until Christianity reached a mainly Greek or Hellenistic environment that the title "Lord" was applied to Jesus, and then under the influence of pagan usage. This conclusion can be shown to be incorrect by a study of the Jewish usage of kyrios and its Aramaic cognate.

2. Jewish Background.

In the Septuagint (LXX) the term kyrios occurs over nine thousand times, and in some 6,156 occurrences it is used in place of the proper name of God, "Yahweh." This amounts not to a translation of the personal name Yahweh but to a circumlocution meant to aid in avoiding saying the sacred Tetragrammaton. There are, however, some doubts as to whether the original compilers of the LXX actually in every case translated the Tetragrammaton with kyrios. Some older manuscripts have the Hebrew YHWH in the Greek text in some places, and at least one LXX manuscript from Qumran uses IAO for the Tetragrammaton instead of kyrios. The copies of the LXX that do have kyrios for YHWH date from the fourth century A.D. on and appear to be Christian copies with Christian modifications. Yet J. Fitzmyer has produced evidence that early Jews did use the Greek kyrios as well as ādōn or mārē of Yahweh, and thus it is not impossible that early Jewish Christians transferred such a title from Yahweh to Jesus (Fitzmyer 1979; 1998). But we can no longer say with any assurance that this was done under the influence of the LXX. When in the LXX and other early Jewish literature kyrios is used to translate the Hebrew word ādōn, it is a matter of translation and not a circumlocution. Some 190 times in the LXX ādōn is translated as kyrios and refers to those who were lords or commanders in some sense.

Examples of kyrios used of Yahweh can be found not only in Josephus and Philo but even as early as the Wisdom of Solomon (some 27x; see Wis 1:1, 7, 9; 2:13). In fact, there is also some evidence that ādōnāy was being used as a substitute for YHWH in some cases at Qumran in their Hebrew biblical manuscripts. Equally interesting is the use of ādōnāy in prayers of invocation at Qumran (cf. 1QM XII, 8, 18; 1Q 34).

The Aramaic word for “lord” is mār, which is almost always found with various suffixes. The use of mārē or mārā to refer to God as Lord can be traced back at least as early as Daniel 2:47; 5:23, even though in these texts the term is not yet used in an absolute sense as a title. Evidence of a different sort can be found in the Genesis Apocryphon (1QapGen). This Qumran document probably dates from about the turn of the era and has examples of God being addressed in Aramaic as mārī, “my Lord.” This is the only known example of this usage in Aramaic. However, it is quite common to find the more mundane use of mārī by a wife or servant of the husband or head of the household. In Targum of Job (11Q10) we have mārē as a rendering of the Hebrew word šadday (“almighty”). There is also a fragment from Cave 4 from the Enoch literature where mārē is used of God (4Qen^c ar 4; cf. 1 Enoch 89:31-36), and the Greek version has ho kyrios in related passages (1 Enoch 89:42, 45). Further important evidence comes from the temple discovered at Gaza, called the Marneum, where a god called mār was worshiped (Johnson, 151).

L. Hurtado has amassed material demonstrating the complex nature of early Jewish thought on such subjects as divine agents (Hurtado 1998). He has shown that there is plenty of evidence that in early Judaism the Jewish concept of the uniqueness of God could coexist with the idea that God could give a unique place and role to a particular heavenly figure or agent. This included the idea that exalted patriarchs (e.g., Enoch or Moses) and principal *angels (e.g., Michael) could speak and act for God with divine *authority and power. This evidence is significant because it indicates a larger context of divine agency in early Judaism by which even the first Jewish Christians could have understood Jesus.

3. The Origin of Christian Kyrios Usage.

Aramaic evidence of singular importance for this study can be found in 1 Corinthians 16:22 and in what is probably the earliest of extracanonical Christian works, the Didache (see Did. 10:6). Here Jesus is referred to as Lord by the earliest Aramaic-speaking Christians using the phrase maran atha, or more likely marana tha (cf. Rev 22:20, which is likely a Greek translation of this phrase; this last text makes it clear that it is Jesus who is in view, as is also evident in 1 Cor 16:22-23). There are three ways the phrase marana tha could be rendered: (1) “Lord, come”; (2) “Our Lord has come”; or (3) even as a prophetic perfect, “The Lord will come.” Whichever rendering one chooses (especially in view of Rev 22:20, the first of the three seems most likely), a person who has died is being referred to as Lord. Since the first translation is the most probable, C. F. D. Moule’s pointed remark is significant: “Besides even if ‘our Lord’ is not the same as ‘the Lord’ absolutely, and even if the Aramaic mārē had been used mostly for humans and not for God (which we have seen reason to question) one does not call upon a mere Rabbi, after his death, to come. The entire phrase, Maranatha, if it meant ‘Come, our Master!’ would be bound to carry transcendental overtones even if the maran by itself did not” (Moule, 41).

It is not completely clear whether maranatha was used to invoke Christ’s presence in worship or was a wishful prayer for the return of Christ from heaven. Nevertheless, on the basis of strong evidence that the Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians, during and likely before Paul’s time (i.e., the earliest Jewish Christians), called Jesus “Lord,” or at least “our Lord,” we must reject Bousset’s argument for the origin of the christological title kyrios in the Hellenistic mission of the early church.

It is striking that Paul, writing in the 50s to Greek-speaking Christians who very likely did not know Aramaic, does not bother to translate maranatha. This surely must mean that he assumes that they understood the meaning of the phrase, which in turn suggests that it had long been a common invocation used by Christians, originating from Judean Christianity, and especially the Jerusalem church (Hurtado 2003, 174-75). Consequently, the apostle sees no need to explain or translate it. The origin of the Christian use of the term "Lord" for Jesus must be traced at least back to the earliest Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians. Can it be traced back even further?

4. Jesus as Kyrios.

Several texts seem to go back to a historical setting during the lifetime of Jesus. They raise the question of whether and in what sense Jesus may have been called "Lord" during his earthly ministry. We have already dealt with texts in which the vocative kyrie was used, and we will not return to them here, as they probably offer little help (with some possible exceptions in the Fourth Gospel [see 5.4 below]). Of more importance may be texts such as Mark 11:3, where Jesus tells his disciples to go and get him a colt to ride into *Jerusalem and to tell anyone who questions their action, "The Lord has need of it." The Greek reads ho kyrios, and presumably, if this goes back to an actual command of Jesus, it is a rendering of the Aramaic mārē (see Languages of Palestine). The meaning here is much like what we find in Mark 14:14, where Jesus is reported to have said, "The teacher asks, Where is my guest room?" If so, then "Lord" here may be no more than a respectful way of referring to a master teacher, just as we might speak of a master craftsman. It does suggest one who sees himself as having authority to command or requisition things of people, whether they are disciples or not. It is not clear whether this particular usage of mārē bears more significance than this.

Support for this can be found in several places in the Fourth Gospel, where we find the two terms "teacher" and "lord" are juxtaposed (Jn 13:13-16). We should also note that in the resurrection account of John 20 we find Mary Magdalene calling her deceased teacher "my Lord" (Jn 20:13), and when she actually recognizes the voice of Jesus speaking to her, she cries "Rabbouni" (Jn 20:16), which is translated "Teacher." This text also seems to suggest that Jesus not only was called rabbi or rabbūnī during his ministry, but also probably was addressed by the term of respect mārē, which would have connoted that Jesus was a great teacher who exercised authority over his disciples. The disciples looked to Jesus as master in that sense. Another piece of evidence that may support this line of reasoning is the use of "slave/master" language (Jn 15:15, 20) in referring to the relationship between Jesus and his disciples.

A much more crucial passage for this discussion is Mark 12:35-37. Here Psalm 110:1 is quoted: "The Lord said to my lord, 'Sit at my right hand.'" Jesus then asks, "David himself calls him Lord; so how is he his son?" This text should not be abruptly dismissed as reflecting the later theology of the early church, especially inasmuch as there is extensive evidence that Jesus saw himself in messianic terms and at least indirectly made messianic claims (see Witherington 1990). Indeed, Mark 12:35-37 reflects precisely the sort of allusive, or indirect, manner Jesus seems to have used in public to indicate how he viewed himself. His method was to allude to his significance in such a way as to lure his audience into careful and deep reflection on this important matter. The form of teaching here is characteristic of early Jewish teachers. Taking a puzzling text, they would raise questions about it in such a way as to challenge common misconceptions, in this case the nature of the Messiah (see Christ) as the *son of David.

Also favoring the authenticity of this tradition is the fact that it seems to suggest that Jesus challenges the idea that Messiah must be of Davidic origin, a fact that the early church went to some lengths to demonstrate (e.g., Mt 1:1-20; Lk 1:27; 3:23-38). In the text as it stands, Jesus is suggesting that the Messiah is David's Lord, and as such he stands above and exists prior to David. This is why Jesus raises the question of why the scribes call Messiah "David's son." The idea of preexistence was commonly predicated of God's divine agents in early Judaism (Hurtado 1998, 13).

It is, then, not inconceivable that Jesus here could have alluded to himself not only as Messiah but even as preexistent Lord and been understood by his audience (Taylor, 492-93). This means that ultimately the proclamation of Jesus as Lord goes back to something that Jesus suggested about himself, albeit obliquely, during his ministry and in public. Yet this does not explain when and at what point Jesus' followers took the hint and really began to see Jesus in this light. We have noted that the evidence is at best scant that during his ministry Jesus' disciples thought of him as mārē in any sort of transcendent sense (Lk 6:46 may suggest this; see also Johannine exceptions discussed below). What, then, prompted the confession of Jesus as Lord? Here we may consider clues from several sources.

First, there is the primitive confessional material that Paul uses in Romans 1:3-4. This text certainly suggests that Jesus assumed new functions, authority and power as a result of his resurrection. Indeed, he was given the new title "Son of God in power" as a result of the resurrection. Another piece of evidence comes from what is probably a christological hymn that Paul quotes in Philippians 2:6-11. Here we are told that because of Jesus' giving up of the status and prerogatives of "being equal to God" and taking on of the form not merely of a human being but of a slave, being obedient to God's plan even to the point of death, he has now been highly exalted and given the name that is above all names. Jesus moves from being a doulos to the kyrios. In the context of the hymn, that name which is above all others is not "Jesus," a name that he already had, but rather the throne name that he acquired when he assumed the functions of deity, ruling over all things. This name is kyrios. Acts 2:36, which may reflect some of the early apostolic preaching, says, "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly that God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you crucified." In view of the fact that Luke readily calls Jesus kyrios in his Gospel, it is most unlikely that he would have created a text such as this, which suggests, if not states, that lordship is most appropriately predicated of Jesus after his death. But what does it mean that God "has made" Jesus kyrios? E. Franklin argued that for Luke the decisive eschatological event was the ascension of Jesus, through which his universal sovereignty was actualized and publicly recognized (Franklin, 53-54). Whether or not one agrees with Franklin's thesis that the ascension (not resurrection) was the moment of Jesus' glorification (Franklin, 30), he is correct that there is both continuity and discontinuity between Jesus' identity as kyrios before and after his exaltation.

Another hint comes from John 20:18, which suggests that the earliest post-Easter proclamation of faith was "I have seen the [risen] Lord." In short, the evidence suggests that the confession "Jesus is Lord" arose as a result of the earliest disciples' experiences with the risen Christ (see Resurrection). Indeed, Paul suggests that such a confession could not arise until after the Lord had risen and the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) had descended on Jesus' followers, for he says, "No one can say 'Jesus is Lord' except by the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 12:3).

Although the ultimate ground for the confession of Jesus as Lord seems to go back to something that Jesus alluded to during his ministry, the formal point of departure for such a confession by the disciples was their encounters with the risen Lord on the day of and after the resurrection, as well as their reception of the Holy Spirit. As best we can tell, the first to so confess Jesus seems to have been the person who first claimed to have seen Jesus risen: Mary Magdalene. In light of the negative view regarding a woman's word of witness that existed in many places, but especially in Palestine, in the first century A.D. (see Witherington 1984), it is not credible that the early church invented the idea that Mary Magdalene was the first to claim, "I have seen the Lord." Indeed, the early witness list in 1 Corinthians 15:5-8 is indicative of the tendency in the early church to move in quite the opposite direction and claim the prominence of the Twelve and the apostles as *witnesses of the resurrection.

We find further evidence that the experience of the risen Lord led to the full confession of Jesus' significance in John 20:28, where the climactic confession in a Gospel full of confessions is ho kyrios mou kai ho theos mou ("My Lord and my God"). It may be that this material is included here because the evangelist, writing toward the close of the first century, knew of the emperor Domitian's (A.D. 81-96) practice of naming himself dominus et deus noster ("our Lord and God") in official correspondence (Suetonius Dom. 13.2). The Fourth Evangelist may have been countering such a claim. But even if this is so, it seems rather clear that John wishes to convey to his audience that the true confession of Jesus first came about as a result of seeing the risen Lord, in the cases of both Mary Magdalene and Thomas. Christological convictions and confessions were first generated by the experience of the risen Lord and his Spirit, not by an influence from Greco-Roman religions (see Hurtado 1988, 121; cf. Hurtado 2003, 64-74). This leads us to examine how the term kyrios came to be used by the evangelists, who likely were composing their Gospels during the last third of the first century A.D.

5. Kyrios in the Gospels.

The Synoptic Gospels, and Luke in particular, include nearly the whole range of uses of the term kyrios as have been discussed here. There are some 717 passages where the term kyrios occurs in the NT, and 210 of them can be found in Luke-Acts (another 275 are found in Paul's writings). The fact that the majority of uses of kyrios are found in the writings of Luke and Paul may be explained by the fact that they were mainly addressing Gentile audiences, or at least they were writing to people in areas where the Greek language and culture were the predominant influences. In contrast to Luke, kyrios occurs only 18 times in Mark and 80 times in Matthew, while there are 52 instances in the Fourth Gospel.

5.1. Kyrios in the Synoptics. A sampling of the various uses not referring to Jesus can now be given. In Mark and the Q material God is never called kyrios except in Mark 5:19; 13:20, but both Matthew and Luke (especially in the birth narratives) call God kyrios (cf. Mt 1:20, 22, 24; 2:13, 15, 19 with Lk 1:6, 9, 11, 15, 17, 25, 28, 38, 45, 58, 66; 2:9, 15, 22, 23, 24, 26, 39). We also find kyrios used of God in the resurrection material in Matthew 28:2 and in two instances unique to Luke: Luke 5:17; 20:37. Kyrie as a conventional address of respect is always used in the Gospels whenever a slave speaks to a master. However, it can also be found on the lips of Jews addressing Pilate (Mt 27:63) (see Pontius Pilate), of workers speaking to the owner of a vineyard (Lk 13:8), of a son to his father when he works for him (Mt 21:30), of Greeks addressing Philip (Jn 12:21), and of Mary to the gardener (unknowingly addressing Jesus) (Jn 20:15).

Kyrios can be used to refer to the lord or owner of some property or estate, such as the owner of a vineyard (Mk 12:9 par.). We have already noted that Mark 11:3 and its parallels likely reflect the same sort of usage. The term can also be used either of the master of a (free) steward (Lk 16:3) or of an owner of slaves (almost always with a qualifier like “his” or “my” [cf. Mt 18:25; 24:45; Lk 12:37, 42; 14:23]). But we do not find the Gospels using kyrios either for the emperor or for any pagan deities, although the verbs kyrieuō (Lk 22:25) and katakyrieuō (Mk 10:42; Mt 20:25) are used of Gentile rulers.

There are, however, some examples where kyrios seems to refer to the ability and right to exercise authority and power. In these cases it amounts to a nontitular use without any transcendent implications. For instance, in Mark 2:28, when Jesus says that the “Son of Man is “lord of the Sabbath,” he means that he is one who exercises authority over the rules that govern the Sabbath. Of a similar nature is the nontitular use in Luke 10:2, where God is said to be the one who controls the harvest; he is “the lord of the harvest.”

Before we examine individual Gospels, a word of caution is necessary concerning the use of the vocative kyrie in the Gospel narratives. The vocative form of the word could be simply used as a respectful address, and many characters in the Gospels address Jesus in this manner. Although this may be the case in the original historical situation during Jesus’ earthly ministry, when read in a Gospel narrative, the address kyrie could attain additional significance, especially in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. With respect to Luke’s Gospel, C. Rowe convincingly argues that individual occurrences of the word kyrie must not be examined in isolation from the entire narrative context, which was written from a postresurrection perspective. Even though from the perspective of the narrative characters Jesus is no more than a “sir” or “master,” the evangelists and their readers know that he is much more than that. Using the literary device of narrative irony, Luke makes use of the ambivalence of the word kyrie to characterize Jesus in his Gospel. For Luke, kyrie “is thus both christologically ‘Lord’ and historically ‘sir/master’” (Rowe 2006, 216).

5.2. Kyrios in Luke. Regarding the absolute use of the noun kyrios, Matthew and Mark do not use the term in a transcendent sense within their narrative frameworks of the sayings of Jesus (Mk 11:3 is probably not an exception). Luke, on the other hand, does employ such usage. For instance, in Luke 7:13 we read, “And the Lord [ho kyrios] had compassion on her.” Or in Luke 10:1 the evangelist writes, “And the Lord [ho kyrios] appointed seventy others.” Luke, as a Gentile writing exclusively to a Gentile audience, shows no reticence in using ho kyrios of Jesus, thereby implying the transcendent religious sense of the term. This is not to say that Luke is being totally anachronistic, for he usually is careful not to place the term on Jesus’ own lips or those of his interlocutors in a manner uncharacteristic of Jesus’ ministry. Some probable exceptions are found in Luke 1:43, where Elizabeth speaks of Mary as “the mother of my Lord”; Luke 2:11, where Jesus is identified as “Lord” to the shepherds (but in this case the speaker is an angel); and Luke 1:38, where Mary is called “the servant of the Lord,” though here kyrios seems to refer to Yahweh.

Numerous other references in Luke’s Gospel indicate the evangelist’s regular use of kyrios within the narrative framework of his account of Jesus’ ministry (cf. Lk 7:19; 10:1, 39, 41; 11:39; 12:42; 16:8; 17:5, 6; 18:6; 19:8a; 22:61; 24:3, 34). When he is speaking of Jesus, Luke is not reluctant to use the Christian title “Lord.” The implication may be that Luke is suggesting that at least in being, if not yet fully in action or recognition, Jesus was already the kyrios. There is some justification then for H. Conzelmann’s claim that for Luke, Jesus is first of all the kyrios who was given dominion by God and rules over the Christian community by means of the Spirit (Conzelmann, 176-79).

Rowe argues that for Luke, the title kyrios is of crucial importance for the identity of Jesus. On the one hand, Jesus is inseparably bound with God as they share in identity as kyrios, although Rowe is careful to describe this identity as a bound, not mixed, one. On the other hand, Jesus' identity as kyrios guarantees the continuity of his earthly and heavenly ministries (Rowe 2006, 27).

5.3. Kyrios in Matthew. In Matthew's Gospel strangers, enemies and Judas Iscariot never refer to Jesus as kyrie, but rather always greet Jesus with didaskale or rabbi. Alternately, the disciples and those who seek out Jesus for healing always address Jesus as kyrie (Kingsbury 1989). While it is possible that J. Kingsbury has made too much of Matthew's use of the vocative kyrie, there is justification for understanding Matthew's narrative use of the vocative kyrie spoken of Jesus as infused with greater christological import (as in Luke [see 5.2 above]).

In fact, Matthew as narrator is not shy about using kyrios of Jesus. For example, in Matthew 3:3 (following Mk 1:3) he quotes Isaiah 40:3 ("prepare the way of the LORD") and implicitly applies to Jesus a title originally referring to Yahweh. This reference, however, only becomes evident from what follows in the narrative, not from the quotation itself. Matthew 7:21-22 provides another case where kyrie is attributed to Jesus, this time with Jesus referring to himself as "Lord" (vocative), with a sense of his right to receive allegiance.

There is a notable stress on the lordship of Jesus as Matthew's Gospel works to its climax. Thus, for instance, in Matthew 22:44 Jesus is clearly implied to be Lord, and in Matthew 24:42 Jesus refers to himself as "your Lord" (note the parallel with Son of Man in Mt 24:39). Additionally, Jesus' final teaching in Matthew includes reference to Jesus as "Lord" (vocative, kyrie [Mt 25:37, 44]) by those on his right and left in a final judgment scenario, in analogous fashion to the saying in Matthew 7:21-22.

Kingsbury offers some helpful conclusions about the use of kyrios in Matthew, particularly his observation that the word is most often used in Matthew as a relational term—the master as opposed to the slave, the owner as opposed to the worker, even the father as opposed to the son (Mt 21:28-30) (Kingsbury 1975). However, none of these examples come from passages of christological significance. Yet it is telling that in the christological passages that we have examined the relational character of the term is indicated by (1) the use of the vocative "Lord, Lord" in Matthew 7:21-22; 25:37, 44; (2) the use of "your Lord" in Matthew 24:42; and (3) the use of "my Lord" in the citation of Psalm 110:1 in Matthew 22:44. Kingsbury has shown, however, that kyrios is not Matthew's premier title for Jesus. When it does bear christological weight, it usually is explained or qualified by another title, and thus at most it should be regarded as an auxiliary christological title in Matthew's Gospel. There is also a certain allusive or indirect character in some of the christological passages (cf. Mt 3:3; 22:44).

5.4. Kyrios in John. John's christological use of kyrios is scant compared to Luke's, yet more evident than Matthew's. The titles "Son," "Son of God" and "Messiah/Christ" occur in John more frequently than "Lord." This may seem surprising, given the likelihood that John is the latest of the canonical Gospels, written well after the confession "Jesus is Lord" would have been established in the church. Although the address of the paralytic (vocative, kyrie) in John 5:7 should not be counted as having christological weight, the reference to Jesus as "the Lord" in John 6:23 is a christological usage (if the few Western manuscripts [D, 091, arm et al.] that omit the relevant phrase are not followed).

Peter's address to Jesus, "Lord [kyrie], to whom shall we go?" in John 6:68 may be intended as more than a respectful form of address, especially in view of Peter's confession in John 6:69. A christological meaning is possible but not as likely in the addressing of Jesus as kyrie by the woman caught in adultery (Jn 8:11), though this pericope was probably not originally part of this Gospel.

A very interesting case is the healed blind man in John 9, where the different nuances of the vocative kyrie are appropriately reflected in several translations (e.g., NIV, NRSV). Having asked by Jesus about the identity of the Son of Man, his initial address to Jesus in John 9:36, "Who is he, sir [kyrie]?" is clearly a respectful form of address. After Jesus revealed his identity as the Son of Man, however, the man responds to him as such, "Lord [kyrie], I believe," and worships him (Jn 9:38).

In John 11, the editorial comment in John 11:2 provides us with a clear Christian use of ho kyrios. Also, Martha's address to Jesus in John 11:27, uttered together with a christological confession, is probably more than a respectful way of addressing her teacher, but the other uses of kyrie in the chapter (Jn 11:3, 12, 21, 32, 34, 39) could be rendered as "sir." But even here ambiguity remains: the presence of the christological use of kyrios in John 11:2, 27 may force John's readers to see more than a respectful address to a great teacher in this narrative.

The blessing at the *triumphal entry in John 12:13 (citing Ps 118:25-26) likely refers to God, not Jesus, as kyrios. John 12:38, citing Isaiah 53:1, should likely also be seen in this way. Peter's address of "Lord" in John 13:6, 9, in the narrative of Jesus' washing the disciples' feet, may have some christological implications in light of Peter's earlier use of the term in John 6:68-69. But we should not discount the possibility that kyrie here is used as a term of respect for one's teacher. The same can be said of Peter's words in John 13:36-37 and Thomas's address of Jesus in John 14:5.

It may be of some significance that in the Fourth Gospel (1) Jesus does not call himself kyrios in the clearly transcendent sense; (2) the evangelist clearly does call Jesus kyrios in his editorial remarks and within the narrative framework (although there are only three instances of this prior to the resurrection [Jn 4:1; 6:23; 11:2], only the last of which is free of textual problems); (3) up until John 20, whenever the term is found on a disciple's lips, it is always in the vocative, and few of these instances are clearly christological. It is important to note that when a narrative character uses kyrie in a christological manner, it is in his or her confession of faith in response to Jesus' self-revelation as a transcendent being (Jn 9:38; 11:27). The words of Mary Magdalene in John 20:13 ("my Lord"), which are not cast in the absolute form, are the first nonvocative use of kyrios by a character within the narrative, and even here they may not bear christological meaning.

On the other hand, John 20:18; 20:28; 21:7, and possibly the multiple examples of the vocative in 21:15-21, are clearly instances where a character in the narrative calls Jesus kyrios in the transcendent sense. John repeatedly narrates how the disciples "saw" ho kyrios (Jn 20:18, 20, 25), which leads to Thomas's climactic christological confession in John 20:28, "My Lord [ho kyrios mou] and my God!" where kyrios and God are unambiguously juxtaposed. This strongly suggests that the Fourth Evangelist is consciously trying to avoid anachronism in his use of this title and wishes to indicate that Jesus was only truly known and confessed to be Lord as a result of the disciples' encounters with the risen Lord. However, in John the line between preresurrection and postresurrection periods is not rigid, as even during Jesus' earthly ministry some people could recognize Jesus' identity as Lord, when Jesus chose to reveal himself to them as such.

In any case, Luke and John clearly share the basic understanding of Jesus' identity as kyrios: Jesus was kyrios even before the resurrection, but the decisive epistemological shift on the disciples' part took place only when they encountered the risen Lord (Rowe 2006, 229).

6. Kyrios in Acts.

Not surprisingly, the use of kyrios in Acts reflects the same sort of phenomena found in Luke's Gospel. The term appears frequently and is used in a variety of ways. Since Acts reflects the period of time after the resurrection of Jesus, it is hardly surprising that the confessional use of the term is even more evident here than in the Gospel. Thus, for instance, Acts 1:21 provides us with the first juxtaposition of the absolute form of "Lord" with the name "Jesus" (ho kyrios Iēsous), a phenomenon that occurs regularly in the Pauline Epistles (cf. also Acts 15:11; 20:35). Also, at the very beginning of the book the risen Jesus is addressed in prayer as kyrios (Acts 1:24; cf. Acts 7:59-60). We also find OT passages referring to Yahweh as Lord now being applied to Jesus (Acts 2:25, using Ps 16:8-11).

Acts 2:36 has already been referred to, but note that in Acts 2:34-35 there is yet another use of Psalm 110:1 referring to Jesus, this time by Peter. J. D. G. Dunn argued that this text played a crucial role in the Christology of the earliest Christian community in Jerusalem: Psalm 110:1 brought home to the earliest Christians the importance not only of the resurrection but also of the exaltation of Jesus (Dunn, 218-19). The title kyrios for Jesus as the exalted one "carried with it overtones of authority, mastery and supremacy" that required absolute submission (Dunn, 219). According to Dunn, however, the fully divine Christology was only a later development of this "somewhat unreflective use of Ps. 110.1 in reference to Jesus as the second Lord installed by the Lord God at his right hand" (Dunn, 221). Other scholars disagree. Noting the fact that this psalm was never applied in Second Temple Judaism to the Messiah or to any of the exalted heavenly figures, R. Bauckham argued that "the exaltation of Jesus to the heavenly throne of God could only mean, for the early Christians who were Jewish monotheists, his inclusion in the unique identity of God" (Bauckham, 23; see also 173-76). Hurtado also doubted that this Acts narrative misrepresents the devotion of early Judean believers to Jesus as kyrios, concluding that at the very least Jesus' lordship acquired a heavenly, transcendent dimension in the early development of the movement (Hurtado 2003, 180-81). Furthermore, Hurtado argued that in the practice of the cultic invocation of Jesus as kyrios, reflected in Acts

2:21, the title clearly functions as a divine title, and that this practice goes back to the earliest stage of Judean Christianity (Hurtado 2003, 182). To these may be added an observation by N. T. Wright: “The high Christology to which [the early Christians] were committed from extremely early on—a belief in Jesus as somehow divine, but firmly within the framework of Jewish monotheism—was not a paganization of Jewish life and thought, but, at least in intention, an exploration of its inner heart” (Wright, 577). Thus, we can conclude that from the very beginning the Christian movement regarded Jesus as the exalted, heavenly kyrios.

Another important passage is Acts 10:36. Here Peter explains to Cornelius, the first Gentile convert, the universal lordship of Jesus: “Jesus Christ, who is Lord of all [houtos estin pantōn kyrios].” Here, two things need mention. First, the universal lordship of Jesus is presented against the lordship claim of the Roman emperor, who is also called “the lord” (ho kyrios) by the governor Porcius Festus (Acts 25:26). Rowe pointed out the importance of the word houtos in Acts 10:36 and argued that Luke’s implication is that “this one—and not someone else—is the kyrios of all” (Rowe 2005, 291). The two kinds of lordship are not necessarily incompatible with each other, as long as the emperor is content with a subordinate status as merely a lord under Jesus, who is the “Lord of lords” (Pinter, 114). At least for Luke, however, the emperor is not content to be subordinate, as Luke presents Caesar Augustus as exercising dominion over the whole world (oikoumenē) (Lk 2:1).

Second, the universal lordship of Jesus provides a theological basis for the faith community that consists of both Jews and Gentiles, and thus for Gentile missions. “The Lordship of the Christ initiates a community of salvation” (Rowe 2009, 124), and this salvation is available to all precisely because Jesus is the Lord of all.

One might also note that in Acts 17:24 Paul calls God “kyrios of heaven and earth.” In light of the shared identity of Jesus and God as kyrios in Luke’s Gospel, the universal lordship of Jesus and that of God are not contradictory but complementary: “God’s universal Lordship is expressed in the Lordship of Jesus Christ” (Rowe 2009, 112). In fact, just prior to Peter’s declaration that Jesus is the Lord of all, Cornelius says to him, “Now we are all here in the presence of God to listen to everything the Lord [ho kyrios] has commanded you to tell us” (Acts 10:33), in which ho kyrios most likely refers to God.

These examples are sufficient to show that the full range of early Christian uses of kyrios is found in Acts in a way that is not true of the Gospels, even Luke’s. The use of the phrase “the Lord” continued to be Luke’s favorite designation for Jesus in his narrative material (see, e.g., Acts 11:21, 23, 24; 15:35, 40).

7. Conclusion.

A somewhat clear development of the use of the term kyrios for Jesus of Nazareth can now be traced. The usage begins with indirect hints during the time of Jesus’ ministry, through accounts of encounters with the risen Lord, to the use of maranatha in early Palestinian Jewish-Christian contexts, to evidence of the christological use of the term in the narrative framework of Luke and John, and finally to the variegated use of the term in Acts. In Acts it is used in combination with the name “Jesus” and the title “Christ,” as a form of address to the exalted Christ, and in the transfer of reference from Yahweh to Jesus in quotes from the OT.

Interestingly, we do not find the use of the absolute or transcendent kyrios in the narrative frameworks of Matthew and Mark, and there is some attempt by both Luke and, to a lesser degree, John to avoid anachronism by not placing the full Christian use of the term on narrative characters’ lips during the ministry of Jesus. It is also significant that Luke-Acts and John intimate that the confession of Jesus as Lord decisively arose as a result of the resurrection experiences. This, of course, did not prevent the evangelists from sometimes calling the Jesus of the ministry “Lord” in their narratives, for it was “this same Jesus” (Acts 1:11) whom God had raised from the dead who took on the tasks of Lord in earnest when he joined God in heaven. In other words, the continuity of the usage of kyrios from before and after the death and resurrection in the Gospels reflects the belief in the continuity of personhood between the historical Jesus (see Quest of the Historical Jesus) and the risen Lord.

The title kyrios for Jesus also has an ecclesiological significance. Since the term kyrios presupposes the relationship between the “lord/master” and those under the lordship of the former, the recognition of Jesus as ho kyrios inevitably leads to the identity of the community of those who recognize Jesus as such (Thompson, 103), regardless of their ethnic origins. Thus, the “people of God” is no longer defined by the traditional notion of ethnic Israel (Yamazaki-Ransom, 3). This common allegiance to the lordship of Jesus sometimes conflicts with the Roman emperor’s claim to lordship. As we have seen, this is evident in Acts, but even in Luke’s Gospel the newly born Jesus is proclaimed by angels as “Christ the Lord” (christos kyrios [Lk 2:11]), which can be seen as a counterclaim to the alleged lordship of Augustus (Yamazaki-Ransom, 73).

Thus, the title “Lord” was of decisive importance in how the early church understood Jesus. The use of the term kyrios in a religious sense was certain to imply Jesus’ divinity, especially in the eastern part of the Roman Empire and in Gentile contexts. The evidence suggests that this remarkable mutation in the Jewish concept of monotheism took place in the earliest Palestinian Jewish Christian community as a result of some hints from Jesus himself and especially as a result of the encounters with the risen Lord as shared by some of the eyewitnesses to the life of the historical Jesus. The evidence indicates that the high Christology of the early Christian church was not a new development of the late first century A.D.

See also CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; ROME; SON OF DAVID; SON OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bauckham, Jesus and the God of Israel: God Crucified and Other Studies on the New Testament’s Christology of Divine Identity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos: A History of the Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus, trans. J. E. Steely (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke, trans. G. Buswell (New York: Harper & Row, 1960); I. de la Potterie, “Le titre kyrios appliqué à Jésus dans l’Evangile de Luc,” in Mélanges bibliques en hommage au R. P. Bédarida, ed. A. Descamps and A. de Halleux (Gembloux: Duculot, 1970) 117-46; A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East: The New Testament Illustrated by Recently Discovered Texts of the Graeco-Roman World, trans. L. R. M. Strachan (repr., Grand Rapids: Baker, 1978); J. D. G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making, 2: Beginning from Jerusalem (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); J. A. Fitzmyer, “New Testament Kyrios and Maranatha and Their Aramaic Background,” in To Advance the Gospel: New Testament Studies (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998) 218-35; idem, “The Semitic Background of the New Testament Kyrios-Title,” in A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays (SBLMS 25; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979) 115-42; E. Franklin, Christ the Lord: A Study in the Purpose and Theology of Luke-Acts (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); G. Howard, “The Tetragram and the New Testament,” JBL 96 (1977) 63-83; L. W. Hurtado, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (2nd ed.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1998); idem, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003);

S. E. Johnson, “Lord,” IDB 3:150-51; J. D. Kingsbury, “The Title ‘Kyrios’ in Matthew’s Gospel,” JBL 94 (1975) 246-55; idem, Matthew: Structure, Christology, Kingdom (2nd ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); D. Pinter, “The Gospel of Luke and the Roman Empire,” in Jesus Is Lord, Caesar Is Not: Evaluating Empire in New Testament Studies, ed. S. McKnight and J. B. Modica (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2013) 101-15; C. K. Rowe, “Luke-Acts and the Imperial Cult: A Way Through the Conundrum?” JSNT 27 (2005) 279-300; idem, Early Narrative Christology: The Lord in the Gospel of Luke (BZNW 139; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2006); idem, World Upside Down: Reading Acts in the Graeco-Roman Age (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009); V. Taylor, The Gospel According to St. Mark (New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1966); A. J. Thompson, One Lord, One People: The Unity of the Church of Acts in Its Literary Setting (LNTS 359; London: T & T Clark, 2008); G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian’s Reading of the Gospels (New York: Macmillan, 1973); B. Witherington III, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, Women in the Ministry of Jesus: A Study of Jesus’ Attitudes to Women and Their Roles as Reflected in His Earthly Life (SNTSMS 51; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (COQG 3; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); K. Yamazaki-Ransom, The Roman Empire in Luke’s Narrative (LNTS 404; London: T & T Clark, 2010).

B. Witherington III and K. Yamazaki-Ransom

LORD’S PRAYER. See PRAYER.

LORD’S SUPPER. See LAST SUPPER.

LOVE, LOVE COMMAND

The love command appears in different forms in the canonical Gospels, and close study highlights their nuances. But among the Gospels, John offers a unique and detailed engagement with this topic, which is best understood in relation to the Johannine letters and community.

1. The Love Command of Jesus in the Canonical Gospels
2. The Theology of God’s Love in Johannine Literature

1. The Love Command of Jesus in the Canonical Gospels.

The canonical Gospels agree that the love command embodies the central motive of Jesus' ethics. The same Gospels, however, show different literary designs as well as distinctive features both in terms of substance and detail.

1.1. Similarities and Differences of the Love Command in the Canonical Gospels. The Synoptic tradition positions the love command in a public argument initiated by enquiries from outsiders. Within the framework of the Jerusalem conflict, the corresponding teachings follow in Matthew 22:34-40 and Mark 12:28-34 in response to the request of the Sadducees, which addresses the question of postmortem existence. In this way, the double commandment of love is the peak of the debates and conversations that Jesus had just before his arrest in *Jerusalem. By contrast, the Lukan account of the love command, in Luke 10:25-28, comes in a comparatively early stage of the story, subsequent to the beatitude spoken to Jesus' *disciples (Lk 10:23-24), in which a teacher of law tries to question the authority of Jesus.

The Johannine composition of the love command is found in a completely different narrative context. On one hand, in John 13:34 Jesus acts without the initiative of a third party. He is not required to comment on the importance and relevance of individual Torah commandments but confidently gives his own, new *commandment. This narrative detail impressively highlights the supremacy and *authority of Jesus. On the other hand, in the Johannine version the love command is directed only to the disciples; in contrast to the Synoptic tradition, no outsider hears the commandment of mutual love.

The most significant differences occur within the justifications of the love command. Matthew 22:36 and Mark 12:28 thematize the question concerning the first or highest commandment, while Luke 10:25 thematizes the question concerning the conditions that must be fulfilled to obtain eternal life. The interlacing of the commandments of love of God and neighbor, which can be found as separate instructions in the Jewish legislative tradition (Lev 19:17-18; Deut 6:5), follows in partially different form in the Synoptic tradition. In contrast, neither in John 13:34-35 nor elsewhere in John is the love command justified with reference to Scripture. The love command is rather the new commandment given by Jesus. This issue can be understood as a consequence of the Johannine hermeneutics of the Scriptures. The Holy Scriptures of Judaism testify to Jesus (Jn 5:39), who interprets the will of God as it is recognizable in them (Jn 1:17). It is the authority not of the Jewish Scriptures but rather of Jesus that justifies the love command.

A further difference in the composition of the Synoptic and the Johannine versions of the love command is reflected in the measure used for ethical behavior. In Leviticus 19:17 and Mark 12:28 one's self-love serves as the measure for love of neighbor. For John 13:34, however, the love of Jesus is the measure and standard of mutual love. The disciples should love each other the way Jesus loved them. It is not human behavior that is normative but rather the love of Jesus, which incarnates God's love and finds its ultimate expression in his sacrifice on the cross (cf. Jn 15:13; 1 Jn 3:16) (see Death of Jesus).

The ground of the love command in the Fourth Gospel therefore connects the background of the motive (Lev 19:17) with an ethic of imitation oriented toward Jesus' life. Within the Johannine writings this motive corresponds with 1 John 4:11, where mutual love of the community is referred to as behavior that corresponds to God's love. John 13:34, however, is oriented not toward God's love but rather toward the love of Jesus. Nevertheless, the concept of the Fourth Gospel is consistent with 1 John 4:11 insofar as the love of God is revealed in the mission of God's Son. Jesus commands the love of which he is an example.

1.2. The Range of the Love Command. There is a remarkable difference between the Synoptic tradition and the Johannine literature in terms of the scope of the love command. The Synoptic versions agree that the love command of Jesus concerns not only one's immediate dependents and peers but also, and indeed primarily, socially marginalized people, including foreigners and even one's enemies (cf. the Q material in Mt 5:43-48; Lk 6:27-36). Whereas criminals and the wicked love their dependents, the followers of Jesus should go well beyond this and practice unconditional love for their neighbors. Although this extension of the love command can already be observed in various Jewish formulations (e.g., T. Iss. 7:6; T. Zeb. 5:1; T. Naph. 8:3), the command to love one's enemies can be understood as an intensification of the contemporary ethic of love and should be traced back to Jesus himself. This tradition-historical detail becomes even clearer in light of the Matthean Jesus referring to a contemporary concept that connects the command to love one's neighbor to the call to hate one's enemies (Mt 5:43). This call can be understood as an indirect reference to the interpretation of the love command that is primarily passed on in the Qumran Rule of the Community (1QS I, 3-9; IX, 16, 21).

In contrast to the Synoptic tradition, where there is specific and detailed focus on love for one's "neighbor," John instead thematizes the importance of mutual love among Jesus' followers (Jn 13:34-35). Since in the latter text the command of mutual love is directed only to the Twelve, and since there are no traces of the call to love one's enemies, it is sometimes postulated that the Fourth Gospel is a "sectarian" document and the Johannine community a "sectarian group" (Segovia, 272). Accordingly, the spirit of Jesus is confined within the walls of the Johannine community (see Stauffer, 47).

Such an assessment misunderstands the overall intention of John's theology. The composition of the love command in John 13:34 is a consequence of the Johannine Christology and is an attempt to cope with the community schism (see 2 below). Likewise, the Fourth Gospel puts the account of the washing of feet (Jn 13) and the commandment of love in one narrative context, whereas at this same point in the narration of Jesus' ministry the Synoptic tradition offers the tradition of the Lord's Supper (see Last Supper). In the Gospel of John the thematic analogy of the Lord's Supper can be found in the eucharistic interpretation of the *bread of life discourse (Jn 6:51-58), a topic that causes schism among the disciples (Jn 6:61). Significantly, while Judas remained with the community of the disciples during Jesus' washing of the feet, he leaves them immediately prior to the conveyance of the love command. Although he had been a witness of Peter's confession (Jn 6:66), which took place after the dissolution of Jesus' following, he did not see what mutual love means.

In view of this narrative drama, the composition of the love command as well as the composition of the bread of life discourse can be understood as an attempt to overcome the central problems at the heart of the Johannine community schism. After John 6:51, which perhaps reflects an anti-docetic polemic, John 13:34 focuses on the lack of communal solidarity. It is as if John is asking a fundamental question: Who, in contrast to Judas, belongs to the true circle of disciples and accepts Jesus' commandment, which he demonstrated paradigmatically by washing the disciples' feet? The private, intimate setting of the footwashing scene must not be seen as an indication either that the Fourth Gospel is a sectarian document or that the Johannine community is a sectarian group. Instead, the narrative composition implies an exhortation to obey that commandment of God that Jesus alone entrusted to his faithful companions.

1.3. The Lukan Interpretation of the Commandment to Love One's Neighbor (Lk 10:25-37). The Lukan formulation of the love command significantly differs from the Synoptic parallel texts. If Luke had followed the Markan narrative structure, he would have placed the love command in the context of the Jerusalem debate, where it embodied the climax of Jesus' controversy with the representatives of contemporary Judaism. That Luke is addressing a concrete concern is evidenced by his sidestepping Mark's plot line. Whereas the Markan and Matthean version describes a scribal discussion about the dignity of different Torah laws, the Lukan version starts with a soteriologically orientated question. A teacher of law wants to know what he has to do to obtain eternal life (Lk 10:25). This is followed by a most peculiar change, at least when compared with the Markan version. Strictly speaking, it is not Jesus who now formulates the interlacing of the love of God and the love of one's neighbor, but rather the anonymous *scribe who does so. This detail shows that, for Luke, the question concerning the justification of the highest commandment is no longer at issue. After all, even an anonymous scribe in the Galilean backcountry knows that the love of God is closely bound up with the love of one's neighbor.

Moreover, compared to Mark, Luke focuses more on the question of concrete ethical practice. This becomes clear through the scribe's question, which he asks in an attempt to justify himself; the question relates to the identity of one's neighbor. Jesus then answers this question by offering the parable of the good Samaritan. Particularly significant in this connection are the introduction and, even more so, the second half of the parable describing the behavior of the Samaritan. Although the treatment of the Samaritan's actions is brief, the reader can see the love command being practically implemented—all as a part of the *healing mission of Jesus.

This much is already clear in the details of Luke 10:34, where the compassionate Samaritan turned to the wounded man, bound up his wounds and administered oil and wine. It often has been assumed that Luke derived the motive of anointing with oil from the context of the Markan mission of healing (Mk 6:13). It has also been suggested that Luke's description matches early Christian practice in addressing the needs of the unwell in their own community (e.g., Jas 5:14). That Luke 10:34 actually describes an act of concrete care for the sick can be seen even more clearly when the text is read against the background of contemporary medical practices.

Although the first statement in Luke 10:34 would not have been out of the ordinary for contemporary readers, what follows in the second statement and in the next verse probably appeared almost shocking.

The Samaritan transported the seriously injured victim on his pack animal to an inn. There, he took care of him until the next day. At the time of his departure, he delegated the care to the innkeeper and provided funds in advance for further expenses. This action turns out to be almost revolutionary when read against the background of contemporary reports that describe the handling of less privileged invalids in the Roman Empire.

The Lukan interlacing of the love command with the parable of the good Samaritan fits well with the ethical thrust of Luke's theology. Luke wants to initiate a Christian ethos in which Jesus' followers are prepared to give their existing assets for the support of people in need of help and care. Against this background, the Lukan formulation of the love command of Jesus and the parable of the good Samaritan can be understood as a Lukan illustration of Jesus' healing mission.

2. The Theology of God's Love in Johannine Literature.

The Johannine literature employs "love" terminology in a unique and broad-ranging fashion (see Popkes). In the Johannine corpus we find 106 of a total of 320 NT occurrences of words from the agap-family (agapaō: John 37x; 1-3 John 31x; rest of the NT 75x; agapē: John 7x; 1-3 John 21x; rest of the NT 88x; agapētos: 1-3 John 10x; rest of the NT 51x). Likewise, 21 of 55 NT occurrences of words from the phil-family are found in the Johannine literature (in particular, phileō: John 13x; rest of the NT 12x; philos: John 6x; 1-3 John 2x; rest of the NT 21x; philia occurs only once in the NT [Jas 4:4]). If the Johannine literature dominates the NT statistically in its usage of agapaō and phileō, the same corpus also shows a broad range of semantic usage (see Popkes, 19-20).

The love motif is a key to understanding Johannine theology. For example, the Johannine correspondence mirrors the conflicts and the break of the Johannine community with varying intensities. In this context, special significance is assigned to the problem of communal love. Especially 1 John aims to advise the community members to love one another. On the one hand, the author wants to remind the addressees that mutual love is central among God's commandments; on the other hand, he tries to make clear the relevance of their mutual love. To this end, he develops a rhetorically effective Johannine equivalent to Song of Songs (1 Jn 4:7-5:4). The central intention of the message is the explication of corporate love as an appropriate response to the mission of Jesus (1 Jn 4:11-12).

An even more complex evaluation of this topic can be observed in the Gospel of John. All statements within the Fourth Gospel concerned with love and the love command appear in an economy of reciprocity. One might fairly call this the "Christology of God's love" because Jesus' words and acts embody the love of God become flesh (see Incarnation). The individual aspects of the love motif form a consistent complex, based on a distinctively Johannine principle of organization. The hermeneutical framework of this concept can be understood in light of the concluding words of Jesus' intercessory prayer in John 17. Here John offers a compendium of his theology where the intimate dialogue between the *Son of God and his Father brings together, compresses and differentiates previous motifs and ideas. This applies in particular to the love motif and in particular the summative passage, John 17:24-26. As is made clear here, the Father already loves the Son before the foundation of the world (Jn 17:24). This eternal love between Father and Son is to be realized within the community of believers (Jn 17:26); the same love also provides the ground for their unity (Jn 17:21, 23) (see God). Encountering this loving unity, the world is to come to faith and to the recognition of Jesus' entitlement to mission and the mutual love of God, Jesus and the believers (Jn 17:21, 23, reiterating and forming an inclusio with Jn 13:35; 14:31).

These statements form an arc of suspense between protology and *eschatology. At the same time, the statements imply reading instructions for the Fourth Gospel itself. On the one hand, the *passion narrative that follows stands under the sign of eternal love between Jesus and God, which should gain ground in the believers; on the other hand, the reader is invited to reread the Gospel as a whole in order to understand the different facets of love statements.

The love motif can first be found in the encounter between Jesus and Nicodemus. Because God loves the cosmos, he sent his Son to save the *world (Jn 3:16). The entire saving event therefore stands under this universal sign. Because God loves the world, Jesus is the surrendered and sent Son of God, the *lamb who takes away the sins of the world (Jn 1:29), and he is the savior of the world (Jn 4:42). On the one side, the authority of Jesus is justified by the love of God for his Son (Jn 3:35; 5:20; 10:17), in each case in correspondence to the motif of Jesus' divine glory (Jn 17:5, 24); on the other side, the rejection of Jesus by the cosmos and by "the Jews" is traced back to the lack of love for him and for God (Jn 3:19-21; 5:42; 8:42; 12:42).

Later, in the farewell discourse, we find that John puts the preceding public works of Jesus under the sign of Jesus' love for his disciples (Jn 13:1). The ensuing narration of the washing of feet gives a good example of this love (Jn 13:15) and offers christological justification of the love command in John 13:34. Here Jesus masterfully gave the new command of love. Because Scripture itself points to Jesus as God's exegete (Jn 1:18; 5:39), this new commandment can be identified as the commandment of Jesus. His love is the measure of the ethical standard. The disciples should not love their neighbors as they love themselves but rather as Jesus had loved them. When it comes to the technique of composition, the love command also contrasts with the main corpus of the farewell discourse. It stands in the center of a scene of betrayal and calumny. Although Judas resides in the community of the disciples during Jesus' washing of the feet, he leaves them immediately prior to the conveyance of the commandment of love. Immediately thereafter Peter emphasizes that he is ready to give his life for Jesus (Jn 13:36-38). Jesus, however, confronts him with his forthcoming calumny (cf. Jn 18:25-27). This narrative frame highlights the love command impressively and underlines the exclusivity of Jesus' self-surrender, which is the highest expression of his love for the disciples (Jn 15:13).

That this commandment of love is conveyed not in a public debate but rather in the circle of Jesus' faithful disciples in John's Gospel is no indication of a particularistic, sectarian ethic. This composition has to be ascribed to the overcoming of the Johannine community's schism. It stands out that the commandment of love is placed in a narrative context in which the tradition of the Lord's Supper can be found in the Synoptic tradition. But this was already covered in the incarnational and anti-docetic bread of life discourse. In the same context, the community schism is also reflected (note particularly the story of the discord among the disciples in Jn 6:60-71). The composition of the bread of life discourse and the love command therefore also serve the overcoming of the community schism.

In the farewell discourse the christological and ecclesiological implications of the motive of Jesus' love for his disciples and the commandment of love (Jn 13:34) are differentiated by putting them in relation to other Johannine themes (e.g., the reciprocal immanence of God and the believers [Jn 14:23], the *joy of Jesus and the disciples [Jn 15:11], the motives of friendship [Jn 15:13-15], the idea of election [Jn 15:16], the understanding of faith [Jn 15:13-15]). It is important to note that the love command is not defined more closely. Whether, for example, the narration of the washing of feet in John 13:2-15 reflects and initiates a practice within the community cannot be clarified on the basis of our reading of John's Gospel. Nor is the nature of the "fruit" that the disciples are chosen or destined to bear (Jn 15:1-8, 16) specifically explained. Obviously, the author did not want to stipulate concrete codes of conduct. Instead, he wanted to declare the love of Jesus as the base and model of mutual love for the believers. Jesus is the vine through which the believers are able to produce fruit.

In addition to Jesus' love for the disciples, the disciples' love for Jesus comes to the fore in the farewell discourse (Jn 14:15, 21, 23-31; 16:27). Although the love for Jesus is not explicitly commanded, it is implicitly identified as an indispensable condition of discipleship: whoever loves Jesus keeps his commandments and words. The Father loves the disciples because they love Jesus (Jn 14:21b, 23a; 16:27). The love for Jesus is a criterion of the reciprocal immanence of Father, Son and the disciples (Jn 14:23b). This conception turns out to be the Johannine interpretation of the command to love God in Deuteronomy 6:4-5. The motif of love for God "merges" in the love for Jesus. This is why the motif of the disciples' love for Jesus can be understood as the christological climax of the Johannine theology of love and as a consistent implementation of the Johannine Christology: if God and Jesus have already been united in loving community before the creation of the world (Jn 17:24; cf. Jn 1:18) and the Son becomes visible in his Father (Jn 14:8-10), it follows that love for the Father is demonstrated in love for the Son of God. If Father and Son are one (Jn 1:1-2; 10:30), the love for God must also include the love for Jesus. The composition of the motive of love for Jesus supports the view that the Gospel of John probably was completed after the Johannine Epistles. It offers an advanced coping strategy in the context of conflicts over the meaning of love for God and for fellow Christians, which are documented in the Johannine Epistles.

This "Christology of God's love" is aimed not only at the community but also at the world beyond the community. The post-Easter fate of the community is based on the pre-Easter fate of Jesus in the world. During Jesus' earthly career the world's hatred was focused not on the disciples but rather on Jesus (Jn 7:7). After Jesus departed, the hatred for Jesus led to hatred for the community (Jn 15:18-25). But the community must not react with hatred to this condemnation; rather, it must continue the mission of the Son of God. Just as God sent Jesus into the world, Jesus sends his disciples into the world (Jn 17:18; 20:21). The saving event—the suffering and death of Jesus—finds development in the proclamation of the community. And the world will gain the saving knowledge of Jesus' claim to mission by the love and unity of the believers who mirror the love of Jesus (Jn 13:35; 14:31; 17:21–23). God's universal desire to save the world does not fail because of Jesus' condemnation, but is continued by the community.

See also COMMANDMENT; ETHICS OF JESUS; MERCY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Augenstein, Das Liebesgebot im Johannesevangelium und in den Johannesbriefen (BWANT 134; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1993); V. P. Furnish, The Love Command in the New Testament (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); J. Piper, "Love Your Enemies": Jesus' Love Command in the Synoptic Gospels and in the Early Christian Paraenesis; A History of the Tradition and the Interpretation of Its Uses (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1991); E. E. Popkes, Die Theologie der Liebe Gottes in den johanneischen Schriften: Zur Semantik der Liebe und zum Motivkreis des Dualismus (WUNT 2/197; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005); G. Quell and E. Stauffer, "ἀγαπάω, κτλ.," TDNT 1:21–55; F. F. Segovia, Love Relationships in the Johannine Tradition: Agapē/Agapan in I John and the Fourth Gospel (SBLDS 58; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); D. M. Smith, "The Love Command: John and Paul?" in Theology and Ethics in Paul and His Interpreters: Essays in Honor of Victor Paul Furnish, ed. E. H. Lovering Jr. and J. L. Sumney (Nashville: Abingdon, 1996) 207–17; E. Stauffer, Die Botschaft Jesu damals und heute (Dalp-Taschenbücher 333; Bern: Francke, 1959); U. C. von Wahlde, The Johannine Commandments: 1 John and the Struggle for the Johannine Tradition (TI; New York: Paulist Press, 1990).
E. E. Popkes

LUKE, GOSPEL OF

From the early church to the present, Luke's Gospel has functioned like a warehouse of scenes and stories from which favorites might be drawn, whether in discussions of the virginal conception or of everyday ethics, whether by preachers or theologians or artists (for Luke in Italian Renaissance and Baroque art, see Hornik and Parsons). The reception of Luke's *birth narrative is a good example of this more atomistic approach ("And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus" [Luke 2:1 KJV]), but other illustrations are easy to find. The parable of the good Samaritan, the story of Zacchaeus, the tale of the rich man and Lazarus, the parable of the prodigal son, Mary's Song (or the Magnificat), Jesus' words of *forgiveness from the cross—all of these and more, well-known and well-loved texts, are found only in Luke. Yet in many circles today they continue to be remembered without concern for their setting and interpretation within the Lukan narrative. For example, the sociologist R. Wuthnow documents how the parable of the good Samaritan generated charitable behavior in American public life in the twentieth century—this in spite of the fact that few people could actually convey the substance of the whole parable and even fewer could identify Luke's Gospel as the source for this parable. The approach to Luke taken by the eighth-century theologian The Venerable Bede represents what has long been common among theologians and preachers. Bede produced homilies on parallel Gospel texts, working as though each narrative was cut from the same cloth as the other, without attending to the particular perspective of any one evangelist.

We can trace the beginnings of serious study of the Gospel of Luke as Luke only as far back as the twentieth century, especially to the literary-historical work of H. J. Cadbury (first published in 1927), the introduction of redaction-critical study of Luke by H. Conzelmann (first published in 1954), and J. Fitzmyer's valiant efforts to put Luke on the map as a theologian in his own right (1981–1985; 1989). Early on Cadbury fixed a hyphen between Luke and Acts, reflecting what would become the widespread assumption of the essential unity of Luke-Acts. By the 1960s, W. C. van Unnik could refer to the study of Luke-Acts as a "storm center." Subsequent study has drawn attention to Luke's Gospel in a way unparalleled in the history of interpretation.

The early church had much to do with the Gospels of Matthew and John, much less so with Mark and Luke. Notable exceptions include readings and homilies associated with major celebrations in the Christian calendar, such as the Christmas season or Feast of the Annunciation (see Just, 17–27). For Luke's Gospel we have only four collections of homilies (or "commentaries") from the early period: from Origen (185–254), Ambrose of Milan (339–397), Cyril of Alexandria (375–444) and The Venerable Bede (675–735). The later medieval period did little to add to Lukan commentary and, in the Reformation era, John Calvin reflected longstanding proclivities by commenting on the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke synthetically, without accounting for the ways in which each of the Synoptic Gospels provides a discrete portrait of Jesus. The rise of disciplined interest in the *quest of the historical Jesus in the late eighteenth century similarly bypassed the character of the individual Gospels in favor of its interest in working, as it were, behind the Gospel narratives in an attempt to recover a Jesus unstained by early church theology.

Where this common approach has been changing, it is typically under the influence of redaction and literary approaches to Luke's narrative, and more recently that of narrative approaches. Today scholars bring a wide range of methods and interests to their reading of Luke (or Luke-Acts). This reflects a century of upheavals concerning how to navigate the relative roles of author, text and reader in the production of a text's meaning, and decades marking the proliferation of interpretive interests and their attendant reading protocols (e.g., Green 2010). Increasingly too, serious study has turned to how Luke's Gospel was received in the early church (e.g., Bovon 2005; Gregory; Gregory and Rowe).

1. Luke's Gospel as Literature
2. Theological Motifs
3. Historical Questions
4. Conclusion

1. Luke's Gospel as Literature.

This section is concerned with literary features of Luke's Gospel, particularly its genre, its literary relationship to the book of Acts, and its structure. Additionally, the question of the unity of Luke and Acts necessarily involves discussion of authorship.

1.1. The Unity of Luke-Acts. The prefaces to Luke (Lk 1:1-4) and Acts (Acts 1:1-2) encourage the view that the book of Acts is somehow continuous with the Gospel of Luke. Throughout most of the twentieth century, scholars followed Cadbury's lead in their references to "Luke-Acts," though typically without doing more than Cadbury did to articulate what "unity" entailed. This changed with a lively attack on the unity of Luke and Acts by M. Parsons and R. Pervo (1993), who dissolved the question of unity into its components: Authorial unity? Canonical unity? Theological unity? Narrative unity? Generic unity? Their questions spawned extensive responses (for surveys, see P. E. Spencer; Bird; cf. Green 2011; Gregory and Rowe; Marguerat, 43-64).

1.1.1. Authorship. Almost universally, scholars agree that the Gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles were written by the same person, making Luke the single largest contributor to the NT (twenty-eight percent of the whole). Arguments against common authorship have typically taken the form of stylistometry, or stylistic analysis (e.g., see Walters), but these have failed to meet the requirements of such analysis (regarding, e.g., sample sizes required for empirical testing, the use of distracter texts, the need for control studies, and the problem of Luke's putative use of sources). As a result, the question is less whether Luke and Acts were written by the same person and more the identity of this author.

Like the other NT narratives, Luke and Acts come to us anonymously, as unsigned documents. The oldest Greek manuscript of Luke's Gospel (Papyrus Bodmer XIV [P⁷⁵]), dating from approximately 200, uses the title "Gospel According to Luke." Together with additional second-century witnesses, this demonstrates how quickly Luke's name was attached to these books. "Luke" appears three times in the NT (Col 4:14; Philem 24; 2 Tim 4:11), always with reference to Paul's companion, who is traditionally identified as the author of Luke-Acts. These NT texts suggest a person of considerable stature in the Christian *mission, a missionary co-worker (and not an assistant) of Paul, who was either a Gentile or at least a non-Jewish Semite. The portrait of Luke as a sometime companion of Paul, though neither his constant travel partner nor disciple, coheres with the evidence of the "we-passages" in Acts (Acts 16:10-17; 20:5—21:18; 27:1—28:16), in which the author appears to locate himself among Paul's traveling companions. There is little reason to reject the traditional identification of Luke as the author of these two books, and it is significant that the early tradition attached no other name to these books (see further Fitzmyer 1989, 1-26; Kuhn).

Because Luke makes no effort to insert himself into his Gospel, and because we know almost nothing about Luke from sources outside his narrative, identifying the author as "Luke" does not shape dramatically how we read the text itself. Attempts to capitalize on his identity as a physician usually fail to account for the difference between ancient physicians (who actually knew little of the body's workings) and contemporary ones, and typically do not account for the ways Luke's presentation of maladies and healing depart from what might be expected of educated medics in the Roman world (see Green 2013a). The narrative itself suggests that the author was well studied in Israel's Scriptures and sacred traditions, and had an advanced education in Greek grammar, rhetoric and literature.

1.1.2. The Genre of Luke-Acts. Although scholars today typically associate the Gospels with Greco-Roman biography (though see the caveats in Pennington, 18-35), the connection of Luke with Acts suggests that the category of a bios, or "life," is not entirely appropriate (see the survey in Phillips; cf. Aune, 77-157; Sterling) (see Gospel: Genre). Even if Luke's Gospel centers on Jesus, Acts cannot easily be squeezed into that form. In fact, in the opening of his Gospel, Luke locates his work alongside other "narratives" (diēgēsis), and the chief prototypes of "narrative" in antiquity were the historical accounts of Herodotus and Thucydides. Moreover, Luke notes in his preface his concern not with a life but with events (pragmata, Lk 1:1-4), and the narration of events was particularly the task of historiography (see Historicisms and Historiography). *Genealogical records (see Lk 2:23-38), meal scenes used for instruction (see, e.g., Lk 5:27-39; 14:1-24; 22:14-38), travel narratives (see Lk 9:51-19:48), speeches and dramatic episodes such as Jesus' rejection at Nazareth (Lk 4:16-30)—these, too, are consistent with historiography. Also telling is the way Luke-Acts envisions the entire inhabited world (oikoumenē, e.g., Lk 2:1; 4:5; Acts 17:6, 31; 24:5) as the arena of the church's mission and Jesus as "Lord of all" (Acts 10:36), thus suggesting the kind of universal reach often found in the historiographical tradition. Since for Luke the category of "historiography" would not have been reduced to the Greek and Roman traditions, but would also include OT and Second Temple Jewish historiographical writing, the case for a generic identification of Luke-Acts with historiography becomes even stronger. Consider, for example, how Israel's historians embedded biographical material (e.g., the Joseph cycle or the Elijah material) within larger historiographical narratives.

Remembering too that "genres" are not molds into which authors squeeze their literary efforts but socio-literary patterns that authors mimic and modify in the service of their agenda, we can see all the more clearly how Luke has drawn on precursor traditions of history writing (both Jewish and Greco-Roman) to interpret "the events that have been fulfilled among us" (Lk 1:1). Thus Luke has a heightened concern with describing and interpreting events in their relations to one another, embedding the present within the distant past to demonstrate continuity and to shape identity, structuring a narrative around its telos in the fulfillment of God's promises and consummation of his purpose, demonstrating how God makes his purpose known in various ways (e.g., *prophets, visions and *dreams, Scripture), and showing how God continues to work through humans, *angels and the *Holy Spirit.

If Luke and Acts are to be read together, this means that Luke's purpose is not simply to tell the story of Jesus or to relate the spread of the church's mission or to underscore the importance of Paul in early Christianity. Rather, the narrative purpose of Luke-Acts centers on the actualization of God's purpose, and Luke's Gospel is preeminently theological in focus rather than christological. As historiography, Luke's two-part narrative draws a continuous line from Israel's Scriptures into the birth, life, death and resurrection of Jesus, and from Jesus into the fledgling community of Christian believers. By this means, Luke provides for the Christian community continuity with Israel of old, identity with God's purpose, and validation as God's people.

1.1.3. Narrative Unity and Canonical Disunity. The unity of Luke-Acts easily escapes the casual reader of the NT since these two volumes are separated in the canon by John's Gospel. In other ways, though, a reading of Luke and Acts invites, one might even say encourages, a reading of Luke and Acts as one continuous narrative (see Canonical Criticism).

Since Aristotle, "narrative" has been understood primarily in terms of temporal sequence and aim. Narratives have a beginning, a middle and an end, with progression from one narrative stage to the next guided by a particular objective or end (see Narrative Criticism). This assumes, first, that narratives advance from one point to the next, organizing the progression of events through time; and second, that this progression transcends the passing of time in order to claim some sort of meaningful set of relationships among the events that, in narrative, order time. For Aristotle the "beginning" is not simply the first thing to be narrated but the thing before which nothing is necessary and after which something naturally follows. Similarly, the "end" is not simply the last thing to be recounted but something that is naturally after something else (i.e., its necessary consequence) and that requires nothing after itself (Aristotle, Poetics 1450b). In the case of Luke-Acts, narrative aim is expressed in the orientation of the opening chapters of the Gospel around the dawning of *salvation and the opposition that the agents of this salvation, *John the Baptist and Jesus, encounter. How will God's aim to bring salvation be realized in the midst of hostility and competing aims? The narrative unity of Luke-Acts is grounded not simply in the fact that Acts can be read as a sequel to Luke, but in the reality that Luke presents key expectations in the Gospel—for example, *Israel's restoration, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the mission to and inclusion of Gentiles in the community of God's people—that require fulfillment in Acts (see further Marguerat, 43-64; Green 2011).

Why then are Luke and Acts written as separate "scrolls"? From a material perspective it was simply impossible to write both on a single scroll. Luke's Gospel, with about 19,400 words, and Acts, with about 18,400 words, each required a papyrus roll of near-maximum size, that is, about thirty-five feet. These two volumes thus share a notable symmetry in relative size, but also in the span of years covered (about thirty years), and in the relative space allocated to Jesus' suffering and death (some twenty-five percent of the Gospel) and to Paul's arrest and trials (some twenty-five percent of Acts). From a theological perspective, Jesus' *ascension, narrated both at the end of the Gospel and the beginning of Acts (Lk 24:50-52; Acts 1:9-11), serves as the narrative hinge and, together with Jesus' resurrection, the theological center of the narrative.

Why are Luke and Acts separated in the NT canon? First, given the similarity of the Gospel of Luke to the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, the Third Gospel found a home in relationship to these other two—which we refer to as “Synoptic Gospels,” on account of their “common view” (see Synoptic Problem). Second, the Acts of the Apostles came to serve as a bridge from the Gospels to the Letters, from Jesus to Paul, and as a framework within which to fulfilled among us” is reliable. Scholars debate whether these “events” refer only to Jesus or also include the early church (i.e., whether Luke's preface introduces only the Gospel or the whole of Luke-Acts); either way, his preface is reminiscent of what we find among Greco-Roman historians (e.g., Josephus, Ag. Ap. 1.1; 2.1).

1.2.2. Jesus' Birth and Childhood (Lk 1:5–2:52).

Luke's preface is written in relatively refined Greek, but the birth account has a “biblical” feel that ties Jesus' story back into the OT, especially into God's promises to *Abraham. Luke's audience enters a world saturated in the piety of Second Temple Jewish institutions, practices and hopes—a veritable festival of salvation (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology).

Two features help to structure the narrative and give it meaning. The first is the movement from divine promise to evidence of fulfillment to responses of praise (see table 1). Hence, Luke narrates not only how God's ancient promises are actualized in the coming of John and Jesus, but also shows how God keeps the promises made in the Gospel itself.

The second feature is the parallelism between

Table 1. Promise, Fulfillment and Praise

Character	Promise	Evidence of Fulfillment	Response of Praise
Zechariah	His wife would bear a son	John is born	Zechariah's Song
Mary	She would conceive a son	Unborn John bears witness to Jesus in the womb; Elizabeth blesses Mary	Mary's Song
Simeon	He would see the Messiah	He encounters Jesus in the temple	Simeon's Song grasp Paul's significance and to trace Paul's travels. Hence Acts finds itself located after the Fourfold Gospel and before Paul's longest letter, Romans. Canonically, then, Luke's Gospel stands with Matthew, Mark and John, which together proclaim the one gospel, Jesus Christ.

1.2. The Structure of Luke's Gospel. Students of Luke disagree on some of the details, but the broad strokes of Luke's outline are clear: a birth narrative is followed by Jesus' mission in Galilee; followed by Jesus' long, meandering journey with his disciples from *Galilee to *Jerusalem; followed by accounts of his teaching, *death and *resurrection in Jerusalem. Geography thus plays a pivotal role in the shaping of Luke's Gospel.

1.2.1. Preface (Lk 1:1-4). Luke situates his Gospel in relation to other “narratives,” names his literary patron, calls special attention to the extent of his research and inquiry and to the order of his narrative, and names his purpose: to persuade his audience that his interpretation of “the events that have been

John and Jesus (see table 2). The stories of John and Jesus are interwoven as “good news” (Lk 1:19; 2:10), with John anticipating and paving the way for Jesus; the “prophet of God Most High” prepares the way for the “Son of the Most High” (Lk 1:32, 76).

Table 2. Parallels Between John and Jesus

John	Event	Jesus
Luke 1:5-7	Parents are introduced	Luke 1:26-27
Luke 1:8-23	Birth is announced	Luke 1:28-38
Luke 1:24-25	Mothers respond	Luke 1:39-56
Luke 1:57-58	A child is born	Luke 2:1-20
Luke 1:59-66	A child is circumcised and named	Luke 2:21-24
Luke 1:67-79	A prophetic response	Luke 2:25-39
Luke 1:80	The child grows	Luke 2:40-52

The birth narrative initiates the Gospel's concern with Jesus' identity as God's Son. This is how Gabriel presents him to his mother in anticipation of Jesus' birth (Lk 1:32-35), and the birth account closes with Jesus as a youth affirming that his father is the God of the *temple (Lk 2:49).

1.2.3. Preparation for Jesus' Ministry (Lk 3:1—4:13). Luke introduces Jesus' ministry by first recounting John's. Luke 3:1-20 presents John's public career in relation to the elite of his day and against the backdrop of Isaiah's message of Israel's restoration and the universal reach of God's salvation. The new epoch has begun already with John's ministry, which has as its center a repentance-baptism that anticipates the coming of God's agent of salvation.

Jesus' ministry is grounded in his identity as God's Son and experience of the Spirit, together comprising the primary focus of Jesus' *baptism (Lk 3:21-22). Jesus' status as God's Son is grounded in his extraordinary conception, confirmed by God at Jesus' baptism, developed further in Jesus' genealogy (Lk 3:23-38) and tested in Jesus' encounter with the devil in the wilderness (Lk 4:1-13) (see Temptation of Jesus). Empowered by the Spirit, Jesus proves his fidelity and readiness to engage in ministry publicly as God's Son.

1.2.4. Jesus' Ministry in Galilee (Lk 4:14—9:50). These initial chapters set out the pattern of Jesus' ministry. First, we find the definitive understanding of the outworking of Jesus' Sonship and empowerment by means of a publicly proclaimed missionary program (Lk 4:16-30) (see Mission). This missionary program is then concretely expressed in Jesus' teaching and *healing (Lk 4:31-44). Luke 5:1—6:11 follows hard on the heels of Jesus' announcement of the divine necessity of his engaging in an itinerant ministry (Lk 4:43-44) by recounting just such a mission. Jesus begins this segment by calling *disciples (Lk 5:1-11)—whose primary vocation is to be with Jesus, to learn from him, to exemplify appropriate response to Jesus and his message (cf. Lk 5:11, 28) and thus to model the regathering of God's people in Jesus' ministry.

Jesus sets before his newly appointed apostles and the crowds the core of his message, the *Sermon on the Plain, in which Jesus identifies the attitudes and practices that characterize and flow naturally from this new people (Lk 6:12-49). This is followed by episodes in which the Sermon on the Plain is on full display in people's lives (Lk 7:1-50). It is startling to see a Gentile centurion embodying Jesus' message by denying his own worthiness. And it is astonishing to find a sinful woman serving as an exemplar of authentic hospitality, the epitome of appropriate response to the gift of salvation manifest in Jesus' ministry. The nature of Jesus' ministry and the people it attracts are apparently so stunning that they raise questions for John the Baptist about whether Jesus is indeed the Messiah. John had prophesied messianic judgment. Where is it? John's question typifies the ease with which people throughout the Gospel misconstrue what Jesus is (or ought to be) about.

The brief summary in Luke 8:1-3 introduces the major motifs that occupy the next subsection of the Gospel, Luke 8:1-56. First is the status of Jesus as the one who broadcasts God's word and brings salvation. The second is the active presence of diabolic activity, which Jesus confronts and overcomes in his ministry. Finally, the gathering of followers is highlighted, underscoring the import of authentic response to Jesus' message.

The final unit of Jesus' Galilean ministry brings together the issue of Jesus' identity with the question of the nature of *discipleship (Lk 9:1-50). Questions about Jesus' identity (e.g., Lk 4:22, 35; 5:21; 7:16, 19-20, 39, 49; 8:25) now culminate in the questions of Herod (Lk 9:7-9) and the pronouncements of Peter (Lk 9:18-20) and God (Lk 9:28-36). The disciples are active in a way that is unique in the Gospel thus far (Lk 9:1-6), but they seem no more clear regarding who Jesus is. They question his ability to provide for the crowds (Lk 9:12-17) and fail miserably to grasp the character of his mission (Lk 9:21-27, 35, 37-50). Indeed, as though contemplating how fully their beliefs and commitments have not been transformed thus far, Luke concludes that the meaning of Jesus' words about himself "was concealed from them" (Lk 9:45).

1.2.5. On the Way to Jerusalem (Lk 9:51—19:48). Painted with hues of Israel's exodus journey, Jesus' journey to *Jerusalem is especially concerned with the formation of his disciples. He teaches them of the gracious Father who is ready to give the *blessings of salvation to everyone. This journey has a destination, Jerusalem—the place of divine destiny and locus of hostility toward Jesus. Hence the journey concerns not only the formation of disciples, but also the growing hostility Jesus attracts. Even the disciples resist Jesus' message. In fact, so fully have they failed to identify themselves with Jesus that, by journey's end, they have all but disappeared from view.

Jesus makes it clear that "following" him entails joining him in the journey and in proclaiming God's *kingdom (Lk 9:51—10:42). Disciples must hear and do God's Word. The stark demands of discipleship (Lk 9:51-62) are followed by the sending out of the seventy-two—a high point in the life of the disciples, who enjoy success in their ministry and subsequently receive from Jesus rare insight into his person and mission (Lk 10:1-20). Here, as elsewhere, Jesus' *prayers provide the context for divine revelation concerning him (e.g., Lk 3:21-22; 9:18, 28, 29). This segment of the Gospel also develops the importance of "welcoming" Jesus, his messengers and his message—that is, of showing hospitality and care. Thus, Jesus presents a compassionate, hospitable Samaritan (Lk 10:25-37), and the brief episode in Luke 10:38-42 provides in the person of Mary a portrait of how to welcome Jesus.

In Luke 11:1-13, Jesus turns a request for instruction in prayer into a lesson on the Fatherhood of *God—on God's character, but also on fidelity as dependence on God and imitation of his graciousness. This concern will resurface in Luke 12:1-13:9, but the intervening material is taken up with escalating hostility and attempts at censuring Jesus (Lk 11:14-54). Luke's account sets concerns with faithfulness and hostility side by side, thus driving home how mistaken the *scribes and *Pharisees are with regard to their portraits of God and, therefore, of the nature of faithful life. The presence of hostility presses the urgency of a decision regarding Jesus. However, as his instruction on vigilance in the face of crisis clarifies (Lk 12:1-13:9), a decision for Jesus may introduce one to the harassment that surrounds him.

From Luke 13:10 to 17:10, Luke's Gospel is fundamentally concerned with the question, who will participate in God's kingdom? Rather than answer the question "Will only a few be saved?" Jesus directs his audience "to make every effort to enter through the narrow door" (Lk 13:23-24). He then parses these efforts in terms of *table fellowship, celebration with shared meals and the extension of hospitality. In Luke 13:22-31 presence at the end-time meal spells participation in God's kingdom. In Luke 14:1-24 meals establish "in-group" boundaries and embody values pertaining to status and purity. Meals foster the bonds of community, but in Luke's portrayal Jesus has a habit of flouting such social and religious protocols, repeatedly eating with the "wrong" people—wrong, that is, as defined by the usual standards (e.g., Lk 5:20-32; 7:34, 36-50; 14:1-6, 13, 21, 23; 19:1-10). Jesus' eating habits invite criticism, and Luke 15 is cast as a defense of the nature of his entire ministry. The parables of the lost sheep, lost coin and lost son demonstrate that, in welcoming social and religious outcasts to the table, Jesus is simply giving expression to God's own capacious grace. What is more, the purpose of wealth is to extend hospitality to those in need (Lk 16); those who do so are doing nothing out of the ordinary (Lk 17:1-10) but are only following *Moses and the prophets (Lk 16:29).

Luke 17:11-19:27 provides a thematic summary of the journey narrative, pulling together the threads of Jesus' instruction and emphasizing the need for response to his message. The pace is quickened, and Luke provides clear markers showing Jesus passing between *Samaria and Galilee, approaching Jericho and, finally, entering Jerusalem. As Jerusalem looms closer on the horizon, Jesus takes care to interpret the significance of his arrival. Contrary to some expectations (cf. Lk 19:11), the *eschatological consummation of God's kingdom is not tied to his entry into Jerusalem. Instead, prior to the end, the *Son of Man must suffer many things (Lk 17:26; 18:30-33); indeed, Jerusalem is to be the site of his suffering and death. Jesus' death will not be the last word, however, and he anticipates both his resurrection and his return with royal authority. The interlude between his death/resurrection and his glorious return should be marked by faithfulness (Lk 18:8; 19:11-27). As Jesus draws closer to Jerusalem, the list of those who model fidelity is astonishing: a Samaritan leper who recognizes in Jesus' ministry God's beneficence (Lk 17:11-17), an audacious widow (Lk 18:1-8), a tax collector who humbles himself (Lk 18:9-14), little *children (Lk 18:15-17), a blind beggar (Lk 18:34-43) and a diminutive tax collector (Lk 19:1-10).

With Luke 19:28-48, Jesus arrives in Jerusalem and attempts to reclaim the temple for its purpose in God's plan. This means wresting it away from the temple leadership, who use the temple to mask their own injustices (cf. Jer 7:1-15). The excitement generated by his entry into the Holy City notwithstanding (see Triumphal Entry), Jesus anticipates the inhospitable reception he will receive, and so pronounces prophetic *judgment on Jerusalem for its failure to recognize that, in Jesus' coming, God himself has graciously drawn near.

1.2.6. Teaching in the Jerusalem Temple (Lk 20:1-21:38). Jesus' prophetic action in the temple (Lk 19:45-48) was an attempt to prepare the temple for Jesus' ministry (see Temple Act). His teaching excites opposition nevertheless. Chief *priests, *scribes, *elders, *Sadducees and the Jerusalem wealthy—all who draw their legitimation from their relationship to the temple are threatened by Jesus' arrival and teaching. "The people" play a key role (see People, Crowd). They provide a buffer between Jesus and his opponents, so that Jesus does not go prematurely to his death; and their presence as Jesus' audience raises the question of whether Jesus will succeed in persuading God's people to align themselves with God's saving purpose. In the end, Jesus undercuts the authority of those who use the Scripture and the temple system to tyrannize and oppress the weak (Lk 20:45–21:4) and forecasts the calamity and destruction that will come as the old world order gives way to the new (Lk 21:5–38).

1.2.7. Jesus' Suffering and Death (Lk 22:1–23:56). The twin motifs of conflict and the fulfillment of God's purpose reach their climax. On the one side are Jesus, who is aligned with the divine aim, together with his disciples and "the people" who have listened to his message and received from his ministry. On the other side are the Jerusalem elite, who are aligned with the rule of darkness, with the devil (cf. Lk 22:53). If the Jewish leaders are to have their way with Jesus, they must win the crowd over to their side—and they do, if only for a moment. The people join the chief priests and leaders of the people in demanding Jesus' crucifixion, but almost immediately respond in sorrow and contrition (Lk 23:48). The disciples' own circle is breached, as Satan enters into Judas, and Judas sides with the Jewish leadership against Jesus (Lk 22:3–6, 47–48). The temple leadership must also win to their side the *Roman empire, especially Pilate; in spite of his protestations regarding Jesus' innocence, Pilate hands him over to their will (Lk 23:23–24) (see Pontius Pilate).

Luke's *passion narrative is characterized by a great irony. Those who oppose Jesus believe that they are serving God, yet they unwittingly serve a diabolic purpose. And given their grasp of God's will, they do the only thing that could be done. They present Jesus to Pilate as a false prophet (Lk 23:1–5; cf. Deut 13) and call for the death penalty (see Trial of Jesus). For his part, Jesus goes to his death in the same manner that had characterized his life, namely, in obedience to the Father's will (Lk 22:39–46). He dies as the regal prophet, the royal Messiah, the righteous one who suffers unjustly, Yahweh's Servant (see Servant of Yahweh).

1.2.8. Jesus' Exaltation (Lk 24:1–53). Luke's account of Jesus' *resurrection appearances is startling in its initial portrayal of Jesus' followers. The empty tomb leads to perplexity and amazement (Lk 24:4, 12); the testimony of the women who witnessed the empty tomb and encountered the angels is met with cynicism and disbelief (Lk 24:11); and the disciples on the Emmaus road are clueless regarding the significance of Jesus' death, astounded by reports of the empty tomb, and unable to recognize that their traveling companion is the risen Lord (Lk 24:13–22). Disbelief and astonishment continue even in the presence of the risen Jesus (Lk 24:41). Simply put, the disciples lack the cognitive categories for making sense of Jesus' passion. The cross and empty tomb require a depth of insight available only to those who have had their minds opened to understand the Scriptures (Lk 24:45). Only thus are they able to grasp that Jesus' passion is not a contradiction of his status and mission, but their fulfillment. Jesus is the rejected prophet, the suffering Messiah who, according to the Scriptures (when interpreted correctly), actualizes God's purpose. Jesus' resurrection and ascension are grounded in the Scriptures, and they demonstrate God's validation of Jesus' life and message. Even the proclamation of *repentance and *forgiveness of sins to all nations—narrated in Luke's second volume, the book of Acts—is written in the law of Moses, the Psalms and the Prophets (Lk 24:45–47).

Luke 24 thus brings closure to Luke's Gospel, but also anticipates more, including especially the baptism with the Holy Spirit and the *mission to all nations. Jesus' *ascension, reported at the close of Luke as well as in the opening of Acts, is the midpoint of Luke's two-part narrative, but also the guarantee of the coming realization of salvation in all of its fullness to all people.

2. Theological Motifs.

Luke's overarching theme is *salvation—God's action to restore God's people, Jesus' coming to announce and make plain God's royal rule, and the concomitant appeal to God's people to welcome and align themselves with God's saving agenda. With very few exceptions in Luke's Gospel, salvation is oriented to Israel. However, in Luke's Gospel the universal scope of God's salvation, inclusive of Jew and Gentile, is announced. Moreover, Jesus engages people who live on the margins, thus portending a mission to "all nations" (Lk 24:47), indeed, "to the end of the earth" (Acts 1:8). Accordingly, Luke's primary theological focus is on God, and his purpose centers on God's people: (1) strengthening them in the face of opposition by ensuring them both in their understanding and experience of God's redemptive purpose and in their understanding of the nature of faithful response to God; (2) calling them to continued faithfulness and witness in the service of God's saving purpose. Luke thus inscribes the identity and mission of Jesus' followers, that is, the community of God's people, into Jesus' life and mission, just as he has embedded Jesus' life and mission into Israel's story as this is told in the Greek OT.

2.1. God and God's Purpose. Although *God appears only rarely as a character in Luke's narrative, he is nonetheless everywhere present, and his purpose drives the narrative forward from beginning to end. He is “God my savior” (Lk 1:47), and he reveals his purpose in a variety of ways—through the Scriptures, through heavenly messengers, through the Holy Spirit, by a voice from heaven and through the divine choreography of events. On this last point consider, for example, how Simeon is guided by the Spirit to come to the vast space of Herod’s Temple where, of all people, he crosses paths with *Mary, Joseph and Jesus, who have arrived at the Temple in obedience to “the law of the Lord” (Lk 2:21-35). God’s law and God’s Spirit work harmoniously to stage this encounter.

An array of terms express God’s design (e.g.): “purpose” (boulē), “it is necessary” (dei), “to determine” (horizō) and “it is written.” On the journey to Jerusalem (Lk 9:51—19:48), Jesus works to transform the theological imagination of his disciples so that they might recognize God as their Father (e.g., Lk 11:1-13; 12:32). God’s will is accomplished through the Spirit-endowed ministry of Jesus (Lk 3:21-22; 4:18-19), and it will be continued in Acts by means of the Spirit-empowered witness of Jesus’ followers (Lk 24:44-49). Fundamental to this mission is the appropriate interpretation of Scripture, and this interpretation is Spirit-enabled, a matter of revelation. Indeed, Jesus’ disciples are repeatedly castigated for their failure to understand the purposes of God, until Jesus “opens their minds to understand the Scriptures” (Lk 24:49). In Acts they are able to serve as Spirit-empowered interpreters who discern correctly how to read the Scriptures as expressions of God’s ancient purpose.

2.2. Jesus as God’s Son. If God’s agenda drives the narrative forward, Jesus is the main character in Luke’s first volume—Jesus, who aligns himself with God’s purpose and, in fact, shares in God’s own identity (e.g., Rowe). Luke informs his audience from the outset regarding Jesus’ identity and role in God’s plan. Jesus is a prophet, but more than a *prophet. He is the long-awaited Davidic Messiah (see Christ), *Lord and *Son of God. He fulfills his career as a regal prophet for whom death, while necessary, is not the last word. Early on Jesus is identified as Savior (Lk 2:11), a role that is subsequently expressed in his *miracles of healing and exorcism, his practices of table fellowship, his readings of Scripture and his prayers, all of which broadcast the message of God’s kingdom (see Kingdom of God/Heaven).

Jesus communicates the presence of God’s salvation especially for those who make their lives on the margins. This is no surprise, given his inaugural address: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me because he has anointed me to bring good news to the poor” (Lk 4:18). As he goes on to parse the term, “poor” refers not simply to the economically disadvantaged but to outcasts of all kinds—widows and children, for example, and lepers and the demonized (see Demon, Devil, Satan). Jesus’ ministry practices are also consistent with his teaching, which occupies major sections of the Gospel. He sets out for audiences of all kinds—his disciples, the Pharisees, the crowds, legal experts and more—a vision of the beneficent God who has drawn near to save and whose visitation compels response.

2.3. Responding to God’s Kingdom. Proclamation of the good news demands response, and both John the Baptist’s and Jesus’ mission are cast as bringing division to God’s people (e.g., Lk 2:34-35; 3:1-20).

2.3.1. Conversion and Repentance. For Luke the fitting response to the advent of God’s salvation is conversion (see, e.g., Kim-Rauchholz; Méndez-Moratalla). This response is built into John the Baptist’s “job description” (Lk 1:16-17: “he will turn many . . . to turn the hearts . . . to make ready”), and John proclaims a repentance-baptism and urges people “to produce fruits in keeping with repentance” (Lk 3:3, 8; cf. Acts 13:24; 19:4). Jesus summarizes his mission as calling *sinners to *repentance (Lk 5:32), reports rejoicing at the repentance of even one sinner (Lk 15:7, 10) and informs his followers that the Scriptures themselves have it that repentance must be proclaimed to all nations (Lk 24:47). Peter and Paul repeat this message throughout the book of Acts (e.g., Acts 2:38; 17:30; 26:20).

Luke uses the language of conversion and repentance (metanoia, epistrophē and cognates) interchangeably with reference to those who have undergone a redirection shift and are now on the move with the community of those faithfully serving God’s eschatological purpose. Conversion for Luke, then, is less as a “moment of decision” and more a life lived or journey traveled (cf. Green 2013b). It is particularly a life characterized by allegiance to Jesus as Lord. And that allegiance is exhibited in behaviors congruent with God’s kingdom, for example: hospitality to children, the poor, and the disabled; refusing to participate in games of status-seeking and oneupmanship; putting one’s resources in the service of those in need. Or to summarize generally, it is doing what Jesus says to do (Lk 6:46), hearing God’s word and doing it (Lk 8:21).

2.3.2. Poverty and Wealth. In Luke’s Gospel Jesus is relentlessly concerned with the ramifications of faith for possessions and the poor (see, e.g., Green 1994; Hays; Johnson 1981; Kim; Moxnes) (see Rich and Poor). Jesus himself comes from a peasant family. Joseph and Mary's offering for their newborn child is "a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons," the prescribed offering for the poor (Lk 2:24; cf. Lev 12:8). During his itinerancy, Jesus depends on the support of others (Lk 8:1-3). At the outset of the journey to Jerusalem, Jesus says of himself that he has no place to lay his head (Lk 9:58), a claim that could refer to his socioeconomic marginality, but is more clearly a warning about the rejection to be expected for those who follow in his footsteps.

Jesus' dependence on the benefaction of others (Lk 8:1-3) disallows any portrait of Jesus as an ascetic who rejects wealth outright. He joins dinner parties with prominent people, participating in ways that lead to his being labeled a glutton and a drunkard (Lk 7:34; cf. Lk 7:36; 11:37; 14:1-24; 19:1-27). If wealth is not inherently evil, then what lies behind his warning that no one can serve both Mammon and God (Lk 16:13)? Why is it difficult for the wealthy to enter God's kingdom (Lk 18:24)? Why must would-be disciples give up everything (Lk 14:33)? For Luke, wealth is a temptation to prestige and security apart from God (e.g., Lk 12:13-21, 33-34), and one's use of possessions is a barometer of one's faithfulness to the good news.

In the ancient Mediterranean world *economic sharing was embedded in social relations. For example, to share with someone without expectation of return was to treat them as though they were one's kin. Conversely, to refuse to share with others was practically the same as regarding them as outsiders. When Jesus asked the rich ruler to sell what he had and give the proceeds to the poor (Lk 18:18-23), Jesus was inviting the rich ruler to put his religious commitments on display in practices that were at once economic and social. A ruler of tax collectors, Zacchaeus, exhibits conversionary behavior in the form of giving half of what he has to the poor and restitution to anyone defrauded under his watch. For this he is recognized by Jesus as a child of Abraham (Lk 19:1-10; cf. Lk 3:7-14). In this context, "almsgiving" would signify friendship with the poor. Accordingly, Jesus censures Pharisees and legal experts for practices of nonsharing, which exhibit their avarice and malice (Lk 11:39-41; 20:46-47). Similarly, the rich man who never welcomed the beggar Lazarus to his daily feasts finds in the afterlife that he is separated from Abraham's side by a great chasm (Lk 16:19-31). Those who really are God's children demonstrate in their lives a God-like graciousness, giving freely to even the ungrateful and wicked (Lk 6:35).

Luke's material on faith and wealth, the rich and poor, is thus implicated throughout in issues of status, power and social privilege. Discipleship raises immediately the question of possessions, with Luke calling for forms of distribution in which the needy are befriended and cared for, and the wealthy give without expectation of return.

2.4. Women and Men. Due largely to the sheer number of its references to women, Luke's Gospel has often been celebrated as good news for *women. In Luke's presentation, women receive divine compassion and help, are visited by angels, and are portraits of piety and exemplars of discipleship. Endowed with the Spirit, they prophesy. And they serve as Jesus' benefactors. (Cf., e.g., Lk 1:24-56; 2:36-38; 7:11-17, 36-50; 8:1-3; 13:10-17; 18:1-8.) Moreover, Luke often pairs women and men—consistently locating them on the same plane or casting women as the more faithful (e.g., Lk 1:5-23 // Lk 1:26-38, 46-56 // Lk 1:67-79; 2:25-35 // Lk 2:36-38; 7:1-10 // Lk 7:11-17). Some forty-two passages are concerned with women or include themes related to women, most of which are unique to Luke's Gospel. More than one-third of the people mentioned in the Third Gospel are women, and about forty percent of people named in the Gospel of Luke are women. Other readers of Luke have been less sure; following the lead of E. Schüssler Fiorenza, they find in Luke's Gospel a systematic attempt to keep women in their places, and they speak of Luke's efforts at silencing women.

These widely disparate readings of Luke result in part from the sheer quantity of evidence Luke provides (see Seim 1994), but also from the varieties of interpretive approaches (even the diversity of feminist approaches) brought to the data (cf. Levine and Blickenstaff; Seim 2010) (see Feminist and Womanist Criticisms). More negative appraisals of Luke's position sometimes depend on a kind of primitivism, that is, attempts to find in the earliest strata of the Christian tradition a foundation for contemporary views—attempts that almost invariably assess ancient texts in terms of modern commitments and hopes. Engaging Luke's Gospel on its own terms invites study that takes seriously the ways in which, in a patently patriarchal world, Luke has portrayed women working both with and against the grain of typical first-century constraints governing women, and not only mimicking ancient cultural mores. Luke has stepped outside widespread literary traditions of antiquity by bringing women—lots of them—out from the shadows and into the spotlight. And in some scenes he has moved beyond treating women as virtual stage props by allowing them their own voices and even presenting them as models of faithful response to God's gracious visitation (see Karris; F. S. Spencer 2012).

Study of men in Luke's Gospel is significantly less developed, though B. Wilson has recently demonstrated that, when read against the norms of masculinity and power in the Roman world, Luke's narrative presents men in surprisingly unmanly ways. Manliness, for Greek and Roman authors, is measured in terms of one's elite status, the avoidance of womanly behaviors, a priority on physical attractiveness (including a lack of deformities), and the exercise of power and self control. Reading against this backdrop, Luke portrays some men at variance with Roman expectations—for example, Zechariah is silenced (Lk 1:20, 64), Zacchaeus is short (Lk 19:3) and Jesus appears impotent as he is ignobly executed on a Roman cross (Lk 22–23). Yet Zechariah is chosen by God to serve in the temple's sanctuary, receives an angelic visit, has a son in his old age and prophesies under the influence of the Spirit (Lk 1:5–23, 67–79). Zacchaeus is an exemplary seeker and is identified by Jesus as an authentic child of Abraham (Lk 19:3, 8–9). Jesus may be “unmanned” by crucifixion, but God raises him from the dead (Lk 24). Luke's Gospel thus presents a gospel in which masculinity can be reconfigured in ways that counter imperial conventions.

2.5. Israel. The question of *Israel's place in God's salvation is not easy to address on account of the diversity of evidence within Luke's Gospel. The legal experts (scribes, lawyers and teachers of the law) are consistently portrayed in negative terms, for example. They question and test Jesus, complain about him, look for a way to accuse and execute him, and participate in his execution (Lk 5:17, 21, 30; 6:7; 9:22; 10:25; 15:2; 19:47; 20:19; 22:2, 66; 23:10). The Jewish *synagogue is not a welcome place for Jesus. Jerusalem, and the Jerusalem-based priesthood too, are portrayed in negative terms, and Jesus forecasts the demise of the city and its temple. At the same time, Mary, Zechariah, Simeon, Anna, John the Baptist and Jesus all announce God's salvation in terms of Israel's hope of restoration (see Exile and Restoration). Torah is never dismissed; faithfulness to the *law, as well as such acts of Jewish piety as prayer, reading and explaining Scripture, worship, offering sacrifices, *fasting and expectant waiting are depicted positively. Israel's Scriptures are woven into the Lukan narrative from start to finish, and Jesus himself claims that his message and mission as well as the anticipated mission of his followers are all continuous with Moses and the Prophets.

We learn from Luke's Gospel, then, that Israel's history, institutions and practices are capable of misconception and misuse, but not necessarily so. The temple, the priesthood, even Israel's Scriptures must be understood in terms of and aligned with God's purpose. Failure to grasp and embrace God's plan renders persons and institutions at cross-purposes with God. Outside of this, they give only the impression of piety and faithfulness. Israel's religion—its institutions, its customs, its practices—is to be embraced fully when understood genuinely in relation to God's redemptive purpose. Jesus runs afoul of Israel's leadership because he articulates an alternative and competing understanding of God's work in the world. In raising Jesus from the dead, God authenticates Jesus, God's Son, as his authorized interpreter—the one whose person and message demonstrate God's character and purpose. Accordingly, Jesus' witnesses in the book of Acts identify Israel with the hope Jesus came to consummate: salvation, God's restoration of Israel, which entails the gathering of the nations.

3. Historical Questions.

In Luke 1:1–4 the evangelist dedicates his work to Theophilus, and this has led some to assume that Theophilus either was Luke's intended reader or that he was representative of the audience Luke hoped to reach. Since “Theophilus” in Greek could refer to a “lover of God” (or even “one whom God loves”), others have imagined that Theophilus is not a real person but a symbol for Luke's audience. Neither of these views is likely, however. Theophilus is a common name through the Roman period. The use of the title “most excellent” (Lk 1:3) for a symbolic audience would have been nonsensical. Further, we have no evidence of the use of symbolic dedications in Luke's world. And even though Luke clearly shows an interest in “God-fearers” in the book of Acts, he never refers to them as “God-lovers.” Almost certainly, then, Theophilus was a real person, though this should not be taken to mean that Luke was actually writing to Theophilus or that Theophilus somehow represents Luke's “community.” Following standard procedures in antiquity, Luke names Theophilus as his patron, and “patron” should not be confused with “audience.” In a world prior to the printing press and without a well-developed book market, publishing consisted of authors allowing their works to be circulated and copied by others. The business of patrons, then, was to introduce books to their network of friends so that the book might gain a wider circulation (see Gold). Any quest for the historical Theophilus, then, would be a blind alley in the search for Luke's audience.

As for the audience assumed by the narrative, one can summarize that it would have included followers of Jesus who were Greek-speaking Jews, Gentiles and God-fearers; people familiar with Judaism from the synagogue and from Israel's Scriptures; people broadly acquainted with the geography of the Mediterranean world; and people who were educated enough to appreciate the character of Luke's rhetoric and occasional literary flair. Beyond this, study of Luke has failed to achieve anything approaching a consensus regarding the identity of a particular audience (i.e., a certain community or persons located in a particular city or region of the Roman Empire) for Luke-Acts (see the survey in Barton; also Marguerat, 65-84).

In Luke 1:1-4, Luke acknowledges his awareness of other "narratives" and traditions, and notes his own research activity. Though he does not identify his sources by name, he seems to have used the Gospel of Mark; an additional source or sources—whether oral or written or some combination of the two—that he shared with Matthew; and additional material used by him alone among the NT evangelists—again, whether oral or written or some combination of the two—which underlies the birth narratives (Lk 1–2), major portions of the journey narrative (Lk 9:51–19:48), significant parts of the passion narrative (Lk 22–23) and the post-resurrection appearances (Lk 24). Among his sources, too, would have been Israel's Scriptures in Greek translation, and these helped to give shape not only to his theological vision but also to the patterns by which he has formed his presentation of Jesus.

If Luke used Mark's Gospel as a source, and assuming Mark was written in the 70s, then Luke's Gospel cannot be dated earlier than the late 70s. The latest possible date for Luke's writing is marked by evidence of its reception and dissemination from the mid-second century (for evidence, see Gregory) (see Canon). Consequently, scholars typically date the writing of Luke's Gospel in the period 75–125, with most locating its composition in the 80s. Modern curiosity and speculation notwithstanding, Luke provides practically nothing by way of evidence for greater specificity. This means, on the one hand, that Luke has not tied his account to a more precise moment either in the church or the Roman world and, on the other hand, that ecclesial or imperial events extraneous to Luke's narrative cannot be taken as reliable keys either for dating Luke's Gospel or for deciphering the meaning of Luke's account.

4. Conclusion.

Among the NT evangelists, Luke stands out first and foremost for his decision to continue the story of Jesus into the story of the early church—and then to present the whole as a seamless narrative that carries the reader from Israel's story, through the story of Jesus' life and mission, and into the ripple effect of the Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the life of the church and its mission. Luke's narrative-theological vision thus emphasizes the essential continuity between Israel and the church by identifying the God who gathers God's people and presses them forward in mission as the God who raised Jesus from the dead and, indeed, as the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Moreover, Luke underscores this continuity by identifying Jesus' followers with God's people of old. However crucial Luke's understanding and portrait of God might be, then, and however significant Christology might be to Luke's literary program, in the end both are placed in the service of Luke's ecclesiology. This is because Luke's basic concern is to interpret faithfully "the events that have been fulfilled among us" so as to identify and shape the character and vocation of God's people, who respond to Jesus' message with conversionary lives distinguished by their faithfulness to Jesus' message.

See also ASCENSION OF JESUS; BIRTH OF JESUS; CHRISTOLOGY; DEATH OF JESUS; JUBILEE; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; RICH AND POOR; SALVATION; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Bibliographies: F. Bovon, Luke the Theologian: Fifty-five Years of Research (1950-2005) (2nd ed.; Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2006); J. B. Green and M. C. McKeever, Luke-Acts and New Testament Historiography (IBRB 8; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994). Commentaries: D. L. Bock, Luke (2 vols.; BECNT; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 1994, 1996); F. Bovon, Luke (3 vols.; Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002, 2012, 2013); J. T. Carroll, Luke: A Commentary (NTL; Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2012); J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke (2 vols.; AB 28-28A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981, 1985); D. E. Garland, Luke (ZECNT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2011); J. L. González, Luke (Belief; Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2010); J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); L. T. Johnson, The Gospel of Luke (SP 3; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); A. A. Just Jr., Luke (ACCS:NT 3; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2003); I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans,

- 1978); J. Nolland, Luke (3 vols.; WBC 35A-C; Dallas: Word, 1989, 1993); R. H. Stein, Luke (NAC 24; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); R. B. Vinson, Luke (SHBC; Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys, 2008). Studies: D. W. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (LEC; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); C. G. Bartholomew, J. B. Green and A. C. Thiselton, eds., Reading Luke: Interpretation, Reflection, Formation (SHS 6; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2005); S. C. Barton, "Can We Identify the Gospel Audiences?" in The Gospels for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences, ed. R. Bauckham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998) 173-94; Bede the Venerable, Homilies on the Gospels (2 vols.; CSS 110-111; Kalamazoo, Michigan: Cistercian, 1991); M. F. Bird, "The Unity of Luke-Acts in Recent Discussion," JSNT 29 (2007) 425-48; D. L. Bock, A Theology of Luke and Acts: God's Promised Program, Realized for All Nations (BTNT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2012); P. Borgman, The Way According to Luke: Hearing the Whole Story of Luke-Acts (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); F. Bovon, "The Reception and Use of the Gospel of Luke in the Second Century," in Reading Luke: Interpretation, Reflection, Formation, ed. C. R. Bartholomew, J. B. Green and A. C. Thiselton (SHS 6; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2005) 379-400; H. J. Cadbury, The Making of Luke-Acts (2nd ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1999); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St Luke (London: Faber & Faber, 1960); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (New York: Crossroad, 1983); J. A. Fitzmyer, Luke the Theologian: Aspects of His Teaching (New York: Paulist, 1989); B. K. Gold, Literary Patronage in Greece and Rome (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987); J. B. Green, "Good News to Whom? Jesus and the 'Poor' in the Gospel of Luke," in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 59-74; idem, The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); idem, ed., Methods for Luke (MBI; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010); idem, "Luke-Acts, or Luke and Acts? A Reaffirmation of Narrative Unity," in Reading Acts Today: Essays in Honor of Loveday C.A. Alexander, ed. S. Walton et al. (LNTS 427; London: T & T Clark, 2011) 101-19; idem, "Healing and Healthcare," in The World of the New Testament: Cultural, Social, and Historical Contexts, ed. J. B. Green and L. M. McDonald (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2013a) 330-41; idem, "Conversion in Luke-Acts: God's Prevenience, Human Embodiment," in The Unrelenting God: Essays on God's Action in Scripture in Honor of Beverly Roberts Gaventa, ed. D. J. Downs and M. L. Skinner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2013b); A. F. Gregory, The Reception of Luke and Acts in the Period Before Irenaeus (WUNT 2/169; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003); A. F. Gregory and C. K. Rowe, eds., Rethinking the Unity and Reception of Luke and Acts (Columbia: University of South Carolina, 2010); C. M. Hays, Luke's Wealth Ethics: A Study in Their Coherence and Character (WUNT 2/275; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010); H. J. Hornik and M. C. Parsons, Illuminating Luke (3 vols.; New York: T & T Clark, 2003, 2005, 2007); L. T. Johnson, Sharing Possessions: Mandate and Symbol of Faith (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); R. J. Karris, "Women and Discipleship in Luke," CBQ 56 (1994) 1-20; K.-J. Kim, Stewardship and Almsgiving in Luke's Theology (JSNTSup 155; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); M. Kim-Rauchholz, Umkehr bei Lukas: Zu Wesen und Bedeutung der Metanoia in der Theologie des dritten Evangelisten (Neunkirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener, 2008); K. A. Kuhn, Luke: The Elite Evangelist (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2010); A.-J. Levine and M. Blickenstaff, eds., A Feminist Companion to Luke (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); D. Marguerat, The First Christian Historian: Writing the 'Acts of the Apostles' (SNTSMS 121; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); F. Méndez-Moratalla, The Paradigm of Conversion in Luke (JSNTSup 252; London: T & T Clark, 2004); H. Moxnes, The Economy of the Kingdom: Social Conflict and Economic Relations in Luke's Gospel (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); M. S. Parsons and R. I. Pervo, Rethinking the Unity of Luke and Acts (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. T. Pennington, Reading the Gospels Wisely: A Narrative and Theological Introduction (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2012); T. E. Phillips, "The Genre of Acts: Moving Toward a Consensus?" CBR 4 (2006) 365-96; J. L. Resseguie, Spiritual Landscape: Images of the Spiritual Life in the Gospel of Luke (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004); C. K. Rowe, Early Narrative Christology: The Lord in the Gospel of Luke (BZNW 139; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2006); T. K. Seim, The Double Message: Patterns of Gender in Luke-Acts (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); idem, "Feminist Criticism," in Methods for Luke, ed. J. B. Green (MBI; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010) 42-73; F. S. Spencer, The Gospel of Luke and the Acts of the Apostles (IBT; Nashville: Abingdon, 2008); idem, Salty Wives, Spirited Mothers, and Savvy Widows: Capable Women of Purpose and Persistence in Luke's

Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2012); P. E. Spencer, "The Unity of Luke-Acts: A Four-Bolted Hermeneutical Hinge," CBR 5 (2007) 341-66; G. E. Sterling, Historiography and Self-Definition: Josephos, Luke-Acts and Apologetic Historiography (NovTSup 64; Leiden: Brill, 1992); M. Turner, Power from on High: The Spirit in Israel's Restoration and Witness in Luke-Acts (JPTSup 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); W. C. Van Unnik, "Luke-Acts, a Storm Center in Contemporary Scholarship," in Studies in Luke-Acts: Essays Presented in Honor of P. Schubert, ed. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1966) 15-32; P. Walters, The Assumed Authorial Unity of Luke and Acts: A Reassessment of the Evidence (SNTSMS, 145; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009); B. E. Wilson, Unmanly Men: Refigurations of Masculinity in Luke-Acts (New York: Oxford University Press, forthcoming); R. Wuthnow, Acts of Compassion: Caring for Others and Helping Ourselves (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1991).

J. B. Green

M

MAGDALA. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

MAGIC. See MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES.

MAGNIFICAT. See SONGS AND HYMNS.

MARK, GOSPEL OF

The Gospel of Mark is a case study in paradox. On the one hand, it leaves its readers breathless in its presentation of Jesus the Messiah (Mk 1:1) as one who comes teaching with *authority, driving out powerful *demons and performing spectacular *miracles. On the other hand, there is no other Gospel in which Jesus remains so misunderstood and so fiercely resisted by all manner of people, including at times his most devoted followers. If the kerygma—the proclamation of the early church—was essentially a narrative about divine triumph despite and indeed through human suffering, then arguably there is no other text in which this paradox comes into crisper expression than the Gospel of Mark.

A paradox of another sort has characterized Mark's reception down through the ages. In the earliest decades of its existence this Gospel was received less favorably than its counterparts, so that by the early part of the second century Papias had to insist that "Mark did nothing wrong in thus writing down single points" as Peter was alleged to have remembered them and recited them (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.16). For the next several centuries Mark is only sparsely quoted, likely on account of its considerable overlap (ninety percent of its contents) with Matthew, which was privileged on account of its putative apostolic authorship. And so in the early church Mark continued to play the role of neglected stepbrother to Matthew, a status that was all but set in stone when the highly influential Augustine of Hippo, who held to Matthean priority, designated Mark as Matthew's "foot-slave and abbreviator" (Cons. 2).

This state of affairs continued through the greater part of church history, until the nineteenth century, when C. H. Weisse (1838) first set forth the case for Markan priority, an argument later reiterated by A. Ritschl (1851) and then finally embraced by the influential H. J. Holtzmann (1863). Part and parcel of Holtzmann's agenda was to respond to the thoroughgoing skepticism of D. F. Strauss, who a generation earlier had called into question the historical reliability of large swaths of the Gospel tradition. If, on Holtzmann's theory, Matthew and Luke were conceded as harboring too much of an ecclesial agenda to be of much use as history, then certainly Mark's primitive style commended his Gospel as a naively wrought, untendentious composition and thus as the Gospel of choice in reconstructing the life of the historical Jesus. Even though this alleged naiveté was later to be called into question by W. Wrede's The Messianic Secret (1901), Mark's importance would remain.

Working within the paradigm of Markan priority, which by the early twentieth century had already become the operative assumption of Gospel scholarship, the classic form critics (R. Bultmann, M. Dibelius, K. Schmidt, V. Taylor) devoted much of their energy to understanding how and where the Jesus traditions came to be preserved there. Maintaining a primary interest in Mark, *form criticism then set the agenda for the rising tide of *redaction criticism, which has given impulse to and continues to engage with *narrative criticism.

Today, Mark continues to offer much raw material for a wide array of readers drawing on a variety of reading strategies, from historical-critical to *feminist, from *postcolonial to postmodern. In contemporary scholarship the text continues to play a central role in reconstructions of the historical Jesus (see Quest of the Historical Jesus). Not only so, but also discussions regarding the setting and aims of Mark remain vigorous. After centuries of being neglected on account of its second-class pedigree and rough Greek style, there is some irony in the fact that Mark comes to be vindicated in modern scholarship precisely on account of these traits. Meanwhile, the church continues to find in Mark, in its raw power and directness, both comfort and challenge.

1. Literary Features and Questions
2. Historical Issues
3. Theological Themes and Messages
4. Conclusion

1. Literary Features and Questions.

1.1. Genre. Concerning the genre of Mark there has been no shortage of debate. This is due to the fact that within the extant ancient sources there are simply no clear-cut analogues to what later readers would recognize as a “Gospel” form (see Gospel: Genre). This not only is a credit to the evangelist’s literary ingenuity, but also is unsurprising. If E. Auerbach is correct to regard the Gospel of Mark as a truly innovative blend of content and style when viewed against the scope of Western literature, one would almost expect its author to invent a new genre, or bend an old one. Though it is doubtful that Mark saw himself as establishing a “Gospel genre,” he was at least aware that the new wine of his content demanded correspondingly new wineskins of form. In what way this form was new and unparalleled in its day remains the crucial question. Whether Mark’s genre is sui generis (of its own kind) or follows the basic pattern of a recognizable ancient literary classification depends not only on the strength of the analogy, but also on the explanatory power that such comparisons can generate in our overall understanding of Mark. Although scholars have put forward a variety of proposals over the years, three basic suggestions are offered here.

Almost four decades ago G. Bilezikian argued that Mark’s Gospel conforms to the basic structure of the Greek tragedy, a proposal that, if valid, may incline us to regard the work along the lines of Seneca’s privately performed “closet tragedies” (Smith, 228-29; cf. Godawa, 64). One of the stronger evidences in favor of this argument is the centrality of a recognition scene both in the ancient tragedies and in Mark’s Gospel (Mk 8:27-30). At the same time, advocates of this view have not have fully succeeded in explaining how other alleged stylistic parallels between Mark and the tragic genre can be explained by the evangelist’s dependence on tragic formula. For example, Mark’s penchant for foreshadowing, a regular characteristic of ancient tragedy, could just as easily be attributed to the evangelist’s skill as a storyteller. A hybrid variation of this Mark-as-tragedy thesis, and more modest in its claims, is found in the work of J. Marcus, who sees in Mark a blend of the dramatic and the liturgical (Marcus 2000, 64-69; cf. Goulder).

Representing a second basic option, M. Tolbert compares Mark to a variety of ancient Greek novels (e.g., Xenophon’s An Ephesian Tale). The evangelist’s use of episodes with spare introduction, repetition and stylized form seems to have some parallel in this brand of Greek literature. According to Tolbert, Mark was assuming a fairly wide-ranging audience, and thus it is inappropriate to think of a localized “Markan audience” (see Bauckham 1998). Moreover, the story that the evangelist tells, precisely because it is a novel, may be expected to have only the remotest connection with actual history. (Here Tolbert may be compared to D. MacDonald, who infers the Gospel’s fictiveness on the basis of his judgment that Mark is a reworking of Homeric myth [MacDonald, 190].) It is hard to deny that there are certain formal similarities between Mark and the Greek novels, which Tolbert describes. However, in order for her argument to work, Tolbert must also grant that Mark has considerably diverged from the genre and its goals to fit his own end. But when such divergences occur on a fundamental level, which they arguably do here, this calls into question the proposed genre identification in the first place. Perhaps one helpful refinement of Tolbert’s thesis comes in M. Vines’s published thesis, which argues that Mark is not a Greek novel, but in fact a Jewish novel.

A third path is to compare Mark with the Greco-Roman biography (bios) (BurrIDGE 1992; 2004; Bryan, 26-28). Like Mark, the ancient biography sets its focus on the protagonist from the beginning and seeks to sustain that focus throughout, not least by constantly making the hero the subject of the narrative’s verbs. There are also formal similarities, such as length and scale. Although this approach has been criticized for paving over conspicuous differences between Mark’s Gospel and the range of literature to which it is compared, one can imagine a first-century reader seeing the Gospel as a kind of bios. In recent decades most commentators have been willing to settle on the bios classification, albeit with qualification. The comments of J. Diehl are representative: “If the canonical Gospel writers were, indeed, consciously following the Greco-Roman bios literary form, they were also creative in their transformation of that literary form” (Diehl, 194). A balanced position on Mark’s genre must recognize not only the Gospel’s many parallels to contemporary literature of various sorts, but also its uniqueness.

1.2. Structure. For the Gospel of Mark, as for any text, interpretation ideally proceeds with some consideration of structure, for structure ordinarily yields up clues as to meaning, as well as an author's chief concerns and emphases. Unfortunately, Mark does not lend itself to simple partition. A century ago, it was Mark's apparent shapelessness that prompted the form critics to view the Gospel as a crude compilation of oral traditions; more recently, at least one major commentator (Gundry, 1048-49) has declared any serious attempt to outline the text as virtually futile.

Yet such judgments are overstated. It is broadly agreed that Mark exhibits at least a bipartite structure (allowing Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi [Mk 8:27-30] to become a kind of hinge dividing the book into two main sections), if not a tripartite form (introducing an additional break on Jesus' entry into Jerusalem [Mk 11:1]). On the former approach, the climactic peak of the narrative is the very point at which Jesus is acknowledged as the Messiah (see Christ), a moment that makes good on the Gospel's introduction promising to tell about "Jesus Christ the Son of God" (Mk 1:1). On the latter approach, the confession is still retained as the high point, but weighty consideration is also accorded to Mark 8:22-10:46, commonly referred to as the "way" section, an extended passage that makes repeated use of the noun hodos ("way") and focuses on the unexpected nature of Jesus' messiahship: it is characterized by suffering.

In moving beyond these basic subdivisions, scholars have resorted to one or more of four different approaches. First, rather than focusing on content within the text, several scholars have sought instead to identify a framework behind the text. P. Carrington argues that Mark's narrative movement follows along a Jewish lectionary running from Rosh Hashanah to the Feast of Tabernacles (see Feasts). Somewhat similarly, J. Bowman links Mark's progression to a hypothetical first-century A.D. Passover liturgy. Lacking evidence at key points, both proposals generally have struck Markan scholars as being too speculative.

A second and much more common approach follows Jesus' geographical movements within Mark. Here a standard outline would look something like the following: (1) prologue (Mk 1:1-13); (2) *Galilee (Mk 1:14-3:6); (3) further ministry in Galilee (Mk 3:7-6:13); (4) beyond Galilee (Mk 6:14-8:26); (5) journey to *Jerusalem (Mk 8:27-10:52); (6) Jerusalem (Mk 11-16). The advantage of this kind of outline is that it builds on Mark's obvious interest in geography, an interest that likely would have been shared by a church interested in knowing how Jesus made his way from Galilee to Jerusalem (see Archeology and Geography). Its weaknesses are twofold. First, given certain patent non sequiturs in Mark's description of Jesus' movements within these discrete sections, attempts to provide a more detailed outline on this model must remain frustrated. Second, for the majority of commentators adopting this strategy, it is unclear how Mark's geographical interest relates to his message.

A third general approach has been to discern a theological structure within Mark. Included under this heading are scholars who find close affinities between Mark's narrative and the exodus. This has been the interest of a number of scholars (e.g., Swartley 1994). R. Watts provides an important variation of this model when he argues that the Mark's operative subtext is not the exodus of the Pentateuch, but rather by the new exodus of Isaiah. Although his overall point is well argued, Watts comes up short in explaining why the reader must opt for one subtext (new exodus) over and against the other (exodus). Surely, if Mark possesses the literary genius to thread his own story with one story beneath the story, what is to prevent him from incorporating several simultaneously? The many parallels between the Markan narrative and the (new) exodus story certainly commend the latter as an important structural basis. However, it is not a consistently uniform basis: as the reader enters the second half of Mark's Gospel, the theme noticeably trails off.

Other theologically driven patterns have been discerned as well. For example, C. Myers identifies Jesus' *baptism, *transfiguration and crucifixion as pivotal revelatory points, all of which conform to a certain structural pattern and speak to his identity (Myers, 390-91). According to B. Witherington, Jesus' identity is likewise the key to unlocking Mark's structure (Witherington, 38). Meanwhile, other scholars, while agreeing that Mark's structure is predominantly motivated by his christological agenda, nevertheless conceive of that agenda as encompassing Jesus' rejection, not least by the disciples. Along these lines, N. Perrin has delineated two matching sets of three. In the first section of Mark there are three subsections (Mk 1:14-3:6; 3:7-6:6a; 6:6b-8:21), each of which begins with an invitation to follow Jesus, only to end on a note of rejection. Corresponding to this in the second half are Jesus' three passion predictions (Mk 8:27-32a; 9:30-32; 10:32-34), each of which is met with misunderstanding (Mk

8:32b—9:1; 9:33-50; 10:35-45). The following proposed outline is a variation on this schema; further variations of the same are found in several of the major commentaries:

- 1:1-15 Prologue
- 1:16—8:26 Jesus Revealed as Messiah
 - 1:16—3:12 Jesus' Authority
 - 3:13—6:6 Teaching and Miracles
 - 6:7—8:26 Mission
- 8:27—16:8 The Nature of Jesus' Messiahship
 - 8:27—10:52 The Way of Discipleship
 - 11:1—13:37 Conflict with Temple Leaders
 - 14:1—16:8 Passion and Resurrection

Whatever the natural divisions perceived by modern readers might be, one must confess that the interrelationship between these and their constituent subdivisions remains complex and intricate. Perhaps J. Dewey is not far off the mark in suggesting that we "gain a better understanding of the Gospel and its individual pericopes by focusing on the interconnections, on the repetitions, and the variations in the repetition, than by analyzing its divisions" (Dewey, 235). In its structure, Mark's Gospel has both a linear and a fugue-like quality (Kee, 64, 75); if the first is important, the latter is no less so.

1.3. Plot Overview. Mark begins by giving notice that the story that he is about to tell concerns "Jesus Christ the Son of God" (Mk 1:1). The reader then meets *John the Baptizer introducing this same Jesus as one who proclaims the *kingdom. After his own baptism, Jesus calls his first disciples, who are witness to several exorcisms and *healings. Such public activity goes on to provoke a series of questions from unsympathetic observers, and inevitably the hostility mounts. Meanwhile, his following continues to expand, and he appoints twelve apostles by name. Next, in the face of even more bitter opposition, Jesus tells a series of *parables that directly or indirectly explain the nature of this opposition. This gives way to an excursion across the lake, the stilling of a storm, and a dramatic exorcism on the far side of the lake. Once back on the western shore, Jesus, in a flurry of activity, heals a hemorrhaging woman and raises a little girl from the dead. After meeting resistance in his hometown, Jesus sends out the Twelve for mission, an event that is interrupted by an account of John the Baptist's unsavory death at the hands of King Herod. On the Twelve's return, Jesus retreats with his disciples and performs a miracle involving the multiplication of loaves and fish and also a second stilling of a storm, both of which remain misunderstood. Despite the disciples' misunderstanding, crowds continue to flock after Jesus from faraway regions. After several more healings, Jesus again feeds the masses and continues to heal. Finally, at Caesarea Philippi Peter voices the climactic declaration that the Jesus is indeed the Messiah.

Still to be resolved, however, is the nature of Jesus' messiahship, which is the focus of the remaining half of Mark. Here Jesus is gloriously transfigured, only to face various instances of unbelief from both the crowds and his disciples. Interspersed amidst Jesus' three *predictions of his passion are various teachings regarding discipleship, as well as several notable encounters, including those with the young ruler and with *blind Bartimaeus, who together present a study of contrasts. Finally, Jesus enters Jerusalem as the acknowledged Messiah, and upon cleansing of the temple, he provokes a fresh wave of hostile interactions. Withdrawing with his disciples, Jesus then predicts the destruction of the *temple and exhorts them to keep watch in view of the Son's coming. As the hour of his death draws nearer, Jesus receives an anointing and then gathers his disciples for a final Passover meal (see Last Supper). Following the meal, Jesus and his disciples move to Gethsemane, where he is finally arrested. He is then tried and handed over to Pilate. Under pressure from the crowds, Pilate in turn hands Jesus over to be crucified. After Jesus' death, Joseph of Arimathea recovers the body and buries him in a tomb. Early the next morning, three women go to the tomb and are surprised by an angel who announces that Jesus has risen, and that they are to meet Peter in Galilee. Noting only the women's fear and silence, Mark's Gospel then comes to an unexpected and sudden close.

1.4. Literary and Rhetorical Features. Among the four Gospels, Mark is the most inelegant in terms of style. Starting off with an abrupt beginning (Mk 1:1-3) and coming to a close with an even more abrupt ending (Mk 16:8), Mark's Gospel hurtles forward to its climax. This effect is enhanced not only by the evangelist's fondness for paratactic construction ("and [kai] . . . and [kai] . . .") and the historical present (whereby past events are vividly recounted in the present tense), but also, especially early on in the book, through the repeated use of "immediately" (euthys), a repetition that only the most woodenly literal English translations dare to reproduce. Lacking in the subordinate clauses and similar signs of stylistic smoothness that are so characteristic of Matthew and Luke, Mark is a rough-and-ready Gospel.

Although this quality once induced form critics to see Mark's text as Kleinliteratur—an artless compilation—several generations of literary studies on Mark have shown just the opposite: despite all initial appearances, Mark's Gospel is extremely sophisticated and yields up a level of complexity that is sometimes mind-boggling. In the first place, one might consider Mark's use of intercalation (often referred to as "Markan sandwiches"). In this technique the evangelist takes up a theme, motif or narrative focus, sets it aside temporarily, and then immediately returns to it, thereby producing an A-B-A structure. Perhaps the most famous instance of this technique involves Jesus' cursing of the fig tree (A) (Mk 11:11-14), followed by the cleansing of the temple (B) (Mk 11:15-19), followed by subsequent discussion about the fig tree (A) (Mk 11:20-25). Using this framing arrangement, Mark invites the reader to interpret the central member of the pattern (B), the temple cleansing, with reference to the outer encasement (A), the withered fig tree. Sometimes the intercalation can be more elaborate, involving multiple levels (A-B-C-B-A) and turning on individual words and themes. Many similar such intercalations have been detected elsewhere and provide an important hermeneutical key throughout. Some interpreters have even argued that the whole of Mark's Gospel is a narrative universe of concentric intercalations, all spinning around the axis of Peter's confession at Philippi (see bibliography in Larsen, 149-50).

As hinted above, Mark is also interested in threefold repetitions, which may well be related to his penchant for intercalation. In Mark 4 Jesus tells three seed parables (Mk 4:3-32). We also find that there are three opinions regarding John's identity (Mk 6:14-15), just as there are three opinions about who Jesus is (Mk 8:27-28). There are three passion predictions (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34), even as there are three points at which the disciples fail to stay awake (Mk 14:32-42), which also match Peter's threefold denial of Jesus (Mk 14:6-72). The same threefold pattern may obtain in more subtle ways—for example, the threefold affirmation of Jesus' sonship, which is strung out across the narrative (Mk 1:11; 9:7; 15:39).

As J. Camery-Hoggatt demonstrates, irony is also an importance feature in Mark's text. A parade example of such irony occurs in Mark 15:16-20, where the Roman soldiers stage a dramatic enthronement of Jesus, mockingly hailing him as the Son of God. The purple robe, the crown, the acclamation and the homage are in place. Of course, on one level the soldiers are playacting, sarcastically rebuffing Jesus' messianic aspirations. But on a different level even as the soldiers are in the process of "enthroning" Jesus by lifting him up on the Roman cross, he, in a moment of supreme irony, is precisely through his crucifixion truly and realistically being enthroned as the rightful ruler of the kingdom of God (Marcus 2006, 77-80). Likewise, although it appears that the Jewish leaders are putting Jesus on *trial, for Mark, it is actually Jesus' prosecutors who are putting themselves on the stand before the Son of Man (Mk 14:62).

Mark's use of irony is not unrelated to the so-called messianic secret, which can be found in each of the Synoptic Gospels but is particularly emphasized in Mark (e.g., Mk 1:24-25, 43-45; 4:11; 8:29-30). More than a century ago, W. Wrede argued that the theme of secrecy was introduced by Mark as a way of explaining the absence of evidence that Jesus claimed messianic status while he was alive. In other words, as an apologetic response to first-century doubters who wondered how a messianic Jesus could remain silent on his messianism, Mark contrived narratives that made it look like Jesus actually intended to suppress this announcement. Even if Wrede's theory fails to convince today, he has at least made a lasting contribution in drawing attention to the theme of mystery in Mark. In this Gospel mystery reveals itself in the midst of irony.

Questions are also a special feature within the narrative. In Mark's story questions are posed rhetorically and thus often remain suspended, only to attain closure at a later point. In response to Jesus' first exorcisms, the people ask, "What is this? A new teaching—and with authority!" (Mk 1:27). Later Jesus' detractors, on hearing his offer of "forgiveness to the paralytic, ask, "Why does this fellow talk like this?" (Mk 2:7 [cf. Mk 2:16, 24; 7:5]). Then, after the stilling of the storm, the disciples ask of one another, "Who is this?" (Mk 4:41), a question not far removed from still another query: "Where did this man get these things [i.e., such authority]?" (Mk 6:2). Questions of identity are then only resolved in the revelation of Jesus' messiahship (Mk 8:27-30) (Witherington, 38; Fowler, 132-33).

Mark's predilection for questions is not unrelated to his characteristic way of creating suspense; after all, posing a question only to leave it unanswered is itself a means of inducing suspense. Elsewhere Mark notes very early in the narrative that the *Pharisees and Herodians conspire to kill Jesus (Mk 3:6). This verse in fact summarizes a string of five pericopae depicting escalating hostilities between Jesus and his opponents (Mk 2:1—3:6). Viewed against the course of the entire narrative, the pitch of this conflict may strike the reader as preemptive if not premature, since the passion does not begin to take place until Mark 14. But by establishing the murderous intents of Jesus' enemies at an early point, the evangelist manages to cast the whole Jesus story under the dark gloom of the cross. This prompts the reader to ponder the intervening chapters (Mk 3–13) as an explanation of the cross, and vice versa. The notional disconnect between Jesus' life and his death, so prevalent in modern-day and scholarly understandings of Jesus, would have been utterly alien to Mark's way of thinking.

Suspense also plays a key role in the ending of Mark as we have it in the best manuscripts. Mark is the only Gospel in which the risen Christ never appears. Instead, upon viewing the empty tomb and hearing the instructions of the angelic figure to report to Peter in Galilee, the women "say nothing to anyone, for they were afraid" (Mk 16:8). To be sure, it is not necessarily the case that Mark intended his Gospel to break off at just this spot. Some text critics have argued that the so-called longer ending of Mark (Mk 16:9–20) is a genuine ending as composed by Mark. Although this is impossible to disprove, most scholars reject the possibility as highly unlikely. Alternatively, it is possible that the Gospel did break off at Mark 16:8 because its author was interrupted at this very point and for whatever reason never returned pen to paper. It is also possible that Mark did in fact write more in the very first version—a now lost longer ending—but that somewhere along the line the last pages of Mark have been lost in transmission (Croy). But at present, the dominant position among scholars is to suppose that Mark intentionally ends his Gospel on this strange, abrupt note. As to just what that intention might be, there have been various proposals. Yet perhaps M. Hooker puts her finger on it: "Mark's ending disturbs us, because it seems so inconclusive. We long to complete the book—and that, of course, is precisely what Mark wants us to do!" (Hooker 2003, 23). In other words, Mark creates a situation of suspense to force an existential decision: to follow or not follow Jesus despite the costs is a question that now falls to the reader much as it did to the women on Easter morning. The weak-willed disciples have failed Jesus at so many turns in Mark, and now so too have the women. What about Mark's readers, who are confronted by the resurrection yet still in their weakness? What will they do?

2. Historical Issues.

2.1. Authorship. Whereas Greco-Roman authors regularly attached their names to their published works, this typically was not the case with Jewish writings concerning the things of God. Like the other three Gospels, Mark was composed as an anonymous document. Exactly when the name "Mark" came to be featured in its present title is a matter of speculation, though scholars seem to be comfortable hypothesizing a date of around A.D. 125. Given the Gospel's composition in the first century, the relatively late date of its literary ascription to one "Mark" in the early second century makes it plausible that those who first titled this Gospel credited it to the John Mark (Acts 12:25; Col 4:10; 2 Tim 4:11; 1 Pet 5:13) pseudonymously. Another possibility is that the same John Mark was indeed the author of this Gospel, and that this fact was faithfully preserved in early church tradition. Still a third possibility is that "Mark" is not the John Mark of the NT, but rather a lesser-known Mark, whose significance has now been completely lost to history. Thus, the question of the authorship of this Gospel is problematic.

Yet the difficulties of the traditional ascription (that the biblical John Mark wrote this Gospel) should not be exaggerated, for as the renowned Oxford scholar B. H. Streeter once aptly opined, in the case of Matthew and John the burden of evidence remains on anyone seeking to establish traditional authorship, but in the case of Mark (and Luke) the onus falls on anyone wishing to deny traditional authorship. The reasons for this dictum are not hard to see. After all, while there would be an obvious temptation for an obscure or unknown first-century writer to ascribe work pseudonymously to Matthew or John, both being members of Jesus' original band of followers, no such temptation would have obtained, or at least have been nearly so strong, in the case of Mark. Given John Mark's modest profile in Acts, not to mention the record of his having abandoned Paul and Barnabas during the first missionary journey (Acts 13:13), this historical figure does not stand out as a likely "go-to" man for authorizing this life of Jesus. For this reason, the church would have little compelling reason to ascribe this Gospel to John Mark, of all people.

This still, however, does not rule out the possibility of a relatively anonymous Mark—that is, a Mark who might have been well known in his own day but whose name has been lost to history. A crucial question in this connection has to do with the reliability of an important testimony from the early church father Papias, passed down by Eusebius. Papias was active as early as the closing decades of the first century and in the first quarter of the second century composed his five-volume Exegesis of the Lord's Say- ings; Eusebius identifies him as “the Presbyter” in the following text: “And the Presbyter used to say this: ‘Mark became Peter’s interpreter and wrote accurately all that he remembered, not, indeed, in order, of the things said or done by the Lord. For he had not heard the Lord, nor had he followed him, but later on, as I said, followed Peter, who used to give teaching as necessity demanded, but who did not make, as it were, an arrangement of the Lord’s oracles’” (Hist. eccl. 3.39.16).

While some critics have been slow to accept this testimony at face value (arguing that this is a desperate and deceitful attempt to validate Mark’s Gospel by linking it with the apostle Peter), several considerations speak to the veracity of this report. First, there is evidence that both John Mark and Peter found themselves in *Rome at about the same time (1 Pet 5:13), giving opportunity for exactly this kind of collaboration. (Whether Papias depends on 1 Pet 5:13 is another question, but I suspect not.) Second, there is a hefty weight of patristic tradition that associates (John) Mark’s Gospel with Peter’s preaching at Rome, even if there is some disagreement among the church fathers as to when the evangelist completed his work (Black, 77-191). Irenaeus says that Mark composed his Gospel after Peter’s “departure” (exodos) (Haer. 3.1.1); later, Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius maintained publication during Peter’s lifetime at Rome and with apostolic encouragement. The early church’s equivocation over the timing of the composition hardly invalidates the core of the tradition, which regularly associates Peter and Mark, and sometimes Rome.

One conceivably relevant testimony in this connection is the witness of Justin Martyr, who was active in Rome in the mid-second century. In making seemingly passing comments, he writes as follows: “It is said that he [Jesus] changed the name of one of the apostles to Peter, and it is written in his memoirs that he changed the names of others, two brothers, the sons of Zebedee, to Boanerges, which means ‘sons of thunder’” (Dial. 106.3). Famously, Justin never refers to any of the Gospels as “gospels,” but rather as “memoirs.” Accordingly, the term here must refer to one of the four Gospels. Which one of the four Gospels he has in mind becomes clear in light of the fact that only in Mark does Jesus give the nickname “Boanerges” to the sons of Zebedee (Mk 3:17). The key word is the possessive adjective in the phrase “his memoirs.” If by this Justin refers to “Jesus’ memoirs”—that is, the memoir about Jesus—this sheds little light on the possibility of Markan authorship. On the other hand, if by “his memoirs” the apologist intends what is essentially Peter’s Gospel (so, e.g., Stanton, 101; Bauckham 2006, 235), and that Gospel is patently Mark’s Gospel, then this is solid (and likely independent) confirmation of Papias’s report. While some scholars remain suspicious of Papias’s reliability, others insist that the historical testimony to a partnership between John Mark and Peter bears the marks of authenticity (Hengel, 2-14, 47-53; Bauckham 2006, 232-39). Where one lands on the question of authorship (and the Gospel’s alleged connection to Peter) will determine, more than anything else, judgments of provenance (see 2.3 below); both of these issues in turn are often brought to bear on a number of exegetical turning points.

2.2. Audience. The question of Mark’s audience is, of course, bound up with (but not necessarily determined by) prior judgments of provenance and dating. Frustratingly, common ground among scholars is hard to find, not only on account of the divergence of opinion on these matters of setting, but also on account of fundamental differences in methodology. More exactly, current study of Mark has yet to resolve at least two important issues. First, to what extent may Mark’s (putative) genre and style be used as a basis for inferring his audience? For example, while M. Beavis argues for a sophisticated and well-educated audience on the basis of a sophisticated and well-educated Mark, others, such as R. Rohrbaugh and R. Horsley, are unconvinced by this line of reasoning; both latter scholars emphasize Mark’s oral quality, which for them serves as evidence that the evangelist’s intended readers were actually hearers in the local peasant villages. Second, to what extent are modern readers justified in rendering reconstructions of Mark’s setting on the basis of narrative realities, when those reconstructions cannot be independently corroborated? Objecting to what he sees as a basic circularity in these kinds of arguments, D. Peterson takes to task some of the more prominent social reconstructions on offer, those of W. Kelber, H. Kee and C. Myers. Where the world within the text and the world behind the text intersect is not always clear, and the principles for reconciling the two remain under discussion. In order to avoid prejudging issues raised below, it will be sufficient to distill only a small set of agreed-upon points: Mark’s audience comprised Jewish and Gentile Christians undergoing duress involving both external persecution (from both Jewish and Roman quarters) and internal tensions resulting from such persecution (Donahue, 17-26; Roskam, 72-74; Winn, 173-77). Beyond this, it is difficult to speculate. Theories regarding the socioeconomic status of Mark’s first readers, as well as their geographical location (urban versus rural, for example), remain disputed.

2.3. Provenance.

2.3.1. Galilee. Whereas for decades scholars had agreed that Mark's Gospel hailed from Rome, this was called into question by W. Marxsen, who, focusing on the importance of *Galilee in critical junctures of the Gospel (Mk 1:9; 14:28; 16:7), urged that the author of this Gospel was attempting to call his readers to gather with him at Galilee to await the parousia, sometime near the beginning of the First Jewish Revolt (A.D. 66–74). Although Marxsen's work is considered by many to be a classic of redaction criticism, the vast majority of scholars consider it quite fanciful. Still, impressed by the rural quality of the Gospel and its seeming tight connection with local Galilean traditions, W. Kelber and R. Horsley follow suit. Given the strengths of the alternative options, this remains a minority position.

2.3.2. Syria. H. Kee, G. Theissen and J. Marcus (Marcus 1992a) are perhaps the most influential of authors who hold to Syrian provenance, a judgment progressively winning adherents. Here attempts are made to link the turmoil facing the community with the events of the First Jewish Revolt (Mk 13) (see Revolutionary Movements). Given the strongly Gentile composition of the audience (cf. Mk 7:3–4), yet also its ability to feel the impact of the events of a war such as the First Jewish Revolt (Joseph reports that the Hellenistic cities on the border of the Syrian region were the first to be attacked), the region immediately to the north and east of Palestine makes good sense. Syrian provenance is also attractive to commentators wishing to emphasize the rural roots of Mark's community.

As for the patristic testimony pointing toward Rome, advocates of this hypothesis remain skeptical. They see too much weight being put on Papias, who would have had his own reasons for inventing Roman provenance. Moreover, the many Latinisms in Mark, which have been a staple argument for defenders of Roman provenance, could just as easily be explained as attempts to accommodate Latin-speaking Romans stationed in the East (Marcus 1992a, 443–44). To be sure, counterarguments to the prevailing paradigm of Roman provenance force us to give this option serious consideration.

2.3.3. Rome. In addition to the weight of patristic testimony (see 2.1 above), scholars supporting a Roman provenance have appealed to a variety of factors, perhaps the most compelling of which are the aforementioned Latinisms in the text. For example, whereas the evangelist could have made his point simply by stating that the poor widow had put “two copper coins” (lepta dyo) into the temple offering, he goes out of the way to render the Roman equivalent and adds the phrase “which is a kodrantēs [kodrantēs]” (Mk 12:42). Likewise, in describing Jesus' movements after his arrest, the evangelist notes that Jesus had been removed “into the palace, that is, the praetorium” (Mk 15:16), which again appears to be an effort to translate for a Roman audience.

Further evidence of an audience in Rome can be discerned from the Gospel's thematic interest in suffering stemming from persecution. Indeed, some researchers have traced the specific elements of Mark's narrative tightly back to what one would expect to find in the Roman Christians' experience of persecution (Donahue; Incigneri, 156–252; Winn, 153–77) just before or just after A.D. 70 in Rome (see 2.3). For these same scholars, Nero's policy of persecution, directed squarely and fiercely against the Christians, along with the upheaval which Rome itself was going through in these years, makes as good a backdrop as any in explaining Mark's social setting.

2.4. Date. Interpreters of Mark have put forward various judgments regarding the dating of its composition, all of which fall within the first century. For the sake of simplicity, we might summarize four positions: Mark was written in the 40s, 50s, 60s or 70s. The relative probability of each of these four windows in turn is sometimes determined by the extent to which a Gospel is a window on the setting of its author (particularly with reference to Mk 13), assumptions of authorship (see 2.1 above) and assumptions of provenance.

2.4.1. 40s. Several sources in antiquity assign Mark's Gospel to the fourth decade A.D., and a handful of scholars from the modern period have been willing to agree. Drawing on Clement of Alexandria, J. A. T. Robinson affirms the tradition that Mark accompanied Peter to Rome in 42, only to finally draw up a record of Peter's preaching three years later (Robinson, 95, 107–8, 352–53). A similar view was well established among the post-Nicene fathers and in certain strands of nineteenth-century biblical scholarship. Meanwhile J. O'Callaghan has argued that portions of Mark can be made out on documents retrieved from Qumran Cave 7, which, if true, would yield a date around the same time. O'Callaghan's argument has convinced few. More intriguing is the suggestion that the “abomination that causes desolation” (Mk 13:14) refers to the decision of Caligula (r. 37–41) to erect a statue of himself in the holy place of the Jerusalem *temple (see Apocalypticism and Apocalyptic Teaching). If so, then

Mark could not have been written as early as 40, months before the assassination of Caligula in January of 41. The problem here is that Mark 13:14 seems to be too slim a rudder on which to turn the ship of Mark's dating; besides, other ways of explaining the verse are regarded as equally if not more likely.

Here the important issue is the conflicting patristic evidence, which needs to be critically weighed. Even if we admit the patristic evidence connecting Mark with Peter, we are still forced to choose between two lines of tradition, one vouching that the Gospel was written while Peter was still alive, and the other affirming that it was composed only after his martyrdom. In the view of many, the latter tradition is to be preferred. It makes sense that the Gospel being connected with a living Peter (as opposed to merely the memory of Peter) developed over time, motivated by pious, wishful thinking. Moreover, Mark's vision of a worldwide *mission to the *Gentiles (Mk 13:10; 14:9) makes better sense after the Jerusalem Council (49) than before it. Though perhaps underrated as a serious option, for understandable reasons, the decade of the 40s has commanded little support in contemporary discussion.

2.4.2. 50s. A few others are inclined to situate Mark's Gospel in the 50s. This argument generally follows from (1) a commitment to the two-source hypothesis, which entails Luke's dependence on Mark (see Synoptic Problem); (2) a judgment that Luke (on the basis of Acts 24) should be dated no later than Paul's first Roman imprisonment (early 60s); and (3) an assumption that Luke's use of Mark requires a lead time of at least several years. None of these isolated points alone is unreasonable, although most scholars are disinclined to support such an early dating for Luke-Acts. Given the probative weight of alternative dating scenarios, most commentators do not see the 50s as a viable option.

2.4.3. 60s. Seemingly the most commonly taken path is to ascribe Mark to the 60s, usually the late 60s, a year or two before the destruction of the temple in 70. The reasons for this ascription are several. First, if we take seriously Peter's connection with Mark's Gospel, and surmise too that Mark was written at Rome after Peter's martyrdom, this makes excellent sense on several counts. First, although Christians at Rome undoubtedly faced persecutions of various sorts since the time of the church's founding there, it is above all during or just after the Neronian persecution (64–68) that issues of suffering and theodicy must have loomed largest. One meets exactly the same concerns in Mark (Mk 4:16–17; 6:4; 10:28–30, 39; 13:5–23). Second, Peter's close connection with Rome in the 60s also clarifies his central role in Mark's narrative. In a setting where many Romans must have come to confess Christ only later to succumb to the pressure of persecution, Mark offers up Peter as a model confessor (Mk 8:27–30) as well as a model apostate (Mk 14:54–72), whose hope remained in the resurrected Christ despite that apostasy (Mk 16:7) (Donahue, 17–19). Third, the stylized account of Mark 13, with its prediction of the temple's destruction and flight from the city, seems to weigh more in favor of Mark having been written before Jerusalem's doom in 70 than after it. Had Mark really reflected a post-70 perspective, one would expect the details of the eschatological discourse to line up much more neatly with what we do know of the sack of Jerusalem from the sources. On this argument, Mark 13 is no vaticinium ex eventu ("prophecy out of the event"), but rather a prediction of the temple's future based on commonsense foresight and a scripturally based logic underwritten by various scriptural images.

2.4.4. 70s. For those who see Mark 13 as providing an all-too-clear reflection of the events of 70, the early years of the 70s remains attractive. Two items in particular tend to nudge champions of a late Mark in this direction: (1) Jesus' mention that "no stone would be left on another" (Mk 13:2), which turned out to be the case in actuality (Josephus, J.W. 7.379); and (2) the reference to the "abomination that causes desolation" (Mk 13:14), arguably a compelling description of the Roman soldiers erecting their standards in the eastern court of the temple (Josephus, J.W. 6.316). Here hermeneutical questions arise as to whether the biblical allusions bound up in these verses provide an adequate alternative explanation to a solution that sees Mark here as recalling reports of the event.

3. Theological Themes and Messages.

Although the Gospel of Mark naturally shares many of the themes developed in the other Gospels, particularly Matthew and Luke, the Markan evangelist has a distinctive agenda. Unless he composed his work in complete isolation, one must imagine that this agenda was driven in part by the situational needs of his audience. At the same time, being among the first to write the Jesus story, he likely would have thought of his task as transcending the immediate concerns of his target audience. In this case, one might expect the evangelist's purpose to include both addressing the immediate theological crises of his initial hearers and laying the theological groundwork for the burgeoning movement as it continued to expand across the Mediterranean world. With this in mind, it is possible to discern at least three central interests: community self-definition, *Christology and mission.

3.1. Community Self-Definition. As early as the programmatic verses of Mark 1:1-3, offering a quotation of Isaiah 40:3 with intimations also of Malachi 3:1 and Exodus 23:20 (see Marcus 1992b, 12-47), the astute reader will detect that prospects of a new community are at hand. It is a community that stands to benefit from, and perhaps participate in, the realization of Isaiah 40, which envisages return from *exile. According to Isaiah, Yahweh would deliver his people from the curse of exile by leading them on the “way”; now, by quoting Isaiah, Mark implicitly announces that Israel’s God was forging a new movement, one that would realize a new and decisive return from exile. By the same logic, once the exile was reversed, God would become king in the fullest sense, and the kingdom would be established (Mk 1:15). This newly formed community, constituted through the preaching of Jesus, would coincide with, but remain distinct from, the reality of the kingdom (Mk 4:1-34).

These would also be the people of “the way,” as evident in the central “way” section (Mk 8:22—10:46). Here Mark’s Jesus begins to elucidate just what it means to be “on the way” and what kind of person belongs to this movement, which by Mark’s time was called “the way” (Acts 9:2; 19:9). In short, it is those who are willing to follow Jesus in the path of suffering of self-denial. It is a way on which personal ambition (Mk 9:33-37), competition (Mk 9:38-41), impurity (Mk 9:42—10:12), socioeconomic attachments (Mk 10:13-31) and power (Mk 10:35-44) are either renounced or radically redefined. Those who wish to join this way must come as blind Bartimaeus does, as one who calls out for Jesus “beside the way” (para tēn hodon) (Mk 10:46), only to have sight restored in order to follow him “on the way” (en tē hodō) (Mk 10:52). The evangelist saw the current day as an era of exile, but it was an exile now ceding ground to the inbreaking kingdom, as signified by a new community with new ethical standards.

For Mark, there is also a cultic aspect to the community identity, for, as the allusion to Malachi 3 in Mark 1:2-3 intimates, this new people will take up their newly assigned role as *priests, properly purified and installed to offer right offerings to Yahweh (cf. Mal 3:1-4). Such an ushering in of a new priesthood inevitably involves an eclipse of the existing temple order operative under the current temple authorities. In Mark, all of this begins to take shape through the cleansing of the temple (Mk 11:12-19), the parabolic denunciation of the regnant priesthood (Mk 12:1-12), the transposition of temple sacrifices into an ethic of *love (Mk 12:28-35), predictions of the destruction of the current temple (Mk 13:1-31), the inauguration of a new temple economy through a new covenant (Mk 14:12-26) and then finally the rending of the temple veil (Mk 15:38-39) (Gray; Heil). Inasmuch as Mark has a strong interest in this cultic conflict, he is calling on community members not just to uphold a higher norm of behavior, but also to function as the gatekeepers and servants of a new temple order.

Finally, in keeping with hints of Exodus 23:20 in Mark 1:2-3, Mark suggests that Jesus is also launching a new exodus. In its context, Exodus 23:20 speaks of the *angel who will go before Israel as it moves forward with the exodus, and it is no coincidence that the reader of Mark does not get very far before encountering a broad variety of exodus images. Even as Moses stretched out his once-leprous hand as validation of his calling (Ex 4:6-7), now Jesus stretches out his hand to the leper (Mk 1:40-45). Upon healing the paralytic so “that you might know that the Son of Man has authority” (Mk 2:10), Mark’s Jesus mimics Moses, who in his time performed miracles “so that you [Pharaoh] might know” (Ex 9:14) that there is none like Yahweh. Jesus breaks up into groups the masses who follow him into the desert (Mk 6:20-44), just as Moses did (Ex 16; 18). Lastly, when Jesus “passes before” the disciples on the water and says, “It is I!” (Mk 6:45-56), this is straightforwardly a recapitulation of the moment when Yahweh walked on the water before Israel (Ex 14) and revealed himself as the “I AM,” later more fully “passing before” Moses (Ex 33:19). These are but a sampling of episodes that draw on exodus images (Bowman; Swartley; Watts). So, then, Jesus is both Moses and Yahweh, but in a new cosmic order. As the leader of the new exodus, Christ has also brought about the moment of spiritual, political and socioeconomic liberation. Mark intends for his readers to be clear: those who take part in this movement initiated by Jesus are participating in nothing less than the final realization of God’s redemptive purposes for Israel and the world.

3.2. Christology. Whatever Mark’s interest in helping the early Christian community as it came to terms with its self-identity, he is equally eager to show that Jesus is the Messiah (see Christ). Before anything else, he announces that his story essentially is “the gospel of Jesus Christ”—that is, “the gospel of Jesus the Messiah” (Mk 1:1). But as the evangelist’s readers would quickly discover, Jesus proved to be something other than the kind of messiah that Israel was looking for. In fact, Mark fully understood that the messiahship according to his Jesus was decidedly unlike anything anyone was looking for.

In some sense, the story that the Gospel writer recounts has all the marks of a “messianic story,” at least as it might have been commonly told in his context. As John appears on the scene wearing *Elijah’s garb (Mk 1:6; cf. 2 Kings 1:8), the reader suspects (especially in light of the quotation of Mal 3:1 in Mk 1:2) that this might be the anticipated Elijahan forerunner of the messiah (see Faierstein). But the disciples would have been confused about this identification as time went on. Certainly, if the disciples had thought that John was the promised Elijah redivivus, they would have had second thoughts following John’s rather bizarre death at the hands of *Herod (Mk 6:14-29). Surely, so they must have thought, just as Elijah overcame the forces of darkness in his day, the new Elijah could not meet such a humiliating demise. Nonetheless, Jesus insists, “Elijah has come, and they did to him whatever they pleased, as it is written about him” (Mk 9:13). And if the disciples were bewildered in the case of John, it made even less sense that Jesus the Messiah would have to suffer and die (Mk 8:31-32). Jesus’ ideas about messiahship seemed to be just the opposite of what the disciples and Israel as a whole had been expecting.

Of course, this is at the heart of Mark’s point. He wants to demonstrate that Jesus is a kind of upside-down messiah, or more precisely, a right-side-up messiah faced with an upside-down world. Eager to hammer this point home, the evangelist skillfully draws together the contrasting threads of two incompatible ideologies. It was widely expected in Judaism that the messiah would be welcomed by the ruling leadership of Israel. But when Jesus comes preaching the kingdom, it is only demons that recognize who he is (Mk 1:23-24, 34; 5:7); meanwhile, the religious authorities reject him (Mk 2:1-3:6). Whereas Israel’s leaders expect the messiah to drive out Satan, it is, ironically enough, these same authorities who accuse Jesus of colluding with Satan; it is also an accusation that his own family also takes up (Mk 3:20-35). If Israel’s expected messiah was to be received with celebration, this Messiah is mocked (Mk 5:40, 15:31). If Israel’s expected messiah was to be tasked with conquering the Gentiles, this Messiah is received by the Gentiles (Mk 7:24-30). Expectations are consistently inverted.

Following Peter’s confession of Jesus’ messiahship (Mk 8:27-30), Jesus dedicates himself to clarifying the nature of his messianic calling (e.g., Mk 10:45), even as he attempts to describe the nature of discipleship. With this in mind, Mark’s Jesus enters Jerusalem for the last time (Mk 11:1), where he seeks to reveal himself as the promised messiah (Mk 11:1-11) and thus as the one who would destroy (and presumably rebuild) the temple (Mk 11:12-19; cf. Mk 12:10; 14:58; 15:29), a uniquely messianic task. Of course, Jesus’ awareness of his own messianic identity surfaces repeatedly, if not obliquely, when he refers to himself as the “Son of Man” (2:10, 28; 8:31, 38, etc.), and then finally and more explicitly before Caiaphas as the transcendent, Danielic Son of Man (Mk 14:61-62). Eventually, Jesus is arrested on the basis of this messianic claim, mocked as the Messiah (Mk 15:16-20), and then crucified as the Messiah (Mk 15:25-32). In being raised from death (Mk 16:1-8), he is vindicated as that which he claimed to be: the Messiah (cf. Rom 1:3-4).

Mark’s Christology goes a long way toward explaining the kind of people who come to follow Jesus, as well as the kind of people who come to reject him. As for those who follow, the narrative is crowded with unlikely and peripheral characters: an erstwhile demoniac (Mk 5:20); a Syrophoenician woman (Mk 7:29); blind Bartimaeus calling out for the *Son of David (Mk 10:47); an anonymous woman who anoints Jesus at Bethany (Mk 14:1-9); and a Roman centurion (Mk 15:39), the embodiment of Gentile oppression and power. Meanwhile, the rejection of Jesus at the hands of Israel’s leadership is conspicuous. But those who oppose Jesus do so because of their misguided commitments and idolatries, as is borne out by the parable of the sower (Mk 4:1-20), which functions as a kind of interpretive key for the Gospel as a whole (Tolbert, 129-75). For Mark, hard-heartedness not only explains Israel’s rejection of its messiah, but also proves to be a constantly menacing threat to the faithfulness of believers (as witnessed in Peter’s denial in Mk 14:66-72; cf. Mk 6:52; 8:17). If Jesus is rejected as messiah, it is through no fault of his own; it is on account of human moral failure. And the way past human failure is the path of following Jesus. Whereas those aspiring to the kingdom are to be characterized by certain qualities, those qualities find supreme and unique expression in King Jesus. Mark’s Christology is inextricably bound up in the practice of following Jesus.

3.3. Mission. Mark is also deeply interested in *mission. So too is Mark’s Jesus, a point that the disciples are rather slow to pick up on and even slower to imitate. This becomes clear on following Jesus’ movements back and forth across the Sea of Galilee, the “other side” of which represents Gentile territory (Iverson). On Mark’s account, those who are in geographical proximity to Jesus are generally unresponsive (Mk 3:31-35; 6:1-6), but those who are distant respond in dramatic ways (Mk 3:8; 5:1-20; 7:24-30). Similarly, Jesus’ compassion in feeding the four thousand Gentiles (Mk 8:3) contrasts decidedly with the disciples’ indifference. On one interpretation of the difficult passage Mark 8:14-21, it is the Twelve’s animosity toward the Gentiles that explains their “forgetting” to take *bread along with them, since in the disciples’ minds no more bread meant no more feedings for the Gentiles. At any rate, their hearts were hardened, and they willfully failed to understand that their task as Israel’s new shepherds coincided with a reconfiguration of *Israel (Mk 8:17-21). As the seed parables of Mark 4 should have made clear, a favorable response to God depended not on ethnicity, but rather on the condition of the heart (Mk 4:1-20); the eschatological moment of the Gentile “birds” coming in to take shade in the kingdom (Mk 4:30-32) was already at hand. But even then the disciples, in their ethnocentricity, had become inwardly resistant. This obstinacy finds expression in the subsequent stilling of the storm (Mk 4:35-41), with its parallels to the story of Jonah, reluctant prophet to the Gentiles.

The theme of mission continues to play out in the final chapters of Mark. When Jesus cleanses the temple (see Temple Act), he claims that he does so because the temple was not fulfilling its role to be a “house of prayer for all nations” (Mk 11:17; cf. Is 56:7). In his eschatological discourse Jesus admonishes his disciples that when the tribulation comes, they are to stand firm as witnesses until the gospel is preached “to all the nations” (Mk 13:9-11). This is consistent with Jesus’ earlier promise: “For those who want to save their life will lose it, and those who lose their life for my sake, and for the sake of the gospel, will save it” (Mk 8:35). On being *anointed at Bethany, Jesus predicts that this anointing will be recounted “wherever the good news is proclaimed in the whole world” (Mk 14:9). As his hour draws nigh, Jesus has his eye on the mission to the nations.

The evangelist was, of course, fully aware that this same mission was not without significant cost. It was a cost that Jesus countenanced and was willing to pay (Mk 10:45); it was a cost that the disciples only dimly understood (Mk 10:38), as becomes clear during Jesus’ trial. Jesus testifies (Mk 14:62; 15:2), and the result is condemnation; Peter, as representative of the disciples, disowns Jesus (Mk 14:66-72), and the result is the “saving” of his own life. Once again, the disciples fail; they fail to carry out the basic activity of mission, which is witness.

Still, human failure cannot frustrate God’s purposes. As Jesus expires, the temple curtain is torn; the once-restricted holy space was now going out to the nations (Mk 15:38). Immediately, a Roman centurion confesses (Mk 15:39) to that which was stated at the beginning (Mk 1:1, 11): this man Jesus is the Son of God. Indeed, Jesus is the Son of God for the nations. This may have more than a little to do with the last command of Mark’s Gospel, which requires the women at the tomb to go to the Galilee (Mk 16:7), Galilee of the Gentiles (Is 9:1), the frontier in which Jesus’ ministry was first inaugurated (Mk 1:9).

There is no small irony in the fact that the women at the tomb fail (at least for the moment) to respond to their instructions to go to Galilee and tell the disciples about the risen Christ (Mk 16:4-8; cf. Mk 9:9). Up to this point, Jesus has found both humans and demons uncooperative in keeping his messianic identity a secret (e.g., Mk 1:23-25, 34, 43-45; 3:11-12), but once it is time to proclaim him as the Messiah (Mk 9:9), the first witnesses of the *resurrection balk at the idea. So Mark ends on a note of human failure, a failure to carry forward the mission due to fear. Writing to a persecuted church, the author knew that many would find themselves, much like the women at the tomb, tempted to remain silent in the face of powerful opposition. Mark’s readers were not alone and now they were called to follow those who had gone before, most of all, Jesus Christ himself.

4. Conclusion.

Holding forth the “mystery of the kingdom,” the Gospel of Mark indeed remains fraught with mystery on a number of levels. Historically, its authorship, dating and geographical origins continue to be matters of debate. Theologically, Mark’s readers are constrained to grapple with the grandest of ironies: even through humanity’s very attempt to reject decisively God’s saving purposes in Jesus Christ, God saw fit to bring those purposes to their full and proper conclusion. Furthermore, if the powerbrokers of Mark’s day had their own vision of a properly ordered cosmos, a vision implemented and maintained by means of raw power, Mark’s Jesus offers a sharply contrasting counterproposal. That counterproposal continues to speak to the Mark’s present-day hearers, challenging us and cutting at the core of our radically self-interested agenda.

See also APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC

TEACHING; CHRISTOLOGY; DEATH OF JESUS; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; EXILE AND RESTORATION; GOSPEL: GOOD NEWS; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; SYNOPTIC PROBLEM; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: A. Y. Collins, Mark: A Commentary (Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); J. R. Donahue and D. J. Harrington, The Gospel of Mark (SP 2; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2002); J. R. Edwards, Mark (PNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Leicester: Apollos, 2002); C. A. Evans, Mark 8:27-16:20 (WBC 34B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001); R. T. France, The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster, 2002); R. H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); M. D. Hooker, The Gospel According to St. Mark (BNTC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993); J. Marcus, Mark 1—8 (AYB; New Haven: Yale University Press, 2000); idem, Mark 9-16 (AYB; New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009); B. Witherington III, The Gospel of Mark: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001). Studies: E. Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1953); R. Bauckham, ed., The Gospels for all Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); M. A. Beavis, Mark's Audience: The Literary and Social Setting of Mark 4.11-12 (JSNTSup 33; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989); G. G. Bilezikian, The Liberated Gospel: A Comparison of the Gospel of Mark and Greek Tragedy (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1977); C. C. Black, Mark: Images of an Apostolic Interpreter (SPNT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); J. Bowman, The Gospel of Mark: The New Christian Jewish Passover Haggadah (StPB 8; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1965); C. Bryan, A Preface to Mark: Notes on the Gospel in Its Literary and Cultural Settings (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993); R. A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography (SNTSMS 70; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992; 2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); J. Camery-Hoggatt, Irony in Mark's Gospel: Text and Subtext (SNTSMS 72; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); P. Carrington, The Primitive Christian Calendar: A Study in the Making of the Marcan Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1952); N. C. Croy, The Mutilation of Mark's Gospel (Nashville: Abingdon, 2003); J. Dewey, "Mark as Interwoven Tapestry: Forecasts and Echoes for a Listening Audience," CBQ 53 (1991) 221-36; J. A. Diehl, "What Is a 'Gospel'? Recent Studies in the Gospel Genre," CurBS 2 (2011) 171-99; J. R. Donahue, "Windows and Mirrors: The Setting of Mark's Gospel," CBQ 57 (1995) 1-26; M. M. Faierstein, "Why Do the Scribes Say That Elijah Must Come First?" JBL 100 (1981) 75-86; R. M. Fowler, Let the Reader Understand: Reader-Response Criticism and the Gospel of Mark (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); B. Godawa, Word Pictures: Knowing God Through Story and Imagination (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2009); M. D. Goulder, The Evangelists' Calendar: A Lectionary Explanation of the Development of Scripture (London: SPCK, 1978); T. C. Gray, The Temple in the Gospel of Mark: A Study in Its Narrative Role (WUNT 2/168; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); J. P. Heil, "The Narrative Strategy and Pragmatics of the Temple Theme in Mark," CBQ 59 (1997) 76-100; M. Hengel, Studies in the Gospel of Mark, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); M. D. Hooker, Beginnings: Keys That Open the Gospels (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997); idem, Endings: Invitations to Discipleship (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2003); R. A. Horsley, Hearing the Whole Story: The Politics of Plot in Mark's Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); B. J. Incigneri, The Gospel to the Romans: The Setting and Rhetoric of Mark's Gospel (BibInt 65; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); K. R. Iverson, Gentiles in the Gospel of Mark: Even the Dogs Under the Table Eat the Children's Crumbs (LNTS 339; London: T & T Clark, 2007); H. C. Kee, Community of the New Age: Studies in Mark's Gospel (London: SCM, 1977); W. H. Kelber, The Kingdom in Mark: A New Place and a New Time (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); K. W. Larsen, "The Structure of Mark's Gospel: Current Proposals," CurBS 3 (2004) 140-60; D. R. MacDonald, The Homeric Epics and the Gospel of Mark (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000); E. S. Malbon, In the Company of Jesus: Characters in Mark's Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); J. Marcus, "The Jewish War and the Sitz im Leben of Mark," JBL 111 (1992a) 441-62; idem, The Way of the Lord: Christological Exegesis of the Old Testament in the Gospel of Mark (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992b); idem, "Crucifixion as Parodic Exaltation," JBL 125 (2006) 73-87; W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist: Studies on the Redaction History of the Gospel, trans. J. Boyce et al. (Nashville: Abingdon, 1969); C. Myers, Binding the Strong Man: A Political Reading of Mark's Story of Jesus (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1988); J. O'Callaghan,

"New Testament Papyri in Qumran Cave 7," JBL 91 (1972) 1-14; N. Perrin, "Towards an Interpretation of the Gospel of Mark," in Christology and a Modern Pilgrimage: A Discussion with Norman Perrin, ed. H. D. Betz (rev. ed.; Missoula, MT: Society of Biblical Literature and Scholars Press, 1974) 1-78; D. N. Peterson, The Origins of Mark: The Markan Community in Current Debate (BIS 48; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000); J. A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1976); R. L. Rohrbaugh, "The Social Location of the Markan Audience," Int 47 (1993) 380-95; H. C. Roskam, The Purpose of the Gospel of Mark in Its Historical and Social Context (NovTSup 114; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); S. H. Smith, "A Divine Tragedy: Some Observations on the Dramatic Structure of Mark's Gospel," NovT 37 (1995) 209-31; G. Stanton, Jesus and Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); W. M. Swartley, Israel's Scripture Traditions and the Synoptic Gospels: Story Shaping Story (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); G. Theissen, The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition, trans. L. M. Maloney (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); M. A. Tolbert, Sowing the Gospel: Mark's World in Literary-Historical Perspective. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); M. E. Vines, The Problem of Markan Genre: The Gospel of Mark and the Jewish Novel (SBLAB 3; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); R. E. Watts, Isaiah's New Exodus in Mark (WUNT 2/88; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997); A. Winn, The Purpose of Mark's Gospel: An Early Christian Response to Roman Imperial Propaganda (WUNT 2/245; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig (LTT; Cambridge: James Clarke, 1971 [1901]).

N. Perrin

MARKAN PRIORITY. See SYNOPTIC TRADITION.

MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS

Mary the Mother of Jesus is mentioned either by name or by title in all four of the canonical Gospels, as well as once in Paul and once in Acts. Within the Gospels, scholars frequently detect a relatively negative portrayal of the mother of Jesus in Mark, generally considered to be the earliest Gospel, which becomes modified into a more positive depiction in Matthew, Luke and John.

1. The Gospel of Mark
2. The Gospel of Matthew
3. The Gospel of Luke
4. The Gospel of John
5. Conclusion

1. The Gospel of Mark.

In the Gospel of Mark the first appearance of the mother of Jesus occurs during his public ministry when his mother and brothers come seeking him (Mk 3:30-35). When Jesus is notified of this, he identifies those listening to him as his mother and brothers, and the narrative concludes with an apothegm: "Whoever does the will of God is my brother and sister and mother" (NRSV). Is this a rejection of Jesus' physical family, or could it simply be a statement that physical family relationships are no guarantee of membership in Jesus' eschatological *family?

The larger context of Mark 3:19-29 must be considered in deciding how best to understand Jesus' words in Mark 3:30-35. In Mark 3:19b-21, after the calling of the Twelve (see Apostle), Jesus apparently returns home to Capernaum, where either "his own" (hoi par' autou) or "the crowd" ([ho] ochlos) attempt to take hold of him because "they" were saying, "He has gone out of his mind." "His own" could refer to Jesus' family or to his disciples, and "they" could either mean the same group designated as "his own" or members of the crowd (see People, Crowd). If the family members of Jesus were simply attempting to rescue him from the crowd, their concern would be contrasted with the harshly negative attitude of the *scribes from Jerusalem in Mark 3:22-29. If the family members believe that Jesus is out of his mind, then their judgment of him is perhaps less hostile than that of the scribes, but nonetheless they are not being portrayed as members of his eschatological family. Most scholars understand Mark to be depicting the mother and brothers of Jesus in a negative sense.

Scholars disagree whether the reference to Jesus as the son of Mary in Mark 6:3 is derogatory. Most note that this reference implies Jesus' illegitimacy. In any case, the climactic saying of Jesus in Mark 6:4, "Prophets are not without honor, except . . . among their own kin, and in their own house," does not reflect positively on the mother (or brothers) of Jesus.

2. The Gospel of Matthew.

In Matthew's Gospel Mary is mentioned first in Jesus' *genealogy (Mt 1:16). A number of scholars interpret the mention of the other four women in the genealogy (identified as women marked by irregular marital unions who were part of God's plan) as a means of drawing attention to Mary as an instrument par excellence of God's providence. M. D'Angelo suggests that the ultimate purpose of including the other four women is probably to defend Mary, who is mysteriously pregnant before cohabiting with Joseph. From a pastoral perspective, S. McKnight reflects on the dangerous reality that a pregnant woman in Mary's situation would have faced and portrays her as a model of faith (McKnight, 2007). B. Gaventa suggests a further similarity between Mary and the other women in Matthew's genealogy: all of them are a threat to David's line, and are themselves threatened (Gaventa 1995). Mary's primary role is to accomplish the prophecy of Matthew 1:23 in line with the ruling principle of Matthew's Gospel: the portrayal of Jesus as the fulfillment of Scripture.

Outside the infancy narrative, the references to Mary in Matthew's Gospel occur during the ministry and are parallels to Mark 3:30-35; 6:1-6 (Mt 12:46-50; 13:53-58). Most scholars who comment on these passages do point out that Matthew omits the negative reference to the family of Jesus, though some (e.g., Donahue and Harrington; Meier) place more emphasis on the fact that Jesus is stressing that physical kinship is not the important relationship in terms of the kingdom. W. Davies and D. Allison point out the modifications in Matthew's version that place the mother (and brothers) of Jesus in a more favorable light, and they also comment on the necessity of reading the later two passages in terms of the way Matthew has portrayed Mary in the first two chapters of his Gospel (see Birth of Jesus).

3. The Gospel of Luke.

The author of Luke's Gospel depicts Mary the mother of Jesus in a much more positive light. In the infancy narrative she is the highly favored one (Lk 1:28) who replies to the announcement of the *angel with complete acceptance. She is blessed among women because she has believed what was spoken to her by the Lord (Lk 1:42, 45), and the declaration of her blessedness and her believing is placed on the lips of Elizabeth, the first character in Luke's Gospel to recognize Jesus as "my Lord" (Lk 1:43). The translation "Here am I, the slave of the Lord" (Lk 1:38) (Gaventa 1995) highlights Mary's wholehearted response to the announcement of Gabriel. Gaventa sees Mary as *disciple, prophet and mother, whose final appearance in Acts, where she is gathered with the faithful disciples after the *resurrection, resolves the somewhat ambiguous portrayal of her within the Gospel after the infancy narrative section.

J. Green argues that in its presentation of Mary in the birth narrative Luke's Gospel only appears to mimic the social and cultural dimensions of the ancient Mediterranean world; accordingly, those cultural norms are overturned when status is redefined in relation to the household of God: "Not least in this way, the portrait of Mary in Luke 1,5-2,42 portends the nature of salvation and the norms of the community of God's people to be developed more fully subsequently in Luke-Acts" (Green 1992, 471). Elsewhere, Green views Mary not simply as an exemplary disciple, but rather as an "accessible exemplar" whose presentation within Luke 1-2 invites the reader to ponder with her, to rethink and re-imagine what it means to be people of God, and thus to become open to "a way of perceiving the world and life in it that runs counter to the world of normal perception" (Green 2002, 18). T. Seim likewise argues that the Spirit reverses social status in Luke-Acts. B. Wilson points out a particular overturning of perspectives in the radical disjuncture between Mary and her predecessors Jael and Judith: "Like Mary, believers are to hear and act on the message of peace proclaimed by the fruit of her womb—Jesus the Christ, the prince of peace" (Wilson, 456).

At several points, Luke creates interesting gender parallels with Mary and a male figure. Within the infancy narrative Mary, the lowly Jewish maiden who is declared blessed because she has believed, is contrasted with Zechariah, the priest who is chided by the angel for his lack of belief (Lk 1:20). Like Zechariah, Mary proclaims the greatness of the Lord, who brings down the powerful and lifts up the lowly, who saves God's people from their enemies and from the hands of those who hate them. In another pairing, perhaps an intentional frame for the birth and death of Jesus, Mary wraps the infant in swaddling clothes and lays him in a borrowed manger because there is no room in the guest room (Lk 2:7); after Jesus' death, Joseph of Arimathea takes Jesus' body, wraps it in a linen cloth, and lays it in a previously unused tomb (Lk 24:53) (see Burial of Jesus). Luke shows how Jesus can bring blessings to the socially and religiously prominent as well as the poor, how he can bring them together in a new kind of family that transcends physical ties, and Mary is a prominent character in this depiction.

Zechariah, Joseph of Arimathea and Mary the mother of Jesus learn to mature in *faith, but Mary, at a much earlier age (in terms of the narrative), seems to recognize the need for such growth. The greeting of the angel perplexes her, so she reflects on it (Lk 1:29), listens attentively to what the angel says, and replies with her statement of faithful submission to God's plan. B. Reid has suggested that Mary might have been troubled because great demands are made on those who find favor with God. After hearing the report of the angel's annunciation to the shepherds that her son will be Savior, Messiah and Lord (Lk 2:19), she treasures the words and ponders them. Nonetheless, though warned by Simeon that a sword will pierce her soul, she is distraught when the twelve-year-old Jesus is missing and does not understand when he tells her he must be about his Father's business; but again, "His mother treasured all these things in her heart" (Lk 2:41-52).

Thus, when Mary appears, or fails to appear, at several points in Jesus' ministry, particularly the two episodes in which she seems unfavorably depicted in Mark, Luke has, much more strongly than Matthew, prepared the reader to understand that Mary clearly belongs to Jesus' eschatological family.

In Luke's version of the logion of Jesus on membership in his eschatological family (Lk 8:19-21) both the form and context of the saying have been altered compared to what is found in Mark 3:20-35. Luke explains that Jesus' mother and brothers are "outside" because the large crowd makes it impossible for them to reach Jesus, thus mitigating the contrast between the family outside and those who are inside. Luke omits the question "Who are my mother and brothers?" as well as Jesus' gesture of looking at the disciples before stating, "My mother and my brothers are those who hear the word of God and do it." Upon being informed that his family is outside, Jesus immediately utters a positive statement that, in the context, seems most clearly to refer to his mother and brothers. Like Matthew, Luke has completely omitted the preceding passage in Mark about Jesus being out of his mind and has moved the Beelzebul controversy to another place. In addition, he has the parable of the sower and seed precede Luke 8:19-21, so that the family of Jesus can be taken as illustrations of the seed that has fallen on good soil.

The final reference to the mother of Jesus within the Gospel of Luke, the macarism of Luke 11:27-28, is unique to Luke's Gospel. While some scholars detect a contrast between the saying of the woman and the logion of Jesus, J. Fitzmyer and others point out that the sense of the particle menoun, usually translated as "rather," can mean either "no, rather" or "yes, but even more," and they opt for the second possibility. They therefore insist that this passage must be read in the light of Elizabeth's declaration that Mary is blessed not simply because she has physically given birth to Jesus, but because she has believed. Mary appears one last time in Acts, where she is numbered together with the disciples and others, about 120 altogether, who remained in Jerusalem after Jesus' ascension, unified in prayer.

4. The Gospel of John.

In the Fourth Gospel the mother of Jesus is mentioned in three places: the Cana narrative and transitional verse immediately following (Jn 2:1-11, 12), a brief reference in Jn 6:42, and the scene at the foot of the cross (Jn 19:25-27). Gaventa takes issue with Protestant interpretations of John 19:25-27 that presume Jesus' emotional attachment and devotion to his mother, as well as Catholic interpretations that regard the mother of Jesus as a symbol of the church; rather, she suggests a contrasting emphasis in comparing the portrayal of Mary in the Cana narrative and in the crucifixion scene (Gaventa 2002). She points out three roles of the mother of Jesus in the Cana story. In terms of the plot, the mother of Jesus sets the stage for the transformation of water into wine. However, to balance the notion that Jesus only had a kind of docetic existence, a notion that might be inferred from the prologue of this Gospel, the interaction of Jesus with his mother affirms his humanness: "Commentators sometimes assert that the Cana miracle separates Jesus from his mother, yet it is also true that the Cana miracle and the passage that precedes it invest Jesus with a human mother and father and brothers and home" (Gaventa 2002, 49). Finally, her request and Jesus' response anticipate the "hour" of the crucifixion. However, in the crucifixion narrative, "When Jesus' mother and the Beloved Disciple are given to one another and depart the scene, Jesus' connections to earthly existence likewise depart from John's gospel. Her role in this incident, then, has to do with Jesus' separation from his earthly life. . . . Yet perhaps something more can be said about Mary's very presence at the cross. If the mother of Jesus is not a sign of Jesus' devotion to family or a symbol for the church, she may nevertheless instruct readers about the place of believers at the cross. By contrast with Peter's denial of Jesus, his mother and her companions serve as the first witnesses to the fulfillment of Jesus' prophecy that he would be 'lifted up' (John 3:14; 8:28; 12:32)" (Gaventa 2002, 50).

Finally, it might be fruitful to further consider the comment about the mother of Jesus in John 6:42 as a possible link between the Cana narrative and the scene at the foot of the cross. While this comment seems to refer only in passing to the mother of Jesus, one of its purposes, from a narrative standpoint, may be to draw attention to the fact that those who claim to "know" the mother of Jesus do not really understand her, any more than they "know" his father, any more than the darkness grasps the light. The Fourth Gospel has a Jewish flavor, and "to know” had many layers of meaning in ancient Israel. Who the mother of Jesus is will become known at the foot of the cross, where she is challenged far more strongly than at Cana to display unequivocal trust in her son’s word. At the foot of the cross she does not speak, but her earlier response, and the clue that she is not really “known” in John 6:42, from a narrative standpoint could indicate that her trust has grown so strong that she does not need to voice any request.

5. Conclusion.

The Gospel of Mark, generally considered to be the earliest Gospel, seems to present the least favorable view of the mother of Jesus, though how unfavorable that view is depends on how one interprets Mark 3:19b-21. There seems to be some indication of differing views regarding the mother of Jesus in the pre-Markan tradition. The suggestion that the treatment of Mary in this Gospel is reflective of the disorientation, but also reorientation, of family life that occurred among those who first heard the Christian message and were challenged by it is apropos (Johnson). However, there is no certainty about the way the mother of Jesus was regarded during the ministry of Jesus.

It seems clear that the author of Matthew’s Gospel has deliberately modified the most offensive references in Mark, and the portrayal of Mary in the first two chapters of Matthew’s Gospel is generally viewed as positive and perhaps as an indication that in an earlier, even pre-Markan, period the virginal conception of Jesus was accepted, and thus Mary was highly regarded. The author of Luke-Acts has gone even further in modifying the offensive passages in Mark, and within the infancy narratives the author has declared Mary blessed because she has believed. She is also portrayed as growing in understanding because she takes time to ponder the way God has entered her life; in addition, just as the Holy Spirit comes upon Mary in the conception of Jesus, Mary and the Holy Spirit are present at the “birth” of the church depicted in Acts. Some regard this as an indication that she was highly regarded within the church at or before the time of the composition of Luke-Acts.

In the Gospel of John, as in Luke, though she appears in only two scenes and elsewhere is mentioned but once, Mary is portrayed as at least a believer who grows in faith. Gaventa contends that the portrayal of Mary in the Gospel of John can be a corrective to a Protestant tendency to relegate Mary to the frequently sentimental emphasis on the infancy narratives: “Considering Matthew and Luke in light of John’s Gospel reveals that . . . the others foreshadow the cross with their treatment of Mary even at Jesus’ birth. . . . Theologically this connection between Mary and the cross reinforces the scandal of the gospel, that is, the scandal of God’s Son enduring humiliation, rejection, and death at human hands. Not only did Jesus’ birth necessitate explanation, but his death did as well” (Gaventa 2002, 47). Indeed, Mary “stands close by the cross even before her son is born” (Gaventa 2002, 53).

See also BIRTH OF JESUS; FAMILY; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown et al., eds., Mary in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); M. R. D’Angelo, “(Re)Presentations of Women in the Gospel of Matthew and Luke-Acts,” in Women and Christian Origins, ed. R. S. Kraemer and M. R. D’Angelo (New York: University Press, 1999), 171-95; W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison Jr., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to St. Matthew (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988-1991); J. R. Donahue and S. J. Harrington, The Gospel of Mark (SP 2; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2002); J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke (2 vols.; AB 28, 28A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981-1985); B. R. Gaventa, Mary: Glimpses of the Mother of Jesus (Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1995); idem, “All Generations Will Call Me Blessed’: Mary in Biblical and Ecumenical Perspective,” PSB 18 (1997) 250-261; repr. in A Feminist Companion to Mariology, ed. A.-J. Levine with M. M. Robbins (London: T & T Clark International, 2005) 121-29; idem, “Standing Near the Cross’: Mary and the Crucifixion of Jesus,” in Blessed One: Protestant Perspectives on Mary, ed. B. R. Gaventa and C. L. Rigby (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002) 47-56; B. R. Gaventa and C. L. Rigby, eds., Blessed One: Protestant Perspectives on Mary (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); J. B. Green, “The Social Status of Mary in Luke 1,5-2,52: A Plea for Methodological Integration,” Bib 73 (1992) 457-71; idem, “Blessed Is She Who Believed: Mary, Curious Exemplar in Luke’s Narrative,” in Blessed One: Protestant Perspectives on Mary, ed. B. R. Gaventa and C. L. Rigby (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002) 9-20; E. E. Johnson, “Who Is My Mother?’ Family Values in the Gospel of Mark,” in Blessed One: Protestant Perspectives on Mary, ed. B. R. Gaventa and C. L. Rigby (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002) 32-46; V. Koperski, “Is ‘Luke’ a Feminist or Not? Female-Male Parallels in Luke-

Acts,” in Luke and His Readers: Festschrift A. Denaux, ed. R. Bieringer, G. van Belle and J. Verheyden (BETL 182; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2005) 25-48; idem, “The Mother of Jesus and Mary Magdalen: Looking Back and Forward from the Foot of the Cross in John 19,25-27,” in The Death of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, ed. G. van Belle (BETL 200; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2007) 849-58; idem, “Mary, Blessed among Women,” TBT 47 (2009) 375-381; S. McKnight, The Real Mary: Why Evangelical Christians Embrace the Mother of Jesus (Brewster: Paraclete Press, 2007); J. P. Meier, Matthew (NTMES 3; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1980); B. E. Reid, Choosing the Better Part? Women in the Gospel of Luke (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1996); K. D. Sakenfeld, “Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and the Wife of Uriah: The Company Mary Keeps in Matthew’s Gospel,” in Blessed One: Protestant Perspectives on Mary, ed. B. R. Gaventa and C. L. Rigby (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002) 21-31; T. K. Seim, “The Virgin Mother and Ascetic Discipleship in Luke,” in A Feminist Companion to Luke, ed. A.-J. Levine and M. Blickenstaff (FCNTECW 3; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002) 89-105; B. E. Wilson, “Pugnacious Precursors and the Bearer of Peace: Jael, Judith, and Mary in Luke 1:42,” CBQ 68 (2006) 436-56. V. Koperski

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF

The Gospel of Matthew has been a favorite of the church throughout history, not least because of its accent on the teachings of Jesus. In fact, the *Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5—7) is one of the most well-known and best-loved portions of Jesus’ teachings in any Gospel. Matthew’s purpose for writing to followers of Jesus toward the end of the first century A.D. is to portray Jesus as God’s authorized Messiah (see Christ), who teaches and enacts the reign of God, and who ushers in the *kingdom through his self-giving ministry and *death. For Matthew, Jesus’ messianic identity and mission are vindicated in his *resurrection, as God gives him all *authority (Mt 28:18). The evangelist seeks to engender in his readers and hearers ongoing covenant loyalty to Jesus as well as faithfulness to the commission to “make disciples of all the nations” (Mt 28:19). Matthew indicates that Jesus’ presence provides the hope and power for his followers to carry out his *mission (Mt 1:23; 28:20).

1. Literary Features and Questions
2. Historical Issues
3. Theological Themes and Messages
4. Conclusion

1. Literary Features and Questions.

1.1. Genre. Matthew fits within the parameters of Greco-Roman biography in many ways. Recent work has demonstrated that the four Gospels cohere with genre expectations for biography in their broad strokes both in form and content (Burridge) (see Gospel: Genre), although Luke presents some unique issues regarding this classification (see Luke, Gospel of). In form, they are of the usual length of a biography, address the topic of a single person, and follow a broad chronological outline filled in with stories and topically arranged sayings. In content, they include an array of geographical settings as they follow the main character, move fairly quickly from introductory matters to the figure’s public debut, and spend considerable space narrating the death of the main character (Burridge, 185-212).

Yet all four Gospels, Matthew included, have unique features that are attributable to their Jewish context and subject matter as well as their goal of shaping the ecclesial communities for which they were written (whether these were quite narrow and specific or more broad in scope [see 2.2 below]). The pervasive use of the OT in Matthew, for example, provides a unique starting point for understanding its genre. As N. T. Wright suggests, the Gospels are “Jewish-style biographies, designed to show the quintessence of Israel’s story played out in a single life. . . . The gospels are therefore the story of Jesus told as the history of Israel in miniature” (Wright, 402). If the Gospels purport to be a continuation of Israel’s Scriptures and story, then an appropriate reading strategy attends to the ways Matthew uses OT text and stories. Matthew’s intended audience, the church, also informs the evangelist’s telling of the Jesus story. Matthew is an ecclesial document and is intended to shape the life and practices of the Gospel’s audience.

1.2. Structure. A number of proposals are suggested for Matthew’s structure, not because of a lack of structural clues but because of the abundance of such indicators. The two primary proposals follow two different repeated phrases in Matthew. The first formula occurs five times across the Gospel (Mt 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). In each case, it concludes one of Matthew’s five major discourses of Jesus’ teaching: “And it happened that when Jesus had finished [these teachings]” (kai egeneto hote etelesen ho Iêsous [tous logous toutous]). The use of this formula highlights the alternation in Matthew between narrative and discourse, with the five major sections focusing on Jesus’ teaching occurring in Matthew 5—7; 10; 13; 18; 24—25. B. Bacon highlighted the five-fold formula and suggested that, by this structure, Matthew intended to mirror the Pentateuch, with its five books. Nevertheless, most scholars who consider this fivefold formula to be the central organizing principle of Matthew do not follow the latter part of Bacon's structural proposal.

The other formula that has been suggested as an organizing frame for Matthew occurs twice (Mt 4:17; 16:21): "From that time forward, Jesus began to . . ." (apo tote êrxato ho Iêsous + infinitive). J. Kingsbury has suggested that, although less frequent than the fivefold formula, this twofold formula is primary given its narrational character (Kingsbury 1988). In other words, the temporal emphasis of this formula clearly delineates what has gone before from what follows in Matthew's story line. According to Matthew 4:17, Jesus begins to preach about the nearness of the kingdom. This proclamation sets the agenda for Jesus' entire Galilean ministry (Mt 4:17–16:20). At Matthew 16:21 the evangelist narrates that Jesus began to show his disciples the necessity of his passion, death and resurrection, which summarizes the narrative movement of the rest of the Gospel (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection).

Earlier support for a geographic outline of Matthew (e.g., Galilean ministry in Mt 4–16; journey to Jerusalem in Mt 16–20; and Jerusalem in Mt 21–28) has given way to the more narrational framing suggested by Kingsbury. D. Bauer and others have attempted to bring together both formulae in their structural proposals, but scholars typically favor one or the other for their overarching framing of Matthew. The outline below follows Kingsbury's emphasis on the twofold narrative formula, with added attention to how the discourses function within this framework. The suggested outline is heuristic for understanding the narrative pattern of Matthew's Gospel, with no presumption that Matthew wrote with this precise outline in mind. Rather, G. Stanton is likely correct that the abundance of structural markers (for additional examples, see 1.4 below) indicates the oral/aural reception of the First Gospel. Such regular and various markers assist in a communal reading of the Gospel, providing a variety of starting and stopping points for its continued public use (Stanton, 74–75).

- 1:1–4:16 Jesus' Identity and Preparation for Ministry
 - 1:1–2:23 Birth and Infancy
 - 3:1–4:16 Baptism and Temptation

- 4:17–16:20 Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom to Israel and Resulting Responses

- 4:17–11:1 Proclamation of the Kingdom in Word and Action

- 4:17–25 Summary of Jesus' Message and Ministry

- 5:1–7:29 Jesus' First Discourse: The Sermon on the Mount

- 8:1–9:38 Jesus' Enactment of the Kingdom

- 10:1–11:1 Jesus' Second Discourse: The Mission Discourse

- 11:2–16:20 Rejection by Leaders and Jesus' Withdrawal from Conflict to Ministry

- 11:2–12:50 Rejection of Jesus as Messiah by Jewish Leaders

- 13:1–53 Jesus' Third Discourse: The Parables Discourse

- 13:54–16:20 Continued Conflict and Emerging Identity

- 16:21–28:20 Jesus to Jerusalem: Kingdom Enactment through Death and Resurrection

- 16:21–20:28 Journey to the Cross and Teaching on Discipleship

- 16:21–17:27 Cross Predicted and Discipleship Defined

- 18:1–35 Jesus' Fourth Discourse: The Community Discourse

- 19:1–20:28 Nearing Jerusalem: Illustrations of Discipleship

- 20:29–25:46 Final Proclamation, Confrontation and Judgment in Jerusalem

- 20:29–22:46 Jesus' Royal Arrival and Controversies with Jerusalem Leaders

- 23:1–39 Judgment on Jewish Leadership: Woes to the Scribes and Pharisees

- 24:1–25:46 Jesus' Fifth Discourse: The Eschatological Discourse

- 26:1–28:20 Jesus' Execution by Rome and Resurrection/Vindication by God

- 26:1–56 Prelude to the Cross: Betrayal and Desertion

- 26:57–27:26 Jesus on Trial

- 27:27–66 Jesus' Crucifixion, Death and Burial

- 28:1–20 Resurrection as Vindication and Commissioning of the Disciples

1.3. Plot Overview.

1.3.1. Matthew 1:1–4:16. In the first major section of Matthew the author introduces Jesus, identifying him as (1) the Davidic Messiah; (2) the one who brings *Israel's restoration from *exile and hope for the Gentiles; (3) the obedient son representing Israel; (4) "God with us." Matthew begins with Jesus' *genealogy and his conception by the Spirit and then moves to the threat that his kingship poses to Herod. God authorizes, protects and guides Jesus as Israel's child-king in the face of political threats. In Matthew 3 the author introduces John's baptizing ministry to Israel and Jesus' solidarity with Israel in pursuing baptism by John. God's commendation of Jesus at his baptism highlights his sonship, as does Jesus' obedience in response to the wilderness *temptations (Mt 4:1-11). Matthew emphasizes Jesus' identity as the faithful *Son of God, fulfilling Israel's call to covenant faithfulness, which includes being a light to the Gentiles (Mt 4:13-16).

1.3.2. Matthew 4:17-16:20. This second major section focuses on Jesus' announcement of God's reign and the responses that it generates in his Galilean ministry. Jesus teaches about covenantal faithfulness in light of the coming-near kingdom (Mt 5-7) and does miracles (especially healings) as an enactment of this kingdom (Mt 8-9). Jesus then empowers and instructs his disciples to follow his pattern of *healing people and preaching about the coming kingdom (Mt 10). Matthew narrates the growing rejection of Jesus' ministry by Jewish leaders and the ambivalence more generally from crowds in Matthew 11:2-16:20. This ambivalence is explained as Jesus reveals more about God's kingdom, including its manifestation in two stages, so that its present expression has a hidden quality (Mt 13). Yet for those with ears to hear and eyes to see, Jesus is revealed to be the Messiah, the inaugurator of God's reign (cf. Mt 16:16). In his teachings and healings people of faith can see the authority and compassion of the *God of Israel.

1.3.3. Matthew 16:21-28:20. In the final turn of the Gospel Matthew narrates Jesus' journey to *Jerusalem to fulfill his mission to be a "ransom for many" (Mt 20:28). In Matthew 16:21-20:28 Jesus predicts his coming death (Mt 16:21; 17:22-23; 20:17-19) and teaches his *disciples that they are to follow his example of service without thought of personal status or gain. Jesus enters Jerusalem as the Messiah, symbolically enacting Zechariah's vision of a peaceable and humble king (Mt 21:1-11). He indicts the Jerusalem leadership for their mismanagement of the temple and their misguided leadership of the people, demonstrating his authority to do so by virtue of his identity as Messiah and *Lord (Mt 21:12-22:46). Through his predictions of the temple's destruction and of his reappearing at the time of final *judgment, Jesus calls his followers to live faithfully and mercifully in preparation for what is to come

(Mt 23:1-25:46). Matthew details the events leading up to Jesus' execution by *Rome instigated by the Jewish leadership. Jesus fulfills his mission to be Israel's messiah-king through self-sacrifice rather than by asserting his God-given power (Mt 26:1-27:66). His messianic identity and mission are vindicated when God raises him from the dead and gives him universal authority (Mt 28:1-18). The final scene finds Jesus commissioning his followers, empowered by his presence, to disciple all nations (Mt 28:19-20).

1.4. Literary and Rhetorical Features. Matthew's choice to write a narrative about Jesus means that basic story features such as setting, characters and plot are fruitful areas for literary analysis. Additionally, Matthew draws upon various rhetorical and literary features (e.g., inclusio, use of the OT, choices in arrangement and sequencing) to narrate the story of Jesus. The following literary and rhetorical examples are suggestive rather than exhaustive for understanding Matthew.

Settings are important for any story, and the First Gospel is no exception. One setting that receives attention in Matthew and has some theological import is the *mountain. Key revelatory and eschatological moments occur on mountains—for example, the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:1), the *transfiguration (Mt 17:1) and Jesus' final commissioning of his disciples (Mt 28:16) (see also Mt 14:23; 15:29; 24:3). According to T. Donaldson, the theological significance of this setting is Matthew's eschatological assumption that "in Jesus and his ministry all of the hopes which had been associated with [Mount] Zion have been fulfilled" (Donaldson, 199).

In addition to Jesus, characters that are prominent in Matthew include the disciples (with special attention to Peter), Jewish leaders (especially Pharisees), various supplicants or seekers that approach Jesus for healing (e.g., Mt 8:1; 9:2, 18, 20, 27) and a few, positively portrayed Gentiles (Mt 8:5; 15:22; 27:19) who contrast with Pilate and Herod (who, though placed as king over the Jews [Mt 2:1], is aligned with Roman interests and power) (see Herodian Dynasty). The disciples, for instance, are portrayed as Jesus' followers and companions for most of the story, which makes their desertion (and denial/betrayal) of Jesus at his arrest and trial all the more poignant. The disciples, conceived at almost every point as the Twelve (see Apostle), are characterized as those who have "little faith" (oligopistos [e.g., Mt 8:26; 16:8; 17:20]). They are also portrayed as frequently misunderstanding Jesus' teaching about the kingdom (Mt 15:15-16; 16:5-11; 18:5 cf. Mt 19:13) as well as the nature of his identity as the Messiah (Mt 16:21-22; 17:22-23; 20:17-20) (Brown 2002). Peter, as representative of the Twelve, is portrayed as “first among equals” (Kingsbury 1979, 80). Given the individual attention that Peter receives in the First Gospel, his portrayal moves him from a “flat” characterization to one that has more complexities and invites a greater level of identification by Matthew’s readers (Burnett).

Matthew’s plot follows in broad strokes the contours of Mark and, specifically, the baptism and temptation accounts (expanded in Matthew), Jesus’ Galilean ministry, the announcements about and traveling to Jerusalem, and Jesus’ passion, death and resurrection. In Matthew’s shaping, however, the Galilean ministry focuses almost exclusively on the mission to Israel (Mt 10:5-6; 15:24), with Jesus’ healing of Gentiles limited to the accounts of the centurion’s servant and the Canaanite woman’s daughter (Mt 8:5-13; 15:21-28). Additionally, Matthew inserts major teaching blocks into Mark’s basic story line (see below).

In telling this story of Jesus, Matthew uses a number of rhetorical features to highlight themes across his Gospel. The evangelist uses inclusio at a number of points, a bracketing feature that bookends a section of text. The most prominent inclusio occurs at Matthew 1:23 and Matthew 28:20 (the final verse of the Gospel), in which the theme of Jesus as “God with us” is emphasized. Another inclusio occurs at Matthew 4:23 and Matthew 9:35, bracketing and highlighting the teaching and healing ministry of Jesus that is the focus of these chapters (Mt 5–9) (U. Luz suggests this as the outer ring of a more elaborate chiasmic structure that has the Lord’s Prayer at its center [Luz, 1:165, 172-73]). Other examples of inclusio on a smaller scale include the alignment of “the deeds of the Messiah” and wisdom’s deeds in Matthew 11:2, 19 to signal a wisdom Christology (see 3.2.2 below). In the community discourse (Mt 18:1-35) the language “in their midst” (en mesō autōn) bookends Jesus’ response to the disciples’ initial question in the first half of the community discourse (Mt 18:2, 20). The repetition of Jesus’ saying about the inversion of “the first” and “the last” (Mt 19:30; 20:16) forms an inclusio around the parable of the workers in Matthew 20:1-15 to highlight the unexpected nature of status in the kingdom (Brown 2002, 87).

Another literary feature of Matthew is his attention to OT citations. Specifically, Matthew includes ten fulfillment quotations, with a formulaic introduction to the effect, “so that the word [of the Lord] through the prophet [name] might be fulfilled, saying” (Mt 1:22-23; 2:15; 2:17-18; 2:23; 4:14-16; 8:17; 12:17-21; 13:35; 21:4-5; 27:9; cf. also 2:5; 3:3; 13:14-15). Additionally, Matthew cites or alludes to the OT many more times across his Gospel to highlight the theme of fulfillment (see 3.1.1 below). As R. Beaton suggests, OT quotations in Matthew function on both the story level of the narrative and the discourse level (Beaton, 5). On the latter level by which Matthew communicates with his audience, themes and theological motifs are developed and emphasized (see Narrative Criticism).

In terms of sequencing and arrangement, Matthew has a penchant for groupings of three across his Gospel. For example, the opening *genealogy is structured in three units of fourteen generations to emphasize Davidic kingship and exile to Babylon from Israel’s history, both of which lead to Israel’s restoration in the Messiah (Mt 1:2-17). Matthew 8–9 is structured around three groups of three *miracle stories each, focusing the reader’s attention on the *authority and compassion of Jesus to heal and rescue (Mt 8:1-17; 8:23–9:8; 9:18-34). And the evangelist includes three *parables in Matthew 21–22 that focus on the Jewish leadership’s rejection of Jesus (Mt 21:28-32; 21:33-46; 22:1-14) and three parables in Matthew 25 that address the importance of being ready for the final judgment (Mt 25:31-32).

Another example of a significant feature of arrangement in Matthew is the grouping of Jesus’ teachings primarily into five major blocks (Mt 5:1–7:29; 10:1–11:1; 13:1-53; 18:1-35; 24:1–25:46). As indicated earlier (see 1.2 above), these five major discourses are signaled by the fivefold formula that concludes each discourse and transitions to the subsequent narrative block (Bauer). Although each major discourse has a different focus, the theme of God’s reign is accented in each of them.

Matthew 5–7: The Sermon on the Mount—Jesus’ Kingdom Manifesto

Matthew 10: The Mission Discourse—The Disciples’ Kingdom Mission

Matthew 13: The Parables Discourse—Kingdom Disclosure of Already/Not Yet

Matthew 18: The Community Discourse—The Community Embodying the Kingdom

Matthew 24–25: The Eschatological Discourse—Temple’s Fall and Kingdom’s Full Arrival Predicted

The Matthean discourses can be understood as providing progressive illumination of the nature and values of God's kingdom as the story proceeds to its culmination. The reference at the very end of Matthew to discipling all the nations by "teaching them to keep everything that I have commanded you" (Mt 28:20) points back to all the teachings of Jesus narrated in the First Gospel. Yet, since Jesus' teachings are intentionally grouped primarily in these five major blocks, there is a particular focus on these specific teachings in their shape and content. Additionally, these five discourses, through their rhetorical shaping, draw Matthew's audience into hearing Jesus' teachings as directed toward them quite particularly (Brown 2005).

2. Historical Issues.

2.1. Authorship. The Gospel of Matthew is an anonymous biography of Jesus. Its earliest attributions are to Matthew, one of Jesus' twelve apostles. The title, kata Maththaion, was probably added no later than A.D. 100, likely when it was combined with the other three canonical Gospels for circulation (Luz, 1:59; S. Gathercole argues for the inclusion of euaggelion in the title based on evidence from P⁴). The title was most likely added to distinguish this Gospel from the other three canonical Gospels once combined (though D. Turner suggests that it was original to the Gospel).

The other early attribution comes from Papias, a bishop in Asia Minor, writing sometime in the first third of the second century. His writing on the topic is referenced in and partially cited by the church historian Eusebius (d. 339). The relevant quotation from Papias reads, "Matthew collected [synetaxato] the oracles [ta logia] in the Hebrew language [or 'Semitic style'] [Hebraidi dialektō], and each person translated [or 'interpreted'] [hērmēneusen] them as he was able" (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.16).

There is no consensus in Matthean scholarship as to what Papias's logion refers to and whether it accurately represents the writing situation of the First Gospel. A few observations on the specifics of the quotation can be made. First, "oracles" (ta logia) probably refers to the whole Gospel, at least for Eusebius, given his reference to Mark as an "arrangement of the Lord's oracles [ta logia]" just prior to the Matthean discussion (for the idea that logia refers to unique Matthean material of the sayings of Jesus, see Hagner, xlv-xlvi). Regarding the reference to "the Hebrew language," although certainly Jesus' Aramaic teachings would have been translated into Greek at an early stage in the tradition history, there is no compelling evidence that the Gospel of Matthew is a translation from Hebrew or Aramaic (although, see Davies and Allison, 1:12). Especially if Mark is a primary source for Matthew's Gospel, any theory of Matthew having been originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic falters. Finally, according to R. Gundry (though not supported by a majority of scholars), hērmēneusen might be better rendered as "interpreted." If so, then the Hebraic aspect of Matthew (Hebraidi dialektō) could be better understood as Hebraic style rather than a translation from Hebrew (Gundry, 619). Alternately, R. T. France proposes that this part of Papias's testimony, though not its reference to Matthean authorship, is likely simply inaccurate: "These two aspects of the tradition [Matthean authorship and translation from Hebrew], while they regularly occur together, are not logically connected" (France 1989, 66).

Scholars are also divided on how much weight to give the Papias tradition for determining the authorship of the First Gospel. While some question whether Eusebius's provision of Papias's testimony should be given much weight (e.g., Eusebius himself questions the veracity of Papias), others suggest that the Papias tradition should be granted its due significance (Albright and Mann, clxxix). If the Gospel's title and the attestation by Papias are at least suggestive of Matthean authorship, another obstacle to attribution to an apostle is Matthew's use of Mark. U. Luz, representative of many scholars, avers that an eyewitness to Jesus' life would hardly use a non-eyewitness as a primary source (Luz, 1:59). Yet this argument may reflect modern sensibilities rather than ancient ones, in which literary borrowing of this sort was quite acceptable (Gundry, 621). Additionally, no one denies that Mark contains eyewitness testimony drawn from Jesus traditions circulating in oral form (with Papias claiming that Mark wrote down Peter's recollections). So Matthew's use of Mark does not exactly qualify as non-eyewitness source reliance (cf. Lk 1:1-4).

In the end, scholarship is divided on whether the apostle Matthew is the author of the First Gospel. While some claim that Matthean authorship is likely (e.g., France; Gundry), many argue against this attribution, claiming there is no clear historical evidence for it (e.g., Luz; Carter). D. Hagner, taking a mediating position, draws on Papias's testimony to suggest that "Matthew the apostle is . . . probably the source of an early form of significant portions of the Gospel, in particular the sayings of Jesus, but perhaps even some of the narrative material" (Hagner, lxxvii).

Yet in the final analysis, determination of authorship is not essential to the interpretation of the First Gospel, since biography as a genre points away from its author toward its subject. The implied author—the author or narrator discernable from the text itself—is a more helpful construct for interpretation of Matthew than any hypothetical reconstruction of the empirical author. The implied author is a conceptual tool from narrative criticism that focuses on the author presupposed by the narrative itself. Construction of an implied author does not require determination of an empirical author but is instead a textually derived construct. For example, the implied author of the Gospel of Matthew highlights Jesus as fulfillment of OT hopes by quite a number of OT citations and fulfillment quotations (e.g., Mt 1:22-23) and by portraying Jesus as fully faithful to the Torah (Mt 5:17; 12:1-14) (see Old Testament in the Gospels). The implied author is the one who uses the story of Jesus to communicate with and shape the implied reader of Matthew's Gospel (for the corresponding concept of the implied reader, see *narrative criticism).

2.2. Audience. Most scholars consider that Matthew was writing to a Jewish audience that had been persuaded that Jesus was God's Messiah. The frequently used fulfillment quotations, emphasis on Jesus as fulfilling the Torah, and the omission of explanation of Jewish customs from Mark (e.g., Mt 15:2 // Mk 7:3-4), provide some of the rationale for the determination of a Jewish audience (although, for the view that Matthew's audience is largely Gentile in composition, see Hare, 2).

It may be that the house church(es) making up Matthew's audience were at the initial stages of embarking on a Gentile mission, given the clear commissioning of its readers and hearers to all "the nations" (ethnē) in Matthew 28:19 (e.g., Stanton, 139-40). Balancing the particularism and universalism of this Gospel (Hagner, lxv), a number of scholars have fine-tuned the precise relationship between Matthew's audience and Gentiles. For Luz, the audience is on the cusp of a mission to Gentiles because of Israel's rejection of the message about Jesus (Luz, 1:50). According to D. Sim, Matthew's audience is not necessarily itself involved in a Gentile mission, though it sees this mission as a valid endeavor (Sim, 245). Sim also highlights that Matthew's audience is "anti-Gentile," in that they sought separation from Gentiles unless the latter converted to Judaism in their embrace of Jesus as the Messiah (Sim, 246). A. Saldarini has a similar perspective on this final point, with Gentiles being peripheral to but included in Matthew's vision of "reformed Judaism" and expected to affirm the Torah (Saldarini, 83).

The relationship between Matthew's audience and *Judaism more broadly (or with other groups within Judaism of the late first century A.D.) is also a matter of debate within Matthean studies. Earlier scholarship had suggested that Matthew's audience has already separated from the parent body of Judaism by the time of the writing of the First Gospel. Some scholars continue to see Matthew addressing his audience, which is quite distinct from mainstream Judaism of the late first century. In this view, the Gospel is written to address those who have already separated from the Jewish synagogue system (Hare; Stanton; Luz).

Yet a number of scholars have sketched a portrait of the Matthean audience in which their interactions with their Jewish neighbors is an intramural conversation and debate (e.g., Overman; Repschinski; Saldarini; Sim). In this view, Matthew's audience is located squarely within Judaism of the late first century, potentially in vigorous conflict with "formative Judaism" (Sim, 109). Responding to this intramural debate, Matthew draws on Jewish sources of authority "to legitimate his particular form of Judaism" (Saldarini, 7-8). This set of perspectives that locates Matthew's audience within the (wide) boundaries of the Judaism(s) of its day avoids locating a "parting of the ways" between Christianity and Judaism in the mid- to late first century. Increasingly, Gospels scholarship has pushed back this "parting of the ways" until after A.D. 135 (Bar Kokhba revolt) or even until the time of Constantine, when Christianity becomes the official religion of Rome. From this perspective, "Most mid first-century believers-in-Jesus were Jews, and even at the end of the first century a substantial minority still were. Even after most Christians were non-Jewish in background, Jews and Christians rubbed shoulders, fought with one another for acceptance and status, and sometimes cooperated" (Saldarini, 194).

In addition to locating Matthew's audience in relation to Judaism, various proposals have been suggested for the particular social location of Matthew's audience. *Redaction criticism had sketched a proposed audience—a singular Matthean community—from which the Gospel arose and to which it was written. This community's particular features could be determined by redaction analysis. For example, Gundry suggests that the Matthean community is a persecuted, mixed Christian community (true and false believers together) with strong Jewish ties (Gundry, 5). Narrative critics, though more hesitant to draw a picture of Matthew's audience from particular details of the Gospel, have attempted to sketch the Matthean audience from their narrative reading of the Gospel. For example, Kingsbury suggests that the implied reader of Matthew provides an approximate "index" of the empirical audience. In his sketch of that audience he suggests they were (1) made up of both Jews and Gentiles; (2) city dwellers (possibly Antioch); (3) fairly prosperous; (4) outside of official Judaism but persecuted by it; and (5) experiencing internal struggles with miracle-working false prophets (Kingsbury 1988, 147-60). In both of these proposals a single community in a single location is presumed.

More recently, R. Bauckham, along with other scholars, has suggested that the assumption of rather narrow and specific communities for each of the Gospels, arising from the redaction critical method, is incorrect (Bauckham 1998b). Bauckham argues from the genre of Gospel as biography that the Gospels are intended for a broader audience and wider distribution (so also Stanton, 51). Although Bauckham's proposal has met with ongoing critique (e.g., Last), the associations among early Christian communities support the conclusion that Matthew was written for wider distribution than for the exhortation of a single community (e.g., Rom 16:1-2; 1 Cor 16:1-4) (see also Thompson).

2.3. Date and Provenance. Dating Matthew is a suggestive rather than a definitive enterprise and involves assessing a number of factors, including (1) dependence among the Synoptic Gospels (see Synoptic Problem); (2) reference and/or relation to the fall of *Jerusalem in A.D. 70; and (3) dependence on the canonical Gospels in Christian writings of the early second century. If Matthew draws on Mark as a source, as is quite likely, then Matthew must postdate Mark. If Mark writes just prior to the destruction of the temple, this would provide a range for Matthew of approximately A.D. 70-85, although there are scholars who suggests dates both before and after this range (e.g., A.D. 85-95 [Sim, 40]; A.D. 58-69 [Blomberg, 42]). Although some have understood Matthew to reflect certain pre-A.D. 70 interests (e.g., the inclusion of Mt 17:24-27), others have observed evidence of a post-A.D. 70 date at Matthew 22:7; 24:15-20. Luz argues for a date for writing not much later than A.D. 80, given familiarity with Matthew seen in early church writings such as the Didache and the letters of Ignatius (Luz, 1:58-59).

Determining Matthew's provenance is a fairly speculative venture, taking its clues from some general observations about the Gospel's language and reconstructed social milieu. Antioch in Syria has been regularly offered as the location of origin, given its large Jewish population, Greek language use and early Christian presence (e.g., Acts 13:1-3) (see Garland, 3). Other suggested venues range from Jerusalem to Sephoris or Tiberius in *Galilee (Carter, 15-16).

2.4. Historical Contextual Features. Given that the Gospels are "cultural products" (Green, 19), understanding the shape of their cultural milieu is important for their interpretation. Although the Greco-Roman and Jewish facets of the world of the first century A.D. are not easily disentangled, these settings can be discussed separately for heuristic purposes. A few examples of helpful areas for exploration are provided below for each setting.

2.4.1. Matthew's Greco-Roman Setting. Prominent features of the first-century A.D. Greco-Roman world for study of the Gospels include (1) long-standing influence of Greek language and culture across the Mediterranean world (see Hellenism); (2) Roman military and political power (see Rome); and (3) fundamental values of status and honor (see Social-Scientific Criticisms).

The Gospels, including Matthew, were written in Greek and intended for a Greek-speaking audience. Since Greek was the lingua franca of the first century, it was the obvious choice for the evangelists. The Greek OT, the Septuagint, is also the primary basis of the OT cited in Matthew and certainly would have been his audience's Scriptures. The ten formulaic fulfillment quotations (see 1.4 above) may be an exception to Matthew's more uniform use of the Septuagint, if they reflect a mixed text form reliant in part on the Hebrew text (Hagner, lvi).

Roman military and political dominance and occupation impacted the daily realities of those about whom Matthew writes and the community to which he writes. These realities come to the fore in Matthew in Jesus' interactions with the Roman governor, Pilate (see Pontius Pilate), who has Jesus crucified, and his guards who carry out the sentence (Mt 27:1-35). In contrasting characterization, Matthew highlights two centurions who respond to Jesus with faith and confession of identity (Mt 8:5-13; 27:54), and Pilate's wife, who warns Pilate of Jesus' innocence (Mt 27:19). In attending to Roman power in Matthew, it is also important to acknowledge that Herod the Great (Mt 2:1-18) and Herod Antipas (ruling in Galilee [Mt 14:1-12]) rule on behalf of Rome over the Jewish people. Collusion with Rome necessarily complicates their power and their identities as Jewish rulers. Even the Jerusalem leaders, with their clear roles within Jewish temple activities and over the Jewish people, are required to bend to Rome's will and attend to Roman interests.

Another significant feature of the first-century A.D. Greco-Roman world for interpretation of Matthew is the importance of maintenance and acquisition of status and honor. Jesus' teachings about status reversal would have sounded odd to the status-conscious and quite stratified first-century world. Jesus calls his disciples to take the place (rank) of a *child or a *slave (Mt 18:1-5; 20:25-27) and draws on commonplace language of "first/last" and "great" to signal the status renunciation he expects of them.

Honor was a deeply held value and commodity in this context. Honor involves a self-claim of worth and a corresponding recognition by others of that worth (Lawrence, 689). Honor can be ascribed, such as honor due as an advantage of birth. Honor can also be achieved by honorable behavior or by gaining honor from a contest with another person (deSilva, 28). In Matthew 21–22 contests for authority between the Jerusalem leaders and Jesus result in Jesus receiving honor from the crowds and even, begrudgingly, from the Jewish leaders, who dare not question him further because of his displays of *wisdom (e.g., Mt 22:22, 33, 46) (Neyrey, 47–48). Yet Matthew also highlights Jesus' teachings about practicing piety for only God to see rather than seeking human honor (Mt 6:1–18). This honor virtue given by God is what Jesus followers should desire (Lawrence, 690).

2.4.2. Matthew's Jewish Setting. The setting of Matthew's audience has been described (see 2.2 above), and the Jewish setting for his story of Jesus also warrants careful attention in interpretation. Some central aspects of the first-century A.D. Jewish setting of Matthew's story include (1) Torah interpretation and purity regulations; (2) Jewish sects, most particularly the Pharisees; and (3) Messianic views and expectations.

Matthew highlights Jesus' Torah observance and fulfillment (Mt 5:17; 12:7–8), inviting contemporary interpreters, often influenced by Reformation views of Torah observance as legalism, to renegotiate their understandings of first-century A.D. Judaism and Torah. Earlier views of Judaism, or at least its first-century expressions, portrayed Jews as consumed by attempts to earn God's salvation through obedience to the Torah. Recent scholarship has challenged this legalistic portrayal. It is more accurate to note that Jews throughout Israel's history understood themselves to be chosen by Yahweh, having experienced redemption from Egypt (Ex 14) followed by reception of the Torah to guide them in proper allegiance to Yahweh (Ex 19–24). Obedience to the Torah was not a means of earning their redemption; rather, it was the means of expressing loyalty to the God who had redeemed them long ago. Or as E. P. Sanders framed it, Torah observance was the means for remaining in, not admission to, the covenant. This sketch makes sense of Matthew's positive view of the Torah, his portrayal of Jesus as faithful to it, and Jesus' exhortation to his followers to obey the Torah—that is, to pursue covenant loyalty (see 3.2.2; 3.3 below).

The specific Torah regulations governing purity have often been misread in NT interpretation as most focused on legalistic misapplication. It is helpful to begin with the observation that there is no clear distinction made in the OT between what might be called "moral" legislation and "purity" legislation (cf. various laws in Lev 19) (see Clean and Unclean). It should also be stressed that being ritually unclean was not coterminous with moral failure. "Uncleanness is not a disease, and it implies no moral censure; it is a ritual state which both men and women likely found themselves most of the time" (Levine 1996, 387). The important task for a Jew who was ritually defiled was to pursue purity via particular washings and/or sacrifices (e.g., Mt 8:4) or, sometimes, simply by waiting for a specified length. Finally, some Jews (e.g., *Pharisees and *Essenes), though not all, were concerned not only with primary pollutants but also with secondary ones. These could arise from touching something touched by a person or thing in an unclean state. Interest in secondary purity issues might provide the context for understanding Pharisaic concern for Jesus eating with "tax collectors and sinners" (Mt 9:11; 11:18).

The sect of the Pharisees was focused on Torah interpretation and application. Although Pharisees were not *priests, their intention was to follow in their daily lives purity regulations applicable to (priestly) temple participation. This made them sensitive to secondary defilement as well as primary sources of impurity (e.g., Mt 15:1–2). Given their frequent role as Torah teachers (Mt 23:2–3), it is not surprising that they are Jesus' main rivals in the First Gospel (Mt 12:1–14; 15:1–20; 19:3–9; 22:15–46; 23:1–39). Narratively, this stems from Matthew's portrayal of Jesus as the consummate interpreter of the Torah in contrast to the Pharisees and *scribes (Mt 15:1–20; 23:1–24). Yet Matthew's concentrated focus on Jesus and the Pharisees as rival interpreters of Torah means that he does not mention any Pharisees who follow Jesus, which we do hear of elsewhere in the NT (Jn 3:1; 19:39; Acts 15:5).

There are multiple and competing messianic views in Judaism of the first century A.D. (see Christ). Certainly a prominent view, drawn from the OT, was of the Messiah as Davidic king (e.g., Is 11:1-9; Jer 23:5-6; Mic 5:1-9; cf. Zech 9:9-13) (see Son of David), who would confront and defeat Israel's enemies and reign on Israel's throne and on God's behalf. For example, Psalms of Solomon prays that God would "raise up for them their king, the son of David, to rule over Israel your servant Israel [and] . . . to purify Jerusalem from nations that trample her down in destruction" (Pss. Sol. 17:21-22). There is also evidence from Qumran of a priestly Messiah (a "Messiah of Aaron" is mentioned in 1QS IX, 10-11; CD-A XII, 22-23). And 1 Enoch pictures a heavenly, exalted figure based on Daniel's vision of "one like a son of man" who seems to take on messianic features (e.g., 1 En. 48:1-5; cf. Dan 7:13-14). Matthew draws on a number of these messianic expectations for his Christology (see 3.2 below).

3. Theological Themes and Messages.

Because it is narrative in form and a biography in genre, Matthew's Gospel communicates theology in primarily implicit ways, through characterization (of Jesus and others), plot and rhetorical shaping. Yet Matthew's message about Jesus and Jesus' mission rings clearly through his story.

3.1. Matthew's Theological Focus: The Kingdom of God. Matthew's theological focus is God's kingdom now being inaugurated in Jesus' person, ministry and mission (see Kingdom of God/Heaven). Matthew's preferred phrase for referring to God's reign is "the kingdom of heaven" (hē basileia tōn ouranōn, with the plural ouranōn likely used to reflect the standard use of the plural for "heaven" in the OT). Although using "kingdom of God" at a few points, the phrase "kingdom of heaven" is ubiquitous, possibly to emphasize the heavenly origin of the kingdom (Pennington). Jewish expectation, as expressed in the OT and Second Temple Jewish writings, anticipated the coming or return of God as king in fullness, often in tandem with promises regarding Israel's return from exile (e.g., Is 40:1-10; Mic 4:1-8; Pss. Sol. 17).

In Matthew both John the Baptist and Jesus announce the nearness of the kingdom's arrival (Mt 3:2; 4:17). And Matthew portrays Jesus' ministry to Israel as consisting in preaching and enacting the kingdom (Mt 4:17-9:35). In line with the metatheme of kingdom, Matthew highlights Jesus as fulfillment of Israel's Scripture and hopes as well as the inclusion of the Gentiles as a signal of the kingdom's inauguration. Along with these motifs, Matthew clarifies that the kingdom is an "already but not yet" reality at the time of the writing of his Gospel. Because this particular facet of Jesus' kingdom preaching is relatively unanticipated in Jewish expectation, Matthew highlights the still-hidden nature of the kingdom in the present, while pointing ahead to its final consummation at the "end of the age."

3.1.1. Fulfillment of the Scriptures. Matthew highlights from the very start of his Gospel that God's present activity in Jesus fulfills Israel's story and Scriptures. He intimately connects Jesus to Israel's story by providing Jesus' genealogy beginning with Abraham and highlighting Jesus' kingly descent from David (Mt 1:1-17). Matthew also cites the OT Scriptures frequently, emphasizing the ways that Jesus and his ministry, teachings and mission cohere and derive from them. The evangelist especially draws on Isaiah and the Psalms to frame Jesus' ministry as the faithful servant of the Lord who stands in for Israel and inaugurates God's return and reign.

There are ten so-called fulfillment quotations in Matthew, which are shaped to highlight that God is now fulfilling the Scriptures in Jesus (see 1.4 above). Beyond these formulaic quotations, Matthew cites the OT consistently across his Gospel along with allusions and evocations to it (France 1989, 166-205). Matthew's Jesus also makes explicit reference to his role of fulfillment in relation to Scriptures: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Torah or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish these but to fulfill them" (Mt 5:17). Matthew particularly highlights Jesus' passion as a fulfillment of the Scriptures broadly understood (Mt 26:54, 56).

3.1.2. Gentile Inclusion in the Restoration of Israel. An important refrain in Israel's Scriptures is the inclusion of the nations in redemption when God returns to restore the people of Israel. For example, Isaiah speaks of the nations streaming into Jerusalem in the last days (Is 2:2-5). In that day, "Many peoples will come and say, 'Come, let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the temple of the God of Jacob. He will teach us his ways, so that we may walk in his paths'" (Is 2:3 NIV [see also Is 49:5-7, 22-23]). This theme of Israel's redemption as catalyst for the influx of the nations is present for Matthew, who indicates that Jesus' Galilean ministry is focused intently on Israel and not *Gentiles (Mt 15:24; 10:5-6). In fact, the two passages that clearly portray Gentiles coming to Jesus for healing are the exceptions that prove the rule (Mt 8:5-13; 15:21-28). In both cases it takes "great faith" on the part of the Gentile suppli-cant to cause Jesus to move outside of his God-given missional focus (Mt 8:10; 15:28). And in both cases Jesus initially hesitates at their request (Mt 8:7 [with a question, as in the NIV]; 15:23-24).

More than the other Gospels, Matthew highlights Jesus' mission to Israel almost exclusively. It is only after the resurrection that Jesus' mission is expanded to the nations through the ministry of the disciples: "Go and disciple all the nations [ethnē]" (Mt 28:19 [including Israel]). Yet Matthew infuses his narrative with the motif of Gentile inclusion from the beginning. This foreshadowing begins in the first few words of the Gospel, where he includes four women in the early part of his genealogy of Jesus—Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Uriah's wife—all Gentiles (Mt 1:3, 5, 6). Gentile inclusion is also foreshadowed with the presence of the magi (Mt 2:1) and in the frequent reference to Gentiles or nations (ethnē) throughout the narrative (Mt 4:15; 12:18-21; 21:43; 24:14) (Levine 1988).

3.1.3. The Already and the Not Yet of God's Reign. Important to Matthew's vision of God's reign present in Jesus is its nature as inaugurated and yet not fully consummated. The initial preaching of the kingdom by John the Baptist and Jesus announces the nearness of the kingdom (Mt 3:2; 4:17). This expectation of the kingdom's imminent arrival sets the course for much of Jesus' teaching, which focuses on the presence of God's reign in his ministry. To the Pharisees, Jesus claims, "if I cast out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Mt 12:28). Matthew ties the kingdom's arrival to Jesus' ministry of preaching and healing (Mt 4:23—9:38).

Yet Matthew also communicates the "not yet" of God's reign in that God's people await its final consummation at "the end of the age"—a favorite Matthean term for that final day when God will judge all things (Mt 13:39, 40, 49; 24:3; 28:20). In fact, it is precisely the judging role of God that is often emphasized when the "not yet" of the kingdom receives attention. God will judge rightly and wisely in that final day (Mt 13:40-43, 49-50), so believers should avoid inappropriately judging one another now (Mt 7:1-2; 13:24-30, 36-43). Matthew also indicates that Jesus, identified as the "Son of Man," will judge and rule on God's behalf in the eschaton (Mt 19:28; 25:31), with universal authority already given him at his *resurrection (Mt 28:18). The "not yet" of God's reign is also apparent in the Lord's Prayer, where Jesus invites his disciples—and Matthew his readers—to *pray, "May your kingdom come" (Mt 6:10).

The dialectic of the "already but not yet" of the kingdom might be most elegantly expressed in Matthew's beatitudes—the entry point to the Sermon on the Mount. In them, Jesus announces eschatological blessings to the most unlikely recipients: the poor in spirit and the meek, and those who mourn and long for justice not yet received (Mt 5:3-6). The promise segment of each beatitude (its second poetic line) is expressed in either present or future tense. The first and the last of the eight parallel beatitudes provide a present tense frame: "the kingdom of heaven [already] belongs to them" (Mt 5:3, 10). The six beatitudes between the first and last promise future blessing—for example, "they will be comforted" (Mt 5:4). In this way, Matthew signals the "already and not yet" of God's reign and the unexpected reversal of fortune that accompanies its arrival.

Matthew also expresses this kingdom dialectic through the theme of hiddenness. In the parables discourse of Matthew 13 the evangelist communicates that the kingdom, while a present reality, is hidden and so not discernable to all. In this chapter Jesus likens the kingdom to yeast "hidden" (enkryptō) in dough (Mt 13:33) and a treasure "hidden" (kryptō) in a field (Mt 13:44). Matthew indicates that Jesus, by teaching in parables, begins to make clear "what has been hidden since the beginning of the world" (Mt 13:35). God's reign as a hidden present reality requires faith to see and understand it.

3.2. Christological Emphases. Whereas *Christology in Matthew (and the other Gospels) has traditionally been derived from analysis of the various titles used for Jesus, a narrative approach suggests that Christology can be discerned from the rich composite of titles, scriptural citations and allusions, and the narrative portrait of Jesus through his actions and words (Brown forthcoming). Such an analysis of Matthew illuminates at least four Christological foci: Jesus as (1) the Davidic Messiah, (2) Torah fulfilled and Wisdom embodied; (3) representative Israel; and (4) the embodiment of Yahweh.

3.2.1. Jesus as the Davidic Messiah. The primary apologetic of Matthew's Gospel is to demonstrate that Jesus is the Messiah and then to illuminate in storied fashion the kind of Messiah he is. From the opening title of the Gospel, Matthew affirms Jesus as Messiah through use of the title Christos (Mt 1:1 [Gk. translation of Heb. mašīah]). The title occurs frequently in the first two chapters (Mt 1:16, 17, 18; 2:4) and then not much until Peter confesses Jesus to be the Messiah (Mt 16:16), the first time a character in Matthew's story explicitly affirms Jesus' identity as the Messiah. Jesus' messianic claims are prominent in the passion narrative, where the high priest asks Jesus to disclose if he is the Messiah (Mt 26:63), the Sanhedrin mockingly calls him “Messiah” (Mt 26:68), and Pilate refers to Jesus as “the one called the Messiah” (Mt 27:17, 22). The referent of Messiah at any number of these points is Jesus as Jewish king, as seen by the use of “king” in immediate proximity to language of to Messiah (e.g., Mt 2:2; 27:11, 29, 37, 42).

Matthew also draws on “son of David” language to affirm Jesus as the Messiah (Mt 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30, 31; 21:9, 15; 22:42). Given that the Jewish Scriptures portray David as prototypical and idealized king of Israel, it is not surprising that eschatological hopes of a descendant of David ruling over Israel emerge (e.g., Is 11:1; Mic 5:2). Matthew draws upon this royal category from the onset: Jesus is “son of David” (Mt 1:1) who comes from Joseph’s line, which extends backward through the line of King David (Mt 1:6). Jesus’ royal identity is also apparent in his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, where the crowds hail him as “son of David” (Mt 21:9) and Matthew identifies him as Israel’s king (Mt 21:5) (Willitts).

Yet Matthew also expands and complicates Jesus as the royal Messiah by emphasizing the divine necessity for Jesus to go to Jerusalem and suffer as an integral part of his messianic mission (Mt 16:21; 17:22–23; 20:17–19). Jewish messianic expectation could include the idea of the Messiah arriving in Jerusalem and claiming his rightful place as king. For the Messiah to be met with confrontation and rejection by Jewish authorities and crucifixion at the hands of the Romans was not part of such expectations. This part of Matthew’s Christology emerges from the narrative contours of his Gospel and is clarified further through his use of the Isaianic Servant of the Lord to show how Jesus’ suffering and death cohere with the Scriptures (see Servant of Yahweh). An extended citation of Isaiah 42:1–4 that provides an interpretive lens for Jesus’ Galilean ministry (Mt 12:18–21; also allusions at Mt 3:17; 17:5) as well as the quotation of Isaiah 53:4 to explain Jesus’ healing ministry (Mt 8:17) provide ample evidence that Matthew understands Jesus to be Isaiah’s Servant of the Lord figure. It is also likely that Matthew alludes to Isaiah 53:11–12 to demonstrate that Jesus’ death is to be understood via the servant’s mission for Israel and for the nations (Mt 20:28; 26:28). By drawing on the servant figure, Matthew “interprets Jesus’ ministry in terms of the servant’s mission to bring mercy and justice to Israel and the nations. . . . And he interprets Jesus’ death in light of the servant’s role in dealing with evil, sin, and suffering for Israel and for the nations” (Brown forthcoming).

3.2.2. Jesus as Torah Fulfilled and Wisdom Embodied. The relationship between Jesus and Torah (and Wisdom) is also important to Matthew’s Christology. Jesus is clearly portrayed as fulfilling “the Torah” and “the Prophets” (Mt 5:17). In part, this means for Matthew that Jesus completes Israel’s story and fulfills the Scriptures (see 3.1.1 above). Additionally, Jesus is portrayed as the consummate interpreter of the Torah (e.g., Mt 5:21–48); he rightly puts at the center “the weightier matters of the law: justice, mercy and loyalty” (Mt 23:23; see also Mt 9:13; 12:7) (Snodgrass). It is also the case that Jesus is portrayed as faithful keeper of the law. For example, Jesus claims he is innocent of any charges of neglecting the *Sabbath (Mt 12:7). And in Matthew 15 the Pharisees apparently lack warrant to accuse Jesus of breaking “the tradition of the elders”; rather, it is his disciples who receive this critique (Mt 15:1–2). Jesus also teaches his disciples and others who come to him to obey the Torah (Mt 5:17–20; 19:17).

Yet Matthew extends beyond the category of Jesus fulfilling the law to intimate that Jesus is the embodiment of *Wisdom (Deutsch; Witherington). This is especially the case in Matthew 11, in which Jesus as Wisdom is accented at two distinct points. First, Matthew uses an inclusio that frames the first half of the chapter to identify Jesus’ messianic deeds as Wisdom’s deeds (Mt 11:2–19). The “deeds [erga] of the Messiah” (Mt 11:2), which include healing and preaching the good news (Mt 11:5), are subsequently identified as Wisdom’s “deeds” (erga), which vindicate Jesus’ identity in spite of accusations otherwise (Mt 11:19). Second, Jesus’ invitation at the end of the chapter is shaped by language drawn from Jewish wisdom literature. Specific connections between Matthew’s portrait of Jesus and the portrayal of Wisdom in this literature are numerous. Wisdom invites people to come to her (Sir 24:19), provides rest (anapauō [Sir 6:28; 51:27]) rather than weariness (kopiaō [Wis 6:14; Sir 51:27]), and is described as having a yoke (zygos a term frequently associated with the Torah). Each of these specific associations characterizes Jesus in Matthew 11:28–30. Additionally, references to the inversion of expected wisdom (Mt 11:25) along with the motif of hiddenness and revelation (Mt 11:25–27) emphasize Jesus’ role as Wisdom embodied.

3.2.3. Jesus as Representative Israel. Matthew portrays Jesus as representative *Israel, especially in the first section of his Gospel, focused on introducing Jesus to his audience. This christological motif may already be present in the Gospel’s opening line: Jesus is “son of Abraham” (Mt 1:1). It appears clearly, however, at Matthew 2:15, with a fulfillment quotation from Hosea 11:1. Matthew compares Jesus to Israel in an analogy between God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt and the movement of Jesus' family to Egypt and back to "the land of Israel" (Mt 2:20-21). In this passage Israel as God's son and Jesus as God's son are compared. The comparison continues with the language of Jesus as "son of God" at his baptism and temptation. Matthew narrates Jesus' baptism by John the Baptist in line with "all Judea" coming to John for baptism (Mt 3:5). Jesus' rationale for his baptism—"to fulfill all righteousness"—fits this picture of Jesus aligning himself with his people and acting on their behalf (Mt 1:21) and in concert with Israel's God-given mission. That mission is exemplified by Isaiah's servant figure, upon which Matthew draws to connect Jesus to Israel's mission to the nations (see 3.1.2 above) (note allusion to Is 42:1 at Jesus' baptism in Mt 3:16-17). The analogy with Israel is especially evident in the temptation account, where Jesus answers each temptation by quoting Deuteronomy's rehearsal of Israel's time in the wilderness. As Israel was in the wilderness forty years, Jesus is in the "wilderness" forty days and nights (Mt 4:1) (see Mountain and Wilderness). But whereas Deuteronomy emphasizes Israel's unfaithfulness during this time (Deut 8:3; 6:13, 16), Jesus, as God's faithful son, does not succumb to temptation (Mt 4:3, 6, 9).

Matthew's focus on Jesus as faithful representative of Israel comes to the fore again in the passion narrative. Jesus is portrayed as faithful to the will of God in spite of his anguish anticipating what is to come (Mt 26:38). He speaks of his fate as a fulfillment of the Scriptures (Mt 26:54, 56). And Matthew's crucifixion scene employs a significant number of allusions to Psalm 22, thereby identifying Jesus with the righteous psalmist who trusts and delights in God (Ps 22:6, 8) and yet suffers unjustly at the hands of sinners (Ps 22:16; cf. Mt 26:45) (Brown forthcoming). For Matthew, Jesus is the faithful and righteous Israelite par excellence, who dies on behalf of his people.

If N. T. Wright is correct to suggest that first-century A.D. Judaism could easily have interpreted Daniel 7:13-14 as a vision of Israel's vindication for their faithfulness, then Matthew's use of the title "Son of Man," for Jesus, especially where there is clear allusion to Daniel 7, also signals an Israel Christology (e.g., Mt 10:23; 16:27-28; 24:30-31; 26:64) (Wright, 291-97). As such, God's vindication of Jesus as the Messiah is a vindication of all who follow Jesus and put their faith in him.

3.2.4. Jesus as the Embodiment of Yahweh. Matthew also portrays Jesus as the embodiment of Israel's *God. This facet of Matthean Christology is communicated for the most part implicitly rather than explicitly. For example, Matthew identifies Jesus with Yahweh at Matthew 3:3, a citation that references Israel's God from Isaiah 40. For Matthew, the clear referent of "Lord" (rendering the divine name in the Hebrew text of Is 40:3) is Jesus himself. In fulfillment of Isaiah 40:3, John now prepares the way for Jesus (Mt 3:3). Additionally, by stressing Jesus' universal lordship at Matthew 11:27; 28:18, the evangelist affirms Jesus' inclusion in the "unique divine identity" (Bauckham 1998a, viii). And, while it is unlikely that the many attributions of "Lord" (kyrios) to Jesus function as christological titles on the level of the Gospel's story (i.e., by its characters), Matthew very likely wants his reader to hear these in line with the more elevated title (e.g., Mt 7:21; 8:2; 14:28; 15:22; 20:30).

Matthew also points to Jesus as "God with us" (Mt 1:23 [cf. Mt 18:20; 28:20]), indicating that in Jesus the divine presence is manifested with God's people (Kupp) (see Incarnation). In concert with this portrayal, Matthew highlights worship of Jesus. As with the title "Lord" used by various characters in the Gospel, characters may be "prostrating themselves" before Jesus (e.g., Mt 8:2) rather than "worshiping" him (both are senses of proskyneō). Yet Matthew capitalizes on the language of proskyneō, using it ten times in his Gospel, more than in the other three Gospels altogether (Mt 2:2, 8, 11; 8:2; 9:18; 14:33; 15:25; 20:20; 28:9, 17). He also begins and ends the story with *worship of Jesus: the magi worship the child Messiah (Mt 2:2, 8, 11), and the women at the tomb and the disciples in Galilee worship Jesus after his resurrection (Mt 28:9, 17). L. Hurtado argues that at least at Matthew 14:33; 28:9, 17, "it seems undeniable that the intended readers were to take the scenes as paradigmatic anticipations of the reverence for Jesus that they offered in their worship gatherings" (Hurtado, 338).

3.3. The Community of Disciples. Although Matthew focuses primarily on Christology in his Gospel, he is interested in shaping his audience to be a community of believers who live in light of the story of Jesus. Attending to this ecclesial shaping involves listening to Jesus' teachings about discipleship, watching Jesus' own example, and discerning how various characters provide examples or foils to following him (Brown 2002, 138-42; Wilkins, 172).

The community of disciples in Matthew is defined fundamentally by their trust in and allegiance to Jesus the Messiah. While the twelve disciples are portrayed as those of “little faith” (Mt 6:30; 8:26; 14:31; 16:8; 17:20), Matthew calls his readers to a more robust faith in Jesus and his messianic authority that resembles the *faith of various seekers who come to Jesus for healing (e.g., Mt 8:10; 9:2, 22, 29; 15:28). At the end of the Gospel, when Jesus commissions his disciples, their mission is to make disciples by baptizing them and teaching them to obey Jesus’ teachings (Mt 28:19). Baptism signals this trust in and allegiance to Jesus.

As the final commissioning also makes clear, discipleship in Matthew involves doing the will of God now expressed in Jesus’ teachings (Mt 7:21-23; 12:50; 19:17; 23:3; 28:19). By living in covenant faithfulness as the kingdom is inaugurated, Jesus’ disciples show themselves to be God’s children (Mt 5:43-48) (Pat-tarumadathil). For Matthew, the contours of covenantal, kingdom faithfulness are cruciform, following the pattern of Jesus’ way of service to others (Mt 16:24-26; 20:28). This focus on the other, especially those most vulnerable, is characteristic of Jesus himself (e.g., Mt 9:9-13; 19:13-15; 21:14-16). And Jesus commends such care of the vulnerable to his followers, especially in his references to “little ones” and “least of these” (Mt 10:42; 18:1-20; 25:31-46). These are status terms, and their use by Matthew illustrates that a life of sacrifice and service involves renouncing status ambitions by emulating those with little or no status (e.g., Mt 18:1-5; 19:30; 20:16; 20:25-27) (Brown 2002). Jesus also defines the community of believers by their practice of forgiveness. The prayer that Jesus provides for his followers asks for God’s *forgiveness as readily as it bestows forgiveness on others (Mt 6:12, 14-15). In the community discourse (Mt 18) Jesus reverses the human propensity for unlimited revenge by calling the church to unlimited forgiveness (Mt 18:21-22, alluding to Gen 4:24) (Brown 2012). He bases all human forgiveness in the lavish grace and forgiveness of God (Mt 18:23-35; see also Mt 26:28).

This pattern of discipleship cut from the cloth of Jesus’ own *ethic can be summed up as *love of God and neighbor, the two commands on which “all the Law and the Prophets hang” (Mt 22:40 [cf. Mt 7:12]). For Matthew, this God-centered and other-centered ethic is also expressed as the “weightier” (barys) matters of the law: “justice, mercy, and loyalty” (Mt 23:23). These themes of love, justice and *mercy emerge at significant moments in the narrative. For example, the opening beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount announce blessing on the merciful (Mt 5:7) and those who are committed to “justice” (dikaioynē) (Mt 5:6, 10). And the culminating “antithesis” of the sermon exhorts love of neighbor and even enemy (Mt 5:43-48). Matthew also twice includes a citation of Hosea 6:6 (“mercy not sacrifice”) to explain Jesus eating with sinners and his interpretation of the Torah (Mt 9:13; 12:7). Using Isaiah 42:1-4, Matthew characterizes Jesus’ ministry by mercy and justice for Israel and for all nations (Mt 12:18-21). These values of love, mercy and justice culminate in the last parable of Jesus’ fifth and final discourse, the parable of the sheep and the goats (Mt 25:31-46). Jesus’ followers will be surprised at the final judgment that their treatment of Jesus is precisely their merciful and just treatment of “the least of these” (Mt 25:40, 45) (Brown 2013).

Matthew is the only Gospel writer who refers to the ekklēsia, the *church (Mt 16:18; 18:17), and his use of the term is directed at his own post-Easter messianic community. His vision for the church emerges from Jesus’ teachings on discipleship as well as his promise to his disciples of future authority and *mission. The mission of the church is a continuation and a derivative of Jesus’ own mission. Jesus’ mission to Israel is the focus of his pre-Easter ministry (Mt 15:24), but by the end of the Gospel it is clear that the mission of Jesus enacted by the disciples goes out to all nations (Mt 28:19). This means that the church is comprised of both Jew and Gentile, with signs across Matthew that his primarily Jewish audience is in the early stages of Gentile mission (e.g., Mt 2:2; 15:21-28). It is the fruit-bearing, multi-ethnic church that will receive the kingdom (Mt 21:43). The broad strokes of the church’s mission are expressed in Matthew’s final scene, which focuses on Jesus’ mandate to make disciples from among all nations by baptizing them and by teaching them to obey all that he has commanded (Mt 28:19). The particular practices of the church for the world are also intimately connected to Jesus’ own mission (above). The church is to enact justice and mercy in Jesus’ name. They are to live as a community defined by God’s forgiveness and so marked and known by their forgiveness of others. The church is not defined by present status categories, and so its members are to live out a surprising equality of status (Mt 20:12-15, 25-28). And the church is to worship Jesus, the risen Messiah and Lord (Mt 28:9, 17).

Finally and most basically, the church’s mission and practices are rooted in its identity as those who follow Jesus the Messiah. As a community, their identity is marked by Jesus’ presence in their midst until the end of the age (Mt 1:23; 18:20; 28:20). So the church’s authority to teach and lead, to bind and loose (Mt 16:19; 18:18) (see Powell), is always a derived authority based on their experience of the presence of the one now given “all authority in heaven and on earth” (Mt 28:18).

4. Conclusion.

The author of Matthew writes to (primarily Jewish) believers in Jesus in the latter part of the first century A.D. to portray Jesus as God’s chosen Messiah, who represents both Israel’s mission and the very mission of God to restore Israel and bring hope to the nations. Jesus, as consummate teacher and fulfillment of Israel’s Scriptures, ushers in the kingdom of God through his self-giving, other-focused ministry and death. According to Matthew, Jesus’ messianic claims and mission are vindicated at his resurrection, when God grants him all authority. His ecclesial purposes include persuading his readers to respond in faith and covenantal loyalty to Jesus the Messiah and his teachings, and commissioning them to disciple others into the way of Jesus through the power and promise of Jesus’ presence with them.

See also BIRTH OF JESUS; CHRIST; CHRISTOLOGY; DEATH OF JESUS; ESCHATOLOGY; EXILE AND RESTORATION; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; MISSION; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; PARABLES; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN; SON OF DAVID; TYPOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: W. F. Albright and C. S. Mann, Matthew: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (AB 26; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1971); F. W. Beare, The Gospel according to Matthew: A Commentary (Oxford: Blackwell, 1981); C. Blomberg, Matthew (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1992); J. K. Brown, Matthew (TTBC; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, forthcoming); F. D. Bruner, Matthew: A Commentary (2 vols; Dallas: Word, 1990); D. A. Carson, Matthew (2 vols.; EBC 1, 2; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); W. Carter, Matthew and the Margins: A Sociopolitical and Religious Reading (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2000); L. Chouinard, Matthew (CPNIVC; Joplin, Missouri: College Press, 1997); W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew (3 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988-1997); R. T. France, The Gospel of Matthew (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); D. E. Garland, Reading Matthew: A Literary and Theological Commentary on the First Gospel (RNT; Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys, 2001); R. H. Gundry, Matthew: A Commentary on His Literary and Theological Art (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); D. Hagner, Matthew (2 vols; WBC 33A, 33B; Dallas: Word, 1993-1995); D. Hare, Matthew (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 1993); D. J. Harrington, The Gospel of Matthew (SP 1; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); W. Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: Exposition of the Gospel According to Matthew (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1973); D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew (NCB; London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1972); C. S. Keener, A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); U. Luz, Matthew: A Commentary, trans. W. C. Linss and J. E. Crouch, ed. H. Koester (3 vols.; Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989-2007); J. P. Meier, Matthew (NTMes; Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1980); P. S. Minear, Matthew: The Teacher’s Gospel (New York: Pilgrim, 1982); R. H. Mounce, Matthew (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); J. Nolland, The Gospel of Matthew (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); D. Patte, The Gospel According to Matthew: A Structural Commentary on Matthew’s Faith (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); D. Senior, Matthew (ANTC; Nashville: Abingdon, 1998); D. L. Turner, Matthew (BECNT; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2008); M. J. Wilkins, Matthew (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2004); B. Witherington III, Matthew (SHBC; Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys 2006). Studies: J. C. Anderson, Matthew’s Narrative Web: Over, and Over, and Over Again (JSNTSup 91; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1994); B. W. Bacon, Studies in Matthew (New York: Holt, 1930); R. Bauckham, God Crucified: Monotheism and Christology in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998a); idem, ed., The Gospels for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998b); D. R. Bauer, The Structure of Matthew’s Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (JSNTSup 31; England: Almond, 1998); R. Beaton, Isaiah’s Christ in Matthew’s Gospel (SNTSMS 123; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, trans. P. Scott (NTL; Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1963); J. K. Brown, Disciples in Narrative Perspective: The Portrayal and Function of the Matthean Disciples (SBLAB 9; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); idem, “Direct Engagement of the Reader in Matthew’s Discourses: Rhetorical Techniques and Scholarly Consensus,” NTS 51 (2005) 19-35; idem, “Genesis in Matthew’s Gospel,” in Genesis in the New Testament, ed. M. J. J. Menken and S. Moyise (LNTS 466; New York: T & T Clark, 2012); idem, “Matthew’s ‘Least of These’ Theology and Subversion of ‘Us/Other’ Categories,” in Matthew, ed. N. W. Duran and J. P. Grimshaw (Texts@Contexts; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2013);

F. W. Burnett, "Characterization and Reader Construction," Semeia 63 (1993) 3-28; R. A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); D. A. deSilva, Honor, Patronage, Kinship and Purity: Unlocking New Testament Culture (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000); C. Deutsch, Hidden Wisdom and the Easy Yoke: Wisdom, Torah, and Discipleship in Matthew 11.25-30 (JSNTSup 18; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); T. Donaldson, Jesus on the Mountain: A Study in Matthean Theology (JSNTSup 8; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985); R. T. France, Matthew: Evangelist and Teacher (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1989); S. Gathercole, "The Earliest Manuscript Title of Matthew's Gospel," NovT 54 (2012) 209-35; J. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); L. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); J. D. Kingsbury, "The Figure of Peter in Matthew's Gospel as a Theological Problem," JBL 98 (1979) 67-83; idem, Matthew as Story (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); D. D. Kupp, Matthew's Emmanuel: Divine Presence and God's People in the First Gospel (SNTSMS 90; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); R. Last, "Communities That Write: Christ-Groups, Associations, and Gospel Communities," NTS 58 (2012) 173-98; L. J. Lawrence, "For Truly I Tell You, They Have Received Their Reward' (Matt 6:2): Investigating Honor Precedence and Honor Virtue," CBQ 64 (2002) 687-702; A.-J. Levine, The Social and Ethnic Dimensions of Matthean Salvation History (SBEC 14; Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1988); idem, "Discharging Responsibility: Matthean Jesus, Biblical Law, and Hemorrhaging Woman," in Treasures New and Old: Recent Contributions to Matthean Studies, ed. D. R. Bauer and M. A. Powell (SBLSymS 1; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); J. H. Neyrey, Honor and Shame in the Gospel of Matthew (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); J. A. Overman, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: The Social World of the Matthean Community (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); H. Pattarumadathil, Your Father in Heaven: Discipleship in Matthew as a Process of Becoming Children of God (AnBib 172; Rome: Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 2008); J. T. Pennington, Heaven and Earth in the Gospel of Matthew (NovTSup 126; Leiden: E.J. Brill, 2007); M. A. Powell, "Binding and Loosing: A Paradigm of Ethical Discernment from the Gospel of Matthew," CurTM 30 (2003) 438-45; B. Repschinski, The Controversy Stories in the Gospel of Matthew: Their Redaction, Form and Relevance for the Relationship be- tween the Matthean Community and Formative Judaism (FRLANT 189; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2000); A. Saldarini, Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994); D. C. Sim, The Gospel of Matthew and Christian Judaism: The History and Social Setting of the Matthean Community (SNTW; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1998); K. Snodgrass, "Matthew and the Law," in Treasures New and Old: Recent Contributions to Matthean Studies, ed. D. R. Bauer and M. A. Powell (SBLSymS 1; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); G. N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992); A. Stock, The Method and Message of Matthew (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1994); M. B. Thompson, "The Holy Internet: Communication between the Churches in the First Christian Generation," in The Gospels for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences, ed. R. Bauckham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998b) 49-70; M. J. Wilkins, Discipleship in the Ancient World and Matthew's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995); J. Willits, Matthew's Messiah Shepherd-King: In Search of "The Lost Sheep of the House of Israel" (BZNW 147; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (COQG 1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992). J. K. Brown

MEALS. See TABLE FELLOWSHIP.

MERCY

Mercy is both disposition and action simultaneously in the Gospels; the one who has mercy is in the position to help another who is in dire need and incapable of self-help. This mercy is usually, but not always, based in some kind of prior relationship; often the covenant relationship between *God and his people is involved.

1. Old Testament Background
2. Gospels
3. Conclusion

1. Old Testament Background.

The word mercy can be represented by a number of different words in Hebrew and Greek. Often the English translation derives from the Hebrew word hesed (occasionally "mercy" is translated for rāham or hānan). The Hebrew concept of hesed, however, is quite complex and, as K. Sakenfeld has demonstrated, several different nuances appear to have developed over time: earlier stories of Israel connect the idea of hesed with grace and compassion, whereas in later writings (such as the prophets) the word was more often associated with *justice or, as in postexilic writings, with pious acts of mercy. In the poetical books God's hesed is the object of hope and trust, and it serves as the foundation for making an appeal to God for *forgiveness or deliverance. God is faithful, and his hesed is eternal and limitless. Humans too can show hesed to one another (e.g., Jonathan and David). Hesed occurs when a superior party provides an essential need to a weaker party that the latter could not provide. Although the superior is free not to perform acts of hesed (i.e., there is no legal obligation or redress if hesed is not performed), Sakenfeld argues that nonetheless there is a moral obligation on the part of the superior party. This obligation arises out of some kind of previous relationship. For God, his covenant with Israel results in faithfulness to helping Israel, even when Israel is unfaithful to God (see also Routledge).

The question of whether a prior relationship is integral to the idea of hesed has been challenged by F. Andersen. He acknowledges that a relationship usually exists between the two parties and that doing hesed is seen as the right thing to do in the given situation. Nonetheless, generous and beneficial action lies at the heart of hesed rather than any sense of obligation. When God does hesed, it is out of obligation to himself and his previous promise to Israel, which itself was based in grace and generosity rather than any merit on the part of Israel.

When considering concepts similar to hesed that appear in conjunction with the term, we note that a variety of nuances arise: mercy, compassion, love, grace and faithfulness, although no one word completely summarizes the concept (see Clark).

Overall, the OT concept of mercy, typically marked by the term hesed, involves action on behalf of another who is in need; mercy is not merely a feeling or emotion. The evidence from the Gospels suggests that this definition continued to be the understanding of mercy in the first century A.D., although the scope of hesed expands to include even those outside the covenant people of God.

2. Gospels.

Various forms of three Greek terms are used for the concept of mercy in the Gospels: eleos ("mercy") and splanchnizomai (often translated "to have compassion") are most common, although rarely oiktirmos ("mercy") also appears. Often people in need will call on Jesus to have mercy upon them, or Jesus is moved with compassion/mercy and performs some great deed. As with the OT concept, mercy in the Gospels always involves action. The Gospels never describe Jesus as having mercy without doing something to help. Rather, if mercy is present, then some action is provided to alleviate the suffering of those in need. Each of the Synoptic Gospels includes a different emphasis on mercy, while John's Gospel does not use the "mercy" word group.

2.1. Mercy in Mark's Gospel. In Mark's Gospel Jesus is always the one who performs acts of mercy; the description is not used of others. This mercy is demonstrated in a variety of ways: *healing, exorcism, *teaching, feeding. Mark emphasizes the power of Jesus in these acts as well as the abundance of his provision. Mercy is a matter of overflowing grace to those in need.

The first mention of mercy may occur in Mark 1:41, where some manuscripts describe Jesus as being filled with compassion (mercy) when he heals the *leper who begs Jesus to make him *clean. A textual variant occurs in some manuscripts, however, describing Jesus as being filled with anger. The latter reading is probably to be preferred (see Marcus, 1:209).

The first textually certain mention of mercy occurs in Mark 5:19. Jesus has just exorcised unclean spirits from a Gerasene man (see Demon, Devil, Satan), but when the man begs to go with him, Jesus replies, "Go home to your friends, and tell them how much the Lord has done for you, and what mercy he has shown you." The language is then repeated for emphasis: the man tells his friends "how much" the Lord has done for him, and the people are amazed (Mk 5:20). The implication is that the mercy that the man has received is abundant, beyond normal expectations.

Next, Mark records that Jesus had compassion on the crowds because they were like a sheep without a *shepherd, and he began to teach them many things (Mk 6:34). In this passage it is clear that mercy is not solely about material benefits such as healings. Mercy extends to the spiritual care of people. After the teaching Jesus miraculously provides food for the crowd of five thousand (see Table Fellowship). Similarly, in Mark 8:2 Jesus feeds a crowd of four thousand. In this case, he has compassion on the people because they have been with him for three days with nothing to eat. Both of these miracles underscore the abundance of the Lord's provision; all are fed, and numerous baskets of food are left over. Jesus' mercy leads to abundant provision.

The last two stories mentioning mercy in Mark involve those in need begging Jesus to have mercy on them. First, a father with a demon-possessed boy asks Jesus to heal his son if he is able (Mk 9:22). The disciples were unable to cast out the demon; Jesus is the father's last hope. This situation aptly demonstrates the OT concept of hesed noted above, where the party requesting hesed is in dire need and has nowhere else to turn for aid. In Mark 10:47-48 blind Bartimaeus repeatedly calls out to Jesus to have mercy on him, and Jesus heals him. In Mark's Gospel no one who asks for mercy is denied.

2.2. Mercy in Matthew's Gospel. Like Mark, Matthew includes stories of pleas for mercy followed by healings, as well as Jesus' compassion on the crowds. Matthew, however, emphasizes another element to mercy when he connects it to the commands of the OT. On three separate occasions Jesus rebukes the *Pharisees for failing to fulfill the law by their neglect of doing mercy. An additional emphasis is that of forgiveness, which is introduced in the parable of the unmerciful servant.

Several of the stories in Matthew parallel Mark's stories and are most likely derived from Mark. These include Jesus' compassion on the crowds who were like sheep without a shepherd (Mt 9:36 [although the feeding story is not attached here; rather, Matthew includes the statement that the harvest is plentiful but the laborers are few]), Jesus' compassion on those who were hungry after following him for three days (Mt 15:32 [after which the feeding of the four thousand occurs]), the father who requests Jesus to have mercy on his epileptic/demon-possessed son (Mt 17:15), and the two *blind men (as opposed to Mark's one) near Jericho who cried out twice for Jesus to have mercy upon them (Mt 20:30-31), to which Matthew adds the comment that Jesus was filled with compassion (Mt 20:34). Matthew also expands on Mark's version of the Canaanite woman who asks Jesus to cure her daughter, who was tormented by a demon; Matthew adds the specific cry for Jesus to have mercy on her (Mt 15:22). After initially ignoring the woman, Jesus eventually applauds her faith and grants her wish. The fact that this woman is not a Jew, however, points to the universal nature of the Gospel and thus undermines the suggestion that hesed is done to those with whom one has a previous relationship. Indeed, the woman likely would have been considered an enemy; the Jewish historian *Josephus describes people from Tyre as holding ill will against the Jews (Ag. Ap. 1.13) (see Gundry-Volf, 516). That Jesus should show mercy to one of Israel's enemies underscores the surprising expansion of the Gospel to all peoples. Theologically, this universal emphasis may highlight the idea that, by virtue of being creator and sustainer of the whole world, God is in relationship with all peoples and desires to offer mercy to all (Mt 5:44-45).

Two additional stories are very similar to Mark's material. Matthew has another report of Jesus healing two blind men who cried out to Jesus to have mercy on them (Mt 9:27), and he adds the comment before the feeding of the five thousand that Jesus had compassion on the crowds and healed their sick (Mt 14:14).

In Jesus' teaching material mercy is also emphasized. In Matthew 5:7 Jesus says, "Blessed are the merciful, for they will be shown mercy." The same lesson is illustrated, albeit in reverse, in the parable of the unmerciful servant (Mt 18:33), which is unique to Matthew. After having been forgiven an exorbitant amount of money (which, like the descriptions of mercy in Mark, emphasizes the abundance of God's mercy), the servant refuses to forgive a small amount owed to him by another slave. In a stunning reversal, the master revokes his forgiveness, telling the unmerciful slave that he should have had mercy upon his fellow slave, just as the master had mercy on him. The fact that the master revokes his original forgiveness suggests that God, though patient and merciful, does set limits (see Keener, 460-61). The emphasis on forgiveness as an aspect of mercy, however, presents a new direction when compared to Mark.

The importance of mercy is further highlighted by three separate instances where Jesus rebukes the Pharisees for neglecting to show mercy to others (Mt 9:13; 12:7; 23:23). In the first story Pharisees question why Jesus eats with tax collectors and *sinners, while in the second the Pharisees condemn Jesus' disciples for plucking heads of grain on the *Sabbath. In both cases Jesus directs the Pharisees to learn the true meaning of Hosea 6:6, "I desire mercy [hesed in the MT], not sacrifice." The point in these two passages is that the ministry of the kingdom, which focuses on human need, ultimately fulfills the law when mercy is present, even where a technical violation of the law has occurred (see Hagner, 1:330; Hicks, 84). In the final passage (the seven woes) Jesus condemns the Pharisees for tithing even garden herbs but neglecting the weightier matters of the law: justice, mercy, faith. These values are similar to those found in Micah 6:8: "What does the LORD require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness [hesed in the MT], and to walk humbly with your God?" (NRSV) and suggest that the Pharisees have imbalanced priorities (see France, 872-73). Jesus, in his Matthean role of reinterpreter of the law, emphasizes what truly matters to God: merciful acts to those in need. Such mercy ultimately defines righteousness (see Hinkle Edin, 356).

Overall, Jesus' provision of mercy in Matthew's

Gospel demonstrates that human need must be met with a practical response. While Matthew includes much of Mark's emphases on mercy as compassionate acts of healing and abundant provision, he also expands the concept of mercy to include forgiveness. Furthermore, mercy is one of the foundational precepts of the law itself.

2.3. Mercy in Luke's Gospel. Most of the occurrences of "mercy" in Luke are unique to his Gospel. Although some of the nuances (such as compassion that leads to healing) are the same as in Matthew and Mark, Luke adds an important element to the discussion: God's mercy leads God to fulfill his covenant promises. In fact, the first five occurrences of "mercy" stem from the joyous praise of God found in the birth narrative. Mary twice praises God for his mercy: God's mercy is for those who fear him from generation to generation, and God has helped Israel in remembrance of his mercy (Lk 1:50, 54). The refrain continues in the specific case of Elizabeth; her relatives hear that God had shown "his great mercy" to her (Lk 1:58). Zechariah joins the praise in Luke 1:72, 78, where he commends God for showing the mercy promised to the ancestors in remembering his covenant and predicts that, by the tender mercy of God, the dawn (i.e., the Messiah) will break forth to give light to those in darkness. The connection of God's mercy to the covenant here underscores the point that God acts because God is merciful (see Bock, 1:159; Green, 117). It is because God's nature is to be merciful and steadfast in his love that God has now fulfilled his covenant in Christ. Thus, the nuance of faithfulness to one's promises emerges from these Lukan uses of "mercy."

In Luke's record of Jesus' teaching several examples accentuate the need to be merciful. In Luke 6:36 Jesus commands his disciples to "be merciful, just as your Father is merciful." In offering this comparison, Jesus roots Christian behavior in the very character of God (see Green, 271). Jesus' teaching also includes three parables that refer to mercy. The first, the parable of the good Samaritan, records that the Samaritan was moved with compassion when he saw the beaten man lying on the side of the road (Lk 10:33). The story then describes the Samaritan's caring actions, which went above and beyond expectations. There is no explicit causal link between the compassion and the action (e.g., one might expect the text to read, "because he had compassion, he bound up the wounds"); rather, the lack of causation suggests that the actions themselves are the compassion. Mercy is not merely a feeling; rather, it is an emotion that necessarily involves action. Mercy does not exist if one who is able to help does not actively aid the person in need. This is further implied by Luke 10:37, where the lawyer responds to Jesus that the neighbor was the one who showed mercy (more woodenly in the Greek: the one who "did mercy"). This story, like the story of the Canaanite woman in Matthew, also emphasizes that a previous relationship is not a necessary feature of mercy. Jesus teaches that one's neighbor is any person in need whom one encounters; this stands in contrast to the rabbinic writings, where the command to love one's neighbor (Lev 19:18) was interpreted by most rabbis as applying only to fellow Jews (see Neudecker, 499).

The second of Luke's *parables involving mercy is that of the prodigal son. When the father from a distance sees his son returning, he is filled with compassion (Lk 15:20), runs out to meet him (an undignified action for a man in his position), and throws a grand party for the son who had previously shamed him. Luke here emphasizes the unexpected abundance of love demonstrated by the father.

The last parable in Luke to discuss mercy takes an unusual turn in that mercy is denied to one of the characters. In the parable of the rich man and *Lazarus the rich man finds himself in Hades and pleads with Abraham to "have mercy on me" by sending Lazarus to cool his tongue with a sip of water (Lk 16:24). Abraham denies the request, essentially demonstrating Jesus' previous teaching in Luke 6:38: as the rich man had measured, so now it was measured to him. The rich man had not helped Lazarus during their earthly lives, and so the rich man would not receive help from Lazarus now (see Bock, 2:1371-72). This theme of reversal of fortune recurs throughout Luke's Gospel, and here it serves as a warning that severe consequences result when one fails to offer mercy to others. Furthermore, it highlights the nuance of the later OT understanding of mercy as righteousness or right action. It would not have been just for Abraham to offer aid to the rich man, and thus it would not have been mercy.

In addition to Jesus' teachings, Jesus' actions in Luke's Gospel clearly demonstrate mercy for those in need. Like both Matthew and Mark, Luke includes the story of the blind man healed near Jericho after repeatedly pleading to Jesus to have mercy on him (Lk 18:38-39). Luke adds two new stories of mercy as well. First, when Jesus walks into Nain and meets a widow whose only son has died, he is moved with compassion (Lk 7:13). No one has asked Jesus for mercy or demonstrated great faith; rather, he approaches the woman's son of his own accord and raises the son from the dead. This demonstrates that it is Jesus' nature to have mercy; he does not wait for a request before he feels compelled to respond to a need. In the second story ten lepers approach Jesus and cry out for him to have mercy on them (Lk 17:13), and they are made clean.

Thus, although most of Luke's uses of "mercy" are unique to his Gospel, he nonetheless describes themes similar to those found in Matthew and Mark: mercy is abundant provision to those who are in need; it often involves healing; mercy is required of those who would be Jesus' disciples; and mercy is both an emotion and righteous action simultaneously. To this Luke adds the explicit nuance of God's covenant faithfulness, which is consistent with the Hebrew understanding of God's hesed for his people.

2.4. Mercy in John's Gospel. None of the various words for "mercy" occur in John's Gospel. This does not mean, however, that John lacks a theology of God's mercy. Rather, it appears that for John, the concept of God's mercy is captured by other phrases, such as "grace and truth" (Jn 1:14, 17). John likely uses this phrase to allude to God's "steadfast love and faithfulness," a paired expression found in OT passages such as Exodus 34:6, where the term hesed is used (see Lincoln, 105-6). Jesus, then, embodies the ultimate expression of God's mercy.

3. Conclusion.

Mercy in the Gospels is consistent with the various OT meanings of hesed: compassion, acts of mercy, grace, forgiveness and faithfulness. This mercy can be demonstrated in acts of physical provision such as healing, exorcism and feeding. It can also address spiritual needs, such as teaching and forgiveness. Mercy is never simply a feeling; it always involves action to help those in need. Furthermore, the abundance of mercy is often emphasized in the Gospels. Jesus' expectation of his disciples was that they would show mercy just as they themselves had received mercy; this was one of the key attitudes in the law that Jesus highlighted. In addition, mercy is not only for those with whom one is in covenant relationship; mercy is offered to all people.

See also FORGIVENESS OF SINS; GOD; HEALING; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; LOVE, LOVE COMMAND; RICH AND POOR.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. Andersen, "Yahweh, the Kind and Sensitive God," in God Who Is Rich in Mercy: Essays Presented to Dr. D. B. Knox, ed. P. O'Brien and D. Peterson (Homebush, NSW: Lancer, 1986) 41-88; D. Bock, Luke (2 vols.; BECNT 3A, 3B; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994-1996); G. Clark, The Word Hesed in the Hebrew Bible (JSOTSup 157; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); R. T. France, The Gospel of Matthew (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); J. Gundry-Volf, "Spirit, Mercy, and the Other," ThTo 51 (1995) 508-23; D. Hagner, Matthew (2 vols.; WBC 33A, 33B; Waco, TX: Word, 1993-1995); J. M. Hicks, "The Sabbath Controversy in Matthew: An Exegesis of Matthew 12:1-14," ResQ (1984) 79-91; M. Hinkle Edin, "Learning What Righteousness Means: Hosea 6:6 and the Ethic of Mercy in Matthew's Gospel," WW (1998) 355-63; C. Keener, A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); A. Lincoln, The Gospel According to Saint John (BNTC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson; New York: Continuum, 2005); J. Marcus, Mark: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (2 vols.; AB 27, 27A; New York: Doubleday, 1999; New Haven: Yale University Press, 2009); R. Neudecker, "And You Shall Love Your Neighbor as Yourself—I Am the Lord' (Lev 19:18) in Jewish Interpretation," Bib 73 (1992) 496-517; R. Routledge, "Hesed as Obligation: A Re-Examination," TynBul (1995) 179-96; K. D. Sakenfeld, The Meaning of Hesed in the Hebrew Bible: A New Inquiry (HSM 17; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978). S. Nicholson

MESSIAH, MESSIANIC EXPECTATION. See CHRIST; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS.

MIDRASH

The Hebrew noun midraš (pl. midrašim) is derived from the verb dāraš, which means "to search [for an answer]." Midrash accordingly means "inquiry," "examination" or "commentary." Only in the rabbinic writings, however, is "midrash" used as a technical term for scriptural interpretation (an interpretative procedure) or for a collection of scriptural interpretations (a type of literature). Scholars therefore refer to "midrashic" interpretation and rabbinic "midrashim." Midrash has also been discussed against the broader background of ancient scriptural interpretation and textual transmission in general. It has become increasingly apparent that portions of the NT itself reflect aspects of midrash. Indeed, there has been considerable scholarly interest in the question of to what extent Jesus and the evangelists may have employed midrashic exegesis.

1. Semantic Development
2. Rabbinic Midrash
3. Midrash in Jesus and the Gospels
4. The Gospels as Midrash

1. Semantic Development.

The verb darāš occurs in a variety of contexts in the OT, meaning “to seek,” “to inquire,” or “to investigate.” It could refer to seeking God’s will (2 Chron 17:4; 22:9; 30:19; Ps 119:10), making inquiry of God through prophetic oracle (1 Sam 9:9; 1 Kings 22:8; 2 Kings 3:11; Jer 21:2) or investigating a matter (Deut 13:14; 19:18; Judg 6:29). However, only in Ezra 7:10, which declares that Ezra the scribe “set his heart to study the law of the Lord,” is this verb associated with the study of the Torah. This later development is anticipated in several scriptural texts: “Great are the works of the LORD, studied by all who delight in them” (Ps 111:2); “I have sought your precepts” (Ps 119:45 [cf. Ps 119:94, 155]); “Observe and search out all the commandments of the LORD your God” (1 Chron 28:8).

The nominal form, midrāš, occurs in the OT only twice, meaning “story,” “book” and possibly “commentary” (2 Chron 13:22; 24:27). This noun also appears in several Qumran passages, referring to an inquiry of the community (1QS VI, 24), communal study (1QS VIII, 26) or the study of the Torah (1QS VIII, 15; CD-B XX, 6). In 4Q174 I, 14 the term midrāš introduces a string of proof texts that are typical for the thematic pesharim (see Dead Sea Scrolls). Philo urges readers of writings to join him in searching (ereuneō = darāš) Scripture (Det. 57, 141; Cher. 14). In none of these passages, however, is the term midrāš used as a technical term for scriptural interpretation. This usage is documented only in the rabbinic literature, which employs midrash as a standard exegetical method to interpret, elucidate or expound the biblical text.

2. Rabbinic Midrash.

In the writings of the rabbis the term midrāš is used to designate either a type of literature or an interpretative procedure. As a type of literature, rabbinic midrash refers to a written work that presumes the existence of a closed, fixed biblical text, which is actualized through an (almost) endless combination of individual elements. As an independent entity that is holy and fixed for all time, Scripture can be called upon to answer all kinds of religious questions. One of the most distinctive features of rabbinic midrashim is the existence of multiple synonymous, complementary or even contradictory interpretations of a single verse, which typically are introduced with the phrase “another interpretation” and listed one after another. The openness of the biblical text to diverse interpretations, however, does not necessarily imply the absence of a systematic theological framework. J. Neusner has repeatedly argued that the theological ideas that inform rabbinic interpretation form a coherent system of various generalizations about God and God’s self-manifestation in Scripture. With the help of midrash, the rabbis transformed the historical accounts of biblical narratives into exemplary patterns that govern the present life and the life to come. In this way, they were able to make scriptural teaching relevant to new circumstances and issues.

As an interpretative procedure, midrash refers to a creative employment of various exegetical techniques, such as etymology, word play, catchwords, analogy and logical inference to interpret Scripture. Many of these techniques focus on minute details in the text, such as individual words or the shapes of the letters, without regard to the authorial intention or a larger literary context in which they appear.

2.1. Rules of Midrash. Midrashic interpretations are frequently guided by specific hermeneutical principles, called middōt, which developed over time. The first list of seven rules is attributed to Hillel the Elder. This list appears in two versions, one in Tosefta Sanhedrin 7:11 and ʿAbot de Rabbi Nathan [A] §37, and one in the introduction to Sipra, which are not completely consistent. Hillel himself employs only two of the seven middōt attributed to him (qal wāḥōmer and gezērā šāwā). These inconsistencies indicate that middōt are secondary literary constructions of the editors of rabbinic works for the purpose of demonstrating the rational and systematic character or the rabbinic hermeneutical endeavor. Rabbinic exegetical rules share many similarities with Greco-Roman rhetorical strategies. These correspondences could be either generic (Daube) or accidental (Lieberman). Ascription of the development of coherent methods of scriptural interpretation to prominent rabbinic figures such as Hillel may have been motivated by a desire to detach them from the Hellenistic world and thus “rabbinize” them. The fact that all of these rules are utilized in the Gospels indicates their general character and a widespread appeal.

(1) Qal wāḥōmer (“Light and heavy”). According to this rule, what is true or applicable in a “light” (or less important) instance is surely true or applicable in a “heavy” (or more important) instance. This rule is not necessarily an exegetical technique but rather a general principle of analogy that is frequently employed in Greco-Roman rhetoric and nonexegetical rabbinic collections. It is plainly in evidence when Jesus assures his disciples that because God cares for the birds (light), they can be sure that he cares for them (heavy) (Mt 6:26; Lk 12:24).

(2) Gezērā šāwā (“An equivalent regulation”). According to this rule, one passage may be explained by another if they share similar words or phrases, regardless of whether they deal with similar subjects. Comparing himself to David, who on one occasion violated the law by eating consecrated bread (1 Sam 21:6), Jesus justifies his apparent violation of the Sabbath (Mk 2:23–28).

(3) Binyan āb mikkātūb ʿēhād (“Constructing a father [i.e., principal rule] from one [passage]”). Since God is the God not of the dead but of the living, the revelation at the burning bush, “I am the God of Abraham . . .” (Ex 3:14–15), implies that Abraham is to be resurrected. From this one text and its inference one may further infer, as Jesus did in Mark 12:26, the truth of the general resurrection.

(4) Binyan āb ābššēnē kētūbīm (“Constructing a father [i.e., principal rule] from two writings [or passages]”). From the commands to unmuzzle the ox (Deut 25:4) and share sacrifices with the priests (Deut 18:1–8) it is inferred that those who preach are entitled to support (Mt 10:10; Lk 10:7; 1 Cor 9:9, 13; 1 Tim 5:18).

(5) Kēlāl ūpērāt ūpērāt ūkēlāl (“General and particular, and particular and general”). When Jesus replies that the greatest commandment (the “general”) is to love the Lord with all one’s heart (Deut 6:4–5) and to love one’s neighbor as one’s self (Lev 19:18), he has summed up all of the “particular” commandments (Mk 12:28–34).

(6) Kayyōsē’ bō bēmāqôm ʾāhēr (“Like something in another place [or passage]”). If the Son of Man (or the Messiah) is to sit on one of the thrones set up before the Ancient of Days (Dan 7:9) (which is how Rabbi Akiba interprets Daniel’s plural reference to “thrones” [cf. b. Hag. 14a; b. Sanh. 38b]), and if the Messiah is to sit at God’s right hand (Ps 110:1), it may be inferred that when the “Son of Man comes with the clouds (Dan 7:13–14), he will be seated at the right hand of God and will judge his enemies. This is evidently what Jesus implied in his reply to Caiaphas (Mk 14:62).

(7) Dābār halāmēd mēʿinyānō (“Word of instruction from its context”). This rule is exemplified in Jesus’ teaching against divorce (Mt 19:4–8). Although it is true that Moses allowed divorce (Deut 24:1–4), it is also true that God never intended the marriage union to be broken, as implied in Genesis 1:27; 2:24.

Tradition holds that these rules were expanded to thirteen by Ishmael, a rabbi of the second century (cf. Baraita de Rabbi Ishmael §1 in the prologue to Sipra). However, like the traditions about Hillel, most of the stories about Ishmael describe him using only qal wāhōmer and gezērā šāwā. Rabbi Eliezer ben Yose the Galilean is credited with further expanding these rules, particularly as they relate to the interpretation of narrative. He is probably the author of the tractate Thirty-Two Rules for Interpreting the Torah (also called the Baraita of Thirty-Two Rules [cf. the beginning of Midrash Mishnat R. Eliezer and beginning of Midrash ha-Gadol on Genesis]). Most of these thirty-two rules, rules that made it possible to enjoy the “savory dishes of wisdom” (m. ʾAbot 3:19), were applied to homiletical, not legal, midrash.

2.2. Halakah and Haggadah. It is customary to classify rabbinic midrash into two basic categories: halakah and haggadah. These categories are distinguished not by method, but by objectives. Halakah (hālākā, from hālak, “to walk”) refers to a legal ruling (pl. hālākôt). Hence, halakic midrash is in reference to legal interpretation. The purpose of halakot was to build an oral “fence” around written Torah, making violation of it (written Torah) less likely (m. ʾAbot 1:1; 3:14). Haggadah (haggaā, lit., “telling,” from the root nāgad, “to draw”) refers to the interpretation of narrative and is usually understood as homiletical or nonlegal interpretation (pl. haggadôt). Best known is the Passover Haggadah (cf. b. Pesah. 115b, 116b). Haggadic midrash was much more imaginative in its attempts to fill in the gaps in Scripture and to explain away apparent discrepancies, difficulties and unanswered questions. Legal rulings were not to be derived from haggadic interpretation (cf. y. Peʾah 2:6). At the same time, however, many haggadic passages are based on legal principles or have practical application. In view of this overlap between halakah and haggadah, G. Porton proposes an alternative division between expositional midrashim, which provide running commentary on a given book, and homiletical midrashim, which focus on only a few verses of a given book or conjoin several nonconsecutive biblical verses around a major theme (Porton 1981). A similar division has been adopted by J. Neusner, who distinguishes three types of rabbinic midrash: (1) verse-by-verse exegesis of a given scriptural book; (2) propositional compositions formed from groups of diverse verses and their exegesis; (3) the repetition of the same point in sequential exegesis of a given book of Scripture (Neusner 2004).

2.3. Rabbinic Periods. The rabbis of the pre-Mishnaic period (50 B.C.–A.D. 200) are referred to as the Tannaim (i.e., the “repeaters”), while the rabbis of the later period (“early”: A.D. 200–500; “late”: A.D. 500–1500) are referred to as the Amoraim (i.e., the “speakers,” from āmôrā, “interpreter”). Given their proximity to the time of Jesus’ ministry and the emergence of the early church, the Tannaitic traditions are of the greatest value for NT interpretation.

2.4. Rabbinic Literature. The legal corpus in which halakic concerns predominate is made up of Mishnah (lit., “repetition” or “[memorable] paragraph” [ca. A.D. 200]), Tosefta (lit., “supplement [to Mishnah]” [ca. A.D. 300]) and Talmud (lit., “learning” [Palestinian/Jerusalem, ca. A.D. 500; Babylonian, ca. A.D. 600]; note that the word for “disciple” is talmid, “one who learns”) (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Many of the halakot found in the Mishnah date back in one form or another to the time of Jesus (e.g., cf. Mk 2:16 and m. Demai 2:3 concerning being the guest of a nonobservant Jew; Mk 3:1-6 and m. Šabb. 14:3-4; 22:6 concerning healing on the Sabbath; Mk 7:3-13 and m. Ned. 1:3 concerning qorban). It was believed that the oral law ultimately derives from Moses: “Many rulings were transmitted to Moses on Sinai [and] . . . all of them are embodied in Mishnah” (y. Pesah. 2:6).

Many of the nonlegal works are called “midrashim” (“commentaries”). From the Tannaitic period we have Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael (on Exodus), Sipre Numbers, Sipre Deuteronomy and Sipra Leviticus. From the early Amoraic period we have Midrash Rabbah (on the Pentateuch and the Five Scrolls), Midrash on the Psalms, Pesiqta Rabbati, Pesiqta de Rab Kahana, Seder Elijah Rabbah and Midrash Tanhuma. Tannaitic tradition is often found in these writings as well (and when it is, it is called baraita).

2.5. Midrash and Jewish Exegetical Literature. In the past, scholars have frequently regarded midrash as a broad category that includes not only rabbinic interpretation but also translation/paraphrase (LXX, Targumim), rewritten Scripture (Reworked Pentateuch, Jubilees, Temple Scroll, Genesis Apocryphon, Pseudo-Philo’s Biblical Antiquities, *Josephus’s Jewish Antiquities), the Qumran pesharim and Philo’s exegetical commentaries. In recent study, however, there is a conscious effort to distinguish rabbinic midrash from other types of Jewish exegetical endeavors with regard to their literary genres, social locations, theological outlooks and exegetical aims. The classification of exegetical texts into those that employ implicit exegesis by intertwining text and interpretation and those that employ explicit exegesis by formally separating scriptural quotations (the lemma) from interpretative comments is especially helpful here. Rabbinic midrashim, along with the pesharim of Qumran and Philo’s commentaries, belong to the latter category because they clearly distinguish the words of Scripture from the explanatory comments (which could also include short stories, dialogues among several sages, or extended monologues). The differences between them, however, should not be overlooked. Unlike the pesharim, rabbinic midrashim do not reflect an apocalyptic mindset and do not promote a singular interpretation of a given scriptural text. Unlike Philo’s commentaries, rabbinic midrashim do not show preference for allegorical exegesis for accessing the timeless truths of Scripture.

3. Midrash in Jesus and the Gospels.

Even though midrash proper is a post-70 A.D. rabbinic phenomenon, some of the biblical exegesis found in the Gospels reflects midrashic principles. As were the students of the rabbis, the followers of Jesus were called “disciples” (mathētēs, “learner” = talmid). B. Gerhardsson and R. Riesner have argued that Jesus’ teaching has been carefully preserved by his disciples, who had been taught according to rabbinic practices (see Teacher). Comments such as “You search the Scriptures” (Jn 5:39; 7:52; cf. Philo, Det. 13; b. Ta’an. 5b), “Go and learn” (Mt 9:13; cf. S. Eli. Rab. §18 [94]; Num. Rab. 8:4, on Num 5:6), “Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me” (Mt 11:29-30; cf. m. ‘Abot 3:5; m. Ber. 2:2, 5) and “Hear” (Mt 21:33; cf. m. Ber. 2:2; b. Šabb. 13b), found throughout the Gospels, echo the language of midrash and exegetical dispute (note Jn 3:25: “A dispute [zētēsis] arose between some disciples of John and a Jew concerning purification” [cf. Acts 6:9; 9:29; 15:7]). Surely the comment “You search the Scriptures because you suppose that you find life in them” (Jn 5:39) has in mind the widespread rabbinic conviction that “more Torah means more life” (credited to Hillel [cf. m. ‘Abot 2:8; cf. 2:7]), and that “Torah is for eternal life” (credited to Ishmael [cf. Mek. Pisha’ §16, on Ex 13:3]). Specific exegeses preserved in the Gospels closely parallel, and at times are apparently part of, midrashic interpretations that were current in the first century A.D., some of which were later incorporated into rabbinic literature. The comparative method for tracing the development of various interpretative traditions associated with specific scriptural passages that was proposed by R. Bloch is still one of the most useful tools for reconstructing the interpretative moves of the NT authors.

3.1. Matthew. The Matthean infancy narrative (see Birth of Jesus) is rich with scriptural allusions and themes that to some extent reflect midrashic principles and practice. When the evangelist presented the genealogy of Jesus in three clusters of fourteen generations each (Mt 1:2-17), he probably was hinting at the numerical value of the Hebrew name "David" (dwd: 4 + 6 + 4 = 14), the messianic ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1:1). The "star" in Matthew 2:7 very likely echoes Numbers 24:17 ("A star shall come forth out of Jacob, and a scepter shall arise out of Israel"), as its interpretation in midrash and Targum would seem to indicate (e.g., "A mighty king of the house of Jacob shall reign, and shall be anointed Messiah, wielding the mighty scepter of Israel" [Targum Pseudo-Jonathan]). Evidently both Philo (Praem. 95) and Josephus (J.W. 6.312-13) understood Numbers 24:17 as messianic. When the evangelist tells us that Jesus' return from Egypt fulfilled Hosea 11:1 ("Out of Egypt I have called my son" [Mt 2:15]), he likely has interpreted Hosea in the light of the similar passage in LXX Numbers 24:7-8 ("There shall come a man out of his seed, and he shall rule over many nations. . . . God led him out of Egypt"). Dwelling in "Nazareth" fulfills the prophets (Mt 2:23), probably because the three root consonants of "Nazareth" (nšr) are common to the word "branch" (nēšer), a word that has messianic overtones (cf. Is 11:1 [nēšer]; Is 49:6 [nšyry]; Jer 23:5; 33:15; Zech 3:8; 6:12 ["sprout," šemah]; cf. also Judg 13:5-7 ["nazarite," nēzir] (see Nazarene).

3.2. Mark. In several places Mark's Gospel gives evidence that Jesus was acquainted with Israel's Scriptures as they were interpreted in the synagogue of his day (Chilton 1984). When Jesus paraphrased Isaiah 6:10, "lest they repent and it be forgiven them" (Mk 4:12), he has followed the Targum ("and it be forgiven them"), not the Hebrew ("and I heal them"). When Jesus cited Isaiah 66:24, "where their worm does not die and the fire is not quenched," as descriptive of Gehenna (Mk 9:47-48), it is again clear that he had not the Hebrew in mind, which does not mention Gehenna, but the Targum: "for their spirits will not die, and their fire will not be quenched, and the wicked will be judged in Gehenna." Jesus' reworking of Isaiah's Song of the Vineyard (Is 5:1-7) into a parable directed against Jerusalem's religious leaders (Mk 12:1-11), instead of the nation as a whole (as it is in Isaiah), likely reflected the Targum's insertion of "sanctuary" (Tg. Isa. 5:2), and the rabbinic interpretation that Isaiah 5:1-7 specifically predicted the destruction of the temple and its altar (cf. t. Me'il. 1:16; t. Sukkah 3:15; Tg. Isa. 5:5).

3.3. Luke. One of Luke's most remarkable accomplishments is the framing and enrichment of the infancy narrative in terms of the stories and language of the OT. Most impressive are the echoes of the infancy narrative of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam 1-2).

*Mary's Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55) is modeled after Hannah's song of thanksgiving following the birth of Samuel (1 Sam 2:1-10). In fact, the Magnificat is replete with scriptural allusions (e.g., cf. Lk 1:48 with LXX 1 Sam 1:11; Lk 1:50 with Ps 103:17). When Luke wrote that "Jesus increased in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and people" (Lk 2:52), he undoubtedly had in mind the similar progress report concerning Samuel: "Now the boy Samuel continued to grow both in stature and in favor with the Lord and with people" (1 Sam 2:26).

3.4. John. The opening verses of the Johannine prologue reflect midrashic interpretation at many points. We are told that the Word [logos] existed with God from the beginning, that all things were made through the Word, and that the Word was the source of light and illumination (esp. Jn 1:1, 4-5, 9) (see Logos). All of these ideas are found in the midrashim and targumim: "You find that at the very beginning of the creation of the world, the King Messiah had already come into being" (Pesiq. Rab. 33:6); "By my Word [memra] I have perfected the heavens" (Tg. Isa. 48:13; cf. 45:12); "And the Word of the Lord said, 'Let there be light'" (Frg. Tg. Gen. 1:3); "The earth was void and empty and darkness was spread over the face of the abyss. And the Word of the Lord was the light and it shone" (Tg. Neof. Exod. 12:42 [cf. Gen. Rab. 1:6, on Gen 1:1]).

The Fourth Gospel presents us with an interesting comparison between Jesus and Jacob. When Jesus tells the astonished Nathanael, "You will see heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man" (Jn 1:51), he has alluded to Genesis 28:12, where the patriarch Jacob saw the staircase of *angels in a dream. According to midrashic traditions, the angels came down to gaze upon Jacob because his image was on God's throne in heaven (Frg. Tg. Gen. 28:12; cf. Gen. Rab. 68:12, on Gen 28:12). Indeed, one interpretation understands that the angels ascended and descended on Jacob, and not simply on the staircase (Gen. Rab. 69:3, on Gen 28:12). The Fourth Evangelist probably wanted to invite his readers to view Jesus as superior to the patriarch, for Jesus, not Jacob, is the true image of God, and it is Jesus the Son of Man, not Jacob, upon whom the angels ascend and descend. A similar concern likely underlies Jesus' encounter with the woman at the well (Jn 4:10-26). "When our father Jacob lifted up the stone from upon the mouth of the well, the well surged up, and continued to surge up for twenty years" (Frg. Tg. Gen. 28:10). In contrast, Jesus offers water that will "surge up" not for twenty years, but for an eternity (Jn 4:14).

4. The Gospels as Midrash.

Some scholars have argued that the Gospels themselves, in their entirety, represent instances of midrashim. J. Drury suggests that the variations in the Synoptic parallels may represent midrashic embellishment and creation. M. Goulder has argued that the Gospels are midrashim whose contents have followed primitive Jewish Christian lectionaries. One scholar has suggested that Mark's Gospel constitutes a "gigantic midrash" on the Hexateuch and Lamentations (Derrett, 1:38; see also Miller). Another scholar, A. Maynard, has argued that the Fourth Gospel is a midrash of the three Synoptic Gospels. But these conclusions are problematic.

Has Mark really produced a midrash on various OT books? On the contrary, he has not given us an interpretation of the Hexateuch; he has given us an interpretation of Jesus. His primary task was not to interpret the written words of Scripture but rather to interpret the life, death and resurrection of a historical figure. It is true that Mark, like other early Christian interpreters, could not explain the significance of Jesus without a dialogue with the sacred texts, but surely it is inaccurate to describe the Gospel of Mark as a whole as a midrash on parts of the OT. B. Chilton has offered a more accurate assessment (Chilton 1986). According to him, the Gospels share certain affinities with midrashic paraphrase and probably should be regarded in places as "midrashic" but not "midrash," as "targumic" but not "targum." Reaching a conclusion that is compatible with Chilton's findings, F. Downing has compared the evangelists' use of sources, particularly Luke's use of Mark, to Josephus's use of the LXX. It probably is best to conclude, therefore, that the evangelists' interpretation of the OT and their respective presentations of the story of Jesus are to an extent midrashic in character but not midrashim.

See also OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS; TARGUMS; TYPOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. Bakhos, ed., Current Trends in the Study of Midrash (JSJSup 106; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); R. Bloch, "Methodological Note for the Study of Rabbinic Literature," in Approaches to Ancient Judaism: Theory and Practice, ed. W. S. Green (BJS 1; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978) 51-75; D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson, eds., It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture: Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, SSF (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 99-140; B. D. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (GNS 8; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1984); idem, Targumic Approaches to the Gospels: Essays in the Mutual Definition of Judaism and Christianity (StJud; Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1986); D. Daube, "Rabbinic Methods of Interpretation and Hellenistic Rhetoric," HUCA 22 (1949) 239-64; J. D. M. Derrett, The Making of Mark: The Scriptural Bases of the Earliest Gospel (2 vols.; Shipston-on-Stour: Drinkwater, 1985); F. G. Downing, "Redaction Criticism: Josephus' Antiquities and the Synoptic Gospels," JSNT 8 (1980) 46-65; JSNT 9 (1980) 29-48; J. Drury, "Midrash and Gospel," Theology 77 (1974) 291-96; E. E. Ellis, "Midrash, Targum and New Testament Quotations," in Neotestamentica et Semitica: Studies in Honour of Matthew Black, ed. E. E. Ellis and M. Wilcox (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1969) 61-69; idem, "Biblical Interpretation in the New Testament Church," in Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading, and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. J. Mulder (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988) 691-725; R. T. France and D. Wenham, eds., Studies in Midrash and Historiography (GP 3; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1983); B. Gerhardsson, The Origins of the Gospel Traditions (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); M. Gertner, "Midrashim in the New Testament," JSS 7 (1962) 267-92; M. D. Goulder, Midrash and Lection in Matthew (London: SPCK, 1974); R. Kern-Ulmer, "Theological Foundations of Rabbinic Exegesis," in Encyclopedia of Midrash: Biblical Interpretation in Formative Judaism, ed. J. Neusner and A. J. Avery-Peck (2 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005) 2:944-64; J. L. Kugel and R. A. Greer, Early Biblical Interpretation (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); R. le Deaut, "Apropos a Definition of Midrash," Int 25 (1971) 259-82; S. Lieberman, Hellenism in Jewish Palestine: Studies in the Literary Transmission, Beliefs and Manners of Palestine in the I Century B.C.E.-IV Century C.E. (2nd ed.; TSJTSa 18; New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1962); A. H. Maynard, Understanding the Gospel of John (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1991); B. McNeil, "Midrash in Luke?" HeyJ 19 (1978) 399-404; D. Miller, The Gospel of Mark as Midrash on Earlier Jewish and New Testament Literature (Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1990); M. P. Miller, "Targum, Midrash, and the Use of the OT in the NT," JSJ 2 (1971) 29-82; J. Neusner, Midrash in Context: Exegesis in Formative Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, What Is Midrash? (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); idem, Judaism and the Interpretation of Scripture: Introduction to the Rabbinic Midrash (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004); idem, "Theology of Rab-binic Midrash,” in Encyclopedia of Midrash: Biblical Interpretation in Formative Judaism, ed. J. Neusner and A. J. Avery-Peck (2 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005) 2:964-78; D. Patte, Early Jewish Hermeneutic in Palestine (SBLDS 22; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975); G. Porton, “Defining Midrash,” in The Study of Ancient Judaism, ed. J. Neusner (2 vols.; New York: Ktav, 1981) 1:55-92; idem, Understanding Rabbinic Midrash: Texts and Commentary (Hoboken, NJ: Ktav, 1985); idem, “Hermeneutics, A Critical Approach,” in Encyclopedia of Midrash: Biblical Interpretation in Formative Judaism, ed. J. Neusner and A. J. Avery-Peck (2 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005) 1:250-68; R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Ein Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung (3rd ed.; WUNT 2/7; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988); G. Vermes, “Bible and Midrash: Early OT Exegesis,” in The Cambridge History of the Bible, ed. P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans (3 vols.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970) 1:199-231; A. G. Wright, The Literary Genre Midrash (Staten Island, NY: Alba House, 1967).

C. A. Evans and L. Novakovic

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES

The Synoptic Gospels most often use “deeds of power” (dynamis [Mt 11:20-21, 23; 13:54, 58; 14:2; Mk 6:2, 5, 14; Lk 10:13; 19:37; cf. Lk 5:17; Acts 2:22]) to identify the activities of Jesus regarded as miracles. Luke also uses “remarkable/strange things” (paradoxa [Lk 5:26]) and “sign” (sēmeion [Lk 23:8]). The Fourth Gospel also uses “sign” (sēmeion [Jn 2:11, 23; 3:2; 4:48, 54; 6:2, 14, 26; 7:31; 9:16; 11:47; 12:18, 37; 20:30]) and “signs and wonders” (sēmeia kai terata [Jn 4:48]). Luke also calls them “wonders” (terata [Acts 2:22; cf. Heb 2:4]) and, perhaps, “doing good” (euergetōn [Acts 10:38]).

More often, Jesus’ miracle working is conveyed through stories of obviously remarkable feats, such as walking on water (Mt 14:22-33 // Mk 6:45-52; cf. Jn 6:16-21), or through noting the simplicity of the methods used (e.g., Mt 8:8 // Lk 7:7), sometimes over against noting the severity of the illness (e.g., Mk 5:25-26; Jn 5:1-9), or the response of the crowd or Jesus’ spreading fame (e.g., Mk 1:27-28). The space given to the stories, and the summaries (e.g., Mt 8:16-17 // Mk 1:32-34 // Lk 4:40-41), draws further attention to these activities and their perceived importance. Although not taken into account in this article, Jesus is also credited with being involved in events generally regarded as miraculous: his *birth, *transfiguration, *resurrection and *ascension.

1. Jesus
2. Early Interpreters
3. Mark
4. Matthew
5. Luke
6. John
7. Summary of the Gospels
8. Recent Interpreters

1. Jesus.

We know of no other figure from the period who has as many miracle stories associated with him. That miracle working was of central importance to Jesus, and to those who knew him, can be gauged from six lines of evidence. (1) Every Gospel tradition connects miracle working with the large crowds that Jesus attracted: Q (e.g., Mt 12:23 // Lk 11:14), Mark (e.g., Mk 1:45; 3:9), M (passages peculiar to Matthew [e.g., Mt 4:25]), L (passages peculiar to Luke [e.g., Lk 7:11]) and John (e.g., Jn 6:2; 12:9-18). (2) Mark, the earliest Gospel, depicts Jesus drawing crowds almost entirely because of his miracles (Mk 1:32-34, 45; 2:1-2, 13; 3:7-12). (3) The request, found in all four Gospels, for a sign to authenticate Jesus’ status arises out of his reputation as a miracle-worker (Mt 12:38-39; 16:1-4; Mk 8:11-13; Lk 11:16, 29; Jn 6:30; cf. Jn 2:12-22), which was refused perhaps because cosmic or eschatological signs were associated with the promises of false prophets (Acts 5:36-37; Josephus, Ant. 18.85; 20.97, 169). (4) Jesus was remembered as a miracle-worker, evident in the use of his name by other healers (e.g., Mk 9:38; Origen, Cels. 1.6, 67; PGM 4.1227, 3019-20; Justin, Dial. 30.3; 76.6; 85.2; 2 Apol. 6; Arnobius, Adv. gent. 1.46); and Josephus appears to know a tradition in which Jesus was remembered primarily as a miracle-worker (Ant. 18.63-64). (5) Jesus can consider himself primarily a miracle-worker (Mt 11:4-6 // Lk 7:22-23) and describe his ministry in terms of conducting miracles, in that they, without preaching, could bring *repentance (Mt 11:21 // Lk 10:13; cf., e.g., Jn 6:14). (6) Jesus’ miracles gave rise to conflict with authority, which led to his eventual arrest (Mt 9:1-8 // Mk 2:1-11 // Lk 5:17-26; Jn 9:1-41).

1.1. Exorcism. From the stories (e.g., Mk 1:21-28; 5:1-20; 7:24-30; 9:14-29) and the summaries, the most frequent type of Jesus’ healings is exorcism, often listed separately (e.g., Mt 8:16-17 // Mk 1:32-34 // Lk 4:40-41; Mk 3:10-11 // Lk 6:17-18; Mt 10:1 // Lk 9:1). Along with the prominence of exorcisms, linking them with the downfall of Satan and his power (Mk 3:23-27; Mt 12:25-29 // Lk 11:17-22) gives the impression that Jesus saw his ministry as a battle against the *demonic and its impurity (cf. Mk

1:23; 4QS IV, 9-10) (see Klutz, 125-37).

1.2. Healings. Jesus is also said to *heal cripples and the paralyzed (Mt 9:1-8 // Mk 2:1-12 // Lk 5:17-26; Mt 12:9-14 // Mk 3:1-6 // Lk 6:6-11; Mt 8:5-13 // Lk 7:1-10; cf. Jn 4:46-54; Lk 13:10-17; Jn 5:1-18), give sight to the *blind (Mk 8:22-26; Mt 9:27-31 // 20:29-34 // Mk 10:46-52 // Lk 18:35-43; Jn 9:1-7), raise the dead (Mt 9:18-26 // Mk 5:21-43 // Lk 8:40-56; Lk 7:11-17; Jn 11:1-57), cleanse lepers (Mt 8:1-4 // Mk 1:40-45 // Lk 5:12-16; 17:11-19), and perform other healings (Mt 8:14-15 // Mk 1:29-31 // Lk 4:38-39; Mt 9:18-26 // Mk 5:21-43 // Lk 8:40-56; Mt 15:29-31 // Mk 7:31-37; Lk 14:1-6; 22:50-51). These are portrayed not only as acts of compassion, but also as acts in which God is involved (e.g., Mk 2:1-12).

1.3. Techniques. There are aspects of Jesus' technique that would have been familiar to his audience: the brevity of his exorcistic commands (cf. 11Q11; Justin, Dial. 85.3; Origen, Cels. 4.33-44) all having parallels in ancient magic (Twelftree 2006, 83); his commands dependent on (or infused with) a power-authority (Mt 12:28 // Lk 11:20); using spittle to cure blindness (Jn 9:6; Tacitus, Hist. 4.81), and using pigs into which to transfer demons (Mk 5:12-13; cf. Plato, Resp. 398a). The dramatic confrontation between Jesus and demoniacs (see Mk 1:23-24; 5:6-7) may be an expression of the belief that the presence of spiritual power could threaten demons (Pesiq. Rab Kah. 4.5; PGM 4.2145-240; 12.270-350; 36.275-83). Yet, there are elements of Jesus' methods that appear distinctive: there is no evidence that he collected, maintained or used artifacts or a library of incantations (cf. PGM 5); and he does not pray (cf. 1QapGen ar XX; b. Ber. 34b; b. Ta'an. 24b) or mention his power-authority when healing (cf. Acts 16:18; 19:13).

1.4. Magician? Some accused Jesus of performing exorcisms by Satan (Mt 9:34 // 12:23 // Mk 3:23 // Lk 11:15). In that the charges of being a "false prophet" (pseudoprophētēs) or "deceiver" (planos) or "magician" (magos) were very closely associated (Justin, Dial. 69.7; b. Sanh. 43a; 107b; Acts Thom. 96, 102, 106-107) and were associated with the devil and demons (Acts 13:6-12; Rev 16:13-14; 19:20; Justin, Dial. 7.3; 69; Origen, Cels. 1.68; Jub. 48:9-11; CD-A V, 17-19; Herm. 43), Jesus probably was being accused of being a magician—that is, being in league with the devil and leading people astray (Stanton).

1.5. Nature Miracles. The historicity of the so-called nature miracles is often thought difficult to establish: a large catch of fish (Lk 5:1-11; Jn 21:4-14); a coin in a fish's mouth (Mt 17:24-27); stilling a storm (Mt 8:23-27 // Mk 4:35-41 // Lk 8:22-25); feeding a multitude (Mt 14:13-21 // Mk 6:32-44 // Lk 9:10-17 // Jn 6:1-15; Mt 15:32-39 // Mk 8:1-10); walking on the sea (Mt 14:22-33 // Mk 6:45-52 // Jn 6:16-21); a fig tree withered (Mt 21:18-19, 20-22 // Mk 11:12-14, 20-26); and turning water into wine (Jn 2:1-12). Only the disciples appear to be aware of them, suggesting that they were not widely known, and they are not mentioned in the sayings of Jesus or in the summaries of his miraculous activity, raising questions about their historicity; and they echo OT motifs and the theology and practices of the early church (Blackburn 1994, 370-71), suggesting to some interpreters that they were significantly embellished or created by the early church.

1.6. Jesus' Interpretation of His Miracles. As a healer, Jesus was recognized as a *prophet (cf. Mk 6:1-4; 8:27-30) (Hooker), but in light of sayings that most likely reflect his intentions, his miracles contributed to his self-understanding as God's anointed individual at the center of eschatological events (see Mt 11:4-6 // Lk 7:22-23; cf. Is 29:18; 35:5; 42:7; 18: 61:1; Ps 146:8; 4Q521 2 II, 8, 12). Particularly important is the saying "If by God's Spirit/finger I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Mt 12:28 // Lk 11:20 [cf. Is 61:1; Tg. Isa. 42:1-4]) (see Holy Spirit). Jesus almost certainly was claiming that his exorcisms made evident that he was endowed with the eschatological Spirit and was therefore himself an eschatological figure. The miracles were not signs or evidence of the coming of God's reign; in themselves they were the kingdom of God expressed in the lives of those healed (see Mt 11:4-6 // Lk 7:22-23).

In the parable of the strong man (Mt 12:29 // Mk 3:27 // Lk 11:21-22) Jesus also expresses the view that his exorcisms are the destruction of Satan. Although Satan was expected to be destroyed in the eschaton (e.g., Is 24:21-22; 1 En. 10:4-6; 1QS IV, 18-19), Jesus is the first to connect exorcism with Satan's downfall. Given that he considered himself to be involved in events of eschatological significance, Jesus probably made the connection between exorcism and the defeat of Satan because the demons that he was evicting were understood to be minions of Satan (cf. 11Q13 III, 24; also, e.g., 11Q13 II, 12-13; 4Q387^a 3 III, 4; Jub. 10:7-8). However, reflecting a two-stage defeat of Satan held at the time (e.g., Is 24:22; 1 En. 10:4-6, 11-13), Jesus probably took his exorcisms to be the first stage of the defeat that would be completed in the eschaton (cf. Mt 13:24-30).

2. Early Interpreters.

2.1. The Q Tradition. The importance of Jesus' miracles for this reconstructed tradition (see Q) is seen from thaumaturgical themes being integral to it (e.g., Lk 17:6), and in one of the two major narratives being of the healing of the centurion's servant (Lk 7:1-10; cf. Lk 4:1-13), and the only other brief narrative mentions Jesus "casting out a demon that was mute" (Lk 11:14). This material is used to show that Jesus' miracles, of central importance to his ministry (Lk 7:22; 10:13), are empowered by the Spirit, not Satan (Lk 11:14-15, 17-19), and that they are visible expressions of the coming of the kingdom of God (Lk 11:20) in which people are rescued as if spoil from a guarded castle so they can be gathered as followers of Jesus (cf. Lk 11:24-26). Despite difficulties and rejection (Lk 9:57-60; 10:3, 10-12), there is also the expectation that Jesus' followers will perform miracles as part of their mission (Lk 10:9).

2.2. Paul. Paul provides very little direct information about Jesus, but he may be referring to Jesus' miracles in Romans 15:18-19. In also talking about his own miracles, his statement about Christ working through him only has force if he thought Jesus conducted miracles. In the parallelism "by the power of signs and wonders, by the power the Spirit of God" Paul is expressing the same view as the Jesus tradition, that his own miracles are also the activity or expression of the Spirit (Mt 12:28 // Lk 11:20).

Paul also takes up Jesus' theme of the kingdom of God (Rom 14:17; 1 Cor 4:20; 6:9, 10; 15:24, 50; Gal 5:21; 1 Thess 2:12; cf. Eph 5:5; Col 1:13; 4:11; 2 Thess 1:5; 2 Tim 4:1; 4:18), and he also connects it with his own preaching and with his miracle working, and, like Jesus, he associates both with empowerment by the Spirit (1 Cor 4:20; 1 Thess 1:5).

3. Mark.

The importance of miracles for the earliest Gospel is evident in almost half of the narrative before Jesus' arrival in Jerusalem (Mk 11:1) being concerned with miracles, and in the expectation that his followers would be miracle-workers (Mk 3:15; 6:7, 13; 9:18).

3.1. Divine Man? The view that Mark was correcting the portrait of Jesus as a "divine man" (theios anēr), which he found in the miracle stories, has been laid to rest. The legendary or historical genius, or religious hero, whose indwelling by the divine brought divinity and supernatural power, which was expressed in miracle working, turns out to be a figment of scholarly imagination. The term "divine man," which was not a fixed expression, is relatively rare in Greek literature, and it is not ascribed to those who were thought to be sacred or who distinguished themselves by conducting miracles (Blackburn 1991).

3.2. Denigrating the Miracles? The idea that Mark was emphasizing the *passion at the expense of the miraculous, depicting Jesus as powerless, or reluctantly including the miraculous is also not credible. Given the amount of space given to the miracle stories, they are no less significant than the passion. Mark also writes positively of the miracles (e.g., Mk 1:27-28; 2:12; 4:41), stressing their magnitude (e.g., Mk 5:3, 26; 9:18), even equating them with the *gospel (Mk 1:1, 14-15; 3:19-30). The interrelated importance of the miracles and the passion is seen in noting that, on the one hand, language and imagery in the miracle stories point to a self-giving Savior (Mk 6:41; 8:6; cf. Mk 14:22) and adumbrate the passion (Mk 9:26-27), and that, on the other hand, the passion is accompanied and interpreted by the miraculous (Mk 15:33, 38; 16:1-8), so that Jesus' miracles and his self-giving death are an interpretive whole.

3.3. Miracles Identify Jesus. Mark links many themes to the miracle stories—for example, failure of the Jews (Mk 8:1-12); inclusion of the *Gentiles (Mk 5:1-20; 7:24-30; 8:1-10); the power of Jesus over impurity (Mk 1:23), sin (Mk 2:1-10) and Satan (Mk 3:21-27); and the ability of Jesus to protect his followers (Mk 4:35-41). However, Mark's consistent interest, and the overarching function of the miracle stories, probably was to identify Jesus. In relation to the miracles, specifically the exorcisms, the demons are said to know Jesus (Mk 1:24, 34; 3:11; 5:7). In Jesus' forgiving and healing a paralytic, the question is asked, "Who can forgive sins but God alone?" and the crowd glorifies God (Mk 2:7, 12). Jesus is shown to have the right to override the *Sabbath (Mk 3:2), to be empowered by the Spirit (Mk 3:19-30), and to bring *salvation (Mk 10:47-52). Moreover, in walking on the water, for example, Mark portrays Jesus as God himself uniquely present (Mk 6:47-52; cf. Ex 33:17-23; Job 9:8).

3.4. Miracles and Teaching. The first miracle story is set in the context of Jesus teaching, and the crowd is amazed over the teaching as well as the miracle (Mk 1:27). Mark goes on to portray the crowds seeking Jesus as a healer (cf. Mk 1:32-34, 37), but Jesus' response is to say that he must proclaim the message (Mk 1:38), even though Mark then says that Jesus went throughout Galilee speaking as well as exorcising (Mk 1:39). The tension between Jesus' wishing to teach though being sought as a healer is also seen in the ensuing story of Jesus teaching at home, yet being sought as a healer (Mk 2:1-12; cf. 3:1-6). Expressing the unity of Jesus the teacher and miracle-worker, blind Bartimaeus, who expects Jesus to heal him, addresses Jesus as "teacher" (rabbouni [Mk 10:51]; cf. Mk 4:38; m. Ber.

2:5-7; m. ʾAbot 1:6). As a healer, then, Jesus is addressed and sought as *teacher (cf. Mk 9:28), and in his teaching he is sought as a healer. Jesus' activity and identity involve both.

3.5. Miracles as Parables. Mark understands Jesus' miracles not as unequivocal signs (cf. Mk 8:11-13), but as parabolic or ambiguous in their significance (see Parables). From one perspective, miracles are the defeat of Satan (Mk 3:23); from another, they are the realization of the kingdom of God (Mk 1:15). Some see them as empowered not by the Spirit but by Satan (Mk 3:20-30). The miracles provoke both hostility to Jesus and *worship of God (e.g., Mk 2:1-11), and even the disciples do not grasp their meaning (Mk 4:35-41; 6:51-52; 8:14-21). As much as in other aspects of Jesus' ministry (e.g., Mk 2:13-17; 11:15-18; 12:1-12), miracles brought about conflict with the religious leaders (e.g., Mk 3:1-6), a conflict that saw its climax in the passion. As with the parables, faith is required to perceive their meaning (cf. Mk 4:10-12, 40; 8:14-21).

3.6. Jesus Cannot Be Hidden. Some commands to silence make the point that Jesus' identity is improperly comprehended apart from his passion (Mk 1:34; 3:12). Other injunctions to silence highlight the inability of Jesus' ministry to be hidden (Mk 1:45; 5:19-20; 7:36). In some miracle stories a command to silence would be senseless or unnecessary because these miracles, taking place in the presence of a crowd, spark Jesus' spreading fame (Mk 1:29-31; 2:1-12; 3:1-6; 5:25-34; 9:14-29; 10:46-52) to Gentiles. Representing Mark's readers, they receive Jesus with acclaim equal to that accorded by the Jews (Mk 5:1-20; 6:53-56; 7:24-8:10). The impossibility of Jesus being hidden is captured in the irony of the last verse of the Gospel (Mk 16:8).

3.7. Miracles as Models. In that the disciples are called to emulate the ministry of Jesus (cf. Mk 3:14-15), the miracle stories are models for the healing ministry of the readers. That Mark intends the miracle stories to teach how to carry out healing can be seen from the structure of his narrative: the called disciples (Mk 3:15) only sent out on mission after having been with Jesus the teacher and miracle-worker (Mk 6:7-13). More widely from Mark's narrative, readers could assume that followers of Jesus would be able to heal because they have his authority to cast out demons and his power to heal the sick (cf. Mk 1:15; 5:30; 9:38). Also, didactic intent is explicit in the story of the healing of the epileptic boy (Mk 9:14-29), where *prayer, an exercise in faith (cf. Mk 6:5-6; 9:19; 11:24), is enjoined as a method of exorcism (Mk 9:29).

3.8. Miracles and Faith. So integral is faith in Jesus' healing that, apart from the exorcisms, all the healing stories include some expression of trust in Jesus before, during, or after the healing. Notably, all occurrences of the noun "faith" (pistis) are associated with a miracle story (Mk 2:5; 4:40; 5:34; 10:52; 11:22). *Faith is essential not only in Jesus being willing (Mk 2:5; 3:5; 5:36; 7:29; 9:14-29; 10:51), but also in his ability to perform miracles (Mk 6:5-6; cf. Mk 5:34). Miracles are, for Mark, an encouragement—a summons or demand to repentance and faith (cf. Mk 1:15)—to be with Jesus (Mk 3:14; 5:18), to follow him (Mk 10:52), or to serve him (Mk 1:31) on the basis of the eschatological *salvation offered in the miracles (Mk 10:48, 51).

4. Matthew.

In establishing Jesus as the Messiah, as *son of David and *Abraham, as well as his conception by the Holy Spirit, and his name as "Jesus" ("Joshua" in Hebrew, related to the verb "to save") (Mt 1:18-21), readers know that God will be saving his people from their sins, and that the miracles will embody and manifest salvation (cf. Mt 8:23-27).

4.1. Word and Deed. Together, the great sermon (Mt 5-7) (see Sermon on the Mount) and the miracle stories (Mt 8-9) form a two-part panel portraying Jesus as the new *Moses, who teaches (Mt 5:1-2) and performs miracles (both Ex 7-12 and Mt 8-9 have ten miracles). However, in being placed second in this arrangement, the miracles take second place to the teaching. This view, reinforced through Matthew's place in the NT, has become part of the orthodoxy of mainstream Christianity and established in Jesus scholarship.

Jesus' ministry of word and deed is to be reflected in the ministry of his followers (Mt 10:1-42). In that the disciples do not go out on mission in Matthew's narrative, it is in the narrative of the readers he expects this twofold ministry is to be carried out (Mt 28:16-20).

In following each three cycles of stories in Matthew 8-9 with teaching by Jesus, Matthew uses the miracle stories to develop a number of themes relating to discipleship. In the first cycle of stories the sufferers are among the outsiders: a leper (Mt 8:2), a Gentile (Mt 8:5) and a woman (Mt 8:14). Readers would be encouraged in their mission to the Gentiles, and Gentile readers would be encouraged in receiving healing salvation from Jesus. In the final story of the first cycle the healed woman serves Jesus (Mt 8:15), a theme that Matthew then develops (Mt 8:18-22). The theme of discipleship (particularly its difficulty [Mt 8:23-24, 34]) is also taken up from the second cycle of stories (Mt 9:9-13), but *Christology is of prime importance (Mt 8:27, 33-34), as can be seen in people glorifying God (Mt 9:8). The third cycle is introduced by the theme of newness (Mt 9:14-17) that goes beyond the issues of *fasting and mourning the dead to raising the dead, so that the amazed crowd concludes that nothing like Jesus' ministry has been seen in Israel (Mt 9:33).

4.2. Christology. When compared with Mark, the most obvious feature of Matthew's miracle stories is that they are (except for Mt 15:21-28 // Mk 7:24-30) abbreviated by abridging the narratives while simultaneously expanding the discourse. This focuses attention on the elements of interest to Matthew, especially Christology, in which the title "Son of David" is significant (this is the only Gospel with the phrase "the Son of David" [Mt 12:23; 21:9, 15]). In that the title is used mostly in the healing miracles (Mt 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30, 31; cf. Mt 1:1, 20; 21:9, 15), they are, as for Mark, revealing Jesus' true identity. Matthew portrays this revelation as progressive: from "Never was anything like this seen in Israel" (Mt 9:33), to "Can this be the Son of David?" (Mt 12:23 [expecting a negative answer]), to the bold statement "Hosanna to the Son of David!" (Mt 21:15). Matthew's unexplained practice of introducing a second sufferer (Mt 8:28; 9:27; 20:30) may be to supply a second witness to the credibility of the confession (cf. Mt 26:60; Dt 17:6).

The Jesus of the miracles is also God himself acting mightily among his people. In the story of the calming of the sea, for example, the disciples' initial address to Jesus (Mt 8:25) resembles the sailors' cry to God in Jonah 1:4. And Jesus' rebuke to the winds and the sea recalls God controlling the chaos and sea in the OT (e.g., Ps 33:7; Jer 31:35). In the story of the healing of the paralyzed man the scribes' accusation of blasphemy arises because Jesus has acted in God's place by forgiving the man's sins (cf. Ex 34:6-7; Is 43:25; Dan 9:9; CD-A III, 18). In walking on water, something accomplished only by God in the OT (Job 9:8; cf. Mt 14:25 with Ex 14:24), Jesus is also portrayed as God, and Peter's cry to Jesus (Mt 14:30) echoes the psalmist's cry to God (Ps 69:1).

4.3. A Wonder Worker? Although the crowd responds in wonder or amazement (thaumazō [Mt 8:27; 9:33; 15:31; 21:20]; existēmi [Mt 12:23]), this is, for Matthew, an incomplete understanding of Jesus. For example, while the amazed disciples only question who Jesus is after he has calmed the storm and draw no particular conclusions about Jesus (Mt 8:27), the stories immediately following present a crescendo of understanding and acclamation in view of Jesus' wonders: first the demons call him "Son of God" (Mt 8:29; cf. Mt 12:23), and then God is glorified in light of the paralytic being healed (Mt 9:8; cf. Mt 15:31).

4.4. Exorcisms. Matthew has downplayed both Jesus as an exorcist and the role of exorcism in the ministry of the disciples, perhaps due to difficulties that he saw exorcists caused (cf. Mt 7:15-23). Nevertheless, Matthew considered that Jesus' exorcisms revealed his identity, were the first stage in the defeat of Satan performed in the power of the Spirit, and, with the other miracles (Mt 11:2-6), were evidence God's new reign had arrived (Mt 12:28 // Lk 11:20).

4.5. Miracles in Nature. The function of the non-therapeutic miracles may be gleaned from their connection to the four places where the followers of Jesus are reprimanded for having "little faith." For example, Peter is, at least initially, successful in walking on the water. On noticing the strong wind, he becomes frightened and sinks, whereupon Jesus reprimands him for having "little faith" (Mt 14:31), probably because he had just seen Jesus, using severely limited resources, feed the five thousand (Mt 14:13-21; cf. Mt 6:30; 8:26; 16:8). Therefore, the function of these nontherapeutic miracles is to teach followers of Jesus to have faith rather than "little faith" in Jesus' ability to care for his followers in difficult life situations.

4.6. Faith. Trust in Jesus enables miracles to take place, as well as to be understood (cf. Mt 13:54-58). However, the miracles in themselves neither create faith nor dispel doubt, but only confirm the distance between Jesus and those who do not understand the source and nature of his miracles (Mt 12:14, 24; 14:33, 35; 15:30-31; 19:2; 21:16). The origin of faith is in seeing Jesus for who he is, as in the case of the leper who, on seeing Jesus coming down the mountain, knelt before him (Mt 8:1-2). It is faith that evinces the compassionate Jesus' willingness to heal (Mt 8:2). This means that salvation is also available for Gentiles who have faith (Mt 8:6). Yet, in the healing of Peter's mother-in-law there is no mention of faith. Jesus, independently informed, asks absolutely no conditions to heal her (Mt 8:14-15). When faith is evident, no matter how small (Mt 17:20), it is a practically expressed confidence in Jesus' ability and willingness to heal.

4.7. The Shadow of the Cross. More clearly than in the other Gospels, in Matthew the miracles anticipate the cross. The exorcisms, especially, cause the Pharisees to begin to plot against Jesus (Mt 12:14), and the Last Supper is foreshadowed in the feeding of the five thousand; both stories are set “when it was evening” (Mt 14:15; 26:20), and the same key vocabulary in the same order is used in each story for Jesus taking, blessing, breaking and giving the bread to the disciples (Mt 14:29; 26:20-29). The parallel is heightened by Matthew omitting mention of the fish in the distribution to the crowd (Mt 14:29). The second feeding story also looks forward to the Eucharist (Mt 15:36) and is also a foretaste of the messianic banquet with the Gentiles (cf. 2 Bar. 29:1-8; 4 Ezra 6:52) (see Table Fellowship).

5. Luke.

Of the Synoptic Gospels, Luke appears to have the most vested in the miracles, identifying Jesus as the eschatological prophet, Messiah and Lord, who is empowered by the eschatological Spirit.

5.1. Miracles and the Spirit. The agenda that Luke sets for Jesus (Lk 4:18-19), and the saying about Jesus casting out demons by the finger of God (Lk 11:20) (which he would have understood as God’s hand or Spirit [cf. Ex 7:4-5; 8:19; 9:3, 15; 31:18]), leave no doubt that Luke saw God’s Spirit as the source of Jesus’ miracles. Thus, the Spirit gives rise not only to prophecy but also to the miracles of Jesus (cf. Lk 4:14, 31-44).

5.2. Miracles and “Power.” Another way Luke attributed the miracles of Jesus to God was through the use of “power” (dynamis). Luke’s concept of power is to be understood not against a background of magic, but rather in light of the LXX. Reflecting the LXX, Luke uses dynamis of “the host of heaven” (Lk 21:26; cf. Is 34:4 [B]) and associates dynamis with God (Lk 5:17; 22:69; cf. Ps 20:14 [ET 21:13]; 53:3 [ET 54:1]; 139:8 [ET 140:7]) and the Spirit (Lk 1:17, 35; 4:14; cf. Ps 32:6 [ET 33:6]; Is 61:1-2), and of a miracle itself (Lk 10:13; 19:37; cf. Ps 76:15 [ET 77:14]; 144:4 [ET 145:4]). Notwithstanding, this power can be portrayed as an impersonal force working independently of Jesus (Lk 6:19), as well as immediately and impersonally in response to his contact with a believer (8:46) (see Turner).

5.3. The Ambiguity of Miracle. As with the other Gospel writers, Luke recognizes the ambiguity of the miracles of Jesus, seen most clearly in the accusation that his exorcisms are empowered by Satan (Lk 11:14-23; cf. Lk 6:11). Jesus’ defense is that it is logically impossible for Satan to cast out Satan (Lk 11:17-18; cf. Acts 19:13-17). Instead, it is by the finger of God, or God himself (Lk 11:20), that Jesus is empowered. Also, Luke portrays Jesus as a prophet bringing God’s authentic voice (Lk 4:24-27, 32; cf. Ex 4:15-16; Acts 10:36) or the “word of God” (Lk 5:1; 8:11, 21; 11:28). Further, rather than describe a self-aggrandizing magician (cf. Acts 9:9-24), Luke gives attention to Jesus’ poverty (Lk 2:7, 12, 16, 24; 9:58), his ministry to the poor (e.g., Lk 4:18; 7:22); his reliance on the support of others (Lk 8:1-3), his teaching on humility (Lk 14:7-14; 18:9-17; 22:24-27), his commendation of humility in others (Lk 7:1-10), and in his own humility (Lk 22:27).

5.4. Miracles as the Work of God. Having established that the coming of Jesus is the saving visitation of God (Lk 1:69-79), Luke rewrites the healing stories to highlight Jesus’ miracles as the work of God. For example, where Mark says simply that the demons knew Jesus (Mk 1:34), Luke has the demons cry out, “You are the Son of God!” (Lk 4:41), a term that Luke uses as almost identifying Jesus with God (Lk 1:35; cf. Lk 8:39; 9:43; Acts 20:28). Frequently, the person healed (Lk 5:25; 7:16; 13:13; 17:15; 18:43) or the crowd (Lk 5:26; 7:16 [cf. 13:17]; 18:43) praises God. That the healings can be salvation is seen in the use of the verb sōzō for both healing (Lk 6:9; 8:36, 48, 50; 17:19; 18:42) and salvation (Lk 7:50; 8:12; 9:24; 13:23; 18:26; 19:10). Yet, healing and salvation are not identical; for a miracle to be experienced as God’s mercy or salvation, thanksgiving is to be added to faith (Lk 17:16, 19).

5.5. Miracles and Faith. In his delaying the call of the first disciples (Lk 5:1-11) until after Jesus has performed miracles (Lk 4:31-41; cf. Mk 1:16-31) gives the impression that discipleship is based not only on Jesus’ teaching, but also on his miracles. This perspective is confirmed in the call story itself (Lk 5:1-11). Also, it was after obeying Jesus’ call to “put out into deep water” and catching so many fish that the nets were beginning to break that Simon “fell down at Jesus’ feet” (Lk 5:8), an act of worship, and was then called by and followed Jesus (Lk 5:10-11). Also, after the story of the healing of the paralytic Luke omits mention of teaching (cf. Mk 2:1-14), so the call of Levi to discipleship follows immediately after the miracle (Lk 5:18-28). In line with this, Luke draws attention to “seeing” what Jesus was doing as grounds for response to his ministry (Lk 10:23). Then, in the story of the *triumphal entry into Jerusalem Luke has the crowd cry out because of “all the mighty works that they had seen” (Lk 19:37).

Similarly, faith as a direct response to miracle is also important in Luke. The theme arises early in that, on being healed, Simon’s mother-in-law is said to begin to serve them (Lk 4:39 // Mk 1:31), “to serve” (diakoneō) being a way of describing not only the immediate act as service, but also *discipleship (see Lk 8:3; 12:37; cf. Lk 10:13 // Mt 11:21; Lk 18:35-43; Acts 6:8; 7:60; 14:3-4).

As well as a basis for faith, Luke portrays miracle as a result of faith, as in Jesus responding to the centurion's declaration by saying that he has not found such faith in Israel. It is then said that the servant was found to be in good health (Lk 7:1-10; cf. Lk 7:50; 8:25, 48; 17:19; 18:42).

Miracle as both a basis for and a result of faith is illustrated in the story of the cleansing of the ten lepers (Lk 17:11-19), in which the question of the nature of faith is the context of this story (Lk 17:5-10). The final verse in the story ("your faith has made you well") shows Luke thought faith was the preparation for the healing (Lk 17:19). But in having one leper, on discovering that he was healed, return to Jesus "praising God with a loud voice" also shows that faith is the proper response to a miracle. Notably, this verse (Lk 17:15) is one of a number of places where Luke shows that the object of faith is not the miraculous powers of Jesus, but *God (Lk 13:13; 18:43; 19:17).

5.6. Mission and Miracle. When the Twelve are sent out on *mission (Lk 9:2), Luke displaces the story of Jesus' rejection (Lk 4:16-30 // Mk 6:1-6a), so that the mission follows immediately after a series of dramatic miracle stories (Lk 8:22-56) and is seen to arise out of the miraculous activity of Jesus that they have witnessed. The disciples' mission can also be seen as Jesus needing to enlist the help of others in light of his very successful early mission (cf. Lk 10:2).

5.7. Exorcism. In contrast to Mark, who begins his Gospel giving the impression that exorcism is the most significant aspect of Jesus' ministry (Mk 1:21-28) yet goes on to reduce its place in the ministry of Jesus (there is no hint of exorcism after Mk 9:41), Luke maintains the place of exorcism in Jesus' ministry. To begin with, empowered by the Spirit (Lk 1:35; 3:16, 22; 4:1, 14, 18), Jesus not only preaches the kingdom of God (Lk 4:18, 43) and heals (Lk 4:18, 40), but also exorcises (Lk 4:31-39; cf. Lk 4:40-44). To sustain the place of exorcism in Jesus' ministry, Luke also inserts brief mentions of Jesus dealing with the demonic (Lk 6:17-19; 7:21 // Mt 11:3-4; Lk 13:32; 11:14-23 // Mt 12:22-30 // Mk 3:22-27; Lk 11:24-26 // Mt 12:43-45; Lk 13:10-17).

Luke also turns healing stories into exorcisms. In the healing of Simon's mother-in-law Luke says that Jesus "stood over her" (cf. PGM IV.745, 2735; Lucian, Philops. 31) and "rebuked" the fever, actions characteristic of an exorcist (Lk 4:35, 39, 41). The crippled woman who was healed is said to "have a spirit of infirmity" (Lk 13:11) and to be loosed from being bound by Satan (Lk 13:16). Yet, Luke also portrays Jesus dealing with the demonic as if he were performing a healing. In the summary of healings at the beginning of the Sermon on the Plain Luke does not say that Jesus rebuked the unclean spirits, but that he "healed [therapeuō] those who were troubled with unclean spirits" (Lk 6:18).

It is not the case that Luke thought that all illness was caused by demons (there is no specific demonic dimension to the healing of the lepers [Lk 5:12-16; 17:11-19]), but in the blurring of the distinction between healing and exorcism, sickness is given a demonic and cosmic dimension; and in all healing God's adversary is being subdued and the person released as a prisoner from jail (cf. Lk 4:18; 11:14-23).

Exorcisms were important to Luke because God was at work in them, or his powerful presence was manifest (Lk 11:20; cf. Lk 8:37-39), and the destruction of the reign of Satan was taking place (Lk 11:21-22; 13:11-12). However, Luke did not see Jesus' exorcisms as the final defeat of Satan. In the story of the Gerasene demoniac Jesus sends the demon(s) not into the abyss (abyssos [8:31]), their place of final destruction (e.g., 2 Pet 2:4; Jude 6; Rev 20:1-3; 1 En. 10; 18:11-16; Jub. 5:6-11), but into pigs that are drowned as the demons enter their new, watery home (Lk 8:32-33). Also, at the end of Jesus' healing ministry (Lk 22:3, 31), and in the post-Easter situation (Acts 5:3, 16; 8:7; 16:16-18; 19:11-20; 26:18), Satan is still active.

5.8. A Balanced Ministry. Maintaining the importance of exorcism is an aspect of Luke balancing word and deed throughout Jesus' ministry. Jesus' first sermon involves notice of healings (Lk 4:18) and is followed by a ministry interweaving miracles and message (cf. Lk 4:40-44). Just before the Sermon on the Plain (Lk 6:20-49) Luke reverses the order of the stories of the choosing of the Twelve (Lk 6:12-16) and Jesus healing multitudes by the sea (Lk 6:17-19; cf. Mk 3:7-19a), bracketing the sermon with the healing of the multitude (Lk 6:17-19) and the centurion's slave being healed (Lk 7:1-10). And, in the healing of the multitudes Luke introduces the idea that the crowds come to Jesus not only because of what they had heard about him (cf. Mk 3:9) but also to be healed by him (Lk 6:17). Luke makes the same kind of change in his introduction to the story of the feeding of the five thousand (Lk 9:11 // Mk 6:34).

Luke carries through his balancing act in retelling miracle stories. For example, in the story of the healing of the demoniac in the synagogue Luke has the crowd respond separately and, first, to Jesus' teaching (Lk 4:31-32; cf. Mk 1:27). In the conclusion to the story of the cleansing of a leper Luke says that crowds would gather to hear Jesus, as well as to be healed (Lk 5:15; cf. Lk 6:6 with Mk 3:1; Lk 9:11 with Mk 6:34; see also Lk 4:40-44; 6:17-26; 7:18-23; 8:1-3; 9:1-2; 10:8-9; 13:10-17). The balancing of the miraculous with other aspects of Jesus' ministry continues in the passion narrative, with the story of the healing the high priest's servant's ear (Lk 22:50-51), and near the end of the Gospel those with Jesus state that he was "a mighty prophet in deed and word" (Lk 24:19 [cf. Acts 1:1]). The miracles do not illustrate or demonstrate the good news, but are themselves, with the teaching, the good news of Jesus bringing salvation to those who have faith, and they are expected to be part of the ministry of his followers (Lk 9:1; 10:9).

6. John.

Even though John's Gospel has the least number of miracle stories—only eight (Jn 2:1-12; 4:46-54; 5:1-18; 6:1-15, 16-21; 9:1-7; 11:1-57; 21:4-14)—and no exorcisms, we reach the other end of the spectrum from Matthew's perspective, which saw the miracles as less important than the teaching of Jesus. In the Fourth Gospel the most profound miracles, with their distinctive language, take center stage in the presentation of Jesus. They do not illuminate the teaching of Jesus; they themselves are the message, and the words are required to explain what are portrayed as life-giving eschatological events.

6.1. Miracles as Signs. Sēmeion ("sign"), a key word in the Fourth Gospel, is used in the LXX almost always of God showing himself to be the almighty one, and Israel as his chosen people, through the events associated with the exodus (e.g., Dt 26:8; Jer 39:2-21 [ET 32:2-21]; cf. Philo, Mos. 1.210). Signs were also events demonstrating the authenticity of a prophet or the prophetic message (e.g., Ex 3:13; 4:1-9; 1 Sam 10:1-9). In using "sign" for the miracles, John is saying that, like the parables of the Synoptic Gospels, the miracles point beyond the immediate to the identity or *glory of Jesus and his filial relationship, even identity, with the Father. Though nonmiraculous actions of Jesus can be understood as "symbolic actions" (Jn 2:13-21; 3:14-15), the miracles stand in a class of their own as "signs" that *God is the author of these extraordinary events that authenticate the identity of Jesus and elicit faith in him and in the Father. Also, in that the Fourth Gospel has Jesus twice say, "The hour comes, and now is" (Jn 4:23; 5:25 [cf. Jn 12:30-31]), the reader is alerted to the glory of Jesus being seen not only in the story of Jesus' death, but also in the signs (Jn 2:11; 11:4 [cf. 9:3]; 11:40; 12:41, 43). As in the Synoptics, the miracles are realizations of God's present reign.

6.2. Miracles as Signs of the Great Sign. There is in John's Gospel a progression of signs of roughly increasing magnitude, reaching a climax in the raising of *Lazarus (Jn 11:1-57), which both prefigures the great sign of Jesus' *death and *resurrection (Jn 2:18-22; 11:4, 40) and is the prism through which to look back at the other signs (Jn 11:15; cf. 2:11; 11:47; cf. 5:9-18), as well as forward to the parousia (Jn 11:23-27). Thus, the ministry of miracle-signs, while no less significant than the great sign, is seen to anticipate the larger and clearer sign of the glory of God in Jesus: the great sign of the death and especially the resurrection of Jesus (Jn 3:14-15). In turn, the great sign anticipates the final earthly sign of the return to the Father, which itself is an anticipation of the return of the Spirit and the parousia (Jn 13-14).

6.3. Miracles as the "Work" of God. In using "work" (ergon) especially for Jesus' miracles (Jn 5:20; 6:28; 9:4; 10:32-33; 14:11-12), the Fourth Gospel conveys the idea that God is to be understood as the author of, particularly, what is seen in Jesus' miracles. For the LXX uses "work" for the salvific work of God on behalf of his people (Ex 34:1; Ps 65:5 [ET 66:5]; 76:13 [ET 77:12]). However, while the miracles are a distinct "work" of Jesus (Jn 10:32-38; 14:8-12), in also using "work" for the whole ministry of Jesus (Jn 7:3; 10:37-38; 14:11; 15:24; cf. Jn 9:3; 10:25), and even his words (Jn 5:36-38; 8:28; 14:10; 15:22-24), John blurs the distinction between the miracles, the words and the entire work of Jesus, so that in the miracles, as much as in the overall ministry of Jesus, God is to be understood as the agent of what is seen in Jesus, to the point of identifying Jesus and God. Not wanting Jesus to be seen acting apart from God may be the reason why the Fourth Gospel never uses dynamis ("power"). Such a high view of Jesus means that he takes the initiative in conducting the miracles (e.g., Jn 11:6), and that his actions are determined not by compassion but only by the Father (e.g., Jn 5:17-21).

6.4. The Identity and Destiny of Jesus. The first miracle ends with the statement that Jesus had revealed his "glory" (doxa [Jn 2:11]), which readers know (cf. Jn 1:14) is grace and truth replacing the *law of Moses (Jn 1:17) and is the invisible reality of God seen specifically in Jesus' miracles. With "glory" being used, after the prologue, only three times in connection with the life of Jesus, each of them concerning the miracles (Jn 2:11; 11:4, 40), the glory is the miraculous power, and faith (cf. Jn 11:40) comprehends that glory. Therefore, in Jesus' miracles, no less than in his passion and return to the Father (Jn 2:4; 7:39; 12:16, 23, 28; 13:31-32; 17:1-2), Jesus and God are being revealed.

Yet, the Jesus of the signs is never entirely or fully disclosed. At one level, there are hints of Jesus' identity through echoes of other stories—for example, of Dionysus (Jn 2:1-11; cf. Pausanias, Descr. 6.26.1-2), Moses (Jn 6:3; cf. Ex 19:3; Jn 6:14, 50, 58; cf. Ex 16:15) and Elisha (see Elijah and Elisha) (Jn 6:1-15; cf. 2 Kings 4:42-44). At another level, Jesus' glory, fully revealed in his passion and ascension as "the Messiah, the Son of God," who gives *life (Jn 20:31), is anticipated in the signs. At a further level, what is revealed is not a god or divine being, but a human being. Even in the most spectacular miracle—the raising of a dead man—Jesus is still a human who weeps (Jn 11:35), for he is "the Word became flesh" (Jn 1:14). While the signs of the first half of the Gospel reveal the identity of Jesus, the great sign of the second half of the Gospel—the death and resurrection of Jesus—reveals his destiny as the risen *Lord ascended to his Father (Jn 14:12, 28; 16:10, 17, 28; 17:11; 20:17).

6.5. Miracles and Faith. The Fourth Gospel expects those who encounter Jesus to trust his word (Jn 9:7, 38; 11:40) and then to witness the miracles. Belief is to be based on the words and the works (miracles), even though miracle-based faith can be sufficient. However, this Gospel portrays a number of responses to Jesus in relation to the miracles: (1) not responding to the signs with faith (Jn 11:45-53; 12:37; cf. Jn 5:7); (2) seeing the signs only as wonders or portents and, so believing in Jesus only as a miracle-worker (Jn 2:23-25; 3:2-3; 6:2, 14-15); (3) seeing the true significance of the miracles, enabling belief in Jesus and an understanding of who Jesus is in relation to the Father (Jn 2:11; 4:53; 9:38; 20:31); (4) believing in Jesus without seeing any signs (Jn 20:29), at first glance conveying the idea that faith in Jesus not based on the miracles is a superior level of faith. This last response, however, is not a criticism of miracle-based faith; rather, it is a caution that miracle-based faith may be a misunderstanding of Jesus, and a recognition that some will never believe without seeing miracles. Also, (5) there are those who see signs without knowing Jesus' identity: a person without initial faith in Jesus is able to experience a miracle (Jn 9:11, 17).

6.6. Missing Miracles. It is unlikely that the author of the Fourth Gospel was unaware of Jesus' reputation as an exorcist, or of the traditions of Jesus healing withered limbs, lepers, fevers, hemorrhages, the deaf and dropsy, which also do not appear in this Gospel (see Synoptics and John). Nor was the writer probably trying to avoid healing techniques that others used or might lead to an accusation of magic, for he includes healing from a distance (Jn 4:46-54) and the use of spittle (Jn 9:1-7). Rather, relatively commonplace healings, especially exorcisms of ambiguous origins, were not sufficiently clear and spectacular to convey the unmistakable work of God in Jesus. Also, in relation to exorcism, not just the few deranged, but everyone needs to be rescued from Satan, and not through the hand of an exorcist, but through knowing the truth: Jesus (Jn 1:14; 8:48-52; cf. 1QS III, 13-26) (see Twelftree 2007, 198-204). Further, with the replacement of the theme of the kingdom of God with the kingship of Jesus (Jn 1:49; 12:13, 15; 18:33-39; 19:3, 14-15, 19, 21), and also with Jesus' battle against and defeat of Satan tied to the cross (Jn 12:31), the exorcisms are both cut loose from the tradition and seen to be inadequate to convey the nature of Jesus' ministry.

6.7. Miracle and Mission. The final miracle story (the catch of 153 fish), part of the appendix (Jn 21:1-25), is not so much a sign as an allegory. Augustine (Tract. Ev. Jo. 122.8) noted that 153 is the triangular number of 17 (the sum of the numbers from 1 to 17), which (cf. Jn 21:13) is the sum of 5 (the number of baskets multiplied) and 12 (the number of baskets collected after the feeding of the five thousand). The story of the feeding of the five thousand anticipated the death of Jesus (Jn 6:4, 51-58), and this story, involving fish (a symbols of life and immortality [see Goodenough, 5:47-50]), reflects the implications of the resurrection. In following the great commission (Jn 20:21) and involving fishing (also a symbol of mission [cf. Mk 1:17]), this story promises, through seemingly irrational obedience to Jesus, success in mission, and that the church, without being destroyed by division, will be able to contain all who can be brought into its compass.

7. Summary of the Gospels.

For all the Gospels, the miracle stories carry the signature of the one who performed them: God is encountered in them, and they reveal Jesus as God himself at work, so that the miraculous activity of Jesus is the eschatological work and message of salvation. Even though divine revelation is inconceivable apart from miracles, this revelation is not without ambiguity; the miracles give rise not only to faith and discipleship, but also to antagonism. In simplest terms, in Mark, the earliest Gospel, Jesus is the miracle-worker who teaches and must also suffer. In Matthew Jesus is the teacher who also performs miracles. Luke carefully balances word and deed. In the Fourth Gospel Jesus is in such communion with and so identified with God that he is first and foremost the author of the most stupendous wonders, signs of his unmistakable identity, origin and destiny, seen preeminently in the sign of his death and resurrection.

8. Recent Interpreters.

In the early days of the scientific study of the Bible, supposing that the Gospel writers had not been involved in reliable investigation and had entangled themselves in glaring contradictions, Hermann Reimarus (1694-1768) suggested that they invented miracle stories. Karl Bahrdt (1741-1792), seeking to direct attention away from the miraculous, was among the first to apply a nonsupernatural interpretation to the miracle stories. He said, for example, that Jesus walked not on the sea but on a piece of timber in the water near the shore.

In reaction to both supernaturalism and rationalism, in The Life of Jesus (1834), D. F. Strauss (1808-1874) proposed that the miracles were mythical, either pure myths, such as the healings of the blind, having no historical base, or historical myths, such as the miraculous catch of fish (Lk 5:1-11) growing out of Jesus' saying about fishers of men (Mk 1:17).

Influenced by the mythical approach, and the history-of-religions school, which showed that Jesus' miracles were similar to others in the period, Rudolf Bultmann (1884-1976) attributed Gospel miracles to non-Christian sources. Although Martin Dibelius (1883-1946) took the miracles of nature to be foreign to the tradition, he said that the healing miracles were an essential part of the Jesus tradition, and that they involved psychically conditioned maladies that were cured by Jesus' psychical impact. Adolf Schlatter (1852-1938), arguing that any attempt to remove the miracle stories from the Jesus traditions involved a violation of history, was out of step with the intellectual climate, which was influenced by the view of Adolf von Harnack (1851-1930) that the essence of Christianity was not in the miracles, but in the religious experience of Jesus and in his teaching about God the Father, and by C. H. Dodd (1884-1973), who was arguing that the kerygma was the center of the gospel. By the middle of the twentieth century, the miracle stories were generally left aside or given very brief treatment in studies of the historical Jesus. With some exceptions, this remains the case, even though the miracle traditions are attracting some scholarly attention.

Attempting to understand Jesus' miracles in the context of his time, Geza Vermes (Jesus the Jew [1973]) argued for Jesus to be seen as one of the early Hasidim, or holy men, who were known for their miracle working. With an attention to the miracles, Morton Smith (1915-1991) argued that Jesus was a magician. The most thorough and outstanding recent discussion of the miracle stories has been by John Meier, concluding that some miracle stories, such as healings, have a historical foundation, while others may have a symbolic base, such as the feeding of the multitude, which was a meal that Jesus shared with a large crowd. Otherwise, for Meier, all the nature miracles appear to have been created by the early church. Eric Eve credibly locates Jesus the healer at the creative confluence of magical folk religion and traditions about prophets such as Elijah and Elisha and the Enochic-Qumran traditions concerned with the eschatological defeat of the demonic.

See also AUTHORITY & POWER; BLINDNESS & DEAFNESS; DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; FAITH; HEALING; HOLY SPIRIT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; RESURRECTION; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. J. Achtemeier, Jesus and the Miracle Tradition (Eugene, OR: Cascade, 2008); B. L. Blackburn, Theios Anēr and the Markan Miracle Traditions: A Critique of the Theios Anēr Concept as an Interpretative Background of the Miracle Traditions Used by Mark (WUNT 2/40; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1991); idem, "The Miracles of Jesus," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (NTTS 19; Leiden: Brill, 1994) 353-94; C. Brown, Miracles and the Critical Mind (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); U. Busse, Die Wunder des Propheten Jesus: Die Rezeption, Komposition und Interpretation der Wundertradition im Evangelium des Lukas (FB 24; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1977); W. Cotter, The Christ of the Miracle Stories: Portrait through Encounter (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2010); E. Eve, The Jewish Context of Jesus' Miracles (JSNT-Sup 231; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); idem, The Healer of Nazareth: Jesus Miracles in Historical Context (London: SPCK, 2009); R. T. Fortna, The Gospel of Signs: A Reconstruction of the Narrative Source Underlying the Fourth Gospel (SNTSMS 11; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970); E. R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period (13 vols.; Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1953-1968); H. J. Held, "Matthew as Interpreter of the Miracle Stories," in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, ed. G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held (NTL; London: SCM, 1982); M. D. Hooker, The Signs of a Prophet: The Prophetic Actions of Jesus (London: SCM, 1997); J. M. Hull, Hellenistic Magic and the Synoptic Tradition (SBT 28; London: SCM, 1974); M. Hüneburg, Jesus als Wun- dertäter in der Logienquelle: Ein Beitrag zur Christologie von Q (ABG 4; Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2001); W. Kahl, New Testament Miracle Stories in Their Religious-Historical Setting: A Religionsgeschichtliche Comparison from a Structural Perspective (FRLANT 163; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1994); H. C. Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World: A Study in Sociohistorical Method (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983); idem, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times (SNTSMS 55; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); C. S. Keener, Miracles: The Credibility of the New Testament Accounts (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2011); K. Kertelge, Die Wunder Jesu im Markusevangelium: Eine redaktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung (SANT 13; Munich: Kösel, 1970); T. Klutz, The Exorcism Stories in Luke-Acts: A Sociostylistic Reading (SNTSMS 129; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); M. Labahn, "Between Tradition and Living Art: The Miracle Tradition in the Fourth Gospel," Bib 80 (1999) 178-203; E. Lohse, "Miracles in the Fourth Gospel," in What About the New Testament? ed. M. Hooker and C. Hickling (London: SCM, 1975); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (New York: Doubleday, 1994); W. Nicol, The Sêmeia in the Fourth Gospel: Tradition and Redaction (NovTSup 32; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972); R. A. Piper, "Jesus and the Conflict of Powers in Q: Two Q Miracle Stories," in Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann (BETL 158; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001); M. Smith, Jesus the Magician (London: Gollancz, 1978); G. N. Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God's People?" in Jesus of Nazareth, Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 164-80; G. Theissen, Miracle Stories of the Early Christian Tradition, trans. F. McDonagh, ed. J. Riches (SNTW; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1983); M. Turner, "The Spirit and the Power of Jesus' Miracles in the Lucan Conception," NovT 33 (1991) 124-52; G. H. Twelftree, "The Miracles of Jesus: Marginal or Mainstream," JSHJ 1 (2003), 104-24; idem, Jesus the Miracle Worker: A Historical and Theological Study (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999); idem, "The History of Miracles in the History of Jesus," in The Face of New Testament Studies: A Survey of Recent Research, ed. S. McKnight and G. Osborne (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2004) 191-208; idem, "Jesus the Exorcist and Ancient Magic," in A Kind of Magic: Understanding Magic in the New Testament and Its Religious Environment, ed. M. Labahn and B. J. Lietaert Peerbolte (LNTS 306; London: T & T Clark, 2006) 57-86; idem, In the Name of Jesus: Exorcism among Early Christians (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); idem, Paul and the Miraculous: A Historical Reconstruction (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2013); D. F. Watson, Miracle Discourse in the New Testament (Atlanta: SBL, 2012); D. Wenham and C. Blomberg, eds., The Miracles of Jesus (GP 6; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986).

G. H. Twelftree

MISHNAH. See RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS.

MISSION

Jesus sought out the people who lived in the towns and villages of *Galilee and called them to *repent and to believe in the good news that the *kingdom of God is arriving and that God's promises to *Israel are being fulfilled through his ministry. This is "mission" (Lat. missio; Gk. apostolē), understood as the activity of individuals (or of a community of faith) who distinguish themselves from the society in which they live both in terms of religious convictions (theology) and social behavior (ethics), who are convinced of the truth of their beliefs, and who actively work to win other people to their convictions and way of life. Jesus understood himself to be sent by the Father (the mission of Jesus). Jesus called *disciples, trained them as his envoys, and sent them into the towns and villages of Galilee and eventually into Judea, Samaria and beyond (the mission of the Twelve). The missionary work of the *apostles, as recounted by Luke in the book of Acts, is inseparably linked with the ministry of Jesus. Without Jesus' message and without his *death and *resurrection, there would have been no good news to share, at least not the good news that Peter and the Twelve proclaimed in Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria and that Paul and other missionaries proclaimed in the cities of the wider Mediterranean world.

1. The Mission of Jesus
2. The Mission of the Disciples
3. Mission in Matthew, Mark, Luke and John

1. The Mission of Jesus.

Jesus held that he was sent by God the Father, asserting not only that both his message and his work of driving out *demons and *healing the sick are divinely authorized, but also that both his message and his work constitute the fulfillment of God's plan and God's promises.

1.1. The “I Have Come” Sayings in the Synoptic Gospels. There are six “I have come” (Gk. ēlthon) sayings that describe the purpose of Jesus’ mission. In Mark 1:38 (cf. Lk 4:43) Jesus insists that he has to visit and preach in other villages in Galilee, “for that is why I have come [exēlthon].” In Matthew 9:13 // Mark 2:17 (cf. Lk 5:32) Jesus declares, “I have come [ēlthon] to call not the righteous, but sinners.” According to Matthew 5:17, Jesus asserted that he has not come to abolish the law or the prophets, adding, “I have come [ēlthon] not to abolish them, but to fulfill them.” In Luke 12:49 Jesus explains, “I have come [ēlthon] to cast fire onto the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled” (similarly Mt 10:34 // Lk 12:51). Two statements speak of the coming of the *Son of Man. In Matthew 20:28 // Mark 10:45 Jesus claims, “Even the Son of Man came [ēlthon] not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many.” And in Luke 19:10 Jesus asserts, “For the Son of Man came [ēlthon] to seek and to save what was lost.” Two passages in which evil spirits speak of Jesus’ coming can be added. According to Mark 1:24 // Luke 4:34, a man with an unclean spirit in Capernaum cries out, “What have you to do with us, Jesus of Nazareth? Have you come [ēlthes] to destroy us? I know who you are, the Holy One of God.” And in Matthew 8:29 two demon-possessed men in the region of the Gadarenes shout, “What have you to do with us, Son of God? Have you come [ēlthes] here to torment us before the time?”

In response to R. Bultmann’s skepticism regarding the historicity of the “I have come” sayings, J. Jeremias argued for an underlying Aramaic expression ʾatayit, which can mean “I am there” or “I will” or “it is my task” (Jeremias, 83) and “to have the intention, or purpose to” or “to have as a task, or mission to” (Arens, 265–70). A critical examination of the examples adduced for this interpretation calls into question the linguistic foundation: two consistently idiomatic uses of Hebrew bôʾ + infinitive concern metaphorical references to the “coming” of Scripture and “coming” within the scope of the law or some legal category, none of which are parallel to Jesus’ ēlthon sayings, which is also the case for the remaining two statements (m. Roš Haš. 2:9; b. Šabb 18b) (see Gathercole 2004).

The ēlthon sayings formulate summaries of Jesus’ mission as a whole: he came with the purpose to preach and heal in the villages of Galilee, he came to call and bring *salvation to sinners, he came to fulfill the *law and the prophets, he came to bring *judgment, he came to give his life as a ransom for sinners, he came to seek out and save the people who are lost, and he came to destroy the power of the devil and his demons. Since the language of “coming” presupposes an origin from which the speaker has come, since the language of “I have come to do such and such” presupposes a time during which the person was not carrying out the task mentioned, and since Jesus describes in the ēlthon sayings his entire earthly mission, the conclusion seems inescapable that the place of Jesus’ origin is somewhere outside of the human sphere (Gathercole 2006, 86–87, 148–76).

1.2. The “Sending” Statements. Several statements that use the language of “sending” summarize the goal of Jesus’ mission (for the corresponding Johannine portrait, see 3.4 below). In Luke 4:18–19 Luke relates Jesus as quoting Isaiah 61:1–2; 58:6, aligning his mission with the mission of the prophet’s *Servant of the Lord, who has been anointed with God’s Spirit to bring good news to the poor, and declaring, “He has sent [apestalken] me to proclaim release to the captives and recovery of sight to the blind, to let the oppressed go free.” As Jesus states that this prophecy has been fulfilled “in your hearing” (Lk 4:21), he asserts that the mission of the Servant of the Lord is his own mission. Luke’s version of the ēlthon saying found in Mark 1:38 explains Jesus’ coming with Jesus having been sent: “I must proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God to the other cities also; for I was sent [apestalēn] for this purpose” (Lk 4:43). The aorist passive apestalēn (from apostellō), translated as “I was sent,” describes Jesus’ “coming” as a sending. Since Jesus has not been sent by a human authority, he evidently claims that he has been sent by *God. This is made explicit in the several passages in which Jesus refers to God the Father as “the one who sent me” (Mk 9:37 // Lk 9:48; Mt 10:40; Lk 10:16). In Matthew 15:24 Jesus asserts, “I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel,” explaining his reluctance to help the Gentile woman from Syrophenicia. In two *parables Jesus alludes to being sent by the Father. In the parable of the great banquet, the man who gives the banquet sends his servant to the invited guests (Lk 14:17), who refuse to come. In the parable of the tenants, the landowner sends various envoys to collect from the tenants in authority over his vineyard, but they treat all of the envoys shamefully, beating and even killing some of them, until eventually, “last of all,” he sends his beloved son (Mk 12:6), whom the tenants likewise kill.

1.3. The Galilean Mission. Jesus’ preaching and healing in Galilee provided the context for the training of the Twelve, whom he called to “fish for people” (Mk 1:17). The following elements of Jesus’ Galilean mission are important.

(1) Jesus called Israel to repent and to believe in the present fulfillment of God's covenant promises. Jesus offers healing to the sick and salvation to sinners (Mt 9:12-13 // Mk 2:17 // Lk 5:31-32). The offer of salvation for the sinners is demonstrated vividly when Jesus dines with tax collectors and sinners (Mt 9:10 // Mk 2:15 // Lk 5:29). When Jesus describes himself as "physician," he seems to allude to Ezekiel 34:1-6 (Landmesser, 104-5). Because Israel's shepherds were feeding themselves while neglecting the flock entrusted into their care, failing to strengthen the weak and heal the sick and bring back those who have gone astray, Yahweh will intervene and take care of his flock himself. He declares, "I will seek the lost, and I will bring back the strayed, and I will bind up the injured, and I will strengthen the weak" (Ezek 34:16). This is a new reality that will come to pass when God sends a new shepherd, "one shepherd, my servant David" (Ezek 34:23). When he comes as God's shepherd, Israel will experience the reality of God being "with them" as he cares for God's people as the "sheep of my pasture" (Ezek 34:30-31). Jesus identifies himself with this bringer of salvation (Mt 9:12-13 // Mk 2:17 // Lk 5:31-32): he is the physician sent by God to heal the sick and to save the lost, inviting sinners to the table of the festival of God's kingdom. The righteous are not excluded, but Jesus' ministry aims primarily at the sinners; if the righteous reject Jesus' call to repentance by which lost sinners are invited into God's presence, then they reject Jesus as God's envoy and thus become lost sinners themselves.

(2) Jesus' ministry of teaching and healing was directed to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:6), meaning the Jewish people, a focus that was not lost after Easter when Jesus commissions the Twelve to proclaim the good news in Jerusalem and Judea (Acts 1:8 [at the time of Luke writing Acts, Galilee belonged to the province of Judea]). At the same time, Jesus' announcement that God's kingdom was coming and that God's promises were being fulfilled (Mt 4:17; Mk 1:14-15) implied a reference to the entire world, on the basis of promises and expectations such as Isaiah 2:2-5 (= Mic 4:1-5); Is 49:1-6; Zech 8:20-23. He had encounters with *Gentiles who sought him out (Mt 8:5-13; Mk 5:1-20; 7:24-30; Jn 12:20-22; cf. Jn 4:1-42). He announced that the Gentiles will share in the blessings of God's kingdom (Mt 8:11-12 // Lk 13:28-29), and he asserted that the final consummation would not occur until the *gospel of the kingdom has been preached in the entire world to "all nations" (Mt 24:14; cf. Mk 13:10). He challenged the true Israel to be the salt of the earth and the light of the world (Mt 5:13-16). After the resurrection, Jesus commissioned the Twelve to go the "end of the earth" (Acts 1:8) and make disciples of all nations (Mt 28:19) (see 2.4 below).

(3) Jesus sought out the simple villagers, and he spoke with sophisticated *scribes and *Pharisees. He ministered among powerless Galileans and dialogued with influential leaders of the Jerusalem establishment. He had *table fellowship with people of ill repute, and he spent time with the pious. Jesus compared his ministry with a dragnet in which fish "of all kinds" get caught (Mt 13:47). Jesus was willing and eager to reach all people, regardless of traditional social or religious barriers. Jesus did not invite people to come to him to Capernaum. Rather, he went out to visit all the small farms (Mk 6:56), the villages, the towns of Galilee, and on occasion (according to the Gospel of John) even urban centers such as *Jerusalem. The references to Jesus' geographical movement in Matthew 9:35; Mark 6:6; Luke 4:43 possibly indicate that Jesus systematically planned his travels in Galilee.

2. The Mission of the Disciples.

After Jesus prepared the Twelve over a period of time for the task of "fishing for people," he sent them out in six teams of two disciples to preach and to heal in the towns and villages of Galilee (Mt 10:5-16 // Mk 6:7-13 // Lk 9:1-6). They were to proclaim the good news of the dawn of the kingdom of God in regions that Jesus had not visited or wanted to visit later. This was a missionary tour through Galilee limited to a short period of time; at the same time, it provided elements of a paradigm of a permanent mission in the future.

2.1. A Short-Term Missionary Tour. Jesus sends the Twelve in pairs of two (Mk 6:7). Matthew relates that Jesus instructs the disciples to restrict their preaching to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (i.e., to Jews) and not to go to the Gentiles or to Samaria (Mt 10:5-6). This was a temporary restriction, as Jesus' later commission for an international mission to all nations indicates (Mt 28:19); the reason for the restriction of the mission of the Twelve to Galilee was theological: salvation is offered first to Israel, then to the Gentiles. This explains why the number "twelve" is emphasized in Matthew 10:1-2, 5: the Twelve represent Israel and therefore are sent to the Jews. Jesus commands the Twelve not to accept money (Mt 10:9); they could assume that most people whom they would encounter on their missionary tour through Galilee had either already heard of Jesus and his message or had been visited before when they had traveled with Jesus from village to village. Jesus commands the Twelve not to take provisions (Mt 10:9-10 mentions gold, silver, copper, bag, extra tunic, sandals and staff) and not to shop around for the most comfortable accommodation (Mt 10:11-15). This directive is readily plausible in the context of a missionary activity that was limited in time and took place in a region where Jesus was known and had many sympathizers (cf. Lk 22:35-38). Since this is a short-term mission, the Twelve are directed not to engage in extensive preparations and not to carry unnecessary provisions. They would be able to travel unencumbered by heavy provisions and to rely on the hospitality of people.

2.2. Paradigm for the Future Mission of the Twelve. The short-term mission of the Twelve in Galilee constituted training for their later missionary activity. The following elements of Jesus' missionary discourse in Matthew 10 are relevant. Jesus instructs the Twelve to proclaim the good news of the arrival of God's kingdom, following the lead of Jesus' own proclamation (Mt 10:7). Jesus' disciples preach what Jesus proclaims: God is fulfilling his promises to Israel in Jesus' ministry as he calls people to repentance and to faith in the good news of the kingdom of God and as he drives out demons and heals the sick. Jesus' disciples heal as Jesus heals: they will have the authority to heal and to drive out demons on account of Jesus' transfer of authority to them (Mt 10:1). Jesus sends the disciples in groups; while the pairing in six groups of two disciples fits a short-time mission of Twelve people, the underlying principle stands: this pairing serves mutual encouragement, attests the veracity of the testimony of two witnesses, and models the new community of followers of Jesus that is being established through the work of the apostles. Jesus warns the Twelve that they will be flogged in "synagogues, hated and persecuted and dragged before rulers and kings "as a testimony to them and the Gentiles" (Mt 10:18; cf. the entire section Mt 10:17-25). While the Twelve could expect to experience opposition and rejection as they travel through the Galilean towns and villages, it is only when their mission reaches Jerusalem and capitals of Roman provinces that they will be dragged before rulers and that their "witness is a testimony to Gentiles.

2.3. The Mission of the Seventy. Luke reports that on one occasion Jesus sent out seventy disciples (Lk 10:1-16 [some manuscripts read "seventy-two"]). The historicity of such a mission has been questioned. Neither Mark nor Matthew knows of such a mission; the instructions that Jesus gives to the Seventy in Luke 10 also appear in Matthew 10:7-16 (cf. also Mt 9:37-38), suggesting that Luke created a literary doublet from Q material, with parallels in Mark 6:6-13. Some argue that the discourse in Luke 10 is not a unified composition but rather is the result of redactional growth. However, other scholars argue that the passage is a compositional unity, and that Luke follows his sources, deeming it improbable that he invented the mission of the Seventy in order to solve the tension between Jesus' commission to the Twelve and the existence of a larger group of evangelists in the post-Easter church. The similarities of Jesus' instructions in the mission of the Seventy and the mission of the Twelve cannot automatically be used as an argument against the historicity: if Jesus indeed sent out disciples on different occasions with the assignment to proclaim his message of the kingdom and to heal the sick, it is to be expected that some instructions would be similar if not identical. The reference to the "plentiful harvest" (Lk 10:2) suggests that many people would be ready to accept the disciples' message of the dawn of God's reign.

2.4. The Commission to Initiate an International Mission. The comprehensive "missionary commission" in Matthew 28:19-20 (for questions of historicity, see Schnabel, 1:349-52) and Acts 1:8 describes the future mission of the Twelve in the following terms.

(1) The mission of Jesus' disciples is authorized by God and takes place in the context of God's authority over heaven and earth, which has been given to Jesus, who has been vindicated after his death in his resurrection. Because Jesus, as the exalted Son of Man (cf. Dan 7:13-14), is Lord over heaven and earth and therefore over all nations, the mission of the disciples is universal: they are directed to make disciples of "all [panta] nations" and to teach the nations "everything" (panta) that Jesus has commanded them, and they work in the presence of and with the help of Jesus "all [pasas] days to the end of the age." The expression "all nations" (panta ta ethnē) includes the Jewish people (cf. Mt 24:7; 24:14; 25:32, where the term ethnē signifies "all nations" without any restriction) as well as the Samaritans, the Greeks and Romans as well as the barbarians (cf. Rom 1:14; Col 3:11).

(2) The Twelve are commanded to "go" (poreuthentes). The participle is implicitly imperatival: the Twelve can reach "all nations" only if they leave Galilee (or Jerusalem) and go beyond the confines of Judea to other regions and other cities. The modified repetition of the risen Jesus' commission to the Twelve in Acts 1:8 clearly describes a geographical movement from the center (Jerusalem, Judea) to the periphery (the end of the earth). Jesus traveled from Galilee to Jerusalem (Lk 23:5; Acts 10:37); the disciples will travel from Jerusalem via Judea and Samaria to the end of the earth. Jerusalem is both the center of the apostles' mission and the point of departure for their travels as witnesses of Jesus. The phrase "the end of the earth" alludes to Isaiah 49:6, where Yahweh says of his servant, "I will give you as a light to the nations, that my salvation may reach to the end of the earth." Jesus sends the apostles to the end of the earth; their mission is world mission. It begins in Jerusalem, it reaches the surrounding regions of Judea and Samaria, and it extends as far as people live, as far as Spain (in the ancient Greco-Roman world the "end of the earth") in the west, Ethiopia in the south, Scythia in the north, and India in the east, transcending both geographical and ethnic boundaries.

(3) The Twelve are commanded to "make disciples" (mathēteusate) among all nations. Since disciples are people who hear, understand and put into practice Jesus' teaching (cf. Mt 12:46-50), the Twelve are commissioned to establish communities of Jesus' followers. The command to make disciples implies the prior proclamation of the gospel (which is not specifically mentioned, perhaps regarded as unnecessary after Mt 10:7). Since Jesus had lived with and trained the Twelve as his disciples, they are the paradigm for all future disciples.

(4) The Twelve are commanded to *baptize or "immerse" (baptizontes) the new converts in water as a demonstration of their cleansing, the forgiveness of their sins, on account of God's offer of salvation through the death and resurrection of Jesus, in whom they believe. The immersion happens "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit"—that is, with respect to the fact that salvation has been provided by God the Father through Jesus, the messianic Son of Man and Son of God, mediated through the *Holy Spirit, who is God's transforming power and who will be poured out by Jesus on Pentecost. Note that references to the triad of Father, Son and Spirit were intelligible in Syria, where a triad of deities (supreme god, mother goddess, son) was worshipped.

(5) The Twelve are commanded to "teach" (didaskontes) the new disciples, who are willing and eager to learn, which again implies the establishment of local congregations of followers of Jesus, whose words they learn to obey. They teach as Jesus' "witnesses" (martyres), which means in the context of Acts 1—2 that they are witnesses of the life, suffering, death and resurrection of Jesus.

(6) The disciples are assured of Jesus' powerful presence: "And remember, I am with you always, to the end of the age" (Mt 28:20). As Yahweh was with his people, so Jesus will be with his disciples and with the people who will become disciples through their missionary activity. And they are assured of the power of the Holy Spirit, who helps them in their task of witnessing about Jesus' life, death and resurrection (Acts 1:8, 22).

3. Mission in Matthew, Mark, Luke and John.

All four Gospels focus on Jesus' mission, and all four Gospels describe aspects of the disciples' mission. Only some of the characteristic elements of the Gospel authors' perspective can be mentioned here.

3.1. Mission in Matthew. The Gospel of Matthew begins with *Abraham and David (Mt 1:1) and with a condensed history of Israel (Mt 1:2-17), and it ends with Jesus' commission to the disciples to make disciples of all nations (Mt 28:16-20). A key element of Jesus' mission is expressed in his characterization as "Emmanuel," meaning "God with us" (Mt 1:23), as the Son of God, in whom God's promised presence in Israel becomes a reality. Matthew wants to strengthen his readers in the conviction that "the work that Jesus completes for Israel as 'Messiah' leads into his ministry for the nations as 'Son of Man.' Jesus is the son of Abraham who leads Israel's history of election to its goal and who thus fulfills God's promise to make Abraham into a 'large nation' that exists as a light for the nations. His ministry as Son of Man is based on his work as Messiah; Jesus is 'Lord' of the nations only on the basis of his mission to Israel" (Wilk, 151).

The mission of the twelve apostles involves being called by Jesus and being trained as his envoys who will "fish for people" (Mt 4:19). Their training involves following and observing Jesus, and it includes a preaching mission in Galilee during which they preach and teach what Jesus is preaching; and it includes doing what Jesus is doing, driving out demons and healing people of their illnesses (Mt 10:1, 5-8). Matthew's description of Jesus' post-Easter commission in Matthew 28:16-20 (see 2.4. above) is more detailed than similar descriptions in the other Gospels. Some suggest that the Gospel of Matthew was written in Jerusalem as the Gospel of the mission of James, the brother of Jesus, some time before he was killed in A.D. 66/67, when the leaders of this mission fled to Pella at the beginning of the Jewish Revolt (Ellis, 288-92).

3.2. Mission in Mark. The Gospel of Mark portrays the life, death and resurrection of Jesus, who is the Son of God, as “the beginning of the good news” (Mk 1:1). This programmatic statement in the first line of this Gospel, if read in the context of central claims of the Roman imperial cult, suggests to some that Mark presents Jesus in opposition to the Roman emperors who are hailed as “savior” and “lord”: Jesus is the one, true Son of God, who is humankind’s true Savior and Lord, and Mark narrates “the story of Jesus in such a way that such a confession will appear compelling and plausible to Jews and Romans alike” (Evans, xciii). More importantly, Mark’s programmatic statement asserts that the content of his book summarizes the content of the “good news” (euangelion) of Jesus Christ, whose life, death and resurrection are the content of the missionary proclamation and the instructional teaching of the church.

Mark situates Jesus’ mission among the Jewish people in Galilee. He narrates only limited contact with non-Jews; two Gentiles recognize his dignity as God’s agent (Mk 7:25–30; 15:37–41). Mark’s focus on Jesus’ passion in the last third of his Gospel establishes that Jesus’ ministry is fulfilled in his death. Jesus’ death is a substitutionary death “for the many” (Mk 10:45; 14:24), and thus it also establishes the community of Jesus’ followers as the “house of prayer” for all nations (Mk 11:12–12:12), which are reached by the preaching of the gospel (Mk 13:10; 14:9).

3.3. Mission in Luke. Luke’s two-volume work shows, among other things, that the promised restoration of the people of God is taking place. In his description of Jesus’ earthly ministry Luke consistently focuses on Jesus’ identity as the Messiah, who is the Son of God and the Son of Man, who ministers in the power of God’s Spirit, who brings good news to the poor, proclaims release to the captives, restores sight to the *blind, brings *freedom from oppression and proclaims the year of the Lord’s favor (Lk 4:18–21) (see Jubilee). The restoration of the people of God begins with Jesus’ messianic mission to Israel. The events of salvation that are connected with Jesus’ ministry are described early in this Gospel as “the glory of the people of Israel” (Lk 2:32), which eventually becomes the “light for revelation to the nations” (Lk 2:32).

Jesus’ mission includes his departure (Lk 9:31) through suffering to glory (Lk 24:27), where he sits at God’s right (Lk 20:41–42; 22:69; Acts 2:32–36), continuing to act and to speak (Acts 1:1; cf., e.g., Acts 3:6; 4:10; 9:4–6) through the ministry of the apostles. The goal of the restoration of the people of God is realized as the disciples proclaim, as Jesus’ witnesses, the significance of his life, death, resurrection and *ascension (Lk 24:46–53; Acts 3:12–26).

3.4. Mission in John. John’s Gospel emphasizes Jesus’ significance as the bringer of God’s revelation. Jesus is the light of the world (Jn 8:12; 9:5) and the savior of the world (Jn 3:17; 4:42; 6:33, 51; 11:27; 12:20–23). Jesus frequently is described as the Son sent by the Father (Jn 3:16–17; 5:23, 30, 36; 10:36; 12:49; 14:24; 17:3, 18, 21, 23, 25; 20:21). The statements related to the sending of Jesus focus on his obedience to and dependence on the Father. Jesus as the one sent is to bring glory and honor to the one who has sent him (Jn 7:18; 8:50, 54; 11:4, 40). Jesus is to do not his own will but rather the will of the Father, who sent him, in particular to do the works of the Father (Jn 4:34; 5:17, 19–20, 36; 9:4). Jesus speaks the words of the one who sent him (Jn 7:16; 12:48–50; 14:24). Jesus as the one who has been sent has the responsibility to represent his sender (Jn 5:19–23; 13:20; 12:44–45; 14:9), a responsibility described as “bearing witness” (Jn 7:28–29; 8:26; 18:37). As Jesus accomplishes the mission for which the Father has sent him, accountable to the Father in terms of both his works and his words, he exercises delegated authority (Jn 5:21–22, 26–27; 13:3; 17:2). Jesus as the one sent maintains an intimate relationship with his sender (Jn 7:29; 8:16, 29; 16:32).

John emphasizes that Jesus was sent by God to reveal him in the world and to take away the sin of the world (Jn 1:18, 29, 36; 3:16). This is the “work” that the mission of Jesus accomplishes (Jn 4:34; 17:4). The “works” that Jesus performs are “signs” of his messianic authority. Jesus is the promised messianic shepherd (see Ezek 34:23–24; Zech 13:7–9), who, in contrast to the Jewish leaders, gives his life for the sheep and leads them safely to green pastures (Jn 10:1–15). The new flock, which initially consists of Jews, eventually includes “other sheep” as well (Jn 10:16). The people of God now are defined not by ethnic identity but rather by faith in Jesus. All those who hear Jesus’ voice belong to the flock that is God’s messianic people, whether they are Jew or Gentile, so that “there will be one flock, one shepherd” (Jn 10:16).

The mission of the disciples is a function of the mission of Jesus, derived from his mission (Jn 17:18; 20:21) and subordinated to his mission. The disciples have been called by Jesus (Jn 1:35–51) and commissioned by Jesus (Jn 20:21–23). They follow Jesus (Jn 1:37; 21:22), they reap where they have not labored (Jn 4:38), and they bear fruit that they have not produced themselves (Jn 15:8, 16). They give witness not of themselves but rather of Jesus (Jn 15:27). Their mission takes place “in the world,” which hates them because it hated Jesus (Jn 15:19).

See also APOSTLE; GENTILES; GOSPEL: GOOD

NEWS; ISRAEL; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Arens, The HΛΘON-Sayings in the Synoptic Tradition: A Historico-Critical Investigation (OBO 10; Freiburg: Universitätsverlag, 1976); J.-A. Bühner, Der Gesandte und sein Weg im 4. Evangelium: Die kultur- und religionsgeschichtlichen Grundlagen der johanneischen Sendungschristologie sowie ihre traditionsgeschichtliche Entwicklung (WUNT 2/2; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1977); E. E. Ellis, The Making of the New Testament Documents (BIS 39; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999); C. A. Evans, Mark 8:27-16:20 (WBC 34B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001); S. J. Gathercole, "On the Alleged Aramaic Idiom behind the Synoptic ἡλθον-Sayings," JTS 55 (2004) 84-91; idem, The Preexistent Son: Recovering the Christologies of Matthew, Mark, and Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM 1971); A. J. Köstenberger, The Missions of Jesus and the Disciples according to the Fourth Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); C. Landmesser, Jüngerberufung und Zuwendung zu Gott: Ein exegetischer Beitrag zum Konzept der matthäischen Soteriologie im Anschluss an Mt 9,9-13 (WUNT 133; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001); J. P. Miranda, Der Vater, der mich gesandt hat: Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zu dem johanneischen Sendungsformeln zugleich ein Beitrag zur johanneischen Christologie und Ekklesiologie (EH 23/7; Bern: Peter Lang, 1972); E. J. Schnabel, Early Christian Mission (2 vols.; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press; Leicester: Apollos, 2004); F. Wilk, Jesus und die Völker in der Sicht der Synoptiker (BZNW 109; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001). E. J. Schnabel

MORALITY. See ETHICS OF JESUS.

MOSES

Along with *Abraham, Moses is the most recognized character in the OT and the writings of Second Temple Judaism. All thirty-eight occurrences in the four Gospels refer to him as the most prominent character of ancient Israel. Jesus grew up and preached the in-breaking *kingdom of God in a world defined and dominated by Moses and his *law.

1. Moses in the Old Testament and Second Temple Writings
2. Moses in the Four Gospels
3. Conclusions

1. Moses in the Old Testament and Second Temple Writings.

Within both the OT and the Second Temple period

the primary focus is on the prophetic and legislative aspects of Moses' character. The Pentateuch describes Moses as the incomparable prophet chosen by God and granted unique access to God (Ex 33:19, 23; Num 12:8; Deut 34:10-12). Occasionally he is depicted as "serving as God" to other people (Ex 4:16; 7:1). His mission is to lead Israel and serve as mediator between Israel and God (Deut 5:5). He is portrayed as the promulgator and interpreter of the divine will. In order to guide Israel after Moses, God promises to raise up a prophet like Moses to whom the people should listen (Deut 18:15, 18). This establishes a prophetic tradition with eschatological and even apocalyptic expectations associated with Moses.

Within a Hellenistic environment Moses came to be portrayed as royalty (e.g., Ezek. Trag. 74-79; Philo, Mos. 1.158, 334; Sib. Or. 11:38-40; cf. Ex 4:20; Deut 33:5), the inventor of the alphabet (Eup., frg. 1) and the founder of Egyptian and Greek cultures (Artap., frg. 3). He is the perfect human and Israelite (Josephus, Ant. 2:229; cf. Num 12:3), an ingenious military commander (Josephus) and a king among philosophers (e.g., 4 Macc 2:17; 9:2; 17:19; 18:18; Philo, Mos. 2.2). More revelatory writings are attributed to him, with his fictitious authorship guaranteeing their validity (e.g., Jubilees; Assumption of Moses; Moses apocrypha in the writings of Qumran [e.g., 1Q29; 2Q21; 4Q375; 4Q376; 4Q377; 4Q378; 4Q379; 4Q388; 4Q389; 4Q390]).

Second Temple writings usually portray Moses as promulgator and mediator of the law (e.g., 1 Esd 1:6, 11; 5:49; 7:6, 9; 8:3; Sir 24:3; As. Mos. 1:14; 3:12). The law became "the law of Moses" (e.g., LXX [Theod.] Dan 9:13; Sus 3, 62; Josephus, Jewish Antiquities), and Moses the lawgiver (e.g., 2 Macc 7:30; Let. Arist. 131-170). With law often identified with wisdom (e.g., Sir 24:3, 8, 23), Moses becomes the chosen one who received "the law of life and knowledge" (Sir 45:1-5; cf. Ex 19:16-21). The Qumran community called for repentance and return to the law of Moses (e.g., 1QS V, 8; 4Q504).

Moses is sometimes portrayed as a quasi-divine figure (e.g., Sir 45:2, 5; 1 En. 89:16) who was allowed to sit on Yahweh's throne (Ezek. Trag. 73-79; cf. Ex 7:1). However, he usually is portrayed as prophet par excellence (e.g., Ascen. Isa. 5:1-13; As. Mos. 11:16; L.A.B. 53:2, 8-10; Philo, Mut. 103, 125 [archiprophētēs]) or as a priest (cf. 4Q504 1-2 II, 9-10; Philo, Mos. 2.2, 71, 75, 187). In Qumran Moses served as prototype for the teacher of righteousness (e.g., CD-A VI, 4-7), whose legitimacy and authority derived from his being a prophet like Moses (1QpHab II, 7-8; CD-A VI, 7; cf. Deut 18:15, 18). Other Qumran writings portray Moses as the true prophet foretelling the coming messiah (4Q175) or view him in the messiah's company (1QS IX, 11). In 4Q377 Moses is endowed with the divine spirit and called God's "anointed" (4Q377 2 II, 4), probably indicating his prophetic status. Moses was the divine prophet over all the earth (As. Mos. 11:16) who continued to reveal God's will, including things to come (e.g., As. Mos. 7:1–10:10). Expectations of his eschatological return or of a prophet like Moses (1QS IX, 11; 4Q175 5-8; Deut. Rab. 3:17; 10:1; Tg. Neof. Ex 12:42; cf. Jn 1:21, 25; Acts 3:22; 7:37) often were based on traditions of Moses being translated to heaven (e.g., Philo, QG 1.86; Mos. 2:288-291; Josephus, Ant. 4.323, 325; 9.28; Sipre 357; Midr. Deut. 34:5), despite the testimony of Deuteronomy 34:5-6 (e.g., Josephus, Ant. 4:326).

2. Moses in the Four Gospels.

The Gospels compare Moses' role as mediator and promulgator of God's will with the divine revelation of Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus' ministry focused on the interpretation of the Mosaic *law without questioning its validity or criticizing obedience to it. He offered new standards of interpretation (e.g., Mk 2:27; 7:15), and his own proclamation always took precedence without defining its basic relation to Moses' law.

2.1. The Gospel of Mark. Mark mentions Moses eight times (Mk 1:44; 7:10; 9:4, 5; 10:3, 4; 12:19, 26). Moses appears as a narrative character only in the *transfiguration (Mk 9:2-10). Most of the references relate to the writings of Moses (Mk 1:44; 7:10; 10:3, 4; 12:19, 26), where he is portrayed as an authority representing the religious laws and social customs of Israel.

2.1.1. Utterances and Provisions of Moses. Except for Mark 12:26, all the references to the writings of Moses refer to specific provisions of "his" law. With the exception of Mark 1:44, all of them, Mark 12:26 included, occur in the introduction to quotations characterized as Moses' oral or written utterances (Mk 7:10; 10:3-4; 12:19, 26). These serve mostly to portray Jesus as the superior interpreter of the law who challenges the authority of its professional interpreters, the *Pharisees and *Scribes (Mk 7:1-23; 10:2-12), and the *Sadducees (Mk 12:18-27). Pharisees and Scribes are criticized for putting their exegetical traditions first (Mk 7:9), while the words of Moses have the quality of divine commands (Mk 7:8-9). Moses' utterances or provisions are highlighted positively (Mk 7:10; 12:26) or critically (Mk 10:4-5) or serve to kindle dispute (Mk 12:19). However, it is Jesus who defines God's commandment (Mk 7:10), intention (Mk 10:6-7) and power of life (Mk 12:24). Jesus even has the authority to object to important passages of the law (Mk 7:15; cf. Lev 11–15; Deut 14:3-21).

In Mark 1:44 Jesus' adherence to Moses is assumed without reservation. To complete his *healing of the *leper (Mk 1:40-45), Jesus asks the leper to undergo the cleansing rites commanded by Moses to accomplish his social and religious reintegration (cf. Lev 14:1-32). The declaration of his healing should prove to the official hieratical institution of *Judaism that God's in-breaking *kingdom realized by Jesus does not violate Moses' law.

2.1.2. The Transfiguration Narrative. The Markan transfiguration story is embedded in the core section of the Gospel (Mk 8:27-10:45), which is shaped by a threefold revelatory teaching of Jesus regarding his identity and his passion and resurrection. The whole passage serves as an introduction to *discipleship, focusing on the requirements for following Jesus. Key elements of the transfiguration are narrated by assuming the point of view of the three disciples (Barton), with the events framed as a visionary and auditory experience of the disciples.

The Markan transfiguration narrative is shaped by biblical motifs reflecting the divine epiphanies experienced by Moses and *Elijah at Sinai (Moses: Ex 24:1-18; 33:18-23; 34:1-9, 29-35; Elijah: 1 Kings 19:8-18). These include the following elements: a high *mountain (e.g., Ex 24:12, 15; 1 Kings 19:8, 11; cf. Mk 9:2); a cloud of divine presence overshadowing the mountain (Ex 24:15-18; cf. Mk 9:7); a divine voice from the cloud (Ex 24:16; cf. Mk 9:7); the radiance of a central figure (Ex 34:29-30; cf. Mk 9:3); a fearful response from the watchers (Ex 34:30; cf. Mk 9:6); the presence of three spectators (Ex 24:11: Aaron, Nadab, Abihu; cf. Mk 9:2: Peter, James, John); and a reference of six days (Ex 24:16; cf. Mk 9:2).

Various lines of interpretation have been offered to explain why Mark introduces Elijah and Moses as a pair (Mk 9:4). (1) A typological approach takes Moses and Elijah as representatives of the biblical writings, "the law and the prophets." Although this interpretation is very old (e.g., Tertullian), both Moses and Elijah are prophetic characters, and Mark's ordering of Elijah first gives an improbable sequence to the biblical writings. (2) Both characters are eschatological prophets and forerunners of the Messiah (e.g., Hooker) (for Moses, see 1 above; for Elijah, see Mal 4:5-6; Sir 48:10). With only one rabbinic witness to the notion of their eschatological return as a pair (Deut. Rab. 3:17; 10:1), this seems unlikely. (3) Elijah and Moses are prototypical vicarious sufferers, so their appearance relates to Jesus' passion prediction in Mark 9:9-10 (e.g., Harstine). But there is no discussion of this topic in Mark 9:2-10 or even in Mark 9:9-10, nor is there sufficient evidence of these two being prototypical for the many other righteous sufferers in Israel. (4) Elijah and Moses appear as representatives of righteous people who did not die but were admitted to heaven (Lee) (for Moses, see 1 above; for Elijah, see, e.g., 2 Kings 2:11-12; Sir 48:9; Liv. Pro. 21:15; Apocr. Ezra 7:6.). Mark clearly sees both figures as inhabitants of the heavenly realm. (5) There are various biographical commonalities between Moses and Elijah, most fundamentally their encounter with God on Mount Sinai/Horeb. Though depicted differently in Exodus 24:34 and 1 Kings 19, the traditions were sometimes viewed as parallel (cf. Sir 45:5; 48:7; Josephus, Ant. 2.264-269; 8.349-352). Thus, the transfiguration narrative is framed to reflect the theophany narratives of the Sinai tradition. Both prophets were chosen by God for a mission of life and salvation, a mission consummated in Jesus' gospel. Thus, Moses and Elijah depict God's will to save, and they attest to the credibility and finality of Jesus' ministry.

Why does Mark introduce them in the order he does: Elijah with Moses (Mk 9:4)? Elsewhere, Mark introduces two people or groups by adding a second to the first in order to enhance the grouping or coupling (cf. Mk 4:10; 8:34). The effect can be paraphrased: first Elijah, and then even Moses appears (Heil 1999; 2000). This is clarified in Mark 9:5, where the sequence is reversed: "one for Moses, one for Elijah."

The divine command to listen to Jesus (Mk 9:7) possibly alludes to the tradition of a prophet like Moses (Deut 18:15) or to the divine envoy of Exodus 23:20-23. The instruction to the disciples to listen to the beloved Son exclusively suggests that Jesus surpasses Elijah and Moses, as well as the eschatological expectations related to them.

2.2. The Gospel of Matthew. Matthew mentions Moses seven times. Six are adopted from Mark (Mt 8:4; cf. Mk 1:44; Mt 17:3-4; cf. Mk 9:4-5; Mt 19:7-8; cf. Mk 10:3-4; Mt 22:24; cf. Mk 12:19). Matthew 23:2 derives from Matthew's special material. Matthew 15:4; 22:31 parallel Mark 7:10; 12:26. However, Moses is replaced by God to underscore the character of divine revelation.

2.2.1. The Unchallenged Validity of the Law of Moses. Matthew's account of Jesus healing a leper (Mt 8:1-4) emphasizes Jesus' adherence to the law (Mt 8:4). Observance of the law serves as positive testimony to the hieratic authorities and Israel that Jesus the Messiah adheres to the law of Moses.

The accounts in Matthew 19:3-12; 22:23-33 demonstrate insufficient insight into God's will by the Pharisees and Sadducees. The Mosaic provisions regarding the issue of divorce letters are assessed as concessions due to the hardness of Israel's heart (Mt 19:8). By contrast, Jesus evaluates *divorce on the grounds of God's creational will (Mt 19:6-7), which precedes Moses' law (19:8). The focus is not on Moses but rather on the Pharisees' restriction of God's will to its legal provisions in contrast to God's creational intent.

In Matthew 22:23-33 the Sadducees' denial of the *resurrection of the dead is refuted by Jesus. While the Sadducees cannot adequately assess Scripture and God's power (Mt 22:29), Jesus offers insight into God's ultimate will without abandoning the law of Moses.

Matthew does not challenge the *authority of the scribes and Pharisees, who sit on the seat of Moses (Mt 23:2; cf. Pirqe R. El. 1:7), probably a teaching chair situated near the Torah ark in synagogues. The "seat of Moses" symbolizes the scribes' and Pharisees' authority and competence to interpret the law. According to Jesus, this authority, though rightfully theirs (Mt 23:3), is severely flawed in its disregard for justice, mercy and faith (Mt 23:23). It cannot model adherence to Moses' law (Mt 5:20).

Matthew's references to Moses and "his" law substantiate Jesus' teaching. He does not intend to abolish the scriptural tradition of Israel (Mt 5:17), for the law of Moses remains valid and effective until the end (Mt 5:18). Jesus' teaching prohibits the annulment of its least provisions (Mt 5:19). Jesus fulfills the law (Mt 5:17) by revealing its intrinsic intention, a righteousness exceeding the righteousness of Israel's leading parties (Mt 5:20, 47).

2.2.2 The Transfiguration Narrative. Matthew's account of the transfiguration (Mt 17:1-9) serves two purposes. First, it reveals "the legitimacy of Jesus' divine sonship as the eschatological revealer of the will of God for the people of God" (Barton). Second, it focuses on the issue of discipleship, thus giving it an ecclesiological thrust.

Matthew follows Mark's structure, with a few significant changes. First, the description of Jesus' transfiguration is enlarged by the motif of his radiant face (Mt 17:2), which evokes the radiant skin of Moses (Ex 34:29-30; Philo, Mos. 2.70). This link to Sinai is not surprising, since Matthew's entire narrative is shaped by "Mosaic imagery" (Allison; Baxter). Second, the appearance of Moses and Elijah is narrated by adopting the expected sequence of their names: "Moses and Elijah" (Mt 17:3). Any allusion to their representing “the law and the prophets” remains questionable. Others explain it as representing a broader Matthean Moses Christology, with Jesus as “the greater Moses” (Allison; A. D. A. Moses). Although Matthew certainly draws on the theme of Jesus being greater than his predecessors in the history of salvation (Mt 12:6, 41–42), it is doubtful that this phrase carries the elaborate notion of a Moses Christology. A third interpretation sees Moses and Elijah as inhabitants of the heavenly realm (Barton; Lee). Their appearance with Jesus emphasizes his transfigured status and offers a glimpse into the eschatological life awaiting all righteous believers. Matthew’s describing the divine cloud as suffused with light (Mt 17:5) links with the righteous (Mt 13:43) and the *angel at the tomb (Mt 28:3). Thus, the transfiguration discloses Jesus’ future glory as the heavenly Son of Man (Mt 16:27), a future that precludes the positive eschatological destiny of all his followers (Mt 22:11–14; 25:31–46).

2.3. The Gospel of Luke. Luke’s Gospel shows considerable interest in the character and writings of Moses (ten occurrences in Luke; nineteen in Acts). The prevailing focus is on the testimony of Moses and his writings to God’s final revelation in Jesus Christ.

2.3.1. Moses and His Writings as Mediation of God’s Will. Five references to Moses originate from the Lukan special material (Lk 2:22; 16:29, 31; 24:27, 44). The other five have Synoptic parallels (Lk 5:14; 9:30, 33; 20:28, 37). The account of Jesus’ birth and childhood serves as a christological prelude to his ministry. His parents are portrayed as pious Jews acting in accord with Moses’ law (Lk 2:22–24), thus demonstrating their compliance to God’s will. Jesus himself acts likewise, as illustrated in the story of the leper’s healing (Lk 5:12–16). In order for the healing to be concluded successfully, the requirements of the Mosaic law must be obeyed (Lk 5:14).

Most of the other occurrences of Moses refer to his writings. The entirety of Israel’s Scriptures is reflected in “Moses and all the prophets” (Lk 24:27; cf. Lk 24:44). These Scriptures testify to the credibility of Jesus’ divine mission. Jesus’ story of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:16–31) also refers to “Moses and the prophets” (Lk 16:29, 31). It addresses material wealth and its eschatologically fatal consequences to people who idolize wealth and ignore the basic needs of the indigent (see Rich and Poor). This is a grave violation of God’s will as found in Moses and the prophets (Lk 16:29).

There are two occurrences of Moses in the Lukan account of Jesus’ controversy with the Sadducees. Luke 20:28 introduces the provision of levirate marriage quoted by the Sadducees. Jesus simply refutes their position (Lk 20:34–38), omitting any critique of a misguided interpretation of the Mosaic law by the Sadducees (Lk 20:34; cf. Mt 22:29; Mk 12:24). Jesus’ authority to interpret God’s will is reinforced by Moses’ own theological reasoning. The Sadducees, with their exclusive allegiance to the law of Moses, are refuted by Moses himself.

2.3.2. The Transfiguration Narrative. Luke’s transfiguration story (Lk 9:28–36) serves as a prelude to the travel account (Lk 9:51–19:48). Luke draws on Mark, but, like Matthew, he rewrites significant parts. First, Jesus’ white shining clothing emphasizes his affiliation with the heavenly world (e.g., 1 En. 71:1) rather than his association with Moses (Ex 34). Second, the appearance of Moses and Elijah, in their heavenly attire and glory, is for the benefit of Jesus alone, since the disciples are “weighed down with sleep” (Lk 9:32) (Harstine). Jesus’ own glory foreshadows his resurrection and parousia (cf. Lk 9:26; 21:27; 24:26). Moses and Elijah discuss Jesus’ coming “exodus” in Jerusalem (Lk 9:31)—that is, his resurrection and ascension. The term exodos (NRSV: “departure”) (see Reid) echoes Moses’ leading Israel out of Egypt to the promised land and reflects continuity between the old exodus and the new one (O’Toole).

Jesus’ “departure” is characterized as an accomplishment including the aspect of fulfillment foretold in Scripture (Lk 18:31–33; 24:27, 44–46). It allows for the assumption that Moses and Elijah are perceived as representatives of Israel’s holy Scriptures—that is, the law (of Moses) and the prophets (Bovon). However, their presence also relates their mission to Jesus’ divine mission (Lee; Harstine). As both Moses and Elijah revealed God’s will, so does Jesus (Lk 9:35; cf. Deut 18:15). Luke primarily underscores a “basic continuity” (Lee) between Moses’ and Elijah’s divine mission and that of Jesus. However, Jesus alone is God’s Son, the chosen one (Lk 9:35). As Jesus alone remains with the disciples (Lk 9:36), henceforth Jesus will be the only mediator, interpreter and teacher of God’s salvific will (Croatto). Ultimately, it is the risen Jesus who will interpret the writings of Moses and the prophets to explain his “exodus” to the disciples (Lk 24:27, 44–46).

2.4. The Gospel of John. Most of John’s thirteen references to Moses are related to the divine law mediated or “written” by Moses (Jn 1:17, 45; 5:45–46; 7:19, 22 [2x], 23; 8:5) or to his religious authority in Israel (Jn 9:28–29). Two occurrences mark certain events in his life (Jn 3:14; 6:32). John’s Gospel is often thought to mirror a vigorous dispute between a Jewish Christian Johannine community and a *Judaism in reorganization mode after A.D. 70. To be a disciple of Moses and Jesus at the same time was no longer possible (Jn 9:28). As a party in this conflict, John's Gospel lays claim to Moses and the religious traditions of Israel. As a consequence, this Gospel never attempts to refute the religious authority of Moses and his role as mediator of the divine law; however, it repeatedly compares Moses and Jesus (Lierman).

John's prologue (Jn 1:1-18) corroborates that the law was given by God through Moses (Jn 1:17a; cf. Jn 7:19, 22). However, it has no salvific power. Only Jesus, the Logos incarnate, has this power (Jn 1:17b). Thus, the sole purpose of Moses and his law and writings is to testify to Jesus. Without citing Moses' writings, John's Gospel maintains that all eschatological hopes of salvation condensed in the Scriptures that Moses "wrote" (Jn 1:45; 5:46-47) are definitively realized in Jesus (Jn 1:45). This Gospel unfolds the new role of Moses and his law by embedding it in an escalating dispute between Jesus and various Jewish adversaries (Jn 5:1-10:42) (see Schapdick). In these debates the use of the law as an interpretive standard to judge Jesus' divine mission is rejected (Jn 7:23; 9:16, 24, 29). In addition, Moses' activities to secure Israel's survival in the wilderness provide no criteria for evaluating Jesus' salvific revelation (Jn 6:31-33). In fact, an adequate reading of Israel's Scriptures reveals that Moses wrote about Jesus (Jn 5:46). Anyone who does not concur demonstrates unbelief and will be accused by Moses himself (Jn 5:45). Such interpreters of the law might consider themselves disciples of Moses (9:28), but as long as they fail to accept Jesus' divine mission, they are not. Specific contents of the law are mentioned only when the legitimacy of Jesus' revelatory claim requires vindication (Jn 7:20-24 [Sabbath, circumcision]). A minor exception is John 8:5, in a passage that most certainly was not part of the original Gospel (Jn 7:53-8:11). The episode describes the authority of Jesus to object to a penalty of the law (stoning) in reference to the sin of adultery (see Lev 20:10). It serves to illustrate Jesus' acceptance of sinners (Jn 8:7-11). References to events from Moses' life focus on life-saving or life-preserving acts (see Ex 16:1-36; Num 21:4-9), which are attributed not to him but rather to God (Jn 3:14; 6:31-33). This proves God to be the sole savior of life. God's final gift is eternal life exclusively related to Jesus. The ministry of Moses to Israel serves as an antecedent to Jesus' ministry (Lierman).

3. Conclusions.

The Gospels introduce Moses mainly for christological purposes. Soteriological and eschatological aspects related to Moses are reconfigured to portray Jesus. Moses and his Scriptures become the prime witness for the continuous salvific will of the God of Israel, which takes its definitive form in the gospel of Jesus. Moses' revelatory role at Mount Sinai affirms Jesus' revelatory role (Matthew, Mark, Luke), the expectation of a prophet like Moses affirms the divine authority of Jesus (esp. Luke), and events from Moses' life depict the salvation offered in Jesus and his mission (John). Finally, Moses' admission to heaven (Mark, Matthew, Luke) illustrates and evaluates (Mark) the status of a transfigured Jesus in order to offer a glimpse into the future world of salvation (Matthew) and to foreshadow the consequences of his mission, his passion, resurrection and ascension (Luke).

See also ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB; ELIJAH AND ELISHA; ISRAEL; JUDAISM, COMMON; LAW; MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF; MOUNTAIN AND WILDERNESS; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; TRANSFIGURATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. del Agua, "The Narrative of the Transfiguration as a Derashic Scenification of a Faith Confession (Mark 9:2-8 par)," NTS 39 (1993) 340-54; D. C. Allison, The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); S. C. Barton, "The Transfiguration of Christ according to Mark and Matthew: Christology and Anthropology," in Auferstehung—Resurrection: Resurrection, Transfiguration and Exaltation in Old Testament, Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity; The Fourth Durham-Tübingen Research Symposium (Tübingen, September, 1999), ed. F. Avemarie and H. Lichtenberger (WUNT 135; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001) 231-46; W. Baxter, "Mosaic Imagery in the Gospel of Matthew," TJ 20 (1999) 69-83; F. Bovon, Luke 1: A Commentary on the Gospel of Luke 1:1-9:50, trans. C. M. Thomas, ed. H. Koster (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); J. S. Croatto, "Jesus, Prophet Like Elijah, and Prophet-Teacher Like Moses in Luke-Acts," JBL 124 (2005) 451-65; M. D. Goulder, "Elijah with Moses, or, a Rift in the Pre-Markan Luke," in Christology, Controversy, and Community: New Testament Essays in Honour of David R. Catchpole, ed. D. G. Horrell and C. M. Tuckett (NovTSup 99; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 193-208; S. Harstine, Moses as a Character in the Fourth Gospel: A Study of Ancient Reading Techniques (JSNTSup 229; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); J. P. Heil, "A Note on 'Elijah with Moses' in Mark 9:4," RB 80 (1999) 115; idem, The Transfiguration of Jesus: Narrative Meaning and the Function of Mark 9.2-8, Matthew 17.1-8, and Luke 9.28-36 (AnBib 144; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute Press, 2000); M. D. Hooker, "What Doest Thou Here, Elijah?’ A Look at St. Mark’s Account of the Transfiguration,” in The Glory of Christ in the New Testament: Studies in Christology in Memory of G. B. Caird, ed. L. D. Hurst and N. T. Wright (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987) 59-70; S. S. Lee, Jesus’ Transfiguration and the Believer’s Transformation: A Study of the Transfiguration and Its Development in Early Christian Writings (WUNT 2/265; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009); J. Lierman, The New Testament Moses: Christian Perceptions of Moses and Israel in the Setting of Jewish Religion (WUNT 2/173; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004); A. D. A. Moses, Matthew’s Transfiguration Story and Jewish-Christian Controversy (JSNTSup 122; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); C. R. Moss, “The Transfiguration: An Exercise in Markan Accommodation,” BibInt 12 (2004) 69-89; R. F. O’Toole, “The Parallels between Jesus and Moses,” BTB 20 (1990) 22-29; B. E. Reid, The Transfiguration: A Source- and Redaction-Critical Study of Luke 9:28-36 (CahRB 32; Paris: Gabalda, 1993); S. Schapdick, “Religious Authority Re-Evaluated: The Character of Moses in the Fourth Gospel,” in Moses in Biblical and Extra-Biblical Traditions, ed. A. Graupner and M. Wolter (BZAW 372; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007) 181-209; D. Zeller, “Bedeutung und religionsgeschichtlicher Hintergrund der Verwandlung Jesu (Markus 9:2-8),” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (NTTS 28/2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999) 303-21.

S. Schapdick

MOTHER OF JESUS. See MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS.

MOUNT OF OLIVES. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

MOUNTAIN AND WILDERNESS

In the Gospels geographical facts are the vehicles of literary and theological ideas. What matters primarily is not on which mountain or in what part of the wilderness any particular event occurred, but rather the *typological or symbolic significance of a given location.

1. Mountain
2. Wilderness

1. Mountain.

Most of the mountains in the Gospels carry theological meaning because they can be related to (1) Sinai; (2) speculation about Zion; or (3) the eschatological prophecy in Zechariah 14:4 about the Mount of Olives.

1.1. Terminology. In the LXX and Josephus to oros can mean not only “(the) mountain” but also “mountainous area” or “(the) hill country.” But “(the) mountain” is the more common meaning of the Greek expression, and as there were other words available for “mountainous area” and “(the) hill country,” and as in several Gospel texts to oros must mean “(the) mountain” (e.g., Mt 5:14; 17:1), it seems best to render to oros consistently as “(the) mountain.”

1.2. Jewish Background. In Jewish literature mountains are associated with numerous themes, including power (Jer 51:25; Dan 2:45), revelation (Jub. 1:2-4; 2 Bar. 13:1), antiquity (Job 15:7; Prov 8:25;), eternity (Gen 49:26; Ps 125:1) and pagan religion (Is 14:13; 16:12). But the most important fact is that several mountains were the scenes of theophanies and/or played crucial roles in salvation history, as the names “Moriah,” “Nebo/Pisgah,” “Carmel” and especially “Sinai” and “Zion” attest. Around the latter two there gathered relatively well-defined clusters of motifs (Sinai: *Moses, wilderness, law-giving; Zion: kingship, *Jerusalem, *temple, inviolability).

Whereas Sinai only occasionally appears in material about the latter days (e.g., in 1 En. 1:4 it is the place of future judgment, and in Liv. Pro. Jer. 11–19 the ark and the saints will be gathered to Sinai, where they will be protected), Zion is prominent in Jewish eschatology. In the OT and elsewhere Zion is to be the place of Israel’s congregating (Jer 31:1-25; Tob 14:5-7), the goal of the Gentiles’ pilgrimage (Is 2:2-3; Zech 2:6-12), the site from which the eschatological Torah will be promulgated (Is 2:2-3; Mic 4:2), the location of the enthronement of God or his representative (Mic 4:6-7; Pss. Sol. 17:21-46) and the home of the new temple (Jub. 1:29).

1.3. Jesus’ Ministry. The following Gospel texts place Jesus on a mountain: Matthew 4:8; 5:1; 14:23 // Mark 6:46; Matthew 15:29; 17:1 // Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28; Matthew 21:1 // Mark 11:1; Matthew 24:3 // Mark 13:3; Matthew 26:30 // Mark 14:26; Luke 22:39; Matthew 28:16; Mark 3:13 // Luke 6:12; Mark 5:5, 11 // Luke 8:32; Luke 4:29; 21:37; John 6:3, 15; 8:1. Christian tradition has repeatedly sought to identify the several unnamed mountains in these texts (e.g., Tabor has been thought the site of Jesus’ transfiguration). It is not possible, however, to link more than a very few events with known mountains, at least with any degree of probability. The Gospels explicitly identify only three mountains: the Mount of Olives (e.g., Mk 11:1; 13:3; 14:26), the hill on which Nazareth was situated (Lk 4:29) and Mount Gerizim (Jn 4:20-21).

Given the regularity with which the Gospel tradition, in all its strands (Mark, Q, M, L, John), has Jesus on a mountain, the association may be accepted as historical. Perhaps Jesus sometimes retired to mountains, which typically were deserted places, for solitude. It is also possible that mountains held some symbolic or theological significance in his own thinking, although no specifics can be credibly hazarded.

1.4. Parallels with Sinai. In accordance with the conviction that Jesus fulfilled the oracle of Deuteronomy 18:15, 18 (cf. Acts 3:22-23), the Gospel writers and those who passed on the tradition before them drew parallels between Jesus and Moses. In this way, Sinai made its presence felt. For instance, in Matthew 17; Mark 9; Luke 9 Jesus is transfigured on a "high mountain." This recalls Sinai. Sinai was thought to have been "high" (Philo, Mos. 2.70; Josephus, Ant. 3.76), and there are numerous parallels between Mark 9:2-9 par. and traditions about Moses on Sinai (see esp. Ex 24; 34). Both Jesus and Moses were transfigured by light, both were accompanied by a select group of three, and both went up on the seventh day. In addition, both transfigurations were associated with a descending cloud, in both incidents a voice came forth from that cloud, and in both cases those who saw the radiant figure became afraid. Furthermore, Moses and Elijah, who appeared and conversed with the transfigured Jesus (see Transfiguration), are the only OT figures of whom it is related that they spoke with God on Sinai. Clearly, the Gospel story was told in such a fashion as to call to mind the theophany on Sinai (this holds for all three Synoptic accounts).

Matthew 5:1 ("and going up on a mountain, he sat down") and Matthew 8:1 ("coming down from the mountain") are also illuminated by Sinai. Not only does the wording of the Greek sentences resemble OT texts about Moses (e.g., LXX Ex 19:3; 32:1; 34:29; Deut 9:9), but also the *Sermon on the Mount follows a series of events that is closely paralleled in the story of Moses as it is known from Scripture, Josephus and other sources (e.g., prophecy of Israel's savior, a father's uncertainty about his wife's pregnancy, the slaughter of Jewish infants by a wicked Gentile king, a return from exile after those seeking the savior's life have died, crossing of the waters/baptism [cf. 1 Cor 10:1-5], temptation in the wilderness for forty years/days); and in some Jewish texts Moses sits on Sinai (Ezek. Trag. 67-82; b. Meg. 21a-b; b. Sotah 49a; the notion is based on a possible translation of MT Deut 9:9: "and I sat on the mountain forty days and forty nights"). The Sermon on the Mount is obviously some sort of counterpart to the giving of the law on Sinai.

John 6:3 reads, "Jesus went up to the mountain and sat down there with his disciples" (cf. Jn 6:15, where Jesus is alone on the mountain; this is reminiscent of LXX Ex 24:2; 34:3). This verse, which so closely resembles Matthew 5:1-2 and its OT parallels, heads a chapter filled with explicit correlations between Jesus and Moses. Here too, then, Jesus on the mountain is like Moses on Sinai. In this way, it is plain that Jesus fulfilled the eschatological expectations of Judaism, according to which the last redeemer (the Messiah) will be like the first redeemer (Moses) (see also Mk 3:13?).

1.5. Zion Typology. In Matthew 15:29 Jesus goes up and sits on a mountain (cf. Mt 5:1-2). This mountain is a place of gathering, healing and feeding. Also, Matthew 15:30-31 may well allude to Isaiah 35:5-6, part of an eschatological prophecy concerning Zion (cf. Origen, Comm. Matt. 11.18). All this suggests a Mount Zion typology (see Donaldson). In Jewish expectation Zion is the eschatological gathering site of Israel (see 1.2 above), a place of healing (Is 35:5-6; cf. Mic 4:6-7) and the location of the messianic feast (Is 25:6-10; Pesiq. Rab. 41.5). Matthew 15:29-38 seemingly interprets the ministry of Jesus as the fulfillment of the Jewish hopes surrounding Zion.

How does this relate to the fact that elsewhere in Matthew the mountain motif is so clearly linked to Sinai (see 1.4 above)? Already in the OT Sinai and Zion are closely associated, as in Psalm 68, and this is true also in later Jewish tradition (e.g., Liv. Pro. Jer. 11-19; Tg. Neof. Ex 4:27; Midr. Bab. Ps 68:9). A key text in this regard is Isaiah 2:2-3, which includes "Torah shall go forth out of Zion." Here Mount Zion functions as the eschatological Sinai, the mountain of the law. In view of this, the Sinai and Zion parallels should not be set over against each other. The two go hand in hand. Both make Jesus the eschatological counterpart of Moses.

It is sometimes suggested that Matthew 5:14 ("a city set on a mountain cannot be hid") has in view eschatological Zion or the new Jerusalem. It was expected that Zion would be raised to a great height and shed its light throughout the whole world (Is 2:2-4; 60:1-22; Sib. Or. 5:420-23). But the reference is uncertain. The verse is perfectly understandable without it referring to any particular city, and the wording lacks a definite article ("a city"). Furthermore, the parallel in Matthew 5:15 (one does not conceal a lit lamp but rather sets it out) speaks against the proposal, as any lamp would fit the bill.

1.6. The Mount of Olives. Zechariah 14:4 reads, "In that day his feet will stand on the Mount of Olives, . . . and the Mount of Olives will be split in two from east to west." This eschatological prophecy makes Jesus' choice of the Mount of Olives as the site for his eschatological discourse (Mk 13 par.) especially appropriate (note also Acts 1:11, which links the parousia and the Mount of Olives). There may also be an allusion to Zechariah's prophecy in Mark 11:23, according to which true belief can cast "this mountain" into the sea. In its context, Mark 11:23 could allude to the Mount of Olives (cf. Mk 11:1) and so to Zechariah 14:4, which foresees the splitting of that mountain (alternatively, the verse, which curiously recalls Homer, Od. 5.480-85, where the Cyclops literally casts a mountain into the sea, could also allude to the destruction of the Temple Mount, upon which Jesus stands as he speaks).

Matthew 27:51-53 may also draw on Zechariah 14:4-5 (interpreted, as in the Targum and Did. 16:6-7, as a prophecy of the resurrection). In both texts there is a resurrection of the dead immediately outside Jerusalem, an earthquake occurs, the same verb is used (schizō ["to split"] in the passive), and the resurrected ones are called hoi hagioi ("the holy ones"). Even today, the western rise to the Mount of Olives is covered with Jewish graves because of the belief, inspired by Zechariah 14:4-5, that on the last day the Messiah will return to that place, where the *resurrection will commence.

1.7. A Literary Function in Matthew. The mountain in Matthew 4:8 (the Lukan parallel, presumably following Q, has no mountain) serves a literary function. It relates a scene near the beginning of the Gospel to the Gospel's conclusion. In Matthew 4:8 the devil (see Demon, Devil, Satan), on a mountain, offers Jesus, who has yet to suffer and die, all the kingdoms of the world. But in Matthew 28:16-20, again on a mountain, Jesus, who has been crucified, declares that he has all authority in heaven and earth. The lesson, made plain by Matthew's redactional insertion of a mountain into the two scenes, is that only after the passion, and only from God, can Jesus accept legitimate authority.

2. Wilderness.

The wilderness is significant primarily because of its association with the theme of a new exodus.

2.1. Terminology. In the Gospels hē erēmos refers to an abandoned or uncultivated place, not necessarily a desert. In the LXX the word translates several Hebrew equivalents, including midbār, ārābā and negeb, words with different shades of meaning.

2.2. Jewish Background. The law was handed down in the wilderness of Sinai, and the entry into the promised land was preceded by Israel's desert wanderings. Thus, despite the tradition of disobedience and murmuring in the desert and the fact that there is no nomadic or desert ideal in the OT, the time in the wilderness was sometimes described in glowing terms (e.g., Is 63:11-14). Moreover, it came to be held that a return to the wilderness and a second exodus would herald the messianic age, and the blessings of the new age were moved to the period of the wandering and vice versa—not unnatural developments, given that the desert had been a place of revelation and Israel's constitution. Pertinent texts include Isaiah 35:1-2; 40:3-5; Ezekiel 20:33-44; Hosea 2:14-23; 1QS VIII, 12-16; Revelation 12:6, 13-14.

That the expectation of a return to the desert could be taken literally is shown by the activity of the Jews at Qumran (they chose to dwell in the desert in fulfillment of Is 40:3-4) (see Dead Sea Scrolls), by the behavior of certain so-called *prophets (Josephus, J.W. 2.259, 261; 6.351; 7.438) and by the warning in Matthew 24:26.

2.3. Jesus' Ministry. Jesus, like *John the Baptist (Mt 11:7; Mk 1:3-4; Lk 7:24; Jn 1:23), spent time in the wilderness (Mt 4:1 // Mk 1:12; Lk 4:1; Mt 14:13, 15 // Mk 6:31-32, 35; Lk 9:12; Mk 1:35 // Lk 4:42; Mk 1:45 // Lk 5:16; Jn 11:54). The motivation for withdrawal may have been simply or above all a desire to escape on occasion the crowds and the demands of ministry. This would concur with the tradition stating that Jesus' retreats to the wilderness were occasions for prayer (Mk 1:35; Lk 5:16).

2.4. New Exodus. The theme of returning to the wilderness in fulfillment of eschatological expectation dominates Mark 1:1-13. John dwells in the wilderness and calls *Israel thence to be baptized. He is the fulfillment of LXX Isaiah 40:3 (a voice crying in the wilderness). Jesus himself first appears in the wilderness and there undergoes temptation. In addition, two of the three OT texts combined in Mark 1:2-3 (Ex 23:20; Mal 3:1; Is 40:3) have to do with the wilderness tradition (Ex 23:20 is about an angelic guardian and guide for the desert, and Is 40:3 explicitly refers to the desert). The concentrated focus on the wilderness means that the story of Jesus begins as a second exodus. Beginning and end mirror one another (cf. 1 Cor 10:1-5).

The theme seems to be continued in Mark 6:30-44, where Jesus in the wilderness gives rest (cf. Deut 3:20; 12:9-10) and feeds the people (cf. Ex 16; Num 11). There are several other parallels here between Jesus and Moses (e.g., Mk 6:34 recalls Num 27:17), and one suspects that Mark intended Mark 6:30-44 to call to mind Exodus 16; Numbers 11: like Moses, Jesus fed Israel in the wilderness (that Jesus himself had similar thoughts is a real possibility [see McKnight]).

Whether Matthew and Luke saw a new-exodus theme in the feeding of the five thousand is not so clear. But in John 6:31, 49, in a discourse following the miraculous feeding, reference is made to Israel eating manna “in the desert” (cf. Jn 3:14). It is true that the Fourth Evangelist places the feeding near a mountain (Jn 6:3), not “in the wilderness.” But John 6:3 alludes to Sinai (see 1.4 above), Sinai and the wilderness were firmly linked (“the wilderness of Sinai” being a fixed expression), and in some contexts “the mountain(s)” and “the wilderness” were almost interchangeable (note Mt 18:12 // Lk 15:4). So the story in John 6 apparently takes place in the wilderness, and the explicit reference to the desert in John 6:31, 49 means that the theme of the eschatological return to the wilderness is present.

We have already observed (see 1.4 above) that Matthew 1—8 draws extensive correlations between the story of Moses and the exodus and the story of Jesus. Here we may note that Israel’s time in the wilderness has its parallel in Matthew 3—4, where Jesus in the wilderness passes through the waters of *baptism and then enters the desert to undergo *temptation. Once again the wilderness setting is at the service of the new-exodus motif.

2.5. The Wilderness and Demons. In the temptation narratives Jesus confronts Satan in the wilderness. In Luke 8:29 we learn that the Gerasene demoniac was driven into the desert by a demon. And in Matthew 12:43-45 and its parallel, Luke 11:24-26, the unclean spirit who has been cast out “passes through waterless places.” These texts are illumined by the Jewish belief that the wilderness, being beyond the bounds of society, is the haunt of evil spirits (see Lev 16:10; Is 13:21; 1 En. 10:4-5; Tob 8:3; 4 Macc 18:8; 2 Bar. 10:8). The idea dominated later Christian monasticism.

See also JERUSALEM; JOHN THE BAPTIST; MOSES; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN; TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison Jr., The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); T. L. Donaldson, Jesus on the Mountain: A Study in Matthean Theology (JSNTSup 8; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985); E. S. Malbon, Narrative Space and Mythic Meaning in Mark (NVBS; San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986); U. Mauser, Christ in the Wilderness: The Wilderness Theme in the Second Gospel and Its Basis in the Biblical Tradition (SBT 39; London: SCM Press, 1963); S. McKnight, “Jesus and Prophetic Actions,” BBR 10 (2000) 197-232; V. Mora, La symbolique de la création dans l’Évangile de Matthieu (LD 144; Paris: Cerf, 1991); R. S. Sugirtharajah, ed., Wilderness: Essays in Honour of Frances Young (LNTS 295; London: T & T Clark International, 2005); S. Talmon, “The ‘Desert Motif’ in the Bible and in Qumran Literature,” in Biblical Motifs: Origins and Transformations, ed. A. Altmann (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1966) 31-63.

D. C. Allison Jr.

MULTIPLE ATTESTATION, CRITERIA OF. See CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY.

N

NAIN. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

NARRATIVE CRITICISM

Narrative criticism is a methodology for reading storied genres. This method has its origins in literary-critical circles and first emerged as a discrete method applied to biblical studies in the 1970s. In Gospel studies narrative criticism has become an important interpretive tool and has continued to evolve; it is often intentionally combined with other methodologies, such as feminist criticism or even historical criticism.

1. Definition of Narrative Criticism
2. History of Narrative Criticism in Gospel Studies
3. Methodological Description of Narrative Criticism
4. The Changing Face of Narrative Criticism

1. Definition of Narrative Criticism.

In broadest terms, narrative criticism is a method of interpreting biblical narratives that attends to their literary qualities and, specifically, to their narrative or storied shape (Resseguie, 18-19). Literary features, such as plot, sequencing, pacing, point of view, characterization and irony, capture the attention of narrative critics. Such literary analysis is accompanied by a focus on the final form of the text rather than emphasis on issues of the text's production (e.g., source analysis). In fact, early application of narrative criticism to the Gospels purposely bracketed out the historical-critical concerns paramount to Gospel studies in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries (Powell 1990, 8). Also characteristic of narrative criticism is an assumption of the unity of the text, although recent critique and reassessment have raised questions about the validity of this assumption.

2. History of Narrative Criticism in Gospel Studies.

2.1. Influence of Literary Criticism. The phenomenon of the "New Criticism" came into vogue in literary circles of the 1930s as a reaction to attempts to understand a literary work by retrieving an author's psychological motives for writing. The New Criticism highlighted the autonomy of a literary work from its situational moorings. The text as autonomous from its author became the focus of the interpretive task for this particular methodological school. A similar sensibility emerged in Gospel studies in the 1970s, paving the way for approaches that centered not on historical analysis of the text but rather on its literary features. One such approach was structuralism, which attended to what were termed "deep structures" that go beyond messages at a text's surface. The goal of this analysis was to uncover the universal and unifying elements of a text. Narrative criticism was another such approach, with its focus on an individual Gospel without recourse to various historical facets of the text, including authorial motives or sources used. While narratology is the discipline within the field of literary criticism most similar to narrative criticism, narrative criticism itself, in its nomenclature and evolution, is essentially unique to biblical studies.

2.2. Influence of Redaction Criticism. In the modern period biblical scholars had focused closely on historical issues surrounding the Gospels. Scholars of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries were preoccupied mostly with questions regarding sources for the Gospels, involving issues of written dependence among the Synoptics (see Synoptic Problem) and *oral forms that preceded their composition. By the 1950s *redaction criticism had emerged as an extension of these source interests. Redaction critics sought to determine the evangelists' particular theological interests by analyzing changes made to their source material. These editorial moves and associated theological contributions were then used to reconstruct an evangelist's specific ecclesial and social setting. One result of redaction criticism (particularly in its later manifestation of compositional criticism) was a more studious engagement with the final form of each Gospel. Focus on the final form became a hallmark of narrative criticism. So while there are significant differences between redaction and narrative criticisms, the former helped paved the way for the rise of the latter in Gospel studies.

2.3. The Emergence of Narrative Criticism in Gospel Studies. Although there were multiple early forays into literary-critical analysis of the Gospels (e.g., Perrin; see Stibbe, 6), the work of the Society of Biblical Literature Markan Seminar (1971-1980) proved to be seminal in Gospel studies. In a paper presented to the Markan Seminar in 1980 summarizing the seminar's work, D. Rhoads first employed the term "narrative criticism" for literary analysis of the Gospels (Rhoads 1982, 412). In that paper he identified two developments that led to narrative criticism in Mark. The first was a movement from textual fragmentation resulting from the application of historical-critical methods toward greater narrative unity. The second development was a shift of attention from history to fiction. By the latter, he meant that "in the end [Mark's] narrative world of the story is a literary creation of the author" with integrity apart from its historical referents (Rhoads 1982, 413). Some of the fruit of the exploratory work of the Markan Seminar was published in Mark as Story (Rhoads and Michie). Narrative criticism applied to the other Gospels followed in subsequent years in works such as Matthew as Story (Kingsbury 1988a [first published in 1986]), The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts (Tannehill) and Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel (Culpepper).

Early issues that emerged in narrative criticism centered on its relation to historical engagement with the Gospels, especially since historical criticism had so long reigned as the prevailing method of Gospel studies. For example, in an early form of narrative criticism the critic approached a Gospel as a first-time reader, which included a commitment to reading as if one did not know subsequent parts of the story. Assuming the perspective of the first-time reader also included (for some) a minimalist view of the implied reader's knowledge. For example, R. Edwards, a narrative critic in Matthew, defined the implied reader as a first-time reader who knows only whatever historical or cultural information is provided in the narrative itself (Edwards, 10). In contrast to this perspective, a more common application of narrative criticism envisions an implied reader who knows everything that the implied author expects the reader to know, including linguistic competence, universal knowledge and sociocultural knowledge presupposed by the narrative, and knowledge of other literature used, such as the OT (Powell 1993, 32).

Although a significant commonality of commitments, terminology and goals typifies narrative criticism of the four Gospels, some differences in emphasis based on the unique features of each Gospel have emerged. For example, the abrupt nature of the ending of Mark (Mk 16:8) made it a fertile area for discussion of narrative closure—or lack thereof, in Mark's case. Narrative criticism of John's Gospel, on the other hand, has necessarily grappled with the way irony is used across that book.

3. Methodological Description of Narrative Criticism.

3.1. Two Levels of a Narrative. Many early narrative critics based their framing of the discipline on S. Chatman's Story and Discourse (1978), with special focus on Chatman's distinction between two levels of a narrative. Accordingly, narrative criticism typically highlights attention to the story level and the discourse level of a narrative (with Rhoads and Michie referring to these as the story and rhetorical levels). The story level consists of elements that most readers easily notice as they read narratives: the settings, events and characters that make up the plot of the story. The discourse level (or the narrative's "rhetoric") consists of elements such as point of view, narration, event sequencing and pacing, plot-tedness, characterization, irony, structural patterns and stylistics (Brown 2002, 25; Powell 2010, 245-49). A Gospel's narrative logic is illuminated by asking interpretive questions of the narrative's discourse. E. Malbon describes this as attending to "how the story means, that is, how the implied author uses characters, settings, plot, and rhetoric to communicate meaning" (Malbon 2008, 47). While narrative criticism has received critique for introducing a certain amount of conceptual and lexical complexity, the basic features of narrative criticism are more about what J. Green calls the development of "literary sensibilities" rather than of a "literary technology" (Green 2010, 98).

An example of attending to how a story means can be seen in Matthew's arrangement of Jesus' teaching into five major discourses (Mt 5-7; 10; 13; 18; 24-25). The arrangement of much of Jesus' teaching into these blocks affects the pacing of the story. The reader is provided an experience of Jesus' teaching with fewer narrational interruptions and with a greater “real time” sense of being taught by Jesus. The audience of these teaching blocks on Matthew’s story level (usually the disciples) fades to a certain extent as each discourse progresses, so that the reader experiences a more immediate sense of being the recipient of Jesus’ teaching (Brown 2005).

3.2. Implied Author and Reader Concepts. Another central methodological lens of narrative criticism involves the concepts of the implied author and the implied reader. These constructs are not to be equated with the empirical author and audience. Instead, the implied author is the author presupposed by the narrative and so is a textual construct. Rather than reconstructing the historical author of Mark’s Gospel, for instance, narrative criticism draws upon the implied author of Mark (i.e., the author who begins his Gospel with an OT composite to illuminate Jesus’ identity in relation to Israel’s hopes and who portrays the disciples as hardhearted and obtuse).

A central aspect of narrative-critical methodology is the task of reading the narrative as the implied reader—“that imaginary person in whom the intention of the text is to be thought of as always reaching its fulfillment” (Kingsbury 1988a, 38). Yet the concept of the implied reader is quite varied among narrative critics. For some, it is a fully textual construct—that is, the reader presupposed in the text. For instance, according to R. Culpepper, the implied reader is “defined by the text as the one who performs all the mental moves required to enter into the narrative world and respond to it as the implied author intends” (Culpepper, 7). In this definition the text itself provides the cues for an “ideal” reader to understand and respond appropriately and so to fulfill the intentions of the text’s implied author.

Other narrative critics, following W. Iser’s more open-ended description, define the implied reader at the intersection of a text and its empirical readers. For Iser and those who use his implied reader construct, actual readers necessarily contribute to the meaning of the text by filling in its inherent gaps. By doing so, they give shape to the implied reader as the one who actualizes the intentions of the narrative (e.g., Howell, 210–11). As such, “narratives cannot be hermetically sealed off from the social situations in which audiences encounter them” (Thatcher, 33).

These concepts of implied author and reader are central for narrative criticism and its interpretive method because a key goal of a narrative-critical reading is to construct the implied reader for a particular narrative. From a narrative perspective, the communicative intentions of the Gospel of Luke are determined by the shaping of Luke’s implied reader by the implied author. If it is determined that Luke’s implied reader is one who participates in the reign of God brought by Jesus through renouncing status concerns and embracing those who have been on the margins of society, then such participation is part of the meaning and goal of Luke’s narrative.

4. The Changing Face of Narrative Criticism.

4.1. Critiques and Responses. Narrative criticism continues to hold an important place in Gospel studies, in spite of and possibly because of critiques that have emerged and been addressed by narrative critics. As a method, narrative criticism has shown itself to be fairly flexible, as its practitioners have responded to concerns by reenvisioning its parameters.

4.1.1. Historical Critique. Appraisals of narrative criticism have raised historical questions from the time of its inception. For example, narrative criticism was accused of ignoring historical issues in its pursuit of textual autonomy. Early attempts to bridge these concerns included the use of the construct of the implied reader for historical purposes. J. Kingsbury, for instance, argued that the implied reader might provide an approximate index to the empirical audience. In a final chapter of Matthew as Story he extrapolates his own historical conclusions about Matthew’s audience from a narrative reading. In doing this kind of reconstruction, narrative critics have emphasized the importance of understanding a Gospel holistically, rather than using a gospel in piecemeal fashion to reconstruct the intended audience (Kingsbury 1988b, 459; Culpepper, 11).

In response to early assessments indicating that narrative criticism should be complemented by historical methods, narrative critics in recent years have taken a more comprehensive approach. Arguing that “narrative analysis of the Gospels should be methodologically as inclusive and comprehensive as possible,” P. Merenlahti and R. Hakola recommend an eclectic methodology that understands narrative analysis to be integral to historical study (Merenlahti and Hakola, 47–48; see also Stibbe). How this integration happens is a matter of some debate. Merenlahti argues for a kind of narrative criticism that attends to the ideological dissonance in every Gospel narrative (Merenlahti, 97). He defines the plot of a Gospel as both a literary entity and “a historical process of ideological meaning-making” (Merenlahti, 100). The latter notion is an acknowledgment of historical particularities and tensions within a Gospel without making those historical exigencies the sole focus of or the central means to interpretation. Instead, Merelahti and Hakola speak of appreciating the polyphony of the text, with its echoes of differing oral traditions, multiple authors and contexts, and contrasting ideologies (Merenlahti and Hakola, 32).

Alternately, Green, while affirming the importance of historical analysis in the study of the Gospels, critiques reading them in a way that presumes an ability to distinguish clearly between narrative and history. Since all narratives that make historical claims, including the Gospels, are themselves “narrative representation[s] of history,” it is important to attend first to the narrative quality of the text (Green 1997, 2). Yet Green readily acknowledges that the Gospels, as “cultural products,” require an understanding of their cultural and social milieus as an essential narrative-critical task (Green 1997, 19). He is more resistant, however, to wedding a narrative sensibility with a historical-critical paradigm that assumes that the Gospels provide material for a reconstruction of the past, since the latter task issues in a reworked narrative quite different from any provided in the four canonical Gospels (Green 2011).

4.1.2. Critique of Chatman’s Model. From another angle, critique surfaced early on regarding narrative criticism’s two-level model inherited from Chatman. S. Moore argues that a narrative does not have story and discourse levels. For Moore, the story level already functions as discourse level; the implied author’s hand is thoroughly embedded in the story elements. “Narrative is inescapably rhetorical” (Moore, 66). Moore’s work has challenged narrative criticism’s formalistic perspective that tends to assume the autonomy of the text both from the empirical author and real readers. Critiques such as these have led to a more complicated rendering of the construct of the implied reader in contemporary versions of narrative criticism.

4.1.3. Critique of Assumed Coherence. A significant issue that continues to spark debate is the question of whether narrative criticism should assume narrational coherence. This assumption was characteristic of early narrative criticism, but critiques have led to more divergent ways of understanding and expressing narrative cohesion. Fairly early on, M. de Boer critiqued narrative criticism for asserting narrational coherence as a methodological presupposition (de Boer, 44). More recently, Merenlahti has claimed that a narrative reading that “successfully integrates any inconsistent features into a complete whole” is not true to the nature of narratives, which include dissonant voices by virtue of their ideological stance (Merenlahti, 97).

Rhoads helpfully indicates that narrative criticism has drawn on narrative unity as a heuristic device to begin its work (Rhoads 1999, 267). As such, assumptions of unity may be held more loosely than critics of the method have supposed. Moreover, narrative unity might be better conceived in line with ancient Greek understandings of it, which were less about unity of theme and more about unity of purpose, less about beauty and more about truth (Merenlahti and Hakola, 32). This conception provides the possibility of shifting focus in narrative criticism of the Gospels from merely a literary appreciation of narrative coherence to recognition of a kind of overarching coherence of purpose. If narratives, ancient and modern, are an “attempt to set events within a coherent, meaningful series,” then the making of meaning is an essential characteristic of the Gospels as narratives (Green 1997, 15; also 2010). When viewed from this perspective, narrative unity, understood as coherence of purpose and meaning, might remain a working assumption for narrative-critical readings of the Gospels.

4.1.4. Critique of Categories Derived from Fiction. Critics of narrative criticism from its beginning have wondered whether methods developed to interpret contemporary fiction are adequate to address ancient narratives that purport to represent historical realities in some way. Recent contributions on this issue have emphasized that, while there is little to no formal difference between fictional and nonfictional narratives, other key distinctions adhere from both authorial and audience perspectives. Thus, formal categories derived from modern fiction can prove helpful for analyzing ancient historical narratives without a corresponding collapsing of distinctions between fictional and nonfictional narratives. In relation to authorial point of view, the kind of truth claims implicit in a nonfictional narrative indicates that the author has a different attitude toward the narrative than if it was fictional. Thus, a Gospel writer is in some way the guarantor of the narrative’s veracity (e.g., the sentiment expressed in Jn 19:35) (Merenlahti and Hakola, 34-35).

On the side of the audience, readers respond differently to fiction and nonfictional narratives, both affectively and by the ways they fill in the gaps inherent to all narratives (Merenlahti and Hakola, 38). For example, although it has been argued that *Pilate is portrayed fairly positively in the Gospel of Matthew (see Mt 27:24-25), the fact that a first-century A.D. Jewish audience would have filled in narrative gaps with sociocultural knowledge complicates this claim. Jewish antipathy toward Pilate, given his frequent transgression of Jewish customs and sensibilities, would fill in the edges of Matthew 27 to produce a negative portrayal that lays significant culpability for Jesus' *death at Pilate's feet (despite his protests at Mt 27:24, cf. Mt 27:26). L. Doležel draws on the notion of narrative gaps to indicate how nonfictional narratives lead their reader to draw from history rather than fiction to fill in any narrative gaps. Accordingly, historical narratives function with a greater set of constraints in relation to narrative gaps than do fictional narratives (Doležel, 269). Careful delineation between fictional and nonfictional narrative means that methods developed for analysis of fiction may be profitably applied to nonfictional narratives as well, while also affirming the distinct stance of a Gospel's author and audience as that Gospel makes truth claims that extend beyond the parameters of the story.

4.2. Ongoing Influence. Narrative criticism, as one of a number of literary methods (e.g., structuralism, reader-response criticism, deconstructionism) introduced into biblical studies in the past forty years, has gained prominence and has contributed to a methodological eclecticism that includes any number of other approaches that focus on the intersection of text and culture, such as *social-scientific criticism, *postcolonial criticism and *feminist criticism.

As at its inception, narrative criticism continues to be viewed, by some, as an enhancement and nuancing of historical-critical enterprises (e.g., Reinhartz). Narrative criticism has also been utilized as a methodological tool for understanding and elaborating a particular gospel's theology (e.g., Malbon 2009). Other applications of narrative criticism to the Gospels include its use to illuminate text-critical questions (e.g., Shepherd) and to inform the practice of preaching (e.g., Graves and Schlafer). Narrative approaches also continue to draw from other disciplines in order to provide multifaceted readings that better acknowledge the Gospels as narratives that are ancient. One example is increased attention to the orality of the Gospels in narrative approaches (Rhoads 1999, 276). Since the Gospels as documents were intended to be delivered orally, attention to their oral (and aural) features is a productive interpretive task.

The flexibility of narrative criticism to address questions and critiques and to adapt to changing interests has contributed to its continuing use and influence in Gospel studies. From early versions of narrative criticism with ahistorical tendencies, narrative critics have engaged historical questions and concerns in numerous ways, allowing narrative criticism to become "technically more advanced and methodologically more inclusive" (Merenlahti, 116). As such, narrative criticism has become an established methodology in the study of the Gospels, with a growing influence in an ever-widening arena.

See also CANONICAL CRITICISM; FEMINIST AND WOMANIST CRITICISMS; FORM CRITICISM; GOSPEL: GENRE; HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY; LATINO/LATINA CRITICISM; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; POSTCOLONIAL CRITICISM; REDACTION CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC CRITICISMS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Brown, "Direct Engagement of the Reader in Matthew's Discourses: Rhetorical Techniques and Scholarly Consensus," NTS 51 (2005) 19-35; idem, Disciples in Narrative Perspective: The Portrayal and Function of the Matthean Disciples (SBLAB 9; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 2002); S. Chatman, Story and Discourse: Narrative Structure in Fiction and Film (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1978); R. A. Culpepper, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); M. C. de Boer, "Narrative Criticism, Historical Criticism, and the Gospel of John," JSNT 47 (1992) 35-48; L. Doležel, "Fictional and Historical Narrative: Meeting the Postmodernist Challenge," in Narratologies: New Perspectives on Narrative Analysis, ed. D. Herman (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1999) 247-73; R. A. Edwards, Matthew's Narrative Portrait of Disciples: How the Text-Connoted Reader Is Informed (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997); M. Graves and D. Schlafer, eds., What's the Shape of Narrative Preaching? Essays in Honor of Eugene L. Lowry (St. Louis: Chalice Press, 2008); J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); idem, "Narrative Criticism," in Methods for Luke, ed. J. B. Green (MBI; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010) 74-112; idem, "Rethinking 'History' for Theological Interpretation," JTI 5 (2011) 159-73; D. Howell, Matthew's Inclusive Story: A Study in the Narrative Rhetoric of the First Gospel (JSNT-Sup 42; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990); W. Iser, The Implied Reader: Patterns of Communication in Prose Fiction from Bunyan to Beckett (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974); J. D. Kingsbury, Matthew as Story (2nd ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988a); idem, "Reflections on 'The Reader' of Matthew's Gospel," NTS 34 (1988b) 443-60; E. S. Malbon, "Narrative Criticism: How Does the Story Mean?" in Mark and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies, ed. J. C. Anderson and S. D. Moore (2nd ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008) 23-49; idem, Mark's Jesus: Characterization as Narrative Christol- ogy (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009); P. Merenlahti, Poetics for the Gospels? Rethinking Narrative Criticism (SNTW; London: T & T Clark, 2002); P. Merenlahti and R. Hakola, “Reconceiving Narrative Criticism,” in Characterization in the Gospels: Reconceiving Narrative Criticism, ed. D. Rhoads and K. Syreeni (JSNTSup 184; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 13–48; S. D. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989); N. Perrin, “Evangelist as Author,” BR 17 (1972) 5–18; M. A. Powell, What Is Narrative Criticism? (GBS; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, “Expected and Unexpected Readings of Matthew: What the Reader Knows,” AsTJ 48 (1993) 31–51; idem, “Narrative Criticism,” in Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation, ed. J. B. Green (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010) 240–58; A. Reinhartz, “Building Skyscrapers on Toothpicks: The Literary-Critical Challenge to Historical Criticism,” in Anatomies of Narrative Criticism: The Past, Present, and Futures of the Fourth Gospel as Literature, ed. T. Thatcher and S. D. Moore (SBLRBS 55; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2008) 55–76; J. Resseguie, Narrative Criticism of the New Testament: An Introduction (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005); D. Rhoads, “Narrative Criticism and the Gospel of Mark,” JAAR 50 (1982) 411–34; idem, “Narrative Criticism: Practices and Prospects,” in Characterization in the Gospels: Reconceiving Narrative Criticism, ed. D. Rhoads and K. Syreeni (JSNTSup 184; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 264–85; D. Rhoads and D. Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); T. R. Shepherd, “Narrative Analysis as a Text Critical Tool: Mark 16 in Codex W as a Test Case,” JSNT 32 (2009) 77–98; M. Stibbe, John as Storyteller: Narrative Criticism and the Fourth Gospel (SNTSMS 73; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); R. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts: A Literary Interpretation: The Gospel According to Luke (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986); T. Thatcher, “Anatomies of the Fourth Gospel: Past, Present, and Future Probes,” in Anatomies of Narrative Criticism: The Past, Present, and Futures of the Fourth Gospel as Literature, ed. T. Thatcher and S. D. Moore (SBLRBS 55; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2008) 1–35.

J. Brown

NAZARENE

The English word Nazarene is used to translate forms of Nazōraios and Nazarēnos, referring to someone from Nazareth. It clearly means something more, however, in the famed text of Matthew 2:23. Interpreting that verse is difficult because it is unclear why Jesus’ residence in a town unmentioned in the OT fulfills the prophets.

1. Primary Meaning of Nazōraios and Nazarēnos
2. Meaning of Nazōraios in Matthew 2:23

1. Primary Meaning of Nazōraios and Nazarēnos.

By the time the Gospels were written, Nazōraios and Nazarēnos were already employed to designate simply someone from Nazareth. Given that “Jesus” was a common name in first-century Palestine, “the Nazarene/of Nazareth” is used in the Gospels (and Acts) to identify this Jesus specifically, usually for the sake of those who do not already know him (see esp. Mt 26:69–73 // Mk 14:66–70; Lk 18:36–37; Jn 18:4–8; 19:19; Acts 22:8). Additionally, in Acts 24:5 Nazōraion refers to Jesus’ followers: “the sect of the Nazarenes.” It is, however, in Matthew 2:23 that the evangelist uses Nazōraios in a more theologically developed way, for there the evangelist recounts how Jesus’ family had moved to Nazareth, thus fulfilling an obscure prophecy: “He will be called a Nazarene.”

2. Meaning of Nazōraios in Matthew 2:23.

Several factors make Matthew 2:23 difficult to interpret. First, there is no pre-Matthean text that reads “He will be called a Nazarene.” Second, Matthew refers to plural “prophets,” but he does not signify what specific prophetic corpus is in view. Third, if Matthew 2:23 refers to a general teaching of all “the prophets,” the question remains what that prophetic teaching might be. Therefore, it is unclear how Jesus’ residence in Nazareth fulfills “the prophets.” Only two theories have amassed scholarly momentum (for the minority report, see Menken 456–60); both refer Matthew 2:23 back to the OT.

Looking to Judges 13:5, 7; 16:17, where Samson is called a “Nazirite” (MT: nāzîr; LXX [A]: naziraios), some scholars see a Samson-Jesus typology in Matthew 2:23. Other similarities between Judges 13 and Matthew 1–2 support this reading: divine intervention in conception (Judg 13:2–3; Mt 1:18, 20, 23); the appearance of the angel of the Lord (Judg 13:3, 9; Mt 1:20; 2:13, 19); the child’s calling to save Israel (Judg 13:5; Mt 1:21). Moreover, in the Western text of the LXX, Judges 13:7; 16:17 read “holy one of God” in place of “Nazirite of God,” suggesting a degree of synonymy between the two titles, the former of which is applied to Jesus (cf. Mk 1:24). In this case, the reference to the prophets is to the OT Historical Books. The question here is whether these considerations are sufficient to outweigh a very basic point: Jesus was not a Nazirite (cf. Num 6:2-3; Mt 11:19).

The second option may be slightly better. In MT Isaiah 11:1 the messiah is called a nešer ("shoot, branch") that will grow out of the family of David. In this case, Matthew makes an awkward, but nonetheless understandable and plausible, pun on nešer. This reading is supported by Matthew's obvious concern with Jesus' Davidic heritage (Mt 1:1, 17, 20; 2:6), repeated interest in the narrative of Isaiah 7–12 (Mt 1:22-23; 4:13-16), and a reference to the Spirit in Matthew 3:11, 16 reminiscent of Isaiah 11:2. With so many contextual similarities, it is not hard to imagine why Matthew would employ this prophecy of the shoot/branch from David. The Davidic shoot/branch was also a common messianic image for other early Christians (Rom 15:12; Rev 5:5; 22:16; Justin, 1 Apol. 32; Dial. 86-87, 126; Irenaeus, Haer. 3.9.3; see also b. Sanh. 43). By this theory, Matthew's reference to "the prophets" is to the cadre of similar prophecies that employ synonyms for nešer (Jer 23:5; 33:15; Zech 3:8; 6:12; see also T. Jud. 24; 4Q161 III, 11-24; 4Q174 III, 10-13; 4Q285 5, 2-4; 11Q14 I, 7-13) in reference to the expected Davidide who arises out of the ashes of the exile. Thus, the relevance of Nazareth would be two-fold: in the linguistic similarity, but more importantly in the connection between the obscurity and ignominy of that town (cf. Jn 1:46) and the dilapidated state of the house of David, whence the Messiah emerges (see Son of David).

This theory is not without its own problem, however. A punning reference to Isaiah 11:1 works in Hebrew but not in Greek. But this obstacle perhaps is overcome in light of other indications that Matthew presumed a knowledge of Hebrew on the part of his readers (e.g., the meaning of Jesus' name in Mt 1:21 and the possible gematria based on David's name in Mt 1:17).

Some scholars see legitimacy in both options, giving priority to one or the other. If Judges 13:5, 7; 16:17 is the primary background, then Matthew 2:23 creates an inclusio with Matthew 1:21-23 serving to highlight Jesus' saving mission to Israel. If, on the other hand, Isaiah 11:1 is the basic background, then this places emphasis on Jesus' lowly beginnings and God's promise to lift up the house of David. Fulfillment, in this text at least, does not mean that Jesus' residency in Nazareth per se accomplishes the prophets' words, but that his association with the town is characteristic of the lowly estate as the Messiah. In either case, the term foregrounds Jesus' mission to *Israel. Given the way the name caught on (cf. Acts 24:5), the believing community seems to have emphasized Jesus' distinction as a Nazarene and to have found the term theologically useful for their own self-identity.

See also SON OF DAVID.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. F. Albright, "The Names 'Nazareth' and 'Nazorean,'" JBL (1946) 397-401; W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison Jr., Matthew 1-7 (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988) 274-81; R. T. France, "The Formula-Quotations of Matthew 2 and the Problem of Communication," NTS (1981) 233-51; R. H. Gundry, The Use of the Old Testament in St. Matthew's Gospel: With Special Reference to the Messianic Hope (NovTSup 19; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1967) 97-104; M. J. J. Menken, "The Sources of the Old Testament Quotation in Matthew 2:23," JBL (2001) 451-68; J. Miler, Les citations d'accomplissement dans l'Évangile de Matthieu: Quand Dieu se rend présent en toute humanité (AnBib 140; Roma: Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1999) 67-76; R. Pesch, "He Will Be Called a Nazorean: Messianic Exegesis in Matthew 1-2," in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner (JSNTSup 104; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 129-78; J. A. Sanders, "Ναζωπαῖος in Matthew 2.23," in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner (JSNTSup 104; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 116-28; H. H. Schaefer, "Ναζαρηνός, Ναζωπαῖος," TDNT 4:874-79; E. Schweizer, "Er wird Nazoräer heissen," in Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche: Festschrift für Joachim Jeremias, ed. W. Eltester (BZNW 26; Berlin: Töpelmann, 1960) 90-93.

N. G. Piotrowski

NAZARETH. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

NEW BIRTH

The concept of a new birth is part of the larger NT theme of a "new creation" (kainē ktisis [2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15]). "New birth" terminology in the Gospels includes both a personal, spiritual dimension (in John 3:3, 7 gennēthēnai anōthen ["to be born again, from above"]) and a cosmic, eschatological dimension (in Mt 19:28 palingenesia ["regeneration, recreation"], variously translated as "the renewal of all things" [NIV], "the new world" [ESV], "the Messianic Age" [HCSB]). The personal, spiritual notion of a new birth consisting of a new beginning and a decisive inner transformation of a person's life, involving cleansing and a new law being written on one's heart, is found in several OT prophetic passages (e.g., Jer 31:31-34; Ezek 11:19-20; 36:25-27). In the Gospels new birth is mentioned most prominently in John. "New birth" in the other Gospels involves a cosmic, eschatological dimension because all of creation, not only individuals redeemed in Christ, will be renewed (palingenesia) at the end of time (Mt 19:28; cf. Lk 22:30). This cosmic, eschatological new birth of creation, likewise, is built on OT antecedents (Is 65:17-20; 66:22).

1. New Birth in Ancient Extrabiblical Literature
2. New Birth in the Old Testament
3. New Birth in John's Gospel
4. Cosmic New Birth in the Synoptic Gospels
5. Conclusion

1. New Birth in Ancient Extrabiblical Literature.

Philo used language of regeneration with reference to the restoration of the world subsequent to the flood (Mos. 2.65) as well as concerning the restoration of life to individuals (Cher. 114; Poster. 124). *Josephus spoke of “rebirth” with regard to the return of an Israelite remnant after the exile (Ant. 11.66). The hope of a restored creation is alive in Jewish apocalyptic literature (e.g., 1 En. 45:4-5; 72:1; 91:16; 2 Bar. 32:6; 44:12; 57:2; 4 Ezra 7:31), the *Dead Sea sectarian literature (e.g., 1QH^a XIII, 11-12; 1QS IV, 25) and in the Targumim and other Jewish literature (e.g., Tg. Onq. Deut 32:12; b. Sanh. 92b; 97b). The Stoics used palingenesia to describe the restoration of the universe, including human souls, after a final cosmic conflagration (e.g., Chrysippus, SVF 2.191 citing Chrysippus, De mundo §10.627). In both Jewish apocalyptic and Stoic thought this regeneration of the cosmos is a future event. Stoicism, however, held to an endless cosmic cycle of destruction and re-creation, whereas Judaism held firmly to a definitive, once-for-all, cosmic catastrophe precipitated by the coming of Yahweh in the Day of the Lord to bring final judgment and salvation (cf. Is 34:4, 8-10; Joel 2:31; 3:14; Zeph 1:14—2:3). It may be presumed from its general usage in the educated world that palingenesia played a role in the mystery religions, but concrete evidence is lacking for the first century A.D. (see Büchsel).

2. New Birth in the Old Testament.

New birth in the OT revolves around Yahweh's giving birth to Israel, Israel's rejection of Yahweh as father, and the promise of a new birth for Israel. This metaphor vividly pictures Yahweh's bringing of Israel into a covenant relationship with himself (birth), Israel's breaking of that covenant resulting in *exile (rejection of Yahweh as father), and Yahweh's restoration of Israel (new birth). The OT first applies the birth metaphor to Yahweh's relationship with Israel in Deuteronomy 32:18-20: “You were unmindful of the Rock that bore you, and you forgot the God who gave you birth. The LORD saw it and spurned them, because of the provocation of his sons and his daughters. And he said, ‘I will hide my face from them; I will see what their end will be, for they are a perverse generation, children in whom is no faithfulness.’” Deuteronomy understands the forming of the nation of Israel to be Yahweh giving birth to his people.

The prophets pick up on this idea, as Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Isaiah use vivid “new birth” language to speak of Yahweh's faithfulness, Israel's unfaithfulness, and the necessity of a second birth for Israel as a nation. Isaiah most clearly uses this imagery from Deuteronomy 32:18 in Isaiah 40—55 (see esp. Is 45:9-11; cf. Is 17:10; 26:4; 30:29). Alluding to the broader context of Deuteronomy 32, Isaiah speaks of Yahweh as Israel's “Rock” over against the idols of the nations: “Fear not, nor be afraid; have I not told you from of old and declared it? And you are my witnesses! Is there a God besides me? There is no Rock; I know not any” (Is 44:8 ESV [cf. Is 44:9-20]). In keeping with the broader context of Deuteronomy 32, Isaiah proceeds to denounce the gods of the nations, which are merely idols made by human hands (Is 44:9-20). That which Yahweh foretold in Deuteronomy has now come to pass: Israel, Yahweh's first-born, has forsaken its father and followed after other gods. Thus, Israel is in need of a new creation, a new exodus, a new birth.

Recounting Israel's idolatrous past, Isaiah invokes Yahweh's long-suffering and patience. Now Yahweh will do a new thing, cleansing Israel from its idolatry by giving Israel ears to hear and eyes to see (Is 42:9). This cleansing and restoration is spoken of as a new birth: “I have kept silent from ages past; I have been quiet and restrained Myself. But now, I will groan like a woman in labor, gasping breathlessly” (Is 42:14 HCSB). What follows is a description of Israel's return from exile, a new exodus (see Exile and Restoration). In contrast to its predecessors, Israel will be born again as the faithful people of God, displaying the glory of Yahweh to the nations (Is 46:13; 49:3; 52:1; 55:5; cf. Is 60:9; 60:21; 61:3). Following Israel's new birth, creation will be restored (see Is 56—66).

In Jeremiah, Israel's cleansing and restoration from idolatry at its return from exile comes in the form of the promised new covenant (Jer 31:31-34). The new covenant will not be like the old covenant that Yahweh made with Israel when he brought them out of Egypt—the covenant that Israel broke because of its idolatry. In this new covenant Yahweh will write the law on Israel's heart rather than on tablets of stone. The result will be the forgiveness of sins and a people who know Yahweh as their God. Thus, Israel will be a people refashioned in the image of their God.

Ezekiel's imagery for restoration from exile is quite vivid and diverse. He employs the imagery of a rebellious child who, in spite of Yahweh's loving faithfulness, rebelled in harlotry and will be restored back to Yahweh (Ezek 16). Ezekiel 37 pictures Israel as a valley of bones that need to be raised by the Spirit of Yahweh. In Ezekiel 36, similarly to Jeremiah, Ezekiel envisions the return from exile as Yahweh making a new covenant with Israel. Yahweh will cleanse Israel with clean water, replace Israel's heart of stone with a heart of flesh, and place his Spirit within the people so that they may obey his commands (Ezek 36:16-27). Following the institution of this new covenant, the land will also be restored (Ezek 36:28-38). The joint notion of Israel's new birth, return from exile, and new covenant forms the background for the concept of new birth in the NT, especially John's Gospel.

3. New Birth in John's Gospel.

3.1. New Birth "from Above." According to John's Gospel, Jesus speaks of the necessity of a new birth "from above" (anōthen) to Nicodemus (Jn 3:3-5). The term anōthen can mean either "from above," whether figuratively (Jn 3:7, 31; 19:11; Jas 1:17; 3:15, 17) or literally ("from top to bottom" [Mt 27:15 par.; Jn 19:23]), or "from the beginning" (Lk 1:3; Acts 26:5; Gal 4:9). This potential ambiguity opens up the possibility of misunderstanding. Nicodemus thought that the phrase meant literally "again," but as John makes clear, Nicodemus misconstrued the meaning of Jesus' words. According to Jesus, Nicodemus must be born "from above"—that is, be reborn spiritually. In John 3:5 "born again/from above" is explicated further as "born of water and spirit." Rather than referring to water and spirit baptism, two kinds of birth, or a variety of other possibilities, the expression probably denotes one spiritual birth. This is suggested by the fact that "born of water and spirit" explicates the meaning of the phrase "born again/from above" in John 3:3, by the use of one preposition (ek) to govern both phrases in John 3:5, and by antecedent OT prophetic theology.

Perhaps the closest OT parallel is Ezekiel 36:25-27, which envisions God's cleansing of human hearts with water and their inner transformation by his Spirit (cf. Is 44:3-5; Jub. 1:23-25). The terminology may also be reminiscent of first-century proselyte baptism, in which the Gentile convert to Judaism was compared to a newborn child (b. Yebam. 22a; 48b; 62a; 97b; b. Bek. 47a). In John 3 Jesus seeks to move Nicodemus from a woodenly literal to a spiritual understanding of what it means to be "born again/from above." In response to Nicodemus's question, Jesus maintains that even if it were possible for a person to be literally born a second time, this "second birth" would accomplish nothing because it would still be a physical birth. What is needed instead is a spiritual birth (cf. Gal 4:29; 1 Jn 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18). John 1:12-13 explicitly ties being born of God and becoming a *child of God to the reception of Jesus, further explained as belief in his name. The importance of "believing" in John's Gospel can hardly be overstated (see Jn 20:31, and note the ninety-eight instances of pisteuō throughout). Receiving Jesus by *faith results in one's experience of a "new birth" from God (Jn 1:12-13).

The progression of the narrative in John 2:13—3:21 from the temple clearing (see Temple Act) to the Nicodemus pericope presents Jesus' emphasis on the necessity of spiritual regeneration for entrance into the *kingdom of God (Jn 3:3, 5) as an explanation for the antagonism of the Jewish leadership (Jn 2:18-20) and the shallow belief of the people (Jn 2:23-25). By this, John indicates that entrance into the kingdom of God is dependent not on ethnicity but rather on a new birth (Jn 3:3, 5-7; cf. Jn 3:16). Together with Titus 3:5 and 1 Peter 1:3, 23, John 3:3, 7 indicates a widespread early Christian usage of "new birth" language to describe what takes place at conversion. John 3:5-8 associates this new birth with the activity of the Spirit.

3.2. New Birth as Part of the "New Creation" Theme in John. John's teaching on the new birth is part of a larger "new creation" theme in his Gospel. From the very outset, John links Jesus' coming to God's creation "in the beginning" (Jn 1:1; cf. Gen 1:1). He proceeds to develop the significance of Jesus' coming in terms of *"life" and *"light" (Jn 1:3-5, 7-9), both of which are part of OT creation terminology (see esp. Gen 1:3-5, 14-18). In the place of the Synoptic teaching on the kingdom of God, John focuses on Jesus bringing "eternal life" to those who believe in him (e.g., Jn 3:16; 20:31). In this context John also speaks of the necessity of a new, spiritual birth for believers (Jn 1:12-13; cf. Jn 3:3, 5). Even the first week of Jesus' ministry is presented in a fashion analogous to the week of creation (Jn 1:19—2:11). In the Sabbath controversy in John 5 Jesus affirmed that his activity stood in direct continuity with God's creative work (Jn 5:17; cf. Gen 2:2-3). Possible instances of the “new creation” motif abound in the Johannine *passion narrative. It is set in a garden (Jn 18:1, 26; 19:41) (see Gethsemane), and Jesus is identified (albeit mistakenly) as “the gardener” (Jn 20:15); Jesus’ *resurrection may be cast as the beginning of a new creation (Jn 20:1; cf. Jn 1:3); Jesus rises from the dead and appears to his followers in keeping with repeated earlier predictions (Jn 20; cf. Jn 2:20-21; 10:17-19); *Pilate calls Jesus “the man” (Jn 19:5), a possible Johannine double entendre presenting Jesus as the “new Adam”; and Jesus breathes on his disciples and gives the Spirit in the final commissioning scene (Jn 20:22), invoking the creation of Adam (Gen 2:7; cf. Ezek 37:9).

4. Cosmic New Birth in the Synoptic Gospels.

Whereas John focuses attention on the “already,” completed aspect of God’s work in Christ to bring about a new creation, Jesus’ statement in Matthew 19:28 draws attention to the future consummation of God’s new creation: “Truly I say to you that in the regeneration [palingenesia], when the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne, you who followed me will also sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.” This usage of palingenesia to describe the eschaton is unique in the NT but shares some similarities to the Stoic literature noted above. The cyclical nature of the endless cosmic cycle of conflagration and rebirth in the Stoic accounts, however, stands in contrast to the linear, definitive nature of NT eschatology.

The parallel in Mark 10:30 refers to “the age to come,” while the parallel in Luke 22:30 speaks of the future coming of the kingdom of God. Matthew 24:3 describes the curiosity of the disciples regarding the timing of this cosmic “new birth” by recounting their request, “When will these things be and what will be the sign of your coming and the completion of the age?” The parable of the weeds in Matthew 13 describes this future event (Mt 13:24-30, 36-43): “The Son of Man will send his angels, and they will weed out of his kingdom all causes of sin and doers of lawlessness and they will cast them into the furnace of fire. . . . Then the righteous ones will shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father” (Mt 13:41-43).

The reference to the eschatological regeneration of creation in Matthew 19:28 may simply indicate belief in temporal progression of history culminating in the age to come. However, in addition to a simple temporal referent, it likely points to the widespread belief in future cosmic destruction and renewal (see 1 En. 45:4-5; 72:1; 91:16; 2 Bar. 32:6; 44:12; 57:2; 4 Ezra

7:31; Sib. Or. 4:160-161, 175-182; 1QH^a III, 28-33; 1QS IV, 25; Is 65:17; 66:22; 1 Cor 7:31; 1 Jn 2:17; Heb 12:26-27; 2 Pet 3:10-13; Rev 21:1). This interpretation is strengthened by the way in which Matthew 5:18 (// Lk 16:17 [note the difference between Matthew’s temporal use of heōs and Luke’s use of the comparative eukopōteron]) and Matthew 24:35 (cf. Mk 13:31) both speak of a future passing away of heaven and earth (Sim).

5. Conclusion.

In the Gospels, the new birth, within the larger framework of the theme of the “new creation,” has both a personal/spiritual and a cosmic/eschatological dimension. The former is seen in passages such as John 3:3-8 and harks back to OT prophetic passages such as Jeremiah 31:31-34; Ezekiel 36:25-27; the latter is evident in the accounts of Jesus’ teaching on the “renewal of all things” at the end of time in the Synoptics (see esp. Mt 19:28) and likewise builds on OT antecedent theology such as Isaiah 65:17-20; 66:22. Thus, the individual believer’s new birth is set within the larger context of the (inaugurated, but yet to be consummated) renewal of all things at the end of time.

See also ESCHATOLOGY; EXILE AND RESTORATION; FAITH; LIFE, ETERNAL LIFE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. L. Appold, The Oneness Motif in the Fourth Gospel: Motif Analysis and Exegetical Probe into the Theology of John (WUNT 2/1; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1976); L. L. Belleville, “Born of Water and Spirit: John 3:5,” TJ 1 (1980) 125-41; R. Borig, Der wahre Weinstock: Untersuchungen zu Jo 15,1-10 (SANT 16; Munich: Kösel, 1967); J. K. Brown, “Creation’s Renewal in the Gospel of John,” CBQ 72 (2010) 272-90; F. Büchsel, “παλιγγενεσία,” TDNT 1:686-88; G. Goldsworthy, “Regeneration,” NDBT 720-23; A. J. Köstenberger, John (BECNT; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2004); idem, A Theology of John’s Gospel and Letters: The Word, the Christ, the Son of God (BTNT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2009); D. C. Sim, “The Meaning of παλιγγενεσία in Matthew 19:28,” JSNT 50 (1993) 3-12; P. Toon, Born Again: A Biblical and Theological Study of Regeneration (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1987).

A. J. Köstenberger

NEW EXODUS. See MOUNTAIN AND WILDERNESS; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; TRIUMPHAL ENTRY.

NEW QUEST. See QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS.

NUNC DIMITTIS. See SONGS AND HYMNS.

OATHS AND SWEARING

The practice of swearing oaths in order to bolster the veracity of one's claims or to obligate oneself was a ubiquitous convention in the ancient Mediterranean world. However, the practice involved a certain risk when the oath forms threatened the sanctity of the invoked deity. As a result, casuistic formulae were invented, and some even restricted the use of oath swearing. In Matthew's Gospel (Mt 5:33-37; 23:16-22) Jesus rejects oaths altogether, demanding instead that his followers speak with straightforward, truthful speech.

1. The Social Practice of Swearing Oaths
2. The Limits of Swearing Oaths

1. The Social Practice of Swearing Oaths.

According to speech-act theory, formalized human speech can be examined according to (1) appropriate conditions for the discourse to be effective, (2) proper authority to conduct the convention, and (3) suitable execution of the procedure (Austin, 14-15, 26-38). For the swearing of oaths, certain necessary conventions were typically important: a shared custom of oath formulae, including the invocation of the deity and self-imprecation, shared beliefs in the binding authority of such words, and shared beliefs that the deity will intervene with punitive action if the oath is not fulfilled. Oaths were fundamental to many social orders in the ancient Mediterranean world and were useful for guarding against perjury, securing loans, strengthening friendships and engaging in formal acts of devotion.

Oath swearing can be indicated by the use of certain terminology, such as the verbs šbʿ Niphal + bē in Hebrew, or omnyō and horkizō in Greek, or by recognized formulae (e.g., 1 Sam 19:6; 2 Kings 6:31) (Lieberman, 116, 121-35; Searle, 2, 9-12, 28). According to Israelite tradition, oaths were performed by Israel's God (Gen 22:16; Ps 89:3-4; Lk 1:73; Acts 2:30; Heb 6:13-18) and pious exemplars (Gen 21:23-24;

1 Sam 24:22) and were required by Torah for each Israelite in covenant with God (Deut 6:13; 10:20). Often the practice of making vows, dedicating oneself or an object for the service of another, and swearing promissory oaths could overlap.

2. The Limits of Swearing Oaths.

The usefulness of oath formulae tended to decline with common use. As a result, various alternatives were utilized to refresh the convention. For some, the ideal became the prevention of oaths unless unavoidable, substituting reliance upon a reputation of honest speech practice (Philo, Decal. 84-85; Spec. 2.2-5; Josephus, J.W. 2.235; Epictetus, Ench. 33.5). There is ample evidence of strictures put on oaths in Hellenistic philosophical paraenesis, including the Pythagorean tradition (Diogenes Laertius, Vit. 8.22; Iamblichus, Vit. Pyth. 47) (Betz, 265, 276).

A crucial conflict arose between the practice of swearing oaths by invoking the name of a deity and the concern for vain or frivolous swearing that could amount to *blasphemy (Sir 23:9-11; Philo, Decal. 92). This is precisely the issue arising in Philo's two most quoted discussions on oath swearing (Decal. 84-93; Spec. 2.2-38). While discussing the third commandment of the Decalogue, "You shall not take the name of the LORD your God in vain" (Ex 20:7; Deut 5:11), Philo states that genuine, candid speech is a better way of life than oath swearing because the latter risks making God complicit in human falsehood (Decal. 86; Spec. 2.10).

Sensitivity to the menacing risks of swearing oaths led some to severely limit the practice or, as is the case with Jesus in Matthew's Gospel, to reject it all together. The Essenes are represented as avoiding all oaths (Josephus, J.W. 2.135; cf. Ant. 15:368-371; Philo, Prob. 84), except for a solemn oath taken upon covenant initiation into the community (Josephus, J.W. 2.139; cf. 1QS V, 7-11). Indeed, even in the state of expulsion they are said to remain faithful to their oaths at the risk of death (Josephus, J.W. 2.143).

There is much evidence to suggest that Israelite sensitivity to (not) pronouncing the divine name (1QS VI, 27–VII, 2) led to casuistic attempts at circumventing its utterance. Debates arose regarding which oath formulae were binding and which were not. In the Damascus Document (CD-A XV, 1–5), one is to swear not by the name of God, but only by the curses of the covenant (i.e., Deut 28:15–68) invoking the consequences of violating the oath. The mishnaic tractate dedicated to oaths illustrates that for some rabbis adjuration by “heaven and earth” meant that one was exempt from culpability, but adjuration by a substitute of the divine name meant that one was liable (m. Šebu. 4:13).

It is against this background that Jesus’ proscription of oaths must be understood. The most significant comes in the *Sermon on the Mount as the fourth of six antithetical declarations where Jesus contrasts a particular interpretation of the *law (beginning with “you have heard that it was said [to the ancients] . . .”) with his own authoritative command (“but I say to you . . .”). In this case, Jesus juxtaposes the received tradition prohibiting the swearing of false oaths (ouk epiorkēseis) and the necessity of fulfilling one’s oath made to the Lord with a complete denunciation of oath swearing (Mt 5:33). He advocates instead simple, honest speech (Mt 5:37). Scholars debate the consequence of (the Matthean) Jesus’ injunction against oath taking. Some suggest that he abrogates and revokes certain commands of the Mosaic law (Meier), while others suggest that he intensifies the spiritual intention of the law (Hagner); still others propose that he is using a common contemporary strategy of “contra-scriptural halakhot” (Klawans) or perhaps didactic hyperbole. Whatever (written) tradition Jesus has in mind (see LXX Lev 19:12; cf. Ex 20:16; Num 30:2; Deut 5:20; 23:21–23), none is an exact parallel (see Betz, 263n499).

Jesus commands that his followers “not swear at all [holōs],” specifying with four casuistic formulae and explanatory (hoti) clauses (Mt 5:34b–36): “not by heaven, because it is the throne of God, nor by earth, because it is God’s footstool” (cf. Philo, Spec. 2:5; m. Šebu. 4:13), “nor toward [eis] Jerusalem, because it is the city of the Great King” (cf. m. Ned. 1:3), and “not by your head, because you are unable to make one hair white or black” (cf. m. Sanh. 3:2). With the first three specifications Jesus seems to be countering attempts to circumvent direct invocation of God. The fourth example (“not by your head”) is rejected according to the logic that humans do not control the dominion of their lives; they do not have proper authority.

These casuistic formulae are similar to the ones condemned by Jesus in his woes against the scribes and Pharisees in Matthew 23:16–22 (see Blessing and Woe). There, the logic is akin to the later rabbinic disputes regarding which oath forms are binding. Jesus charges the Pharisees with holding liable a person who swears by the sanctuary of the *temple (naos) or the altar, but releasing a person who swears by the gold of the sanctuary or the gift of the altar. Jesus condemns the failure to dissociate the sacred objects from their holy source.

Jesus concludes his antithesis with a simple command and warning (Mt 5:37). He states that simple, honest speech should characterize those whose righteousness is to exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5:20): “Let your yes simply be ‘yes,’ and your no simply ‘no’” (cf. Jas 5:12). Jesus concludes by stating that anything more than these utterances “is from the evil one” (cf. Mt 6:13), indicating that any oath is de facto akin to perjury and blasphemy and is opposed to the ethical demands of the *kingdom.

Both Mark and Matthew illustrate the danger of oaths with Herod’s frivolity leading to the execution of John the Baptist (Mt 14:1–12; Mk 6:14–29) and Peter’s temperamental denial of Jesus expressed with his self-imprecation (Mt 26:69–75; Mk 14:66–72) (Brant, 12–20). These failures are contrasted by Jesus’ refusal to swear an oath to the truth of his testimony when adjured by the high priest to confirm his alleged claims to being the Messiah, responding only with, “You have said so” (Mt 26:64a [cf. Mk 14:62]).

See also AUTHORITY AND POWER; BLASPHEMY; BLESSING AND WOE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. L. Austin, How to Do Things with Words, ed. J. O. Urmson and M. Sbisà (2nd ed.; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1975); H. D. Betz, The Sermon on the Mount: A Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, Including the Sermon on the Plain (Matthew 5:3–7:27 and Luke 6:20–49), ed. A. Y. Collins (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 259–74; J. A. Brant, “Infelicitous Oaths in the Gospel of Matthew,” JSNT 63 (1996) 3–20; D. C. Duling, “Against Oaths,” FFF 6 (1990) 99–138; D. A. Hagner, “A Response to John P. Meier’s ‘Did the Historical Jesus Prohibit All Oaths?’” JSHJ 6 (2008) 25–32; J. Klawans, “The Prohibition of Oaths and Contra-scriptural Halakhot: A Response to John P. Meier,” JSHJ 6 (2008) 33–48; S. Lieberman, “Oaths and Vows,” in Greek in Jewish Palestine: Studies in the Life and Manner of Jewish Palestine in the II–IV Centuries C.E. (New York: Jewish Theological Seminary, 1942) 115–43; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew,

4: Law and Love (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2009) 182-234; J. Schneider, “ὁμνύω,” TDNT 5:176-85; idem, “ὄρκος, κτλ.,” TDNT 5:457-67; J. R. Searle, Expression and Meaning: Studies in the Theory of Speech Acts (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979). D. R. McCabe

OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS

In Second Temple Judaism significant theological expressions are often grounded in Scripture. Therefore, in describing the climax of God's acts in history, it is not surprising to find early Christian writers situating the life and *death of their Lord Jesus in the matrix of the holy writings of Israel. From the evidence in the four Gospels, it is clear that this understanding of Jesus within the context of God's wider plan of history is not an invention of the early church. An examination of the use of the OT in the Gospels will naturally lead to one's appreciation of the ways Jesus himself uses the OT.

A study of the use of the OT in the Gospels has to consider both explicit quotations and the wider uses that involve allusions, themes, patterns and characters of the sacred past. In doing so, perhaps the functions of such uses can be made clear.

1. The Old Testament in Mark
2. The Old Testament in Matthew
3. The Old Testament in Luke
4. The Old Testament in John
5. Jesus' Use of the Old Testament

1. The Old Testament in Mark.

When compared to the use of the OT in the other Gospels, the Gospel of Mark often is considered to be the one least saturated with OT material. It does not contain the many explicit quotations that one finds in Matthew, nor does it exhibit the same intense use of OT language that frames the narrative of Luke-Acts. The interweaving of OT themes and motifs in the Gospel of John also appears to expose a deeper reflection on the significance of Christ in light of the sacred history of Israel. On the other hand, if the Gospel of Mark is indeed the first written canonical Gospel, it does lay the foundation for the later Gospels that reflect a more explicit evocation of the OT. Moreover, beyond the individual quotations, one does find the OT providing the controlling framework for a number of subsections within this Gospel. After all, in Mark Jesus affirms the significance of the Mosaic Torah (Mk 10:3), and he expects God's people to be familiar with their Scriptures (Mk 12:24). Moreover, he considers his life and death as aiming to “fulfill the Scriptures” (14:49).

1.1. Explicit Quotations. It is misleading to focus solely on explicit quotations in any examination of the use of the OT in the Gospels. Quotations do, however, often provide a framework within which the narrative finds its fuel. Of these individual quotations, perhaps the most significant is the one that begins this narrative, the only quotation that comes directly in the form of an editorial comment (Mk 1:2-3 [Mal 3:1; Ex 23:20; Is 40:3]). With this quotation, Mark draws attention to the fact that “the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ” (Mk 1:1) is the climax of God's promises to Israel. The transformation of the exodus tradition in Isaiah 40 and Malachi 3 allows Mark to use this tradition in describing the arrival of the eschatological new exodus. The iconic significance of Isaiah 40:3 as symbolizing the arrival of the eschatological era is well established (cf. Bar 5.6-9; T. Mos 10:1, 1 En 1:6-7; 1QS VIII, 13-16; IX, 16-21), and its appearance at the beginning of Mark may provide the key to unlocking the significance of the life and death of Jesus (see Marcus, 12-47). The appearance of Malachi 3:1 in this composite may qualify this pronouncement of good news (see Gospel: Good News), however, since it introduces the theme of *judgment, a theme that plays an important role in Mark in reference to those who reject God's *salvation (see Watts 1997, 53-90).

After the pronouncement of this good news of the arrival of the eschatological era, the next explicit quotation, drawn from Isaiah, is embedded in Jesus' discussion of the purpose of his parables and points to the obduracy of God's people (Mk 4:12 [Is 6:9-10]) (see Hardness of Heart). This message is reaffirmed through another quotation from Isaiah still later in this Gospel: “These people honor me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; they worship me in vain, teaching the teachings as commandments of human beings” (Mk 7:6-7 [Is 29:13]).

The failure of God's people and their leaders to recognize the arrival of this eschatological era is illustrated by their competing interpretations of the *law (Mk 7:10 [Ex 20:12; 21:17; Lev 20:9; Deut 5:16; 10:6-8 [Gen 1:27; 2:24; 5:2]; 10:19 [Ex 20:12-16; Deut 5:16-20]; 12:29-33 [Deut 6:4-5; Lev 19:18]) and their failure to perform proper cultic practices (Mk 11:17 [Is 56:7; Jer 7:11]). More importantly, they refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Lord (Mk 12:36 [Ps 110:1]) and the *shepherd from God (Mk 14:27 [Zech 13:7]). But this rejected “stone” will become the “cornerstone” (cf. Mk 11:9 [Ps 118:25-26]; 12:10-11 [Ps 118:22-23]).

These explicit quotations reflect different textual traditions. In many of the quotations Mark appears to be relying on the LXX. The use of Malachi 3:1 and Exodus 23:20 in Mark 1:2 seems, however, to point to his awareness of the Hebrew text, although he may be relying on early traditions in the use of this composite quote. In other places, the influence of the proto-targumic traditions is possible (cf. Mk 4:12 with Is 6:9-10). Source-critical solutions may explain some of these texts, but the creative hand of Mark cannot be ruled out.

1.2. Patterns and Themes. Beyond individual quotations, wider patterns can be discerned with Mark's use of the OT. As evoked by the quotation at the beginning of this Gospel (Mk 1:2-3 [Mal 3:1; Ex 23:20; Is 40:3]), a wider new-exodus pattern can be detected behind this Gospel. W. Swartley, for example, points to the significance of Sinai themes in the first half of Mark: the selection of the Twelve (Mk 3:13-19; cf. Ex 24:4), the worship of false Gods (Mk 3:20-30; cf. Ex 32), the definition of the new community (Mk 3:35; cf. Ex 19:3-5) and the formation of a new covenant (Mk 4:1-34; cf. Ex 19:1-31:18) (Swartley, 52-59). Behind the miracle stories one may also identify two cycles of miracle stories that resemble God's mighty works in the first exodus (see Achtemeier 1972) (see Table 1). These two cycles that begin with a sea miracle may evoke the crossing of the Red Sea, and the concluding feeding stories may bring to mind the wilderness feeding. If so, Jesus is reenacting the exodus in bringing deliverance to God's people. Moreover, as the new Moses, his authority surpasses that of his contemporaries (cf. Mk 1:22), since he is the one who holds the key to understanding the will of God (see Watts 1997).

Moving to Mark's *passion account, one finds a concentration of OT language. Without assuming that Mark is intentionally drafting a new haggadah for the celebration of the passion of Christ (see Bowman), one sees the evangelist clearly pointing to the OT to explain both the fact and the significance of the *death of Christ. Three particular OT books play a notable role in this passion narrative. First, the psalms that depict the righteous sufferer provide the language in the depiction of Christ's suffering (Moo, 285-86). As the psalms point to the vindication of the righteous sufferer, Jesus' suffering likewise affirms the sovereignty of God (see Table 2).

Second, the Isaianic *Servant of the Lord also provides the framework for the portrayal of Jesus' death. Though not explicitly quoted, the language of Isaiah 53 may be detected behind some phrases and clauses: Mark 8:31 ("the Son of Man must suffer many things" [cf. Is 53:10]); Mark 9:12 ("the Son of Man must suffer . . . and be rejected" [cf. Is 53:3]); Mark 10:45 ("the Son of Man did not come to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" [cf. Is 53:10]); Mark 14:24 ("this is my blood . . . that is poured out for many" [cf. Is 53:11-12]); Mark 14:61 ("he was silent and answered nothing" [cf. Is 53:7]); Mark 15:27 ("they crucified two robbers with him, one on his right and one on his left" [cf. Is 53:12]).

Finally, the rejection of the shepherd in Zechariah 13-14 may also have provided the language for some of Mark's description, especially in light of the explicit quotation of Zechariah 13:7 in Mark 14:27: "I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered." Other allusions in reference to Jesus can possibly be identified behind the reference to the "Mount of Olives" in Mark 11:1 (cf. Zech 14:4) and Jesus warning against the temple merchants in Mark 11:16 (cf. Zech 14:21). More importantly, the wider

Table 1. Two Cycles of Miracle Stories in Mark

Sea miracle (Mk 4:35-41)	Sea miracle (Mk 6:45-52)
Healing miracle (Mk 5:1-20)	Healing miracle (Mk 6:53-56)
Healing miracle (Mk 5:21-24, 35-43)	Healing miracle (Mk 7:24-30)
Healing miracle (Mk 5:25-34)	Healing miracle (Mk 7:31-37)
Feeding miracle (Mk 6:30-44)	Feeding miracle (Mk 8:1-10)

Table 2. Christ's Suffering and the Righteous Sufferer of the Psalms

Mk 14:18 (Ps 41:9)	Betrayal by a close associate/friend
Mk 14:34 (Ps 42:5-11; 43:5)	Deep grief
Mk 15:24 (Ps 22:18)	Throwing dice, dividing clothes
Mk 15:29 (Ps 22:7)	Mocking and taunting
Mk 15:34 (Ps 22:1)	"My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"
Mk 15:35-36 (Ps 69:21)	Offering of vinegar

narrative in Zechariah 13–14 of the rejection of God’s servant by God’s people and the judgment that is to come upon them provides the context for understanding both the suffering of Christ and the focus on eschatological judgment in the final chapters of Mark.

The use of Psalms, Isaiah and Zechariah provides the framework within which the death of Jesus can be understood. The fact that Mark uses these works may point to Jesus’ own use of the OT in understanding his own mission and destiny. Moreover, such uses also pave the way for the allusions to these works in the later Gospels.

2. The Old Testament in Matthew.

The significance of the OT in Matthew needs no demonstration. It contains by far more explicit quotations than do any of the other canonical Gospels, and many of these quotations are framed by one of two set formulae. At every turn of his narrative Matthew evokes OT themes and traditions. Echoing his source with a more emphatic formulation, Matthew notes that the events surrounding the life and death of Jesus took place “so that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled” (Mt 26:56). The significance of Jesus’ relationship to the Scripture is best illustrated by a uniquely Matthean passage: “Do not think that I have come to abolish the law or the prophets; I have not come to abolish but to fulfill them” (Mt 5:17). Jesus makes it clear that this fulfillment is to be understood not in terms of the abrogation of the OT (cf. Mt 5:18) but rather as an affirmation of its significance through his own life and ministry.

2.1. Explicit Quotations. Matthew includes more than fifty explicit quotations in his Gospel, among them quotations used by characters other than Jesus (e.g., Mt 4:6 [Ps 91:11–12]; Mt 19:7 [Deut 24:1]; Mt 21:9 [Ps 118:25–26]; Mt 22:24 [Gen 38:8; Deut 25:5]) and discussions related to the meaning of the law (Mt

5:27 [Ex 20:14; Deut 5:17]; Mt 5:38 [Ex 21:24; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21]; Mt 5:43 [Lev 19:18]; Mt 19:4–5 [Gen 1:27; 2:24; 5:2]; Mt 19:18–19 [Ex 20:12–16; Deut 5:16–20; Lev 19:18]; Mt 22:32 [Ex 3:6]; Mt 22:37–39 [Deut 6:5; Lev 19:18]). Most notable are the ten editorial quotations that began with a formula that includes the passive form of the verb plēroō (“to fulfill”) (see Table 3).

It has been said that these fulfillment quotations “appear to be pedestrian” (Moyise, 39) because they do not focus on the christological status of Jesus or the significance of his death and resurrection. Without having these quotations focused on Jesus’ death, it is possible that Matthew aims at supplementing the Markan Gospel, in which the passion narrative is already firmly grounded in Scripture (see Stanton, 214–15). It is also possible to consider these quotations as originating from an intent to highlight Jesus’ mission to the lost sheep of Israel (Rothfuchs). In any case, it is clear that these quotations do provide a broad matrix for the reading of Matthew’s story, and the point emphasized through these quotations is that every detail of Jesus’ life points to the fulfillment of scriptural promises. These quotations should then be read in light of the programmatic statement in Matthew 5:17, where Jesus claims to “fulfill” the law and the prophets. As such, it is possible that it is not the precise quotation that is important but rather the fact that the entire Scripture points to the person and ministry of Jesus. The use of the fulfillment formula in Matthew 2:23 that introduces the clause “he will be called a Nazarene” without a clearly identifiable quotation from the OT text best illustrates this point (see Nazarene). Once the point is made that the totality of Jesus’ life and ministry “fulfills” the ancient promises of God, other quotations that do not use this “fulfillment formula” should also be understood within this broader category of quotations (e.g., Mt 2:6 [Mic 5:2, 4]; Mt 3:3 [Is 40:3]; Mt 11:10 [Ex 23:20; Mal 3:1]).

Table 3. Quotations with the Passive Form of “To Fulfill”

Mt 1:23 (Is 7:14)	Jesus as Emmanuel
Mt 2:15 (Hos 11:1)	Jesus’ return from Egypt
Mt 2:18 (Jer 31:15)	Rachel’s weeping for her children
Mt 4:15 (Is 9:1–2)	Jesus in Galilee
Mt 8:17 (Is 53:4)	Jesus’ healing of the sick
Mt 12:18–21 (Is 42:1–4)	Jesus as the servant of God
Mt 13:35 (Ps 78:2)	Jesus’ use of parables
Mt 21:5 (Zech 9:9)	Jesus’ entry into Jerusalem as king
Mt 27:9 (Zech 11:12–13; Jer 18:2–6)	Jesus being betrayed

A further discussion of the first of these fulfillment quotations may illuminate their function within Matthew's narrative. At the end of the first chapter, a chapter that uses personal names to illustrate the significance of Jesus in the history of God's work among his people, one finds a quotation from Isaiah 7:14 used in reference to Jesus as "Emmanuel" (Mt 1:23). That this is not meant as a "proof" for Jesus' identity is made clear by the fact that nowhere else in Matthew is Jesus called "Emmanuel." This quotation does, however, serve to "explain" the significance of Jesus as "God with us" (Mt 1:23; cf. Mt 28:20). Moreover, in light of the wider context of Isaiah 7, where the presence of God is to be understood as a sign of judgment for those who refused to provide the proper reception of God's presence (see Is 7:16-25), Matthew is also likely using this verse to introduce the rejection of Jesus by God's own people in his Gospel. As in the time of Isaiah, those who reject the presence of God will not be able to escape his judgment (see Watts 2004). The interpretive significance of this and other fulfillment quotations for the understanding of the Matthean story highlights Matthew's profound use of the ancient Scriptures of Israel.

The textual traditions of the quotations in Matthew are more difficult to determine. Those that he shared with Mark retain their Septuagintal flavor. As for other quotations that betray a heavier Matthean hand, the influence of Hebrew and Aramaic textual traditions seems more apparent. It is possible that Matthew relies on a textual tradition that has not survived, but many scholars now suggest that Matthew himself might be responsible for the quotations as he translates directly from the Hebrew text (in a tradition that precedes the later MT text) with contemporary Aramaic influences.

2.2. Patterns and Themes. Beginning with the *genealogy and the birth account, one can already detect an *Israel typology that points both to Christ as the fulfillment of God's promise to Israel as well as to his followers as the eschatological people of God. This "book of genesis" (biblos geneseōs [Mt 1:1]), which begins with Abraham (Mt 1:1-2), evokes the Abrahamic covenant, and the numerous references to David (Mt 1:1, 6-7) point to Jesus as the legitimate heir to the throne of David. More importantly, the references to the "exile" (Mt 1:11-12, 17) situate the story of Jesus within God's promise to restore his own people through someone who fulfills God's eternal covenant with David (cf. 2 Sam 7:14-16). As God's people went into exile when they sinned against their God, Jesus "will save his people from their sins" (Mt 1:21). That Jesus fulfills the role of Israel is best seen in the quotation of Hosea 11:1 in Matthew 2:15: "Out of Egypt I called my son." As Israel was delivered from Egypt, Jesus' return from Egypt likewise would signify the ultimate deliverance of God's people from their state of exile.

This Israel typology naturally feeds into the use of the exodus paradigm in the depiction of God's eschatological act of salvation, within which Jesus is depicted as the new *Moses. Matthew's Gospel contains five discourses (Mt 5-7; 10; 13; 18; 24-25), which may recall the five books of Moses. D. C. Allison in particular has detected further correspondence between the ministry of Jesus and the life of Moses (Allison 1993, 268) (see Table 4).

Beyond the Pentateuch, several prophets also play significant roles in Matthew's Gospel. Among the prophets, the name of Isaiah appears most frequently. In many ways, Isaiah provides the pattern of God's interaction with his people at the end of times: God's salvific act is manifested among his people (Mt 3:3 [Is 40:3]) through his Suffering Servant (Mt 8:17 [Is 53:4]; 12:17-21 [Is 42:1-4]), but his people rejected him (Mt 13:14-15 [Is 6:9-10]; 15:7-9 [Is 29:13]). Embedded in the mission of this rejected servant is a move to those who are at the margin, including the Gentiles (Mt 4:14-15 [Is 9:1-2]; 12:17-21 [Is 42:1-4]). It is both the proclamation of the good news of God's work among his people and their rejection of this good news that draw many early Christian writers, including Matthew, to the work of this ancient prophet.

Table 4. Correspondences Between Jesus and Moses

Mt 1:1—2:23 (cf. Ex 1:1—2:10)	Infancy narrative
Mt 3:13-17 (cf. Ex 14:10-31)	Crossing of water
Mt 4:1-11 (cf. Ex 16:1—17:7)	Temptation in wilderness
Mt 5:1—7:29 (cf. Ex 19:1—23:33)	Giving of the Torah
Mt 11:25-30 (cf. Ex 33:1-23)	Knowledge of God
Mt 17:1-9 (cf. Ex 34:29-35)	Transfiguration
Mt 28:16-20 (cf. Deut 31:7-9; Josh 1:1-9)	Commissioning of successor

The theme of the rejected prophet is further enhanced through the explicit references to Jeremiah, two of them with quotations from this prophet (Mt 2:17-18 [Jer 31:15]; 16:14; 27:9-10 [Jer 18:2-6; cf. Zech 11:12-13]). Other allusions to this book can be identified especially in Matthew 21; 23 (see Knowles). As in Mark, Zechariah also contributes to this portrayal of the rejected prophet when Jesus is portrayed as the rejected shepherd-king through both explicit quotations (Mt 21:5 [Zech 9:9]; Mt 26:31 [Zech 13:7]; Mt 27:9-10 [Zech 11:12-13]) and allusions occurring between Matthew 21 and Matthew 27 (see Ham; Nolland).

In a more general sense, in Matthew the “prophets” point to the *mercy of God that has to be read together with the holiness of God as reflected in the Torah of Moses (see Borg). This is best illustrated by, but not limited to, the two references to Hosea 6:6 (“I desire mercy and not sacrifice”) in Matthew 9:13; 12:7 (cf. Mt 23:23). References to “the law and the prophets” (see Mt 5:17; 7:12; 11:13; 22:40; 23:29) would therefore not simply refer to the two-part Scripture but rather to the two sides of God that must be considered together.

3. The Old Testament in Luke.

Unlike Mark and Matthew, Luke wrote a two-volume work that connects the life and death of Jesus with the mission of the early church. The Gospel of Luke contains about thirty explicit OT quotations, and a slightly higher number can be identified in Acts. These two works, both by the same author, are connected in numerous ways, not least in their use of OT quotations and themes. Though likely a Gentile (and possibly a God-fearer), Luke relies heavily on the OT in the construction of his narrative. The final product testifies to God’s mighty work at the climax of the history of salvation. After all, in teaching his disciples, the risen Jesus himself is described as situating his own story within the Scripture of Israel: “Beginning with Moses and all the prophets, [Jesus] explained to them the things concerning himself in all the Scriptures” (Lk 24:27).

3.1. Explicit Quotations. Though replete with OT language and images, the Lukan birth narrative contains only one set of explicit quotations in reference to Jesus’ parents fulfilling the legal requirements of the law (Lk 2:23-24 [Ex 13:2, 12, 15; Lev 12:8]).

The first significant quotation appears at the beginning of the ministries of *John the Baptist and Jesus (Lk 3:4-6 [Is 40:3-5]). This lengthy quotation from Isaiah points to the arrival of the eschatological era: “Prepare the way of the Lord, make straight his paths” (Lk 3:4 [Is 40:3]); it also anticipates the narrative in Acts because it includes a reference to the mission to the Gentiles: “All flesh will see the salvation of God” (Lk 3:6 [Is 40:5]). This Isaianic vision is again evoked in the programmatic sermon of Jesus in the synagogue of Nazareth as he points to himself as the anointed messenger of the good news (Lk 4:18-19 [Is 58:6; 61:1-2]). This jubilant note is dampened, however, by initial signs of the Jewish rejection of Jesus (Lk 4:24). This note of rejection reappears in Luke 8:10 with yet another quotation (though without a quotation formula) from Isaiah (Is 6:9).

As in Matthew, Jesus in Luke is also presented as one who has the authority to interpret the Torah. In Luke 10:27 Jesus evokes verses that represent the center of Jewish piety (Deut 6:5; Lev 19:18), but in doing so he redefines the definition of one’s neighbor (Lk 10:29-37). In Luke 18:20 Jesus also quotes from the Ten Commandments (Ex 20:12-16; Deut 5:16-20), but by demanding that his questioner abandon everything and follow him (Lk 18:22), Jesus takes on the role of God the Father, who is to be considered the sole object of one’s *worship.

The frequency of explicit quotations increases in Luke’s passion narrative, which begins with Jesus’ entry into Jerusalem (Lk 19:45). These include references to Jesus as the rejected stone but one vindicated by God (Lk 20:17 [Ps 118:22]), Jesus as the Davidic Messiah who will triumph over all his enemies (Lk 20:42-43 [Ps 110:1]), and Jesus as the Suffering Servant who was “reckoned with the transgressors” (Lk 22:37 [Is 53:12]). The death of Jesus is therefore not simply an event to be explained; it reveals the true identity of Jesus.

At the end of his Gospel Luke uses a quotation formula but without an explicit quotation from the OT in describing the significance of Jesus’ death and resurrection: “Thus it is written that Christ will suffer and will rise from the dead on the third day, and repentance for the forgiveness of sins will be proclaimed in his name to all the nations, beginning at Jerusalem” (Lk 24:46-47). This “quotation” points to the fact that sometimes it is not individual quotations that are important, but that the entire OT finds its fulfillment in this eschatological era. Moreover, this note links the life and death of Jesus with the period of the church: both are to be understood in light of God’s ancient promises to Israel.

From the explicit quotations, it appears the LXX is Luke’s Bible. Changes to the LXX reading often can be explained by the attempt to fit the texts into their new context. One should not assume, however, that the use of these quotations is simply the creation of Luke that would work only on the level of the Greek texts. D. Bock, in particular, has argued for the influence of Hebrew source texts behind the traditions from which Luke draws in his use of specific OT quotations (Bock, 271).

3.2. Patterns and Themes. The fact that explicit quotations do not tell the whole story of Luke's use of the OT is best seen in the opening *birth narrative, which contains only one explicit set of quotations (Lk 2:23-24 [Ex 13:2, 12, 15; Lev 12:8]) but is saturated with OT images and themes. Beyond the numerous allusions and echoes embedded in the individual words and phrases, the OT is used in a number of creative ways. First, the distinct Septuagintal character of the Greek of Luke 1-2 has been attributed to the sources behind Luke's narrative, but the distinctly Lukan style can be detected throughout these two chapters. A better explanation is to consider this as a result of Luke's intention to write "biblical history" as he reflects on the climax of God's work among his people. Second, the intense presence of the Spirit (Lk 1:15, 35, 41, 67; 2:25, 26; cf. Is 32:15; Joel 2:28-32), the reappearance of prophetic activities (Lk 1:67, 70, 76) and the use of the name "Gabriel" (Lk 1:19, 26; cf. Dan 8:16; 9:21) point to the dawn of the eschatological era. Third, the use of the "barren woman" motif at the very beginning of this birth narrative (Lk 1:6-7) also evokes the ancient stories of Sarah (Gen 18), Rebekah (Gen 25), Rachel (Gen 30), the mother of Samson (Judg 13) and Hannah (1 Sam 1-2). These stories are mediated through the use of this motif in Isaiah 54:1 in reference to the eschatological reversal that will take place among God's people in the eschatological era (cf. Pesiq. Rab Kah. 20:2). Luke's use of this motif in the description of Zechariah and Elizabeth (Lk 1:6-7) as well as the parallels between the Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55) and the ancient song of Hannah (1 Sam 2:1-10) point to the renewed work of God among his people. These uses of the OT in the birth narrative lay the foundation for Luke's story of Jesus as the one through whom God's eschatological promises are fulfilled.

As noted above, the first lengthy explicit quotation in the narrative comes from Isaiah (Lk 3:4-6 [Is 40:3-5]), and this quotation introduces the wider Isaianic new-exodus program in both Luke and Acts (see Pao, 37-69). First, the eschatological program as contained in Isaiah 40:1-11 points to both the restoration of Israel (Is 40:1-2, 9-11) (see Exile and Restoration) and the *mission of the Gentiles (Is 40:5). While the arrival of God's salvation in Jerusalem (Is 40:2) is fulfilled in the Gospel of Luke, the restoration of Israel and the mission to the Gentiles are the focus of Luke's narrative in Acts. Second, the "way" terminology as introduced in Luke 3:4 (Is 40:3) becomes one of the terms applied to the church in Acts (Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22). As God's people, the fulfillment of God's promises in Israel can now be found in the church. Finally, as Luke begins his two-volume work with a quotation from Isaiah 40, one that announces the beginning of God's eschatological salvific act, Luke ends his narrative with another quotation from that book, Isaiah 6:9-10, a passage that announces God's judgment on his people who refused to receive God's work on their behalf (Acts 28:26-27). Reading both volumes together, one can detect the tragic tone of the work when the good news turned into a note of judgment as God's own people rejected his act of salvation among them.

Another prominent pattern from the OT can be detected in the central section of Luke's Gospel (Lk 9:51-19:44). Attempting to explain the form of this lengthy central section that depicts Jesus' journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, C. F. Evans was among the first to argue that Luke constructs this section according to the order of events recorded in Deuteronomy 1-26. Instead of arguing for a strict correspondence between the two works, D. Moessner argues that several Deuteronomistic themes dominate this section: (1) the faithless and rebellious nature of the people of God; (2) the commission of a prophet to issue the call to *repentance; (3) the rejection of this prophet by God's people; (4) the judgment of God's people. This central section therefore points to both Jesus as the eschatological *prophet of God and Israel as God's rebellious people. The basic thesis of this proposal has been widely accepted and is further qualified by M. Strauss, who highlights both the significance of the Isaianic new-exodus program and the centrality of the Davidic royal messianic paradigm in this section in Luke.

In Luke's passion narrative one again finds the significant influence of the OT. As in Mark, a number of OT books exert their influence on this section. Particularly noteworthy is the use of psalms in this section. The use of Psalm 118 in various places within and beyond the passion narrative in both Luke (Lk 2:34; 13:35; 19:38) and Acts (Acts 4:11) points to the significance of this psalm in explaining both the human rejection and divine vindication of Jesus the Messiah. The allusions to other royal Davidic psalms within the passion narrative also provide the link to King David, who was portrayed as both the king and the righteous sufferer (Lk 23:34 [Ps 22:18]; Lk 23:35 [Ps 22:8]; Lk 23:36 [Ps 69:21]; Lk 23:46 [Ps 31:5]; Lk 23:47 [Ps 31:18]) (see Jipp, 260-64). One should no longer be surprised that the glorious Messiah is also one who suffers under the hands of those who had “rejected the plan of God” (Lk 7:30).

Through these uses of the wider scriptural patterns Jesus is portrayed as the new Moses, the Isaianic servant, and the royal righteous sufferer. This allows Luke to continue his narrative in Acts by interpreting the persecution of the early Christians in light of the suffering of Jesus himself, and by emphasizing that those who follow this suffering Messiah are to be considered as God’s eschatological people. After all, both Luke and Acts aim at portraying a time that has been foretold by “all the prophets” (Acts 3:24).

4. The Old Testament in John.

The significance of the OT in John can be established on the different levels of this Gospel. Not only are there numerous explicit quotations and allusions to the OT, but also the use of various patterns and images from the OT provides the fundamental structure to John’s argument. Moreover, if the struggle with the *synagogue is to be considered as constituting part of the context for the writing of this Gospel, one should not be surprised to see a significant presence of the OT in the presentation of his arguments.

John shares with the Synoptics in the use of four OT texts: Psalm 118:25–26 (Jn 12:13); Isaiah 6:10 (Jn 12:40); Isaiah 40:3 (Jn 1:23); Zechariah 9:9 (Jn 12:15). He adds another eleven explicit quotations, perhaps to supplement the Synoptic interpretation of the Jesus story (see Köstenberger, 417). At least three of these four quotations (Ps 118:25–26; Is 6:10; 40:3) appear to be widely used in early Christian proclamation, and John’s use of these should not be considered as proof of his dependence on the Synoptic tradition. Taken together, all the explicit quotations appear to be carefully selected to support John’s argument.

4.1. Explicit Quotations. As in the Synoptics, the quotation from Isaiah 40:3 in John 1:23 announces the arrival of the eschatological era in language that evokes the Isaianic new exodus, a time when “they will all be taught by God” (Jn 6:45 [Is 54:13]). As Isaiah had proclaimed, however, God’s message of salvation is rejected by his own people: “Lord, who has believed our message, and to whom has the arm of the Lord been revealed” (Jn 12:38 [Is 53:1]); and this confirms their rebellious and stubborn nature: “He has blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts, in order that they would not see with their eyes and understand with their hearts and turn, and I would heal them” (Jn 12:40 [Is 6:10]). This message of the rejection of God’s messenger is reinforced by the psalms, some of which focus on the experience of the righteous sufferer (Jn 13:18 [Ps 41:9]; Jn 15:25 [Ps 35:19; 69:4]; Jn 19:24 [Ps 22:18]).

A distinct christological focus of the OT quotations can be identified in John’s Gospel. Jesus is “the seed of David” (Jn 7:42 [Ps 89:4]) and is “from Bethlehem” (Jn 7:42 [Mic 5:2]). He is the king who is to enter Jerusalem (Jn 12:13 [Ps 118:25–26]; Jn 12:15 [Zech 9:9]). Moreover, in the polemic against the claims of the Jews, Jesus also uses an OT text to establish his own sonship (Jn 10:34 [Ps 82:6]). Jesus’ death and suffering can only prove that he is the righteous one and the Messiah, one who is vindicated by God (cf. Jn 19:36 [Ex 12:10, 46; Num 9:12; Ps 34:10]; Jn 19:37 [Zech 12:10]).

Beyond the content of the individual quotations, particularly noteworthy is the difference in the introductory formula for the quotations that appear in the different halves of this Gospel (see Table 5). With few exceptions, the general pattern is the use of either “to say” (legō) or “to write” (grapheō) in quotation formulae in the first half of the Gospel, and “to fulfill” (plēroō) in those in the second half. This roughly corresponds to the two sections of John, commonly known as the Book of Signs (Jn 2–11) and the Book of the Passion (Jn 13–20), with John 12 as a transition chapter. The significance of the section that contains the first two fulfillment quotations

Table 5. Introductory Formula in the Two Halves of John’s Gospel

Jn 1:23	As Isaiah the prophet said
Jn 2:17	It is written
Jn 6:31	As it is written
Jn 6:45	It is written in the prophets
Jn 7:38	As the scripture said
Jn 7:42	Does not the scripture say
Jn 10:34	Is it not written in your law
Jn 12:14	As it is written
Jn 12:38	So that the word of Isaiah the prophet would be fulfilled, who said
Jn 12:39	Because again Isaiah said
Jn 13:18	So that the scripture would be fulfilled
Jn 15:25	So that the word written in their law would be fulfilled
Jn 19:24	So that the scripture would be fulfilled
Jn 19:36	So that the scripture would be fulfilled
Jn 19:37	As another (scripture) says

(Jn 12:38, 39) should be highlighted. In John 12:36 Jesus was still calling the Jews to repent: "While you have the light, believe in it, so that you may become sons of light." In John 12:37, however, the tone clearly shifted as a result of the Jewish rejection of Jesus: "Although Jesus had performed so many signs before them, they still would not believe in him." This is immediately followed by two OT quotations that focus on the pattern of disbelief among God's people (Jn 12:38 [Is 53:1]; 12:40 [Is 6:10]). The rest of these fulfillment quotations are related to this theme of human rejection. This use of the fulfillment quotations "suggests an audience that needs to be provided with a rationale, a biblical rationale, for the substantial rejection of Jesus by his fellow Jews" (Carson, 248).

A further understanding of these fulfillment quotations can be discerned through the use of the verb teleiōō ("to bring to its end, to perfect") in a fulfillment formula (Jn 19:28) that is sandwiched by formulae that use the verb plēroō ("to fulfill") [Jn 19:24, 36]. Reading both sets of formulae together, we see that John is not simply concerned with the fulfillment of individual predictions contained in the OT; he also aims at drawing attention to the fact that this passion narrative depicts "the 'ultimate fulfillment' of all christological prophecy in the Scriptures" (Hengel, 393). In the death and resurrection of Christ one finds the true fulfillment of the entire OT history as it forms the climax of God's work among his people.

Some would insist that the LXX is the only Bible behind John's Gospel (e.g., Schuchard), even when John appears to be quite capable of translating directly from the Hebrew text (e.g., Jn 12:40; 13:18) (see Menken). It is also possible that John is aware of the targumic tradition (e.g., Jn 12:48), although such deviations from the Greek text may simply indicate that he has been quoting from memory (see Achtemeier 1990). Since the whole of Scripture points to Christ, John's argument does not always rest on the particular details contained in any textual traditions. Moreover, as a disciple of Jesus, he would not have shied away from the derived authority from Jesus as he renders Jesus' teachings in Aramaic for his Greek readers.

4.2. Patterns and Themes. In his Gospel John focuses not simply on the fulfillment of individual verses in the OT, but also on wider movements that point toward Christ as the proper goal of scriptural history. Three OT figures in particular are highlighted as witnesses to this climax of salvation history: Moses, Abraham, Isaiah (see Hengel, 386-89; Hengel would also include John the Baptist as an "OT" witness).

In the prologue to his gospel John has already provided his readers a fundamental contrast between the age of promise and the age of fulfillment: "For the law was given through Moses, but grace and truth came through Jesus Christ" (Jn 1:17). This Gospel is therefore to be understood as that which supersedes the previous era. The continuity between the two is also emphasized, however, when it is noted that this Jesus is "the one Moses wrote about in the law" (Jn 1:45). The witness of Moses is most clearly stated in John 5:46: "If you believed Moses, you would also believe me, because he wrote about me." This Jesus, therefore, does not aim at destroying the law of Moses (Jn 7:19, 22-23; 8:5); Moses' work in guiding the people out of Egypt and through the wilderness is but a witness to Christ's own salvific work (Jn 3:14; 6:32).

The relationship between Jesus and Abraham is the subject of Jesus' discourse in John 8:31-59, in which Jesus explicitly points to Abraham as a witness to him: "Your father Abraham rejoiced greatly in seeing my day, and he saw it and was glad" (Jn 8:56). This discourse is important for both christological and ecclesiological reasons. Christologically, when asked if he is greater than Abraham, Jesus answers by pointing to his own glorification by God (Jn 8:53-54). Most striking is perhaps this statement: "Before Abraham was, I am [egō eimi]" (Jn 8:58). This statement, which alludes to both the classic name of God, "I am who I am" (egō eimi ho ōn [Ex 3:13-14]), and the Isaianic reference to God as "I am the one" (egō eimi [Is 41:4]), points to the unique status of Jesus (see "I Am" Sayings). Ecclesiologically, the claim of the Jews that they are "Abraham's children" (Jn 8:39) prompts Jesus to identify their "father" instead as "the devil" (Jn 8:44) because they have rejected the God of Abraham. Moreover, Jesus also provides a definition of God's people based on their response to him, the one who is "from God" (Jn 8:42). In focusing on this patriarch, therefore, Jesus is able to address both his own identity and the identity of those who believe in him.

As noted above in the discussion of the explicit quotations, Isaiah plays an important role in this Gospel. In John 1:23 John evokes the Isaianic eschatological program with his citation of Isaiah 40:3. It is in John 12:37-41 that we find the repeated use of the name "Isaiah" (Jn 12:38, 39, 41). Contained in this section are two quotations that point to Christ as the Isaianic Suffering Servant (Jn 12:38 [Is 53:1]) and to the Jews as those who reject the work of God as their ancestors did (Jn 12:40 [Is 6:10]). The concluding remarks most clearly consider Isaiah directly speaking about Christ: "Isaiah said these things because he saw his [Christ's] glory, and spoke about him." With the testimonies of these three witnesses, the significance and the glory of the Messiah are revealed, as well as his fate among God's own people.

Beyond these three witnesses, David as evoked through royal psalms also plays an important role in John's Gospel (see Son of David). Compared to the Synoptic Gospels, more explicit references or quotations to the psalms in the passion narrative can be identified (esp. Jn 12:13 [Ps 118:25-26]; 15:25 [Ps 35:19; 69:4]; 19:24 [Ps 22:18]; 19:28 [Ps 69:21]). In this passion narrative these psalms reaffirm John's earlier identification of Jesus (through the mouth of Nathaniel) as "the King of Israel" (Jn 1:49), but this king is also the righteous sufferer who will be rejected by his own people. Through these OT characters Jesus is presented as the one to whom the sacred past pointed.

Another way the OT is used in John's Gospel is images and *feasts with rich OT background: lamb of God (Jn 1:29-34), eschatological banquet (Jn 2:1-11; 6:25-29), temple and cultic places of worship (Jn 2:12-25; 4:1-26; 7:14-52; 11:55-57), the serpent in the wilderness (Jn 3:14), the shepherd and his flock (Jn 10:1-21), the vine and the branches (Jn 15:1-17). Also worth noting are the numerous references to Jewish feasts and festivals in this Gospel: Sabbath (Jn 5:2-15; 7:20-24; 9:13-34; 19:31), Day of Preparation (Jn 19:14, 31, 42), Passover (Jn 2:13, 23-25; 4:45; 6:4; 11:55; 12:1; 13:1; 18:28—19:37), Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7:1-43), Feast of Dedication (Jn 10:22-30).

Finally, it seems to be significant for John to highlight the close relationship between the ancient Scripture and the word of Jesus. In John 2:22, for example, John states that "they believed the Scripture and the word that Jesus had spoken." The act of remembering is likewise applied both to the Scripture (Jn 2:17, 22; 12:16) and the word of Jesus (Jn 15:20; 16:4), although different Greek verbs are used for these two groups of passages. Although John does not explicitly identify the word of Jesus with that of Scripture, the close relationship between the two is a significant point that should not be missed.

5. Jesus' Use of the Old Testament.

A detailed examination of the use of the OT by the historical Jesus would require an examination of every individual saying against an acceptable set of criteria of authenticity. Even for those who refuse to accept the general reliability of the Gospel traditions, it is difficult to argue against the significant role that the OT plays in the words and deeds of Jesus. This is consistent with the fact that Jews living in first-century A.D. Palestine were able to use and interact with the OT, and Jewish teachers based their teachings on their Scripture. Even if Jesus is not to be considered a well-educated rabbi according to the model most fully developed in the later rabbinic schools, he was able to evoke the biblical text, language and tradition as any leader of popular prophetic movements would. This is indirectly affirmed by a text that is less flattering and thus likely not to be the creation of the early church, but that indirectly acknowledges the power of Jesus' teachings: "How does this fellow know Scripture when he has not studied" (Jn 7:15 [trans. Meier, 269]).

In all four canonical gospels, as in other early Christian writings such as the Pauline Epistles and the book of Hebrews, one finds "the basic Jewish story focused now on Jesus" (Wright, 417). In this common story one finds the prophetic use of the OT in the proclamation of the arrival of the eschatological era, the christological affirmation of the identity of Jesus in light of ancient Jewish models and paradigms, the legal discussion that derives from both the prophetic and christological claims, and the ecclesiological ramifications of this arrival of the eschatological era. The fact that these four Gospels converge on these points encourages the readers to consider the historical Jesus to be responsible for such use of the OT.

Prophetically, all four Gospels situate Jesus within the exodus and the new-exodus paradigms. The significance of the original exodus patterns most likely points to Jesus' self-understanding as the one who delivers his people from bondage. This can be articulated in terms of saving "the people from their sins" (Mt 1:21) or delivering this people so that "all who believe in him will not perish but have eternal life" (Jn 3:16). The eschatological fulfillment of this exodus paradigm often is mediated through Isaiah when texts such as Isaiah 40:3 (Mt 3:3; Mk 1:3; Lk 1:76; 3:4-6; Jn 1:23) and Isaiah 61:1-2 (Mt 5:3; 11:5; Lk 4:18-19; 6:20; 7:22) are used in more than one Gospel. With the evocation of this paradigm, Jesus proclaims the arrival of "the year of the Lord's favor" (Lk 4:19 [Is 61:2]) (see Jubilee).

Christologically, numerous titles are applied to Jesus, and many of them have a rich history in OT texts. Related to the exodus and new-exodus program as noted above, Jesus is portrayed as the new Moses and the Isaianic servant. The classic text that points to a new prophet like Moses in Deuteronomy 18:15-20 is explicitly quoted in Acts 3:22, but it also is evoked in all four Gospels (Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7; Lk 9:35; Jn 1:21). The Moses typology that appears in both Mark and Q reaches to the earliest layer of the Gospel traditions and deserves to be taken seriously in any reconstruction of the historical Jesus (see Allison 2000, 217). For the Isaianic servant figure, the frequent uses of and allusions to texts such as Isaiah 42; 49; 53 have already been noted above. Both the suffering and the glory of Christ are also understood in light of the royal messianic paradigm as mediated through the psalms. Other titles, such as “son of man”* (see Dan 7) and “shepherd” (see Zech 13), likewise cannot be understood apart from the OT. The use of the christological titles may also point to Jesus’ self-understanding as informed by the OT.

As Jesus considers himself to be the new Moses, he often provides the authoritative interpretation of the Mosaic law. This is best illustrated by the recurring use of the formula “You have heard that it was said . . . but I say to you” in Matthew 5:21-48. The conflict with others in their interpretation of the law is reflected also in the numerous Sabbath controversy stories found in all four Gospels (e.g., Mt 12:1-8, 9-14; Mk 2:23-28; 3:1-6; Lk 6:1-5, 6-11; Jn 5:1-18; 7:14-24). Equally important is Jesus’ reinterpretation of the Ten Commandments as he applies them to himself by calling disciples to abandon all to follow him (Mk 10:17-31; Mt 19:16-30; Lk 18:18-30; cf. Jn 12:20-26).

Finally, the ecclesiological focus of Jesus’ use of the OT should also be noted. This includes the understanding of the Jewish rejection of the gospel through OT prophetic lenses (e.g., the use of Is 6:9-10 in Mt 13:14; Mk 4:12; Lk 8:10; Jn 12:40), the inclusion of the Gentiles (e.g., Mt 4:15 [Is 9:1-2]; Lk 2:32 [Is 42:6]; 3:6 [Is 40:5]) and the use of the symbol “twelve” in all four Gospels (Mt 10:1-4; Mk 3:13-19; Lk 6:12-16; cf. Jn 6:66-71). The eschatological era ushered in through the life and ministry of Jesus created a new eschatological people through whom God’s faithfulness to his ancient promises continues to be manifested.

In light of these uses, the following statement, which appears only in Luke, is consistent with the evidence found in all four Gospels: “Everything that is written about me in the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms must be fulfilled” (Lk 24:44). The four Gospels provide the precise details in which these ancient promises of God are fulfilled.

See also ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB; CHRIST; ELIJAH AND ELISHA; EXILE AND RESTORATION; ISRAEL; JUBILEE; LAW; MOSES; PASSION NARRATIVE; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS; SABBATH; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; SHEPHERD, SHEEP; SIGN OF JONAH; SON OF DAVID; SON OF GOD; SON OF MAN; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. J. Achtemeier, “Omne verbum sonat: The New Testament and the Oral Environment of Late Western Antiquity,” JBL 109 (1990) 3-27; idem, “The Origin and Function of the Pre-Markan Miracle Catenae,” JBL 91 (1972) 198-221; D. C. Allison Jr., The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); idem, The Intertextual Jesus: Scripture in Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000); D. L. Bock, Proclamation from Prophecy and Pattern: Lucan Old Testament Christology (JSNTSup 12; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (SBEC 5; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1984); J. Bowman, The Gospel of Mark: The New Christian Jewish Passover Haggadah (StPB 8; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1965); D. A. Carson, “John and the Johannine Epistles,” in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture; Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 245-64; C. F. Evans, “The Central Section of St. Luke’s Gospel,” in Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Honour of R. H. Lightfoot, ed. D. E. Nineham (Oxford: Blackwell, 1955) 37-53; C. A. Ham, The Coming King and the Rejected Shepherd: Matthew’s Reading of Zechariah’s Messianic Hope (NTM 4; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix, 2005); T. R. Hatina, In Search of a Context: The Function of Scripture in Mark’s Narrative (JSNTSup 232; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); M. Hengel, “The Old Testament in the Fourth Gospel,” in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner (JSNTSup 104; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 380-95; J. W. Jipp, “Luke’s Scriptural Suffering Messiah: A Search for Precedent, A Search for Identity,” CBQ 72 (2010) 255-74; M. P. Knowles, Jeremiah in Matthew’s Gospel: The Rejected Prophet Motif in Matthean Redaction (JSNTSup 68; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); A. Köstenberger, “John,” in Commentary on the New Testament Use of the Old Testament, ed., G. K. Beale and D. A. Carson (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007) 415-512; J. Marcus, The Way of the Lord: Christological Exegesis of the Old Testament in the Gospel of Mark (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991); M. J. J. Menken, Old Testament Quotations in the Fourth Gospel: Studies in Textual Form (CBET 15; Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1996); D. P. Moessner, Lord of the Banquet: The Literary and Theological Signifi- cance of the Lukan Travel Narrative (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); D. J. Moo, The Old Testament in the Gospel Passion Narratives (Sheffield: Almond, 1983); S. Moyise, The Old Testament in the New: An Introduction (London: Continuum, 2001); J. Nolland, "The King as Shepherd: The Role of Deutero-Zechariah in Matthew," in Biblical Interpretation in Early Christian Gospels, 2: Gospel of Matthew, ed. T. R. Hatina (LNTS 310; London: T & T Clark, 2008) 133-46; D. W. Pao, Acts and the Isaianic New Exodus (WUNT 2/130; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); S. E. Porter, ed., Hearing the Old Testament in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); W. Rothfuchs, Die Erfüllungszitate des Matthäus-Evangeliums (BWANT 88; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1969); B. G. Schuchard, Scripture within Scripture: The Interrelationship of Form and Function in the Explicit Old Testament Citations in the Gospel of John (SBLDS 133; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); G. Stanton, "Matthew," in It Is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture; Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, ed. D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988) 205-19; M. L. Strauss, The Davidic Messiah in Luke-Acts: The Promise and Its Fulfilment in Lukan Christology (JSNTSup 110; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); W. M. Swartley, Israel's Scripture Traditions and the Synoptic Gospels: Story Shaping Story (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); R. E. Watts, Isaiah's New Exodus and Mark (WUNT 2/88; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997); idem, "Immanuel: Virgin Birth Proof Text or Programmatic Warning of Things to Come (Isa 7:14 in Matt 1:23)?" in From Prophecy to Testament: The Function of the Old Testament in the New, ed. C. A. Evans (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004) 92-113; N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

D. W. Pao

OLIVET DISCOURSE. See APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING.

ORAL TRADITION. See FORM CRITICISM; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION.

ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION

A growing area of contemporary research on the Gospels involves the application of interdisciplinary orality studies to the early Jesus/Gospel tradition, both oral and written. This new area of Gospel studies holds potential implications for important issues such as the historical reliability of the early Gospel tradition, the proper interpretation of the Gospels themselves, and the infamous *Synoptic Problem. The bulk of this article is divided into three main sections. First, a survey is offered on the history of scholarship related to the transmission of the early oral Jesus tradition. Second, two areas of contemporary debate that have bearing on the oral Jesus tradition are considered. Finally, the "oral" nature of the written Gospels is explored. Here, following a survey of some of the oral-like features of the Gospels themselves, implications for a few of the standard methods of Gospels research are considered. Now, a few words must be given to an important issue that arises in the study of orality.

One of the persistent problems for orality studies relates to the fact that the term oral has come to possess a broad semantic range. Two different uses of the term oral must be kept clear and distinct. First, oral can be used to identify the oral medium/mode—that is, spoken acts of communication. Second, oral can be used to identify an oral register/conception—that is, style of communication, one that tends to be highly context-bound in nature and is commonly characterized by things such as informal tone, mnemonic devices and relatively flexible precision standards. Contrastingly, a literate register/conception is relatively context-independent in nature and typically is associated with a more formal tone, stricter precision standards, and so on (Tannen; Eddy and Boyd, 351-54).

Two things are important to note here. First, with regard to both media and register, the oral and the written/literate can influence and interface with each other in a variety of ways and degrees (contrary to the "Great Divide" theory, on which see 1.3.1 below). For example, with regard to linguistic register, an act of communication can be more or less oral or literate in nature. Second, medium and register/conception are independent phenomena. That is, a spoken act of communication (i.e., oral medium) can be either predominantly oral or literate with regard to register. Similarly, a written text can be composed in a more or less oral register. In fact, as we will see, this is precisely the situation that we find with regard to the written Gospels, most clearly Mark. Suffice it to say that although there is justification for continued use of the terms oral and orality, they are not without complexities and problems and must be used with clarity and nuance (Finnegan, 212-13; Rodriguez).

1. Oral Transmission of the Early Jesus Tradition: History of Scholarship
2. Two Current Debates
3. Orality and the Gospels

1. Oral Transmission of the Early Jesus Tradition: History of Scholarship.

The importance of oral transmission for the early Gospel tradition is rooted in a fact about Jesus himself: rather than written texts, he left his followers spoken teachings that were written down later by others. Jesus is presented in the Gospels consistently as a traveling teacher who proclaims the *kingdom of God by both word and deed. For much of the early Christian movement as reflected both within and beyond the NT, the oral transmission of traditions about Jesus played an important role (see, e.g., 1 Cor 15:3-7; Papias's famous statement in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.3-4). In the Gospels remnants of Jesus' oral teaching style are detectable in his aphorisms (e.g., Mk 8:35; 10:31) and *parables (e.g., Mk 4:1-9, 26-32; Mt 13:24-30, 44-46). The multiple versions of similar teachings found in the Gospels (e.g., Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20) are reflective of the realities of an itinerant teacher within an orally dominant environment. Simply put, Jesus would have spoken the same basic teachings in a variety of settings, which would have naturally produced a variety of audience-specific performance variations of the same material.

From the beginning of modern biblical studies, scholars were aware that oral tradition played some role (e.g., Richard Simon [1638-1712]). One of the first to draw serious attention to the importance of the early oral Jesus tradition was J. G. von Herder at the close of the eighteenth century. Despite this general awareness, biblical scholars up to and throughout the nineteenth century continued to focus virtually all of their attention on what they had in hand: written texts.

1.1. Form Criticism and the Bultmannian Model. It was with the rise of *form criticism in the early twentieth century that the question of the oral transmission of the early Gospel tradition was finally given significant attention. Following the lead of H. Gunkel's form-critical work on Genesis, a number of NT scholars (e.g., K. Schmidt, M. Dibelius, R. Bultmann, M. Albertz, V. Taylor) began to identify and investigate the diverse literary forms within the Gospels. In addition, form critics commonly attempted to determine the "life setting" (Sitz im Leben) within which each form developed. In time, Bultmann's work became the dominant form-critical approach to the Gospels. He drew his conclusions about the developmental dynamics of the early oral Jesus tradition primarily by drawing analogies from the dynamics of the two-source theory (i.e., the manner in which Matthew and Luke presumably used and developed Mark and *Q) and from what, at the time, were believed to be common, transcultural tendencies (oral "laws") derived from analysis of (mostly European) folklore traditions. Here it was assumed that the early Jesus movement (1) was virtually without written texts prior to the Gospels and Q; (2) showed no real interest in actual biographical/historical details of Jesus' life, and thus no real interest in preserving eyewitness information; (3) lacked knowledge of a larger, coherent narrative framework for Jesus' life prior to its de novo creation by Mark; and (4) was open to fabricating sayings from, and stories about, Jesus, often derived from prophetically inspired utterances of the risen Christ, when community needs called for them. Naturally, these conclusions led to a highly skeptical view of the historical reliability of both the oral Jesus tradition and the Gospels themselves. Unfortunately, both the methods and presuppositions of the Bultmannian approach to oral transmission were deeply indebted to written texts, highly literate assumptions and limited data (e.g., very little actual fieldwork) regarding the nature of oral transmission itself.

1.2. Birger Gerhardsson and the "Scandinavian School." A significantly different model of the oral Jesus tradition was offered with B. Gerhardsson's Memory and Manuscript (1961). Preceded by decades of interest in oral tradition among other Scandinavian scholars, Gerhardsson proposed that the process of oral transmission exemplified by the "school" dynamic of later *rabbinic Judaism provided the best comparative model by which to understand the early oral Jesus tradition. Here, strict memorization of tradition within the context of a teacher-disciple relationship allowed for later flexible, situation-specific use of that tradition by the disciple. Gerhardsson challenged a number of the dominant assumptions of the Bultmannian approach. Eyewitness disciples formed a natural link from Jesus up to the time of the written Gospels via memorized oral tradition. With this model, one could easily imagine a stable oral tradition that provided a generally reliable historical basis for the material eventually recorded in the Gospels.

Reactions to Gerhardsson's model were swift and polarized. Many conservative scholars gravitated to his model as a way of demonstrating the stability and reliability of the Jesus tradition. However, those shaped by the Bultmannian approach quickly charged Gerhardsson with "anachronism," claiming that he was illegitimately projecting a later rabbinic phenomenon back onto the pre-70 A.D. world of the early Jesus movement. A second charge was that Gerhardsson's model simply did not fit the evidence of the Gospels themselves. Specifically, based on the assumption of the two-source theory, critics argued that Matthew and Luke's use of Mark and Q was highly flexible and creative and thus did not reflect a strict memorization model. In later publications Gerhardsson responded to his critics by clarifying and nuancing his model. Others have embraced and developed this "Scandinavian School" model, including R. Riesner, who emphasized the stable transmission of tradition within more popular settings of ancient Judaism such as homes, schools and synagogues (see also Byrskog).

1.3. Contemporary Interdisciplinary Orality Studies. Despite their differences, both Bultmann and Gerhardsson shared one methodological orientation: both depended primarily on data from written texts in order to theorize about oral transmission. With the rise of contemporary interdisciplinary orality studies, however, a wide range of fieldwork-based research on living oral history/tradition has provided a new basis from which to reimagine the early oral Jesus tradition.

1.3.1. The Parry-Lord (Oral Formulaic) Theory. Ironically, during the time Bultmann's model of oral transmission was settling in as a dominant approach among Gospel scholars, Homeric scholar M. Parry, along with his best-known student, A. Lord, was initiating a revolution by doing fieldwork that would usher in the discipline of contemporary orality studies. Together in the mid-1930s, they recorded and analyzed live performances of Serbo-Croatian singers of oral tradition. Due to Parry's untimely death, publication of much of their work was delayed until 1960, when Lord's famous book The Singer of Tales appeared. Initially intended to explain phenomena within Homer's epics, the "Oral Formulaic" theory was quickly applied by others to a wide range of oral traditions. At the core of the theory is the conviction that performers of song-based oral tradition do not strictly memorize their compositions prior to performance. Rather, they re-create the composition anew with each successive performance, though always making use of a wide range of stock phrases ("formula") available to them within the communally shared performative tradition itself.

The importance of Parry and Lord's work can hardly be overstated. For the first time in a systematic way, an actual instance of carefully analyzed living oral tradition became the basis of a scholarly theory of oral transmission. Yet some unfortunate effects followed in the wake of its success, three of which would eventually influence assessments of the oral Jesus tradition. First, Lord's work served to foster what has come to be known as the "Great Divide" theory, in which orality and writing are seen as "contradictory and mutually exclusive" (Lord 1960, 129). This assumption, while an understandable over-reaction to the long-standing dominance of writing-based theories regarding oral tradition, served to create a virtually unbridgeable divide between the "oral" and "written/literate" that has plagued the field of orality studies ever since, thus obscuring the many and varied ways in which these two media/registers can creatively interact. Second, many early adherents of the Parry-Lord theory assumed that its principles could be generalized to all instances of oral tradition across cultures and genres. Further fieldwork has shown the importance of culture and genre specificity with regard to the dynamics of oral transmission. Finally (and a specific instance of the "generalization" problem), the Parry-Lord theory fostered the widespread notion that oral tradition and memorization are inherently incompatible. Based on a wide range of further fieldwork, however, we know that a vast number of orally dominant cultures contain oral genres that involve significant, sometimes stringent, memorization (e.g., Sowayan, 110-22). Taking these sorts of criticisms to heart, a number of scholars inspired by the Parry-Lord approach have modified the model to avoid these problems and to cover a wider range of oral phenomena. Noteworthy among them is J. Foley (Foley 1991; 2002), who has become a valuable conversation partner for Gospel scholars exploring the oral Jesus tradition (e.g., Foley 2006).

1.3.2. The Interdisciplinary "Turn to Orality." In the wake of the Parry-Lord revolution, the study of oral tradition/transmission began to flourish within a number of disciplines. In the 1960s scholars such as E. Havelock, J. Goody, M. McLuhan and W. Ong (representing disciplines ranging from classical studies to anthropology to linguistics) pushed the orality-literacy conversation ahead. Whether intentionally or not, in the course of distinguishing oral and written modes of communication and their various effects, the work of these scholars served to strengthen the aforementioned "Great Divide" mentality. This characterization of the inherent opposition between the oral and written/literate, through use of a series of mutually exclusive binaries, continues to haunt certain sectors of orality studies today (for elaboration, see Foley 2002, 26, 36-40; Finnegan, 187-89, 220-21; Carr, 6-8).

Various disciplines have contributed significant insight into the workings of oral transmission. Rep-representative voices along these lines from within the field of African historiography include R. Finnegan and J. Vansina, with the latter's important fieldwork-based text Oral Tradition as History (1985) serving as a standard guide to the use of oral sources in historical reconstruction. In the areas of anthropology/ethnography and folklore studies, the mid-century "turn to performance" shifted attention from transcribed written texts to the creative oral performance arena itself. The "oral history" movement has also made its mark as it has explored both method and practice regarding the use of oral articulations of autobiographical memory in the reconstruction of the past. Following in the train of F. Bartlett's famous studies of human memory in the early twentieth century, contemporary psychology has continued to investigate the nature and reliability of autobiographical memory. In a groundbreaking work in 1995, D. Rubin took things one step further by applying his deep familiarity with psychologically based memory studies to the question of how memory works in the context of oral tradition. Finally, stemming from M. Halbwachs's earlier work on collective memory, contemporary theorists of social memory are shedding light on the dynamics by which individual memories (on which oral traditions naturally depend) are shaped by the pressures of a community's collective memory.

With the rise of postmodern sensibilities within the Western academy has come an interdisciplinary ideological bias toward flux and fluidity. This has been reflected in the area of orality studies by an overemphasis on the inherent instability and malleability of orality, features that are seen as offering emancipation from the oppressive strictures and inflexibility of the written/literate. However, this overreaction to the modern/literate is beginning to be rebalanced in many quarters as more scholars are exploring orality's full range of capabilities, including its remarkable capacity to conserve tradition even as it creatively reproduces it (Barber, 67-102).

1.4. Werner Kelber's Breakthrough. Important orality-sensitive challenges to the Bultmannian model of the Jesus tradition appeared in the late 1960s and early 1970s. But it was the 1983 publication of Werner Kelber's landmark book The Oral and the Written Gospel that provided the first extensive treatment of the Gospels in light of interdisciplinary orality studies. In this study Kelber begins by setting out the two competing models offered by Bultmann and Gerhardsson. He goes on to explicate a third option, one that takes seriously the orally dominant context of the first-century world within which early Christianity was born. Drawing from scholars such as Parry and Lord, Havelock, Goody and especially Ong, Kelber demonstrates the ways in which prior models of the oral Jesus tradition had remained unwittingly trapped within the modern world of written, print-based texts and highly literate, post-Gutenberg assumptions. With this book Kelber provided an amazing service for Gospel scholarship, both by opening it up to the realm of interdisciplinary orality studies and by calling it to awareness of its own media bias.

However, Kelber's book naturally reflected some of the weaknesses of the then-current state of the discipline. For example, Kelber adopted a fairly stringent "Great Divide" approach that tended strongly to pit the "oral" against the "written." Following Ong, Kelber decisively identified the "oral" with freedom, reality, creative potential and, ultimately, "life" itself. Conversely, the "written" word was identified with absence, illusion, suppression and, inevitably, "death" (Kelber, 158, 185). Thus, in Kelber's view the written Gospels essentially represent the attempt to domesticate, control and suppress the creative fluidity of the oral Jesus tradition. Viewed in hindsight, this ideological construal of the "oral" versus "written" represents both an empirically false generalization and an unhelpful romanticizing of "orality" (Byrskog, 128-29; Floyd). Nonetheless, despite its shortcomings, Kelber's book began a long overdue conversation between Gospel scholarship and orality studies.

2. Two Current Debates.

Since Kelber's provocative invitation, a relatively small but growing number of Gospel scholars have entered into dialogue with orality studies. Several issues and debates have emerged as the conversation continues to unfold, two of which will be considered here.

2.1. The Nature and Extent of Ancient Literacy.

One point of discussion involves the nature and extent of literacy in and around first-century Palestine and thus within the early Jesus movement. One common assumption of classical form criticism is that there was virtually no writing in the early years of the Jesus movement. This assumption has been given support in recent years by several studies arguing for a relatively low literacy rate within the ancient Mediterranean world in general and/or Greco-Roman Palestine in particular (Harris; Hezser). Thus, for many contemporary scholars of the early oral Jesus tradition, it has become a virtual truism that there was little-to-no literacy and/or writing present within the first few decades of the Jesus movement (e.g., Horsley and Draper, 125-27; see also Keith). Others, however, have questioned this line of argument on methodological and/or evidential grounds (e.g., Macdonald; Millard; Riesner). Important considerations here include the complex spectrum of “literacies” at work in the ancient world, the impressive amount of writings found at Qumran, the influence of a “Great Divide” mentality on certain antiliteracy arguments, and the danger of allowing a priori, deductive arguments about literacy to override actual literary/epigraphic evidence from the ancient world. Regardless of the actual literacy levels, however, the oral/aural orientation both of books and reading in the ancient world (on which, see 3.1 below) granted broad access to written materials all along the literacy continuum.

2.2. The Debate on Historical Reliability. A perennial issue surrounding study of the early oral Jesus tradition centers on implications for the historical reliability of the Jesus tradition found in the Gospels. For Bultmann and his followers, the period of oral transmission is viewed as inherently unstable, so thoroughly steeped in the fabrication of legend and myth that it serves virtually as an impenetrable curtain that separates the Jesus of the Gospels from the Jesus of history. This truncated distortion of the dynamics of oral transmission is still unquestioningly maintained by many NT scholars, such that the dynamics at work within the early oral Jesus tradition have been compared to modern phenomena such as the “telephone game” or legends of UFOs at Roswell. On the other side of the spectrum, Gerhardsson’s model suggests a relatively stable picture of oral tradition and thus points toward a significant degree of historical continuity between Jesus and the Gospels. Yet it hangs predominantly on a single point of comparison—the rabbinic tradition—whose dynamics are known to us only through the medium of written texts from later times. Kelber’s model provides an important third alternative. However, while noting now and then the retentive abilities of oral transmission, for the most part Kelber (not unlike Bultmann) emphasizes the highly fluid, malleable nature of the oral Jesus tradition.

In the 1990s K. Bailey offered a different approach to things. Based on his experiences of oral transmission within contemporary Middle Eastern culture, Bailey proposes that between the extremes of Bultmann’s “informal uncontrolled” and Gerhardsson’s “formal controlled” models stands yet another model: “informal controlled” oral transmission. Here, a key to the informal control of oral tradition is the regular gathering of the community for the purpose of performing and preserving the shared tradition. Having regularly witnessed such gatherings himself, Bailey notes that the community itself functions as an informal custodian over the tradition by verbally correcting a speaker in the midst of performance whenever the shared communal norms of faithfulness to the tradition are violated. Bailey’s argument is that the balance of stability and flexibility found in the Synoptic Gospels reflects this same type of “informal controlled” model and thus provides evidence of significant historical continuity back to Jesus. Predictably, reactions to Bailey’s model have been mixed. Some scholars, such as J. D. G. Dunn and N. T. Wright, have, for the most part, embraced Bailey’s approach. Others, however, have raised critical questions about the model (e.g., Weeden).

More recently, R. Bauckham has proposed another model of the early oral Jesus tradition, one that suggests a significant degree of historical continuity between Jesus and the Gospels. Building on S. Byrskog’s prior work on eyewitness testimony (or “autopsy”) in the context of ancient oral history, Bauckham proposes that the Gospels are rooted in eyewitness testimony that was authoritatively preserved by those who had actually walked with Jesus. Similar to Gerhardsson, Bauckham’s proposal suggests a model of formal controlled oral tradition, and yet one that purports to allow for more flexibility. Bauckham’s model serves to highlight an important observation regarding the dynamics of oral tradition: one must consider not only the “formal-informal” and “controlled-uncontrolled” continuums, but also the “stability-flexibility” continuum, which is a third, independent variable (Bauckham, 257-60).

Gerhardsson, Bailey and Bauckham have each proposed a model of oral transmission of the Jesus tradition that challenges the historical skepticism reflected in large sectors of Gospel scholarship still laboring under the shadow of Bultmann. A number of other findings within contemporary orality studies can also serve as correctives in this regard (for a more detailed discussion of the following, see Eddy and Boyd, chaps. 6-7). Here we will consider four examples.

First, classical form criticism assumed that oral narratives were, by nature, relatively short, independent units of tradition. Thus, as the first to write a Gospel, Mark was also seen as the first to imagine and create a lengthy Gospel narrative framework.

Based on a wide range of fieldwork data, however, we now know that extended oral narratives, many of them much longer than our Gospels, are found in a variety of orally dominant cultures (see, e.g., Honko). There is good reason to suppose that Mark's lengthy narrative, and even the Q material (see Hultgren), are rooted in a prior narrative matrix of Jesus' life, which would have operated in accordance with commonly occurring dynamics of oral transmission (on which, see 3.1 below).

Second, recent breakthroughs in our understanding of the dynamics of oral transmission within orally dominant, communally oriented cultures point toward the likelihood of a generally stable early oral Jesus tradition. The phenomenon of "traditional referentiality" within orally dominant cultures is a case in point (Foley 1991, 6-13; cf. Foley 2002, 59-65, 130-33). Briefly, in orally dominant contexts instances of oral transmission/performance emerge from and, via a metonymically rich oral register honed for an economical use of language, constantly refer back to the wider, shared pool of tradition within which members of the community are always already steeped. Thus, the performance of communal shared oral traditions is not primarily about transmitting new information (except for the young and/or uninitiated); rather, it is about "activating"—that is, co-remembering and reexperiencing together through new, creative retellings—the already shared communal knowledge (Bakker; see also the concept of "mental text" in Honko, 92-99). As it turns out, elements of both Bailey's and Bauckham's models are commonly found across cultures. Bauckham's proposal that individual tradents are key to the preservation of communal tradition is reflected in the widespread recognition within orally dominant cultures of what J. Niles has termed "strong tradition bearers"—trusted individuals who are recognized as faithful retainers and transmitters of the community's tradition (Niles, 173-93). As Bailey proposes, and as a vast range of field studies has demonstrated, the communal audience itself regularly functions as a custodian of the tradition, actively participating in, as well as monitoring and correcting, any particular performance (Foley 2002, 83-84; Honko, 197; Sowayan, 111, 125). Within such a context, while some flexibility accompanies each new performance, the general stability of the tradition is maintained. The balance of stability and flexibility monitored by the community varies depending on genre, which leads to the next consideration.

Third, the historical skepticism toward the oral Jesus tradition fostered by Bultmann was largely based on models of oral transmission of folktales, including oral entertainment genres, applied to the Gospels. This is a classic case of the sort of genre insensitivity known to influence certain approaches to orality. An array of fieldwork studies has demonstrated that different genres in different cultures reflect different points along the stability-flexibility continuum. Sacred traditions containing identity-forming values and/or religious tradition are typically among the most carefully handled and monitored forms of transmission within an orally dominant community (e.g., Sowayan, 123-24). Narrative entertainment genres, on the other hand, tend to be more flexibly transmitted. This suggests that the early oral Jesus tradition would have been handled more carefully, and stably, than the Bultmannian form-critical model has imagined.

Fourth, most Gospel scholars skeptical of the historical value of the oral Jesus tradition have not taken seriously the relatively short time frame between Jesus and the writing of the Gospels. Numerous fieldwork studies have indicated that oral transmission of historical events over the period of a single generation or so are vastly more stable and thus more reliable than those transmitted over longer periods. In fact, technically speaking, the span of only several decades between Jesus and the Gospels renders the early oral Jesus tradition connecting them as a phenomenon of "oral history" rather than "oral tradition" (Vansina, 12-13).

3. Orality and the Gospels.

3.1. The Nature of Orally Oriented Written Texts. As a wide range of scholarship has shown, orally oriented written texts generally function in ways quite distinct from their highly literate, print-based counterparts. The pre-Gutenberg Mediterranean world was orally dominant in a way that the modern, print-literate person finds hard to imagine. Written texts and public inscriptions were present, but factors such as literacy rates, cost and availability of books, and the very practices of ancient reading and writing served to foster an oral-aural cultural orientation that profoundly shaped the nature of written texts. To begin, most books (whether actually penned by the author or a scribe) were composed through dictation; that is, they literally began their life as spoken word. In addition, the reading of books, whether individually or, more commonly, in a group setting, typically was done aloud, a phenomenon virtually necessitated by the fact that ancient texts were written in a scripta continua fashion (i.e., a flowing script—reminiscent of oral speech itself—lacking word breaks, punctuation and upper-lower case differentiation). In an orally dominant environment, typically the goal of reading was the imprinting of the content on the reader's mind for the purposes of internalization and versatile future recall independent of the written text itself (Carr, 177-81; Macdonald, 68-71). Thus, memorization of propositional, or illocutionary, gist, and not necessarily verbatim wording, was the common educational and/or performative goal of reading in the ancient world (Carr; Small). Public readings were common. Since a spontaneous vocalized reading of the scripta continua style would have been very difficult, ordinarily a literate reader would first commit the essence of the text to memory in preparation for the public performance (Carr, 4-5). The reader would then read/perform the written text to a gathering of people. In this way, all the people of a community, literate or not, could gain access to the contents of written texts. And so, both in composition and reception, ancient written texts were also both oral (spoken) and aural (heard) phenomena. It is not surprising, then, to find that ancient texts characteristically were composed in an oral register and thus shared a range of traits commonly associated with oral transmission (e.g., traditional referentiality, mnemonic and structuring devices, etc.). In essence, ancient orally oriented written texts served as inscribed references for future reoralizations of the tradition from which they emerged.

3.2. The "Oral-like" Nature of the Gospels. For years now, Gospel studies have been dominated by the mistaken assumption that since the Gospels are written texts, they generally function similarly to print-based texts in modern times. This has been the case both for the traditional historical-critical paradigm as well as the more postmodern, literary-critical approaches. With the rise of orality-sensitive Gospel studies, some (e.g., Kelber's early work) have overreacted to this assumption by adopting the opposite, but equally erroneous, "Great Divide" view, which says that since the Gospels are written texts, they stand in contrast to orality and thus to the oral Jesus tradition. But once we move beyond these extreme views, the way is open to understanding the Gospels as ancient, orally oriented written texts that both flow from and, by original design, return to a wider orally dominant context from which they derive their meaning (Eddy and Boyd, 350-60).

In terms of composition, the four Gospels each appear to fall somewhere along the continuum between a straightforward transcription of an actual oral performance, on the one hand, and a "literary" work with roots in the oral Jesus tradition, on the other. Where, precisely, each of them is to be located along this continuum is a matter of debate. Following the general pattern of ancient texts, it is quite likely the Gospels were composed through dictation. It is also evident that they were written to be heard. The NT itself affirms that both sacred texts and letters were regularly read aloud in congregational settings (e.g., Lk 4:16; Acts 13:27; 15:21, 30-31; 2 Cor 1:13; 3:14-15; Col 4:16; 1 Thess 5:27; 1 Tim 4:13; Rev 1:3), as do other early Christian writings (e.g., 2 Clem. 19:1; Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 67:3). In several NT texts (e.g., Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14; Rev 1:3) the public reader, or lector, is referred to (on which, see Shiell).

To date, most studies of the orally oriented nature of the Gospels have focused on Mark and the Q material (e.g., Wire; Horsely and Draper). With regard to Mark, the oral register/style reveals itself in a number of phenomena that would have served to assist the listening audience in grasping and retaining the essential content of what they were hearing. Such phenomena include relatively simple word choice, direct speech, frequent use of the connecting "and" (Gk. kai), parataxis, alliteration (e.g., Mk 14:38), idea/word repetition (e.g., Mk 13:12), topical clustering (e.g., parables in Mk 4:1-34; miracles in Mk 4:35-5:43) and "acoustic echo" techniques, both large-scale (e.g., concentric/chiastic patterns throughout Mark's Gospel) and smaller-scale, such as the famous "Markan sandwich" (e.g., Mk 3:20-35; 11:12-21; 14:1-11, 53-72).

3.3. Some Implications for Study of the Gospels. Insights from interdisciplinary orality studies have significant implications for several well-known methodological approaches to the Gospels, four of which will be considered here. First, orality-sensitive study of the Gospels has birthed a new method: performance criticism of the Gospels (Rhoads; Shiner). Drawing on a wide range of communication-oriented interdisciplinary methods (from narrative and rhetorical criticism to orality and theater studies), performance criticism strives to imaginatively investigate the orally oriented performance arena within which the Gospels would originally have been experienced, both through historical reconstruction and live experiences of oral performance of the Gospels as whole texts. Consideration is given to performance phenomena such as voice, emotion, memorization, subtext, narrative speed, gesture and movement, audience participation and response. Performance criticism aids in the exegetical task by asking new questions of proposed interpretations—for example: Could this biblical passage be orally read/performed in such a way that an ancient listening audience plausibly would take from the event the meaning alleged in this particular contemporary interpretation?

Second, orality studies have implications both for literary and redaction criticism of the Gospels. Some have pointed out that many of the guiding assumptions and practices of contemporary literary criticism are indebted to the modern, highly literate world of print-based texts (Amodio, 11; Byrskog, 265-66). In turn, these methods foster analysis of the Gospels apart from an awareness of things such as an oral poetics (e.g., traditional referentiality) or the inherent dynamics and constraints of texts composed in an oral register (most likely by dictation) and intended for aural reception. As a consequence, there is a tendency among contemporary scholars to "overread" the Gospels, supposedly finding within them complex polemics, aesthetics and novelty that simply do not reflect the natural dynamics of orally oriented texts (Eddy and Boyd, 400-406). What is needed instead is the development of a literary-critical approach guided by an oral/aural poetics, one that is sensitive both to the media dynamics and the inherent constraints of first-century compositional practices (see below) and reading-by-hearing. Apart from such considerations, NT scholarship will unwittingly find itself involved in what T. Boomer-shine has perceptively identified as "media eisegesis" (Boomer-shine, 65).

Third, orality studies pose new challenges and possibilities for source criticism, particularly the notorious Synoptic Problem. For many years now, the vast majority of Gospel scholars have assumed that the remarkable similarities among the Synoptic Gospels are to be explained by an appeal to direct literary relations, with the two-source theory being the dominant model. However, it should, at the very least, cause Gospel scholars some hesitation when experts in comparative oral traditions such as Lord and Foley conclude that the phenomena reflected in the Synoptic Gospels are sufficiently explained as largely independent written variants emerging from a shared pool of oral traditional material (Lord 1978, 90; Foley 2006). From this perspective, Q, if it ever existed, most likely was a "voiced text"—that is, an "orally-derived text meant for oral performance" (Foley 2006, 138). Following this trajectory of analysis, some Gospel scholars have turned to a predominantly oral solution to the Synoptic Problem (e.g., Baum). Others, while still holding to some form of the two-source theory, argue that our conception of Synoptic literary relations must be significantly complexified if we are to take seriously what is now known of ancient compositional practices, including the absence of desks, the physical constraints of cumbersome scrolls and thus the frequent use of memory to access and quote from written texts (Small; Derrenbacker; Boomer-shine, 61-62), as well as the transmission dynamics of traditional materials within orally dominant environments (e.g., Dunn, 210-54; Derrenbacker).

Finally, we consider some implications of orality studies for *textual criticism of the Gospels. In recent years, a number of text critics, including B. Ehrman, E. Epp and D. Parker, have highlighted in new ways the nature and number of "variants" and thus, especially for Ehrman, the scribal "corruptions" to be found within the Gospel manuscript tradition. An orality-sensitive approach to textual criticism of the Gospels would offer at least two responses. First, in broad agreement, such an approach would anticipate a significantly flexible dynamic at work within ancient manuscript culture. Especially prior to canonization, it would have been sufficient in most quarters of the orally dominant milieu of the early church that any particular written copy of a Gospel fell within the verbal parameters reflected in the countless orally performed, communally controlled variants of that Gospel—that is, within the verbal parameters of what was read aloud and heard of this Gospel on a regular basis. Within an orally oriented context that retains access to the oral tradition from which a written text emerged, it is more accurate to think of scribes as "performers" of that tradition (with the inherent flexibility that involves) rather than as merely rote "copyists" in the modern sense of the term (Doane; Person).

A second response to this recent trend in NT textual criticism provides a corrective. Although Ehrman, Epp and Parker have rightly taken seriously the variants within the manuscript tradition, they have, unfortunately, interpreted this data from the standpoint of a highly literate, print-oriented mentality and its associated precision standards (see Kirk, 229-34). In an ancient, orally dominant context, where faithfulness to the wider oral/aural performative tradition of a text commonly was the goal and where "copying" of a text could be done, in large part, from memory, textual variation-within-limits was an ever-present reality (Kirk; Person; Small). And yet, in such a media context most textual variations more likely would represent adaptations of the text (sometimes consciously, sometimes not) to remembrances of other performative possibilities already available within the wider traditional storehouse from which the text itself emerged rather than intentional, ideologically motivated departures from the exemplar text (Person; Eddy and Boyd, 384-89). To view these variants as instances of an individual author's ideologically motivated "corruption" of "the (singular) text" is to imagine ancient scribal practices through the categories and precision standards familiar to tradition-independent, post-Gutenberg, print-oriented scholarship. But such a context is quite removed from the orally oriented, tradition-generated/enabled/dependent world in which early Christian texts were scribally reproduced (Foley 2002, 91-92, 130-33).

See also CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY; FORM CRITICISM; GOSPEL: GENRE; HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY; REDACTION CRITICISM; SYNOPSIS PROBLEM; TEACHER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. C. Amodio, Writing the Oral Tradition: Oral Poetics and Literate Culture in Medieval England (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2004); K. E. Bailey, "Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Gospels," AJT 5 (1991) 34-54; E. J. Bakker, "Activation and Preservation: The Interdependence of Text and Performance in an Oral Tradition," Oral Tradition 8 (1993) 5-20; K. Barber, The Anthropology of Texts, Persons and Publics: Oral and Written Culture in Africa and Beyond (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007); R. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); A. D. Baum, Der mündliche Faktor und seine Bedeutung für die synoptische Frage: Analogien aus der antiken Literatur, der Experimentalpsychologie, der Oral Poetry-Forschung und dem rabbinischen Traditionswesen (TANZ 49; Tübingen: Francke, 2008); T. E. Boomershine, "Peter's Denial as Polemic or Confession: The Implications of Media Criticism for Biblical Hermeneutics," Semeia 39 (1987) 47-68; R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (New York: Harper, 1963 [1921]); S. Byrskog, Story as History—History as Story: The Gospel Tradition in the Context of Ancient Oral History (Boston: E. J. Brill, 2002); D. M. Carr, Writing on the Tablets of the Heart: Origins of Scripture and Literature (New York: Oxford University Press, 2005); R. A. Derrenbacker Jr., Ancient Compositional Practices and the Synoptic Problem (BETL 186; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2005); A. N. Doane, "The Ethnography of Scribal Writing and Anglo-Saxon Poetry: Scribe as Performer," Oral Tradition 9 (1994) 420-39; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); P. R. Eddy and G. A. Boyd, The Jesus

Legend: A Case for the Historical Reliability of the Synoptic Jesus Tradition (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); R. Finnegan, The Oral and Beyond: Doing Things with Words in Africa (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2007); M. H. Floyd, "'Write the Revelation!' (Hab 2:2): Re-imagining the Cultural History of Prophecy," in Writings and Speech in Israelite and Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy, ed. E. Ben Zvi and M. H. Floyd (SBLSymS 10; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 2000) 103-43; J. M. Foley, Immanent Art: From Structure to Meaning in Traditional Oral Epic (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991); idem, How to Read an Oral Poem (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002); idem, "The Riddle of Q: Oral Ancestor, Textual Precedent, or Ideological Creation?" in Oral Performance, Popular Tradition, and Hidden Transcript in Q, ed. R. A. Horsley (SemSt 60; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2006) 123-40; B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, trans. E. J. Sharpe (ASNU 22; Uppsala: Gleerup, 1961); W. V. Harris, Ancient Literacy (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989); C. Hezser, Jewish Literacy in Roman Palestine (TSAJ 81; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001); L. Honko, Textualizing the Siri Epic (Helsinki: Academia Scientiarum Fennica, 1998); R. A. Horsley and J. A. Draper, Whoever Hears You Hears Me: Prophets, Performance and Tradition in Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); S. Hultgren, Narrative Elements in the Double Tradition: A Study of Their Place within the Framework of the Gospel Narrative (BZNW 113; New York: de Gruyter, 2002); C. Keith, Jesus' Literacy: Scribal Culture and the Teacher from Galilee (New York: T & T Clark, 2011); W. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); A. Kirk, "Manuscript Tradition as a Tertium Quid: Orality and Memory in Scribal Practices," in Jesus, the Voice, and the Text: Beyond the Oral and the Written Gospel, ed. T. Thatcher (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2008) 215-34; A. B. Lord, "The Gospels as Oral Traditional Literature," in The Relationships Among the Gospels: An Inter-disciplinary Dialogue, ed. W. O. Walker (San Antonio: Trinity University Press, 1978) 33-91; idem, The Singer of Tales (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1960); M. C. A. Macdonald, "Literacy in an Oral Environment," in Writing and Ancient Near Eastern Society: Papers in Honour of Alan R. Millard, ed. P. Bienkowski, C. Mee and E. Slater (LHBOTS 426; New York: T & T Clark, 2005) 49-118; A. Millard, Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus (BibSem 69; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); J. D. Niles, Homo Narrans: The Poetics and Anthropology of Oral Literature (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999); R. F. Person, "The Ancient Israelite Scribe as Performer," JBL 117 (1998) 601-9; D. Rhoads, "Performance Criticism: An Emerging Methodology in Second Testament Studies," BTB 36 (2006) 118-33, 164-84; R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung (WUNT 2/7; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1981); R. Rodriguez, "Reading and Hearing in Ancient Contexts," JSNT 32 (2009) 151-78; D. C. Rubin, Memory in Oral Tradition: The Cognitive Psychology of Epic, Ballads, and Counting-out Rhymes (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995); W. D. Shiell, Reading Acts: The Lector and the Early Christian Audience (BIS 70; Boston: E. J. Brill, 2004); W. Shiner, Proclaiming the Gospel: First-Century Performance of Mark (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2003); J. P. Small, Wax Tablets of the Mind: Cognitive Studies of Memory and Literacy in Classical Antiquity (New York: Routledge, 1997); S. A. Sowayan, Nabati Poetry: The Oral Poetry of Arabia (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985); D. Tannen, "Relative Focus on Involvement in Oral and Written Discourse," in Literacy, Language, and Learning: The Nature and Consequences of Reading and Writing, ed. D. R. Olson, N. Torrance and A. Hildyard (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985) 124-47; J. Vansina, Oral Tradition as History (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985); T. J. Weeden, "Kenneth Bailey's Theory of Oral Tradition: A Theory Contested by Its Evidence," JSHJ 7 (2009) 3-43; A. C. Wire, The Case for Mark Composed in Performance (Eugene, OR: Cascade, 2011).

P. R. Eddy

OSSUARIES. See BURIAL OF JESUS.

P

PARABLES

There is perhaps no more characteristic feature of the proclamation attributed to Jesus than that he spoke in parables, and no aspect of his teaching is more memorable and influential than these unassuming similes and vivid stories. Not surprisingly, the parables of Jesus have been the subject of much rigorous analysis, hermeneutical experimentation and not a little controversy. At the same time, the parables are regarded by most scholars of the critical era as that strand of tradition which perhaps more than any other sheds light on the Jesus of history, his aims, his *ethic and even his self-understanding.

1. The Parable Genre
2. Parables Attributed to Jesus and Their Placement and Use in the Gospels
3. Parables, Authenticity and the Historical Jesus
4. The History of Parable Interpretation
5. Interpreting the Parables

1. The Parable Genre.

It may be no exaggeration to say that the history of parable interpretation, for all its twists and turns, has been essentially a dispute over the genre. The contention attaches to the natural, if unfortunate, insistence that the parables of Jesus should be regarded in toto as one kind of speech, that what applies to one parable should apply with minimal variation to all others. But the diversity of parabolic speech forms resists an all-encompassing definition; it is not even obvious what teachings and sayings are to be included in the set. An inductive approach is to be preferred, noting the diversity of form and features within the broad corpus of Jesus' parables.

1.1. Terminology. While the Greek etymology of "parable," parabolē, is initially illustrative, the term itself is applied rather broadly. From para ("beside") and bolē (from ballō, "to cast"), the etymological image is of something cast beside something else, thus a juxtaposition functioning as an illustrative comparison. This is the sense that the term bears already in its Attic usage in Plato and Aristotle (e.g., Aristotle, Pol. 1254b; Rhet. 2:20, where parabolē is classed with but distinguished from "fable"). In LXX usage, however, the specificity of the original image is largely obscured as the term comes into broader application. Especially significant is its use in the LXX to translate the Hebrew māšāl, accounting for thirty of its thirty-four occurrences. As such, the term encompasses a broad range of reference, describing a variety of aphoristic utterances: oracles (Num 23:7, 18; 24:3), sayings (1 Sam 10:12), proverbs (1 Sam 24:14; Prov 1:6; Eccl 12:9; Ezek 17:2; Sir 20:20) and taunts or derisive bywords (Deut 28:37; Jer 24:9; Ezek 16:44; Joel 2:17; Mic 2:4; Hab 2:6; Wis 5:4). Although in certain contexts parabolē refers to obscure or mysterious speech (Dan 12:8; Sir 39:2-3; 47:17), never is either māšāl or parabolē used of illustrative narratives of the sort that we have come to think of as parables. Even in the NT, the range of application is broad, including not only narrative parables (e.g., Mt 13:18; 21:33; Mk 4:2; 12:1; Lk 15:3; 19:11), but also a variety of sayings (e.g., Mt 24:32; Lk 4:23) or similes (e.g., Mt 13:31, 33).

1.2. Classifications. An interest arising especially from form-critical analyses of the parables is their categorization into types or forms. Classifications of the parables have employed a variety of criteria, from formal features, to subject matter, to narrative structural patterns, to supposed authenticity. In some respects, the parables themselves prove uncooperative for a neat categorization, as some of them straddle subgenres, but most interpreters find a taxonomy of three, or perhaps four, formal categories more or less adequate, ranging from the briefest sayings to the most extended narratives.

1.2.1. Aphorisms. The simplest utterances of Jesus termed "parables" are mere aphorisms (Mt 24:32 // Mk 13:28; Mk 7:15-17; Lk 4:23; 6:39; 21:29-30). Such instances are continuous with the OT use of the term as a translation of māšāl.

1.2.2. Similes. Distinct from these few aphorisms are the more numerous similes (or similitudes), in which Jesus typically makes use of a concrete figure to illustrate a more abstract notion. A feature of Matthew's Gospel especially is the description of the kingdom as likened to figures and scenarios: "The kingdom of heaven is like [or, 'may be compared to'] . . ." (Mt 13:24, 31, 33, 44, 45, 47, 52; 18:23; 20:1; 22:2; 25:1; cf. Mk 4:26, 30; 13:34; Lk 6:48; 13:18, 20). Not all similitudes are introduced in the form of simile; in certain instances a comparative scenario is implicitly understood to be illustrative in function (e.g., Mk 2:19–20, 21–22). It should also be noted that to the extent that these extended similes offer a narration of action, however simple, with characters and outcomes, a sharp distinction from the narrative parables becomes less obvious.

1.2.3. Narrative Parables. Finally, there are narrative parables, stories of varying length and complexity that are most readily identified with the genre. It is here, however, that a second element frequently comes into play: the degree to which the story intends a signification outside of itself by means of characters and figures within the story. Among the narrative parables there are those that are thought to imply a rather high degree of external correspondence and those that are resistant altogether to that sort of interpretation. The former sometimes have been categorized imprecisely as "allegories," while the latter, all of them peculiar to Luke's Gospel, have, since A. Jülicher, been termed "example stories" (Beispielergählungen) (Lk 10:25–37; 12:13–21 [16:1–8]; 16:19–31; 18:9–14 [on which, see Tucker]). Furthermore, it has been customary to label the stories between these poles as "parables" proper. But the actual phenomena of the parables frustrate this neat taxonomy, for the narrative parables represent something more of a fluid continuum rather than categories per se. Moreover, the so-called example stories do not so much offer models of behavior, negatively or positively, as represent startling or quixotic scenarios for sake of provocation, a feature shared with parables that imply a more patent metaphorical level. By the same token, an absolute distinction between parables proper and allegories is untenable. The difference is of degree rather than of kind. As presented in the Gospels, leaving aside the question of authenticity, the parable of the sower (Mt 13:3–9 // Mk 4:3–10 // Lk 8:5–8) and of the wheat and the weeds (Mt 13:24–30)—the only two parables in the Gospels for which an explicit interpretation is offered (Mk 4:13– 20 par.; Mt 13:36–43)—clearly are treated as stories with networks of metaphorical correspondences. Yet, even these are not necessarily thoroughgoing allegories, as numerous elements of the stories are left uninterpreted. Meanwhile, with perhaps the exception of the example stories, the remaining narrative parables at least allow, if not even invite, certain metaphorical associations, especially when read in their narrative and intertextual contexts. Arguably, for example, parables such as the wicked tenants (Mt 21:33–46 // Mk 12:1–12 // Lk 20:9–19; cf. Is 5:1–7), the vineyard workers (Mt 20:1–16) and the lost son (Lk 15:11–32) are stories that resist relationship to the larger story of the Gospel or even of the Bible only by means of disregard for the storytelling milieu.

1.3. Definition. Only in light of this wide range of sayings, similes and diverse stories can a definition of parable be forged. Useful for its simplicity and general applicability is D. Stern's formulation "an allusive narrative which is told for an ulterior purpose" (Stern, 42). Rightly, this definition understands the referential character of parable without foreclosing unnecessarily on the nature of the allusion, and that parables are told for "ulterior purpose" nicely captures their rhetorical and performative character. Of course, however, not all of the parables of Jesus are narratives.

One can scarcely improve on the classic description by C. H. Dodd, which has served several generations of interpreters well despite their wide array of competing interpretive interests: "At its simplest a parable is a metaphor or simile drawn from nature or common life, arresting the hearer by its vividness or strangeness, and leaving the mind in sufficient doubt about its precise application to tease it into active thought" (Dodd, 5). Several features of this definition are worthy of notice, and in fact one notes in this 1936 description an almost prescient anticipation of future avenues of research. Formally, Dodd leaves open the possibility that both simile and metaphor might count as the raw material of the parable genre. Whereas Jülicher had rejected "metaphor" as an appropriate descriptive category for the parables of Jesus, Dodd's more expansive definition has proved felicitous, as numerous late-twentieth-century interpreters of the parables have explored the metaphorical character of the parables, albeit with a broader, more dynamic and literary definition. Likewise, Dodd captures well a characteristic feature of many parables: they are at once located in the familiar ("drawn from nature or common life") while also having a feature or features which strike the hearer-reader as atypical, unlikely or even absurd ("arresting the hearer by its vividness or strangeness"). Finally, the capacity of the parable by means of its “strangeness” and ambiguity to “tease” and provoke its audience existentially has been the particular feature of parables that has fueled parable scholarship of the second half of the twentieth century.

1.4. Precedents and Analogues. Though the parable form is a feature characteristic of the proclamation of Jesus, the genre is not unique to him. Indeed, one of the repeated missteps of parable scholarship has been too quickly to attribute novelty or uniqueness to Jesus, leaving aside relevant collections of materials that might make more transparent both the traditions that informed Jesus and those features of his parabolic teaching that are peculiar to him. Even if one wishes to regard Jesus as the master of the craft, it does not follow that parable telling is unique to him.

Already in the OT we find examples of “parable,” both narrative parables (Judg 9:7-15; 2 Sam 14:1-20; 2 Kings 14:9-10; Is 5:1-7) and the varieties of měšālīm noted above. The most famous and most analogous to the story parables of Jesus is the story of the ewe lamb. Through this parable the intrepid prophet Nathan confronts a guilty King David (2 Sam 12:1-4), an instructive example, evincing features that would also be characteristic of the parables of Jesus. In the first place, the story accomplishes its work by cloaking its ultimate referents in the figures of a rich man, a poor man and a ewe lamb. The story functions to draw David into an empathic identification by which he commits himself to a judgment—as it turns out, a harsh judgment against himself, the story’s “rich man.” This demonstrates a second feature: the story requires its hearer-readers to make certain simple identifications of figures internal to the story with persons outside, identifications on which the story depends for its effect. At the same time, to call the story an “allegory” would be to overstate the degree of figurative correspondence. There is, for example, nothing in David’s tryst with Bathsheba that corresponds to a traveler in need of hospitality (2 Sam 12:4). By the same token, the tender treatment of the ewe lamb in 2 Samuel 12:3 presumably intends no direct correspondence to Uriah’s relationship to Bathsheba other than to evoke a picture of deep affection. Beyond this, the preparation of the ewe lamb as food is markedly a mischaracterization of David’s treatment of Bathsheba, but is a metaphor revealing David’s sin in lurid terms. In short, the story functions to invite the hearer’s commitments by means of a figural narrative that has correspondences, but only in broad terms, with events external to the story. All of these features repeat themselves in many of Jesus’ narrative parables, and the recognition of these same features might save interpreters from preemptive definitions insufficiently flexible to account for the actual phenomena of the parables.

Parables or parable-like stories are not unattested in the noncanonical or deuterocanonical literature of the Second Temple era. Few, if any, however, provide close analogies for the parables of Jesus. For example, the Similitudes of 1 Enoch (1 En. 37–71, sometimes called the “Book of Parables”) are stories that are apocalyptic in form and eschatological in substance, and that are both much longer and more elaborate than any parables of Jesus. Likewise, the Greco-Roman corpus is full of figurative tales and parabolic sayings that could be said to form a general background to Jesus’ parable; however, one finds here little that counts as a strong genre analogy to the parables of Jesus (Snodgrass).

The situation is different in the rabbinic corpus. While it would be too much to say that the rabbinic parables form the only or an exact genre analogy with the parables of Jesus, clearly they are the closest both in time and in form (Fiebig; McArthur and Johnston; Flusser; Stern). But, as is the case more generally, the rabbinic materials prove exceedingly hard to date with certainty, and thus their influence on the parables of Jesus is hard to demonstrate. Yet the following modest conclusions can be asserted with reasonable certainty. (1) Although most rabbinic parables post-date the parables of Jesus, at least some are likely to have preceded. (2) Although there are no clear lines of dependence, the rabbinic materials do suggest a milieu of figural and illustrative storytelling in which Jesus’ parables are properly located. (3) This being so, certain well-worn modern theses are shown to be dubious, especially that (a) any trace of allegory is owed to the early church rather than to Jesus, and (b) any concluding, postnarrative application (nimšal) of a parable is always secondary to the original parable. (4) Nonetheless, the parables of Jesus demonstrate unique features, being generally less adjudicatory and more provocative, more self-referential, and more eschatological than the rabbinic counterparts.

2. Parables Attributed to Jesus and Their Placement and Use in the Gospels.

2.1. An Inventory of Jesus’ Parables. A full accounting of the extant parables of Jesus depends somewhat on definition—that is, to what extent one counts a variety of figurative sayings or tropes as parables. In Table 1 a rather maximal definition is employed for sake of inclusion, acknowledging that the borders of the genre are disputed.

Table 1. Inventory of Parables in Synoptic and Noncanonical Gospels

	Matthew	Mark	Luke	Extracanonical
Parables in Mark and/or of the Triple Tradition
Bridegroom's Guests	9:15	2:19-20	5:33-39
Unshrunk Cloth	9:16	2:21	5:36
New Wine	9:17	2:22	5:37-39
Strong Man Bound	12:29-30	3:22-27	11:21-23
Sower	13:1-9, 18-23	4:1-9, 13-20	8:4-8, 11-15	Gos. Thom. 9
Lamp and Measure		4:21-25	8:16-18
Seed Growing Secretly		4:26-29		Gos. Thom. 21:4
Mustard Seed	13:31-32	4:30-32	13:18-19	Gos. Thom. 20:2
Wicked Tenants	21:33-46	12:1-12	20:9-19	Gos. Thom. 65-66
Budding Fig Tree	24:32-36	13:28-32	21:29-33
Watchman		13:34-36	12:35-38
Parables Common to Matthew and Luke (Q?)
Wise and Foolish Builders	7:24-27		6:47-49
Father and Children's Requests	7:9-11		11:11-13
Two Ways/Doors	7:13-14		13:23-27
Leaven	13:31-32		13:20-21	Gos. Thom. 96:1
Lost Sheep	18:12-14		15:1-7	Gos. Thom. 107
Feast	22:1-14		14:15-24	Gos. Thom. 64:1-2
Thief in the Night	24:42-44		12:39-40
Stewards	24:45-51		12:42-46
Talents and Pounds	25:14-30		19:11-27
Parables Unique to Matthew
Good and Bad Trees	7:16-20
Dragnet	13:47-50			Gos. Thom. 8:1
Wheat and Weeds	13:24-30, 36-43			Gos. Thom. 57
Treasure	13:44			Gos. Thom. 109
Pearl	13:45-46			Gos. Thom. 76:1
Unmerciful Servant	18:23-35

	Matthew	Mark	Luke	Extracanonial
Laborers in the Vineyard	20:1-16
Two Sons	21:28-32
Wise and Foolish Maidens	25:1-13
Sheep and Goats	25:31-46
Parables Unique to Luke
Two Debtors			7:41-50
Good Samaritan			10:25-37
Friend at Midnight			11:5-8
Entreating the Father			11:9-13
Rich Fool			12:13-21	Gos. Thom. 63:1
Barren Fig Tree			13:6-9
Tower Builder			14:28-30
Warring King			14:31-33
Lost Sheep			15:1-7
Lost Coin			15:8-10
Lost Son			15:11-32
Dishonest Steward			16:1-8
Rich Man and Lazarus			16:19-31
Humble Servant			17:7-10
Unjust Judge			18:1-8
Pharisee and Tax Collector			18:9-14
Parables Attested Only Outside the Canonical Gospels
Children in the Field				Gos. Thom. 21:1-2
Empty Jar				Gos. Thom. 97
Assassin				Gos. Thom. 98
Palm Shoot				Ap. Jas. 6:8
Grain of Wheat				Ap. Jas. 6:11
Ear of Grain				Ap. Jas. 8:2

2.2. The Placement and Use of Parables in the Gospels. The inventory yields four observations.

First, parables are a phenomenon especially of the Synoptic tradition. John's Gospel is excluded from the inventory, not because it lacks extended metaphors altogether (e.g., Jn 10:1-18; 15:1-8), but because these are arguably of a different type than the parables of the Synoptic Gospels. For the Synoptic Gospels have both brief similes and extended narratives but not extended, nonnarrative similes of the sort found in John. Notably, the term parabolē is not found in John's Gospel (although cf. paroimia in Jn 10:6; 16:25, 29).

Second, among the Synoptic Gospels, Mark has the fewest parables, not surprisingly, given its briefer compass, of which only two are full-scale narrative parables: the parables of the sower and of the wicked tenants. Almost all of Mark's parables are paralleled in either Matthew or Luke, and most of them in both (parables of the so-called triple tradition), a datum consistent with the theory of Markan priority.

Third, the situation is quite different in Matthew and Luke, where parables abound, especially in Luke. On the assumption of Markan priority, both have retained almost all of the parabolic material in Mark and added to it significantly. Nine parables are paralleled in Matthew and Luke, exclusive of Mark, and for that reason are typically attributed to the Q source.

Fourth, both Matthew and Luke have a number of parables unique to each, Luke even more than Matthew. In Matthew one notes especially the drawing together of six additional parables of the kingdom in Matthew 13 around the parable of the sower: wheat and weeds; mustard seed; leaven; treasure in a field; valuable pearl; net. In Luke one notes a collection of at least fifteen unique parables, especially concentrated in the so-called travel narrative (Lk 9:51–19:44).

3. Parables, Authenticity and the Historical Jesus.

Within the precincts of modern biblical criticism, the parables represent a corpus of special interest, particularly to the extent that they serve as windows into the question of the historical Jesus (see Quest of the Historical Jesus). For a variety of reasons, the parables of Jesus are seen to constitute a historically plausible core to the Jesus tradition. The skeptical and controversial Jesus Seminar determined that five parables were beyond serious doubt as to authenticity and placed another sixteen parables in the category of "Jesus probably said something like this."

Thus, working with methods and assumptions notorious for yielding minimalist results, the Jesus Seminar found twenty-one of thirty-three parables attested in canonical and noncanonical sources to be undoubtedly authentic or most probably so, and twenty-one of twenty-seven of the canonically attested parables to be so, though not always the canonical form (Funk et al.). When it is remembered that only eighteen percent of the teaching material attributed to Jesus in the canonical Gospels was deemed by the Jesus Seminar as belonging to one of these two categories, the disparity with regard to the parables is notable. Meanwhile, mainstream NT scholarship as a whole is even less skeptical, while allowing for considerable reshaping of the material in the tradition process.

The reasons for the favorable evaluation of the parables' authenticity are several. (1) That parables are ubiquitous in the Synoptic tradition while comparatively uncharacteristic in the Second Temple literature and especially in early Christian sources satisfies the criterion of discontinuity (or dissimilarity). (2) The parable tradition also frequently satisfies the criterion of embarrassment. One notes the implacable difficulty of certain of the parables, with their apparent tolerance of injustices (Mt 13:44; 20:1-15; Lk 16:1-8), peevish protagonists (Lk 11:5-8; 18:2-5; 19:11-27), implausible scenarios (Mt 18:23-35; Lk 15:2-32) and figures unlikely for the kingdom of God (Mt 13; Mk 4; Lk 8). It is thus highly improbable that such parables are actually owed to the inventiveness of the early church. (3) With the parables' repeated witness to the *kingdom of God, sometimes by means of curious figures connoting an inaugurated *eschatology, the parable tradition satisfies the criteria both of coherence, by marking a characteristic theme in Jesus' ministry, and of discontinuity, by describing the reign of God in innovative terms. But the criterion of coherence is satisfied on grounds beyond the eschatologically themed message, including attestation to customs of Palestinian life, to opposition from the religious establishment, and to Jesus' embrace of the outcast. (4) More controversially, with the discovery of the Coptic Gospel of Thomas among the Nag Hammadi documents, certain parables previously attested only within the Synoptic tradition now enjoy a second attestation apart from the Synoptic Gospels (see 2.1 above), thus satisfying the criterion of multiple attestation. While it is true that the independence of the Gospel of Thomas from the Synoptic tradition is doubted by many, a number of scholars have maintained that the Gospel of Thomas witnesses to arguably earlier (i.e., less allegorical) forms of the parables, forming an independent witness. Indeed, the discovery of the Gospel of Thomas further substantiates the authenticity of the parable tradition, which most had regarded as essentially secure in any case.

In short, the authenticity of the corpus of Jesus' parables is scarcely to be doubted. Even if it is conceded that the parables have undergone substantial reworking in their transmission from the preaching of Jesus to their later forms in the Gospels—and some scholars demur on this point (e.g., Blomberg)—the authenticity of the core of those traditions enjoys widespread assent. Not surprisingly, then, the analysis of parables has featured prominently in certain celebrated accounts of the historical Jesus. So intertwined, in fact, is the historical Jesus question with the exegesis of the parables that it might not be unfair to characterize much critical parable scholarship as tributary to the historical Jesus project.

4. The History of Parable Interpretation.

4.1. Precritical Interpretation. Although it is common, and in some degree justifiable, to describe the whole of premodern parable interpretation as “allegorical,” the label lacks sufficient specificity to be of much descriptive utility. If, as most now assume, exegesis consists in representing the intentions of Jesus or of the evangelists, it is self-evident that the allegorizing methods fail. If, however, exegesis concerns the creative exposition of Christian truth by means of biblical vehicles that have the capacity to bear more than their literal sense, then it is not hard to see the appeal of allegorical interpretation, even if its working presuppositions are now largely foreign to us. It was, after all, only to be expected that early and medieval interpreters, already accustomed to allegorical modes of interpretation of Scripture more generally, should do the same with the parables, which arguably by their form invite the exploration of a secondary level of meaning. The precedent in this case is the NT itself (Mt 13:24–30, 36–43; Mk 4:1–9, 13–20 par.). Moreover, the parable of the sower and its interpretation are presented as a sort of hermeneutical key to the interpretation of all parables, a clue that would lead many to assume that parables are coded and esoteric speech. That this is a dubious reading of Mark 4:10–12 (// Mt 13:10–17; Lk 8:9–10) does not change the fact that it is a plausible and influential reading that sets in motion a trajectory of parable interpretation only overturned at the end of the nineteenth century.

Yet the continuity between the relatively modest allegorical interpretations of the NT parables and the sort of theological allegorization of later Christian interpreters should not be overestimated (contra Hedrick; Crossan 2012). The textbook example of allegorization in full flower is Augustine's at once notorious and ingenious interpretation of the good Samaritan (Quaest. ev. 2.19). Here, seemingly every detail of the parable finds an anachronistic theological or ecclesial corollary. The journeying man is Adam; Jerusalem is the heavenly city of peace; Jericho (meaning “moon” that is born, waxes, wanes and dies) signifies human mortality. The thieves are the devil and his angels, “stripping” man of immortality and in “beating him” persuading him to sin. The priest and Levite are the priesthood and ministration of the old covenant, impotent for salvation. The Samaritan (which means “guardian”) is the Lord himself. The binding of wounds is the restraint of sin, oil the comfort of good hope, and wine the exhortation to work with a fervent spirit. The beast is flesh, and being “set upon it” is belief in the incarnation. The inn of convalescence is the church; the “morrow” is the time beyond the resurrection; the innkeeper is the apostle Paul. The two pence paid are either the two love commands or the promise of this life and of life eternal. Finally, the “supererogatory” payment “whatever more you spend” represents Paul's counsel of celibacy or his voluntary working with his own hands though he was entitled to compensation for his ministry.

While this example is often rehearsed and implicitly ridiculed, rarely noticed (although see Crossan 2012) is that elsewhere Augustine appeals to the literal sense of the same parable, applying it straightforwardly to the Christian moral obligation to love of neighbor (Doctr. chr. 1.31, 33). These contrasting interpretations confirm that, contrary to modern practice, Augustine's aim in biblical interpretation was not first historical and reproductive, but rather fully occasional and rhetorical, and that the literal sense, if basic, did not exhaust the text's potential to speak. Moreover, as S. Wailes has ably demonstrated, the allegorizations of the medieval era were not all of one sort, however much different in kind they would be from the interpretations of the critical era. In any case, even the more literally minded Reformers would only restrain, not escape, the allegorizing impulse (Kissinger).

4.2. Interpretation in the Critical Era.

4.2.1. The Jülicher Revolution and Response. Although his approach to the parables was anticipated by other interpreters, no NT scholar had approached the parables of Jesus with the critical rigor of A. Jülicher, whose massive two-volume contribution is universally recognized as marking a transition into the critical era of parable interpretation. The center of Jülicher's claim was that the parables of Jesus had been obscured and mistaken for allegories, when in fact they are no such thing. The seminal error is to mistake parables for metaphor or complex extended metaphors. But, in Jülicher's view, this was to cast Jesus as a clever sophist, speaking in puzzles and opaque figures, when, quite the opposite, he was a rather simpler teacher, speaking straightforwardly and without pretense. Thus, Jülicher rejected not only the church's subsequent allegorizing interpretation of the parables but also, as inauthentic, the allegorical impulses evident in Gospel forms of the parables. To the contrary, a parable should be thought to make but one simple point by means of a tertium comparationis (i.e., a point of similarity), usually yielding for Jülicher a moralistic maxim. Complex correspondences between the parable and the world external to it are not the intent of Jesus, but rather are the legacy of the evangelists carried forward with unbridled zeal by generations of Christian parable interpreters. On this foundation—the rejection of allegory and the one-point premise—nearly a century of critical parable interpretation would be built, sometimes with a surprisingly facile acquiescence to Jülicher's conclusions.

To be sure, however, Jülicher's thesis did not go unchallenged (Kissinger; Blomberg). Most prominently, P. Fiebig explored a surprising lacuna in Jülicher's research: the parables of the rabbinic literature—first the mēšālīm of the Mekilta (1904) and then of the Talmud (1912) (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). While Fiebig notes the qualitative distinctions between the parables originating in the Tannaim and those of Jesus, he maintains that it is impossible to understand the parables of Jesus without giving an account of those of his near contemporaries. Jülicher's analysis is vulnerable on other fronts as well, not least for a wooden understanding of metaphor and for the implausibility of a singular point of comparison when applied rigidly to actual parables. But perhaps the chief failure is the lack of distinction between interpretations that allegorize and the form of the parable itself, sometimes bearing modest allegorical features. It is not an overstatement to say that little of Jülicher's program has withstood close scrutiny, save for the repudiation of Christian allegorical exegesis. Nonetheless, the notion that parables make but one point and the view that the intent of the historical Jesus is the proper object of interpretation remain axiomatic even among interpreters whose critical sensibilities are at variance from Jülicher's.

4.2.2. The Eschatological Turn. Jülicher's dismantling of the allegorical approach to the parables was not only thoroughgoing but also influential. For better or worse, it secured a hermeneutical commitment to read parables as reconstructed utterances of the historical Jesus. The authenticity of the parables being generally granted, the parables would provide a privileged window into the proclamation of the Jesus of history. But it is here that Jülicher's conclusions, over against his methods, were found least satisfying, with parables yielding bland maxims of application notorious for their historical nonparticularity. Rightly, then, the history of parable interpretation in the critical era focuses its attention on two giants who, though heirs of the Jülicher tradition, sought a more robust theological harvest: C. H. Dodd and J. Jeremias.

Notably, Dodd found in the parables a stark alternative to the thoroughgoing eschatology of A. Schweitzer. Building explicitly on Jülicher's principles, Dodd argued that in their originating contexts—those being distinct from their reapplications in the canonical Gospels—the parables bear witness to the inaugurated presence of the kingdom in the mission and ministry of Jesus, that is, to Jesus' so-called realized eschatology. Dodd sought to demonstrate that the kingdom of God stands at the center of Jesus' proclamation, and that the kingdom there revealed is not Schweitzer's notion of a mistakenly imminent and strictly apocalyptic kingdom but rather a mysteriously present reign in which God summons humankind within the context of history.

With a similar theological result, but more methodological rigor, Jeremias accounted for the parables as depicting "an eschatology in the process of realization" (Jeremias, 230). As with Dodd, the question of eschatology saturated Jeremias's account of the parables, sometimes intrusively. But in certain respects, his more enduring contribution was a tradition-critical paradigm for the transmission of the parables, a paradigm that would achieve a nearly canonical status in parable study of the second half of the twentieth century. Jeremias argued that ten "principles of transformation" were observable in the transmission of the parables from their original setting in the life of Jesus to their recording in the Synoptic Gospels decades later: (1) the translation of parables from Aramaic to Greek; (2) representational changes that accord with the new Hellenistic environment; (3) embellishments of scale and detail; (4) the influence of OT and folk story on the shaping of material; (5) changes of audience, especially from opponents of Jesus to the church; (6) the church's application of originally eschatologically themed parables to hortatory uses; (7) the influence of the church's later exigencies of mission and the delay of parousia; (8) allegorization toward hortatory use; (9) the influence of collections of parables, including the fusion of some parables with each other; (10) new settings for parables including the attaching of generalizing conclusions and universal meanings.

Worked out in detail with numerous examples and, in later editions, with the aid of the newly discovered Coptic Gospel of Thomas as comparative material, Jeremias's position won a substantial consensus within critical scholarship. His study proved to be a classic. In ten German editions and three in English translation, popularized in an abridged version, it arguably became the most influential work on the parables of the twentieth century. But several of Jeremias's confident assertions did not endure further examination without challenge or qualification. His strict opposition of Palestinian Judaism to Hellenism did not stand the test of time. His insistence that virtually every parable is originally eschatological in character often looks like an imposition. And numerous later scholars came to see that the wholesale rejection of allegorical features in the parables was unsustainable in the face of the evidence. Nonetheless, though flawed in certain important respects, Jeremias's study remains indispensable for the serious study of the parables.

4.2.3. The Hermeneutical and Linguistic Turn. The middle of the twentieth century marks a transition in the study of parables. If, in broad terms, the first half of the century witnessed the rigorous historical interests pioneered by Jülicher and epitomized in Jeremias's landmark contribution, the second half turned to interests more overtly hermeneutical, aesthetic and literary in character (on which, see Perrin; Blomberg; Gowler; Wright). In truth, historical-critical methods continue apace and in certain regards even fund more aesthetic interests. Nonetheless, beginning especially in the 1960s, the parables became a natural site for various hermeneutical experimentations. Characteristic and pioneering are the treatment of the parables in the context of the "new hermeneutic" by scholars such as E. Jüngel, E. Fuchs and R. Funk. Stressing the dynamic event character of the speech in general, the new hermeneutic found in the "language event" of the parable a performative speech event that is irreducible to a propositional re-presentation. Thus, in some sense equally mistaken are both the older allegorizing approaches and the more recent critical habit of reducing the parables to illustrations of a single point. The parables are not illustrations, as if their existential force was incidental to and separable from their form.

Closely related to the new hermeneutic was the recovery of metaphor as a literary category that could yield insight to the dynamics of the parable genre. Under the influence of literary theorists A. Wilder and P. Ricoeur and the biblical scholar R. Funk, among others, the creative, generative open-endedness of the parables was explored as metaphorical in character. As such, the parable, like metaphor, bears on the hearer-reader to participate in its resolution. Parables, thus, less convey meaning than they create the possibilities for it. From this vantage point, the reduction of parables to a network of symbolic code, as in the allegorizing method, or as a generalizing maxim in the one-point approach, is a fundamental betrayal of their form and their genius. In this regard, it became increasingly important to insist that the parables were not merely tools of conflict in the ministry of Jesus, but rather a means by which Jesus' hearers, then and now, find themselves confronted with reversal of expectations yielding new possibilities of existence. Writing later, J. Crossan memorably contrasted the parable with its counterparts: "Myth establishes world. Apologue defends world. Action investigates world. Satire attacks world. Parable subverts world" (Crossan 1975, 42).

Similar in outcome are those approaches to parables located in more aesthetic and more specified literary concerns. Notably, D. Via protested the "severely historical" approach characteristic of the Jülicher-Jeremias paradigm along with its reduction of the parable to single point. To the contrary, Via proposes that parables be viewed as autonomous aesthetic objects, and he exploits the tools of literary criticism toward their interpretation. In this vein there followed a succession of engagements with the parables that were more or less experimental in character. M. Tolbert explored the parables by means of semiotics in an argument for their intrinsic polyvalence. Literary structuralism enjoyed a brief experimental phase in the 1970s, and, as might be expected, it largely yielded its ground to poststructuralism or other deconstructive approaches, not least under the auspices of Crossan, whose wide-ranging forty-year career of parable research can almost be read in succession as the state of the question.

4.2.4. Recent Trends. If preceding eras of critical interpretation can be broadly characterized historicist and hermeneutical, respectively, the last several decades are not so readily thematized. To a significant extent, many of the most important contributions, rather than venturing into new territory, offer some sort of critique or new synthesis, moderating and consolidating the gains of previous research. A notable trend in this respect is the cautious and circumscribed rehabilitation of the allegorical approach to the parables. Although anticipated by others (e.g., Boucher), C. Blomberg's introduction to the parables (first published in 1990) is perhaps the most vigorous recent rebuttal of Jülicher's rejection of allegory and his enshrinement of the singular point of comparison. To the contrary, Blomberg argues that the parables are inherently allegorical, though in a rather limited and constrained sense. Each key figure of the parable makes extratextual reference to corresponding figures or notions outside the text, with the result that, for example, a parable with three main characters (or sets of characters) will yield three theological "points." Although the model has been criticized as wooden, a return to an overly propositional account of the parables, Blomberg's survey of the field, his refutation of the one-point approach, and the argument on behalf of modest account of parable as allegory serve as useful correctives, especially in an evangelical context that has been curiously beholden to the one-point maxim (e.g., Stein).

Several important recent studies (e.g., Hultgren; Snodgrass) are distinguished by their comprehensive synthesis of prior research and the studied rejection of the idiosyncratic pendulum swings of earlier programs. These voices of moderation have now general disavowed the hegemony of Jülicher's single-point approach. Moreover, less and less is the reconstruction of the most original form or structure of the parable seen to be the object of parable interpretation, and increasingly the Gospels' supply of literary context is explored rather than circumvented. Nonetheless, the reintegration of the parables into their literary contexts in the Gospels remains a work in progress (see Narrative Criticism). If the first impulse of the critical era of parable interpretation was to recover the starkest alternative to ecclesial allegorizing, the setting in life of the historical Jesus, the reintegration of the parables into their canonical literary contexts would eventually follow larger trends in NT scholarship. Marking the transition from form to redaction criticism, a number of studies explored the characteristic tendencies of the evangelists in their use of parables within the literary objectives of the Gospels (Kingsbury; Drury; Donahue). This is followed by an even more overt synchronic interest in studies that, following the interests of narrative criticism, seek to explore the dynamic interplay of the parables when they are constituents of the larger Gospel narratives (Carter and Heil; Olmstead; Forbes).

Other recent studies betray a more ethical concern by attending to the socioeconomic dynamics of the parables. For example, W. Herzog's account of the parables casts Jesus after P. Freire's "pedagogue of the oppressed," who by means of parable draws attention to structural injustice, empowering a status reversal. Not unexpectedly, Herzog must circumvent the literary settings of the Gospels, and even then few have been convinced of these readings, distinct from their political utility, as interpretations of Jesus. Nonetheless, that socioeconomic exigencies form a context for the parables of Jesus is patent, and not a few recent studies have explored this dimension (e.g., Schottroff).

5. Interpreting the Parables.

Desirable though it may be, a comprehensive guide to the interpretation of the parables will remain elusive, depending as it does on the prior commitments of the interpreter. While few if any contemporary exegetes will defend patristic and medieval allegorizing as an exegetical strategy, many are now rightly aware that Jülicher was guilty of a severe overcorrection. Nonetheless, the question remains as to whether the parable to be interpreted is a reconstructed verbal artifact of the historical setting of Jesus' ministry, the parable offered in the canonical Gospels replete with its contextual setting, or a parable essentially autonomous from history or text that meets the hearer-reader new in its every performance. Each claim has its own plausibility, each interpretive task its own integrity. Historical, if not theological, interest might call one to the horizon of the Jesus of history, but the privileging of that horizon to the derogation of that of the Gospels implies a theological commitment that many cannot follow. Moreover, the Gospels offer not only the most stable, but also, for the Christian church, the normative form and setting for the parable, by means of which the parables are to be understood, on the one hand, and brought into a robust relationship with the canonical narratives, on the other hand. This is not to claim that the parable has an inconsequential prehistory before we encounter its fixed canonical form, but rather to claim that it cannot be assumed that the reconstruction of that tradition history usurps the canonical form, of which both the parable and its literary context are constituents. While no one ought to deny the parables' existential force, it remains necessary that their interpretation be rooted in networks of context, both historical and literary.

In the absence of a methodological consensus, the following modest parameters are offered with respect to durable questions confronting the interpreter of the parables.

5.1. Allegory. As it concerns the vexed question of allegory, the rigid absolutism of Jülicher can no longer be maintained; nor is the only other option the theological allegorizing of previous eras. Rather, the primary figures of the parable will frequently, though not as a rule, stand in a referential relation to entities of the external world. The justification of this relationship rests not only in the tendencies of the genre, but also in the literary-cultural milieu of Judaism, in which certain characters and figures serve as stock symbols. Thus, while each parable ought to be judged on its own merits, readers can expect authority figures (kings, fathers, judges, etc.) to depict *God (if even sometimes problematically) and subordinates (servants, laborers, stewards, children, widows, etc.) to stand for persons or groups and types of persons, not infrequently bifurcated as the good or wise over against the evil or foolish. This is not to allegorize the parable, but rather merely to follow its own conventions with sensitivity to genre and milieu.

5.2. The Single Point. If an understandable corrective, the single-point approach is now rightly understood to be artificially limiting. It makes no sense, for example, to ask with regard to the lost son whether it is the returned son's restoration, the father's mercy, or the older son's bitter obduracy that is "the point" of the parable (Lk 15:11-32). While it is an improvement to expand interpretation so as to assign a "point" to each character (Blomberg), such an approach, for all its schematic discipline, is still too much indebted to a static view of the parables that requires them to yield "points," whether one or several. It will be more fruitful to recognize that most parables, arguably all of the narrative parables, traffic in both the commonplace and the unexpected. Capturing then the parable's thrust is aided in no small measure by discerning what features of the parable are the "world as we know it" and which describe actions atypical or even bizarre from the vantage point of parable's cultural setting. It is antecedently probable that a special force of emphasis attends the latter as it is set in relief against the backdrop of the former. Thus, a *Samaritan exercising costly care to the object of natural contempt, a father running to embrace a son who shamed him, a master commending an embezzling manager, workers who labored twelve hours being paid no more than those who labored but one hour—these intend to arrest the reader and to spark reflection that reckons with their significance.

5.3. Eschatology. While Jesus' eschatology—his vision of the inaugurated reign of God—is central to his teaching, and the *kingdom of God is the explicit subject of numerous parables, interpreters are under no obligation to insist that every parable expounds the kingdom of God per se (although even less plausible is C. Hedrick's claim that none of them do). Rather, we might rightly note that the parables naturally reference a conceptual framework and values coherent with the kingdom that Jesus preaches and enacts, but this is different than the oft-repeated claim, going back to Dodd and Jeremias, that the kingdom of God is the express subject matter of every parable. To the contrary, parables that intend to depict that kingdom and give it pictorial and narrative expression are entirely explicit in this regard.

5.4. Structure. While attention to literary structure is relevant for the exegesis of any biblical text, careful study of the parables in this regard may prove especially fruitful (Scott; Bailey 1976; 1980). Akin to folk story, the parable will have features of patterned narration that establish the focus by means of repetition and contrast. Under Semitic influence, the parables may display composition in concentric, ring or chiasmic patterns. This sort of analysis can be overdone or some interpreters over-committed to its significance, but it will nevertheless repay the interpreter to pay close attention to the phenomenon of literary structure.

5.5. Literary Context. If the horizon of interpretation is the parable as it is narrated within the Gospels, the reader typically will find multiple coordinates that come to the aid of specifying a parable's particular use in its literary context. To be sure, separating the wheat of the parables from the chaff of their (allegedly later and secondary) settings was the preoccupation of much critical parable scholarship. But these same settings can just as well be exploited as excised, especially if the object of parable interpretation is construed as a subspecies of Gospel exegesis rather than tradition criticism or research on the historical Jesus. Audiences and introductions to the parables (e.g., Lk 15:1-2; 16:1; 18:1, 9) will frequently orient the reading of the parable in a particular direction. For example, that both a group of sinners and tax collectors and a group of Pharisees and scribes are listening to the parables of Luke 15 prepares the reader to identify the prodigal son and his older brother with characters in the audience. By the same token, that Luke 18:1 introduces the persistent widow as an incentive “to pray and not lose heart” gives reading direction to a parable susceptible to other readings. Even more explicit are the frequent concluding sayings that follow the parable proper (akin to the nimšal of the rabbinic parables). In these sayings Jesus offers explicit application that, while not exhausting the parable’s interpretation, gives direction to it. Some literary context is less direct yet significant for interpretation, especially the collocation of parables with each other or with other teaching, or a parable’s embeddedness in a larger narrative in a mutually interpretive relationship.

5.6. Polyvalence. It is a feature of the parables that they involve the active participation of the listener in the reckoning of their meaning and to a degree beyond what is typical for more straightforward forms of speech. If for no other reason than this variable of listener participation, it can be argued that the parables are intrinsically polyvalent, bearing multiple senses and resisting a singular determinate meaning. That the “same” (or genetically related) parables are put to multiple uses in the Synoptic Gospels is thought by many to be a verification of this claim (Tolbert). But the nature of the parables’ polyvalence can be qualified by means of two clarifications. First, the alleged polyvalence of the parables (they are susceptible to multiple, equally valid interpretations) should not be confused for their complexity (that their meaning is not simplex, reducible to competing, finite propositions). To note that the meaning of the parables is complex, textured and subject to multiple interests is not to say that their meaning is indeterminate. Second, that different performances of a parable (e.g., historical Jesus, early church orality, Gospel redaction, liturgical and homiletical) draw attention to diverse meanings or even to mutually exclusive meanings is rather more a function of the variation of performance than it is a claim that any given performance is radically indefinite or polyvalent. Thus, it can be argued that the polyvalence of the parables is best accounted for as a function of their self-involving character, on the one hand, and as the aggregate of their multiple performances, on the other hand. Thus, the claim that the parables are polyvalent is then less a claim with respect to any particular performance (which frequently evidences a specificity of intent) than it is a claim regarding their open-ended character and capacity for multiple uses.

See also CHREIA/APHORISM; ESCHATOLOGY; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. E. Bailey, Poet and Peasant: A Literary Cultural Approach to the Parables in Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976); idem, Through Peasant Eyes: More Lucan Parables, Their Culture and Style (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); C. L. Blomberg, Interpreting the Parables (2nd ed.; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2012); M. Boucher, The Mysterious Parable: A Literary Study (CBQMS 6; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1977); W. Carter and J. P. Heil, Matthew’s Parables: Audience-Oriented Perspectives (CBQMS 30; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1998); J. D. Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); idem, The Dark Interval: Towards a Theology of Story (Niles, IL: Argus, 1975); idem, The Power of Parable: How Fiction by Jesus Became Fiction about Jesus (New York: HarperOne, 2012); C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London: Nisbet, 1936); J. R. Donahue, The Gospel in Parable: Metaphor, Narrative, and Theology in the Synoptic Gospels (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); J. Drury, The Parables in the Gospel: History and Allegory (New York: Crossroad, 1985); P. Fiebig, Altjüdische Gleichnisse und die Gleichnisse Jesu (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1904); idem, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu im Lichte der rabbinischen Gleichnisse des neutestamentlichen Zeitalters (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1912); D. Flusser, Die rabbinischen Gleichnisse und der Gleichniserzähler Jesus, 1: Das Wesen der Gleichnisse (JC 4; Bern: Peter Lang, 1981); G. Forbes, The God of Old: The Role of the Lukan Parables in the Purpose of Luke’s Gospel (JSNTSup 198; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); R. W. Funk et al., eds., The Parables of Jesus: Red Letter Edition (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1988); D. B. Gowler, What Are They Saying About the Parables? (Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 2000); C. W. Hedrick, Parables as Poetic Fictions: The Creative Voice of Jesus (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); W. R. Herzog, Parables as Subversive Speech: Jesus as Pedagogue of the Oppressed (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994); A. J. Hultgren, The Parables of Jesus: A Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (New York: Scribner, 1963); A. Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu (2 vols.; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1888-1899); J. D. Kingsbury, The Parables of Jesus in Matthew 13: A Study in Redaction-Criticism (Richmond: John Knox, 1969); W. S. Kissinger, The Parables of Jesus: A History of Interpretation and Bibliography (Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1979); R. N. Longenecker, ed., The Challenge of Jesus’ Parables (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); H. K. McArthur and R. M. Johnston,

They Also Taught in Parables: Rabbinic Parables from the First Centuries of the Christian Era (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990); W. G. Olmstead, Matthew's Trilogy of Parables: The Nation, the Nations and the Reader in Matthew 21:28-22:14 (SNTSMS 127; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003); N. Perrin, Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom: Symbol and Metaphor in New Testament Interpretation (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976); L. Schottroff, The Parables of Jesus, trans. L. M. Maloney (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 2006); B. B. Scott, Hear Then the Parable: A Commentary on the Parables of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); K. R. Snodgrass, Stories with Intent: A Comprehensive Guide to the Parables of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); R. H. Stein, An Introduction to the Parables of Jesus (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1981); D. Stern, "Jesus' Parables from the Perspective of Rabbinic Literature: The Example of the Wicked Husbandmen," in Parable and Story in Judaism and Christianity, ed. C. Thoma and M. Wyschogrod (SJC; Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1989) 42-80; M. A. Tolbert, Perspectives on the Parables: An Approach to Multiple Interpretations (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. T. Tucker, Example Stories: Perspectives on Four Parables in the Gospel of Luke (JSNTSup 162; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); D. O. Via Jr., The Parables: Their Literary and Existential Dimension (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); S. L. Wailes, Medieval Allegories of Jesus' Parables (Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1987); S. I. Wright, The Voice of Jesus: Studies in the Interpretation of Six Gospel Parables (PBTM; Carlisle: Paternoster, 2000); B. H. Young, Jesus and His Jewish Parables: Rediscovering the Roots of Jesus' Teaching (New York: Paulist Press, 1989).

G. P. Anderson

PARACLETE. See HOLY SPIRIT.

PASSION NARRATIVE

The passion narrative is the dramatic story portraying and interpreting the events of Jesus' suffering and *death. In the Synoptic Gospels the account of the Jewish plot against Jesus' life during the Feast of Unleavened Bread is usually regarded as the beginning point of the passion narrative; its finale is marked by Jesus' *burial. Thus, the passion narrative in the Synoptic Gospels is found in Matthew 26—27; Mark 14—15; Luke 22—23. The parameters of the Johannine account are less easily determined, for material otherwise found in the Synoptic passion narrative is scattered throughout John 10—19. The extant remains of the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (ca.

A.D. 125) constitute a narrative of Jesus' passion and resurrection, beginning with the story of Jesus before Pilate (see Pontius Pilate). According to longstanding and widely held views, the story of Jesus' suffering and death was the first among the developing Gospel traditions to achieve written form.

1. The Formation of the Passion Narrative
2. The Role of the Old Testament in the Passion Narrative
3. The Genre of the Passion Narrative

1. The Formation of the Passion Narrative.

The origins of the passion narrative have been widely debated (see Brown, 1:46-93; 2:1492-1524; Carroll and Green, 17-19; Green, 9-14). Early in the twentieth century form critics observed the passion narrative's relative self-sufficiency and coherence, its chronological and topographical cohesion and the fundamental correspondence of narrative sequence among the four Gospel accounts—all easily observed in a Gospel synopsis (see Form Criticism). They found that, unlike other Gospel segments, this one did not dissolve easily into component parts. On this basis they insisted on the existence of a connected story of Jesus' passion long before the composition of the Gospels. From this consensus arose widely divergent opinions regarding the narrative's sources, content and purpose. One particularly widespread thesis postulated an evolutionary, multi-stage process of growth, from a primitive outline (such as Mk 10:33-34; Acts 13:27-29; or 1 Cor 15:3-5) to a short account beginning with Jesus' arrest. Additional materials were thought to have been appended to this brief story to achieve the expanded narratives of our four Gospels. A number of multi-source theories have also been championed.

Beginning with the 1960s, however, the whole notion of a primitive narrative of Jesus' passion was called into question. A few independent passion traditions might have existed from earliest times, it was alleged, but Mark composed the first passion account from beginning to end. W. Kelber developed this view further, arguing that Mark constructed the first passion narrative largely from OT texts and reflection on the OT against the backdrop of Jesus' execution (see Old Testament in the Gospels; Typology). This basic thesis claims a number of adherents, especially in North America.

This is not to say, however, that study of the early formation of the passion narrative has ceased. Since the 1980s, especially in German-language study, a number of proposals have taken up those earlier, form-critical observations and developed them with greater sophistication. Drawing on source- and redaction-critical inquiry, research on the literary forms of antiquity and observations regarding the enigma of Jesus' death in its milieu, these scholars have supported with renewed vigor the probability of an early, written, self-contained passion narrative underlying the passion narratives of Mark and John (e.g., Mohr; Myllykoski; Reinbold). (Many scholars have abandoned the earlier view that Lk 22–23 appropriated an extended passion source other than Mk 14–15 [see the survey in Harrington].) These studies have tended more and more to move away from earlier attempts to juxtapose theological and historical interests, recognizing instead the inevitable grounding of theological discourse in historical memories and accounts of Jesus' passion (see Sommer) (see Historicisms and Historiography). Several studies have focused on the formation of the passion story within the context of early Christian *worship—for example, the commemoration of the death of Jesus by Christians during the Jewish Passover celebration (Trocme), the regular celebration of the Lord's Supper (Green) or more generally the cultic practices of early Christian communities (Aitken) (see Last Supper).

J. D. Crossan also supports the idea of a primitive, self-contained narrative of Jesus' passion. His point of departure, however, is the apocryphal Gospel of Peter, which he regards as best embodying this primitive passion account (see Gospels: Apocryphal). For him, the first passion story was practically devoid of historical reminiscence, but was created under the influence of passion prophecy. Scholars have countered by questioning Crossan's understanding of passion prophecy (see 2.1 below) and by demonstrating the dependence of the Gospel of Peter on one or more NT Gospels, rather than the other way around (e.g., Brown, 2:1317–49).

With the influx of newer literary-based methods into Gospels research (see Narrative Criticism), questions concerning the origins and development of the passion narrative have been eclipsed in many circles. This has led to a healthy emphasis on understanding the theology of the passion narratives within their larger Gospel contexts (already Senior 1984; 1985; 1989; 1991; also Karris; Van Oyen and Shepherd).

2. The Role of the Old Testament in the Passion Narrative.

2.1. The Old Testament: Creative Agent? Kelber and Crossan are only two among many voices arguing that the passion story was either largely or entirely created out of OT texts, as a kind of *midrash on OT texts understood as prophecies of Jesus' passion. According to this thesis, early Christians knew almost nothing of the events of Jesus' suffering and death, so they turned to the OT for information and inspiration.

An initial query that might be raised against this theory: in the context of hermeneutics in late Judaism, was it a matter of course that narratives were worked up from OT texts? In other words, was the procedure posited by Kelber and Crossan commonplace in the interpretive milieu of Second Temple Judaism and early Christianity? In fact, research on this question points to a negative verdict (e.g., Moo; cf. Goodacre). Indeed, studies of the use of the OT at Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls), among apocalypticists (see Apocalypticism and Apocalyptic Teaching) and in postbiblical historiography indicate that the direction of influence was primarily from event to Scripture rather than vice versa. Biblical texts were adapted to fit events more readily than were events created to fit biblical texts.

Those who regard the passion narrative as a midrash on selected OT texts must overcome the additional obstacle presented by the narrative itself. Biblical references abound in the passion narrative, but they follow no discernible pattern as might have been expected if they were determined by an OT passage or passages. Although some OT texts reappear in the passion story (e.g., Ps 22; Is 53), "the biblical allusions in the passion narrative have almost no continuity and seldom concern the same book twice in succession, while the themes vary from one allusion to the next" (Trocme, 58).

Still further, we should note that not every aspect of the passion story can be accounted for by an appeal to the creative role of the OT. A list of such elements in Mark might include the *anointing at Bethany (Mk 14:3–9), the singing of a hymn after the Last Supper (Mk 14:26), the sword incident at the arrest (Mk 14:47), the reference to the fire at the courtyard (Mk 14:54), the mention of Simon of Cyrene and his two sons (Mk 15:21), the hour scheme at the cross (Mk 15:25, 33) and the tearing of the temple veil (Mk 15:38). Clearly, factors beyond the influence of the OT were at work in the formation of the passion narrative.

Finally, evidence from the Gospel passion narratives themselves supports the conclusion that passion events were primarily interpreted by, not created from, the OT. For example, just as Psalm 41:9 explains the problem raised by Judas Iscariot (cf. Mk 14:18; Jn 13:18), so Zechariah 13:7 justifies the flight of the disciples (Mt 26:31, 56; Mk 14:27, 50). For this reason, some have judged that the citation of Zechariah was placed on Jesus' lips by the early church. Even if this were true, however, it remains evident that the reason for doing so would have been to downplay the scandalous character of the disciples' flight at Jesus' arrest. If Jesus' suffering and death were God's will, why did the disciples flee? According to Zechariah 13:7, this too was foretold as part of the divine plan. That is, a historical event, the flight of the disciples, gave rise to a riddle that was solved with recourse to the OT. The OT interpreted, but did not create, this problematic event.

To give an example of a different sort, a number of canonical and extracanonical texts demonstrate that it was understood that Jesus was secured to the cross with nails (Jn 20:25; Acts 2:23; Col 2:14; Gos. Pet. 6:21; Justin, Dial. 97; and perhaps Lk 24:39) (see Death of Jesus). Aside from the fact that this detail has a good claim to being historically accurate, it is remarkable that, in not mentioning this detail in the crucifixion story itself, early Christians bypassed an opportunity to show one more substantial intersection between the fate of the suffering righteous in Psalm 22 and Jesus. In Psalm 22:16 (LXX 21:17) we read, "they pierced my hands and feet." It is true that the reading of the (possibly corrupt) Masoretic Text would not have suggested this correspondence ("as a lion my hands and feet"), but elsewhere in the passion story references to Psalm 22 employ the Greek version. If the passion narrative depended heavily on the creative role of the OT, we might have expected "passion prophecy" to have rendered this connection explicit.

If the best way to describe the relationship of the OT to the passion narrative is not with reference to its creative role, what is a more appropriate explanation?

2.2. The Old Testament: Interpretive Agent. One way of grappling with the crucial role of the OT in the passion narrative is to begin by recognizing the enigma of Jesus' death. Jesus' public humiliation and execution on a cross ran counter to practically every strand of first-century A.D. messianic expectation. The cross of Christ constituted a scandal of no mean proportions. How could it be explained? The answer could be cast only in terms of God's will, his redemptive plan, and it was to the OT that early Christians went in search of ways of making sense of the death of their Messiah.

In the process of working out the significance of Jesus' death in a narrative context, early Christians employed the OT at a number of levels. In some cases they incorporated direct citations of OT materials into the passion story (e.g., Lk 22:37, citing Is 53:12; Mk 15:34, citing Ps 22:1). In other instances allusions to OT texts were woven into the narrative material. Thus, for example, language from Isaiah 50:6 has been borrowed in the account of Jesus' mockery in Matthew 27:30; Mark 15:19; John 19:1, 3. In this way, Jesus is identified typologically as the Isaianic *Servant of Yahweh.

The framers of the passion tradition were not interested in specific OT texts only. These Christians were convinced that, whatever God's plans for redemption were, they were all fulfilled in Jesus. Hence, in the passion narrative we read that "the Son of Man will go just as it is written about him" (Mk 14:21) or "the Son of Man will go as it has been decreed" (Lk 22:22) (see Son of Man). Probably, these are not allusions to specific OT texts, but rather intentionally general references to the divine will as this is manifest in the OT.

Moreover, throughout the passion narratives we find evidences of the interpretation of Jesus' suffering and death along larger, typological lines (see Typology). For example, in many ways the passion accounts portray Jesus against the interpretive framework of the Suffering Servant of the Lord. "Like the Servant, Jesus (1) is God's chosen one who will complete his mission through suffering; (2) willingly submits to his divine mission; (3) is innocent; (4) maintains his silence; (5) dies 'for many'; (6) is 'handed over'; (7) is abused; (8) is 'numbered with transgressors'; (9) anticipates his vindication; and (10) is vindicated after maltreatment" (Green, 317-18). Similarly, especially in the Markan and Matthean passion accounts, Jesus is the suffering righteous one.

By these means we are instructed that, far from being a contradiction of the divine will, far from being an inexplicable puzzle in redemptive history, Jesus' suffering and death happened according to God's will. Whether by slightest allusion or explicit citation, the use of the OT in the passion story underscores the necessity of Jesus' death in God's salvific plan.

3. The Genre of the Passion Narrative.

The centrality of the passion of Jesus to redemptive history is suggested not only by the use of the OT in its interpretation, but also by the genre within which it is related. In fact, the genre, or literary form, of this story is a significant indicator of the passion narrative's meaning and antiquity.

Recent studies in genre have isolated a traditional literary schema known to some as the genre of "court conflict," to others as the "story of the vindication of the innocent sufferer" (see Crossan, 297-334; Nickelsburg, esp. 249-79). Set against a legal or royal setting, the protagonists in these stories are recognized for their outstanding qualities; their lives are endangered, usually through evil schemes; though innocent, they are persecuted; and finally, they are vindicated. In earlier examples of this genre (e.g., the story of Joseph [Gen 37—42]) the protagonist is rescued from death; however, with time, the genre was transformed so that vindication comes after death (e.g., 2 Macc 7; Wis 2; 4—5). Significantly, within the development of this genre, Isaiah 52:13—53:12, which combines the twin motifs of vindicated innocence and vicarious death, comes to play a pivotal role.

The parallels between this genre and the passion narratives of our Gospels are remarkable. They demonstrate further the possibility of an early, self-contained passion narrative constructed along the lines of this readily available literary convention. Moreover, they underscore the intimate relation of Jesus' passion with God's redemptive activity, and especially with the interpretation of innocent death found in Isaiah 52:13—53:12.

See also BURIAL OF JESUS; DEATH OF JESUS; GETHSEMANE; LAST SUPPER; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; TRIAL OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. B. Aitken, Jesus' Death in Early Christian Memory: The Poetics of the Passion (NTOA 53; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht; Fribourg: Academic Press, 2004); R. E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels (2 vols.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994); J. T. Carroll and J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus in Early Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); J. D. Crossan, The Cross That Spoke: The Origins of the Passion Narrative (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988); J. R. Donahue, "From Passion Traditions to Passion Narrative," in The Passion in Mark: Studies on Mark 14-16, ed. W. H. Kelber (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1976) 1-20; M. Goodacre, "Scripturalization in Mark's Crucifixion Narrative," in The Trial and Death of Jesus: Essays on the Passion Narrative in Mark, ed. G. Van Oyen and T. Shepherd (CBET 45; Leuven: Peeters, 2006) 33-47; J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative (WUNT 2/33; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988); J. M. Harrington, The Lukan Passion Narrative: The Markan Material in Luke 22,54-23,25: A Historical Survey, 1891-1997 (NTTS 30; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000); R. Karris, Luke, Artist and Theologian: Luke's Passion Account as Literature (New York: Paulist Press, 1985); W. H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); T. A. Mohr, Markus- und Johannespassion: Redaktions- und traditionsge-schichtliche Untersuchung der Markinischen und Johanneischen Passionstradition (ATANT 70; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1982); D. J. Moo, The Old Testament in the Gospel Passion Narratives (Sheffield: Almond, 1983); M. Myllykoski, Die letzten Tage Jesu: Markus, Johannes, ihre Traditionen und die historische Frage (2 vols.; AASF B/256, 272; Helsinki: Suomalainen Tiedeakatemia, 1991-1994); G. W. E. Nickelsburg, Resurrection, Immortality, and Eternal Life in Intertestamental Judaism and Early Christianity (rev. ed.; HTS 56; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2006); W. Reinbold, Der älteste Bericht über den Tod Jesu: Literarische Analyse und historische Kritik der Passionsdarstellungen der Evangelien (BZNW 69; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1994); D. Senior, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark (Passion Series 2; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1984); idem, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew (Passion Series 1; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1985); idem, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Luke (Passion Series 3; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1989); idem, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of John (Passion Series 4; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1991); U. Sommer, Die Passionsgeschichte des Markusevangeliums: Überlegungen zur Bedeutung der Geschichte für den Glauben (WUNT 2/58; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1993); E. Trocmé, The Passion as Liturgy: A Study in the Origin of the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels (London: SCM Press, 1983); G. Van Oyen and T. Shepherd, eds., The Trial and Death of Jesus: Essays on the Passion Narrative in Mark (CBET 45; Leuven: Peeters, 2006).

J. B. Green

PASSOVER, PASSOVER LAMB. See FEASTS; LAMB OF GOD; LAST SUPPER.

PATRISTIC INTERPRETATION. See GOSPELS; HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION.

PATTERNS AND THEMES, OLD TESTAMENT. See OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS.

PEACE

As the horrific slaughter in Matthew's *birth narrative (Mt 2:16-18) reminds us, the threat of violence loomed large in first-century Judea. Hence, when the Gospels speak of the peace brought by Jesus, this is not a reference to inner tranquility. On the contrary, their message must be understood primarily in the context of concrete social and political strife. Only in the Gospel of John do we find a concept that resembles the modern notion of inner peace.

1. Peace (eirēnē)
2. Synoptic Tradition
3. Gospel of John

1. Peace (eirēnē).

In the NT the word “peace” (eirēnē) indicates more than the absence of war. Like the Hebrew word šālôm, for which it serves as a translation throughout the LXX, eirēnē is used to connote harmony, wholeness and well-being (Ridgway, 94-142; Dinkler). In the OT, šālôm included “everything necessary to healthful living: good health, a sense of well-being, good fortune, the cohesiveness of the community, relationship to relatives and their state of being, and anything else deemed necessary for everything to be in order” (Westermann, 24 [cf. Brueggemann, 13-23]). Echoes of this broad conception of peace are heard throughout the Gospels.

2. Synoptic Tradition.

2.1. Peace and Healing in the Gospel of Mark.

The word eirēnē occurs only once in the Gospel of Mark. After a woman who had long suffered hemorrhages covertly touched Jesus’ garment and was healed, Jesus sought her out and blessed her: “Daughter, your faith has saved you. Go in peace and be healed of your disease” (Mk 5:34 [// Lk 8:48; cf. Lk 7:50]). The phrase “go in peace” reflects traditional biblical idiom (see 1 Sam 20:13; 2 Sam 3:21-23; 19:25) and was a common *blessing (Judg 18:6; 1 Sam 1:17; 29:7; 2 Sam 15:9; 2 Kings 5:19; cf. Ex 4:18). But in this context it is no mere cliché. As if in a concerted effort to evoke the full scope of the biblical concept of šālôm, Jesus’ blessing places eirēnē in close proximity with the related words sōzō (“to save” [cf. sōtēria in LXX Gen 26:31]) and hygiēs (“whole, healthy” [cf. hygiainō in LXX Gen 37:14]). Further, the story emphasizes the social restoration that Jesus’ *healing enables by highlighting this woman’s movement from secrecy and shame to openness and honor (cf. Lk 7:50). Jesus’ healing ministry brings physical restoration and, what is more, the renewal of God’s šālôm. For Mark, then, peace is not a matter of the individual heart; instead, it is to be expressed in the community of those who follow Jesus (Mk 9:50).

2.2. Bringing Peace and Responding Peaceably in the Gospel of Matthew.

2.2.1. Peace and Mission. The correlation of peace and healing visible in Mark 5:34 and parallels is further attested in the Synoptic accounts of Jesus sending forth the disciples for *kingdom proclamation (Mt 10:1-16; Mk 6:8-11; Lk 9:1-6; 10:1-12). In the Matthean version Jesus sends out his disciples to proclaim the same good news that he himself had earlier announced: “The kingdom of heaven has drawn near” (Mt 10:7 [cf. Mt 4:17]). And, as was the case throughout Jesus’ initial Galilean ministry, the disciples’ kingdom proclamation, entailing healing and exorcism (Mt 10:8; cf. Mt 4:23; 9:35-38), involves concrete manifestations that the power of the enemy has been broken (cf. Mt 12:22-28). They are commanded to bestow eirēnē (Mt 10:12-13; cf. Lk 10:5-6) upon “the house” that receives the disciples and their good news—a blessing that is emblematic of the wholeness and restoration that accompany God’s reign of peace (Ridgway).

2.2.2. Responding Peaceably to Persecution. But God’s reign of healing and peace will not come without resistance. As Matthew emphasizes throughout his narrative, those sent forth on behalf of the kingdom of heaven can expect to encounter rejection, persecution and violence (Mt 10:13b-39; cf. Mt 21:33-46; 23:29-39) (Weaver). The disciples go out like sheep among wolves (Mt 10:16). Not all will accept them, and thus not all will receive the peace that they offer (Mt 10:13-15). Indeed, Matthew, like Luke and Q (Lk 2:34-35; 12:49-53), emphasizes that the message of the kingdom will bring division and strife—“not peace but a sword” (Mt 10:34). Note that Jesus’ metaphorical reference to a sword here (cf. “division” in Lk 12:51) is by no means advocacy of physical violence (cf. Mt 26:52); on the contrary, the point is that differing responses to Jesus’ message will divide society to its core, making enemies (echthroi) even of members of the same family (Mt 10:35-36).

If Matthew expects division to accompany the proclamation of the gospel, in the Sermon on the Mount he provides a model for how disciples are to respond to such conflict: “Love your enemies,” says Jesus, “and pray for those who persecute you” (Mt 5:44 [// Lk 6:27-28]). By refusing to respond to abuse in kind, believers demonstrate that they are children of their Father in heaven (Mt 5:45 // Lk 6:35). This same connection between peaceable responses to conflict and status as God’s true children provides the logic of the seventh beatitude: “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called children of God” (Mt 5:9).

Further, in contrast to the lex talionis, which demanded eye for eye and tooth for tooth (Ex 21:24; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21), Jesus’ instruction is that his disciples should not “resist” someone who does them evil (Mt 5:38-39a). Our proverbial English usage of the exemplary cases that follow (Mt 5:39b-42 // Lk 6:29-30)—turn the other cheek, go the extra mile—would suggest that “nonresistance” here indicates willingness to suffer mutely any abuse that one encounters. In fact, however, each of Matthew’s examples depicts nonviolent resistance, an attempt to preserve one’s dignity and to unmask the injustice of one’s opponent (Wink). A backhanded slap on the right cheek constitutes an insult, the intention of which is not to injure but to humiliate. By refusing to be cowed and turning the left cheek, which can be struck only with a real, equal-to-equal blow, one robs the aggressor of the power to humiliate. Likewise, taking a poor person’s cloak (himation) is expressly forbidden by Torah (LXX Ex 22:24-26 [MT Ex 22:25-27]; Deut 24:10-13; cf. Amos 2:8). By giving a creditor not only one’s tunic (chitōn) but also one’s himation, and thus appearing before him naked (cf. Gos. Thom. 21), one shames one’s creditor and exposes his rapacious greed.

So far, Jesus’ examples seem to depict creative responses to the ordinary conflicts that characterize village life (Horsley 1992). But in the final example reported by Matthew there is a new player on the scene: the Roman army. The requisitioning of local labor was a common practice among occupying armies (Josephus, Ant. 13.52; cf. Mk 15:21 // Mt 27:32) and was both feared and resented (Wink, 108-10). By voluntarily continuing the second mile, the oppressed person reclaims his or her agency and thus puts the soldier in a discomfiting position (Wink, 111). This sort of teaching is not a call to revolution, not even a nonviolent one, but it does suggest that the love of enemy that Matthew advocates is applicable not only to interpersonal relationships but also to the social and political realms.

Many readers today find Matthew’s advocacy of nonviolence appealing. More difficult for many to swallow, however, is the conception of divine *judgment on which this nonviolence is predicated. Matthew’s Jesus sends out his disciples with these instructions: “When they persecute you in one town, flee into another” (Mt 10:23). There is no retaliation here, only the prophetic gesture of shaking the dust of the offending town off one’s feet (Mt 10:14 // Mk 6:11; Lk 9:5; 10:11). But what this gesture anticipates is complete annihilation on the day of judgment (Mt 10:15 // Lk 10:12)—an expression of divine wrath that stands in some tension with Matthew’s earlier portrait of a God whose perfection consists in making rain to fall indiscriminately on the righteous and the unrighteous (Mt 5:45-48). Indeed, as elsewhere in the NT and Jewish literature (Rom 12:19; 2 Thess 1:6-10; Rev 6:9-11; 1QS X, 16-18; T. Gad 6:7), the wronged are assured that they can forgo violent retaliation precisely because vengeance will be wrought by God.

2.3. The Way of Peace in Luke’s Gospel. Of the twenty-seven occurrences of eirēnē and cognates in the Gospels, fourteen occur in the Gospel of Luke. Luke’s emphasis on peace is evident already in his birth narrative. Zechariah’s song (Lk 1:67-79) is resonant with scriptural language and allusions, and the prophesied restoration of the Davidic monarchy provides the controlling image (Lk 1:69). From the house of David a “horn of salvation” will be raised up to redeem Israel from its enemies, bringing light to those in darkness and “directing our feet in the way of peace” (Lk 1:79). Isaianic prophecy resonates in the background here (Is 9:6-7; 40:3; 49:6), and there are particularly clear verbal echoes of LXX Isaiah 52:7, which speaks of the feet (podes) of those who proclaim the good news (euangelizō) of peace (eirēnē) and salvation (sōtēria), and who announce that God will reign (basileuō). The same complex of imagery recurs in the angels’ announcement to the shepherds in Luke 2:10-14: light, good news, Davidic kingship, salvation, peace. For Luke, then, God’s kingdom is a kingdom of peace, and “God bestows salvation on the people in the form of peace” (Yamasaki, 155). Thus, it is no surprise when Luke has Peter characterize God’s word to Israel as “good news of peace through Jesus Christ” (Acts 10:36).

Luke’s language evidently evokes Israel’s expectation of a renewed Davidic monarchy under God’s reign, but it is reminiscent also of the imperial ideology of Rome. The emperor Augustus was widely celebrated as the divine lord and savior who had brought stability and peace—the Pax Romana—to the entire world (Wengst, 7-54). An inscription from Priene is exemplary (OGIS 458; cf. GIBM 894; Virgil, Ecl. 1.6-8): The birth of the god (theos) Augustus is good news (euangelia) for the world, for he is the savior (sōtēr) sent to end war and set all things in peaceable order (kosmeō). It is difficult to determine whether Luke’s depiction of Jesus in similar terms is an intentional counterclaim that seeks to challenge Roman pretension to power (Grassi, 3-13; Klassen, 82), or whether Luke simply thinks that Jesus is king and thus uses the imperial language available to him. What is clear, however, is that the good news of peace that Luke attributes to Jesus cannot be relegated to the spiritual realm. Indeed, for Luke, Jerusalem’s failure to recognize “the things that make for peace” results in concrete violence: a brutal and destructive siege (Lk 19:41-44). So, although the proclamation of God’s kingdom includes no summons to revolution, the enactment of the kingdom has profound social and political implications that do indeed challenge the existing political order.

3. Gospel of John.

As we have seen, the notion of inner spiritual peace is foreign to the Synoptic Gospels; the Gospel of John, however, does speak of peace as an inner reality that is present in the hearts of believers despite the tumult of the world.

We first hear of eirēnē in John's Gospel during Jesus' *farewell discourse (Jn 14–17). In the face of Jesus' imminent departure, the disciples are not to let their hearts be troubled (Jn 14:1, 27). They will not be left orphaned, for they will receive the gift of the *Holy Spirit (Jn 14:18, 26). Indeed, although Jesus is departing, he promises to leave with them his peace (Jn 14:27). Again, in John 16, Jesus consoles the disciples by explaining that he will depart from them only for a little while (Jn 16:16). Since they know what is to come, they may take courage and have peace despite the tribulation they will face in the world (Jn 16:33). Peace, then, derives from the assurance of Jesus' abiding presence. And, in both texts, such peace is explicitly contrasted with what is on offer from "the world" (ho kosmos).

When the resurrected Jesus appears to the gathered disciples, he repeatedly greets them with the phrase "Peace be with you" (Jn 20:19, 20, 26 [cf. Lk 24:36]). In another context this could be interpreted as nothing more than a routine greeting (cf. Judg 6:23; 19:20; Tob 12:17). Here, however, the repetition is emphatic and signals that this is the fulfillment of what Jesus had promised his disciples a few chapters earlier (Jn 14–16): despite tribulation and tumult, he will remain present with them, and thus they may have peace.

See also BLESSING AND WOE; ESCHATOLOGY; ETHICS OF JESUS; HEALING; SALVATION; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Brueggemann, Peace (UBT; St. Louis: Chalice Press, 2001); E. Dinkler, "Eirene—The Early Christian Concept of Peace," in The Meaning of Peace: Biblical Studies, ed. P. B. Yoder and W. M. Swartley, trans. W. W. Sawatsky (SPS 3; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 164–212; J. A. Grassi, Peace on Earth: Roots and Practices from Luke's Gospel (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2004); R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); idem, "Ethics and Exegesis: 'Love Your Enemies' and the Doctrine of Nonviolence," in The Love of Enemy and Nonretaliation in the New Testament, ed. W. M. Swartley (SPS 2; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 72–101; W. Klassen, Love of Enemies: The Way to Peace (OBT 15; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); J. K. Ridgway, Let Your Peace Come upon It: Healing and Peace in Matthew 10:1–15 (SBL 2; New York: Peter Lang, 1999); M. H. Schertz and I. Friesen, eds., Beautiful upon the Mountains: Biblical Essays on Mission, Peace, and the Reign of God (SPS 7; Elkhart, IN: Institute of Mennonite Studies; Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2003); W. M. Swartley, ed., The Love of Enemy and Nonretaliation in the New Testament (SPS 2; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992); idem, Covenant of Peace: The Missing Peace in New Testament Theology and Ethics (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); D. J. Weaver, "As Sheep in the Midst of Wolves: Mission and Peace in the Gospel of Matthew," in Beautiful upon the Mountains: Biblical Essays on Mission, Peace, and the Reign of God, ed. M. H. Schertz and I. Friesen (SPS 7; Elkhart, IN: Institute of Mennonite Studies; Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2003) 123–43; K. Wengst, Pax Romana and the Peace of Jesus Christ (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); C. Westermann, "Peace (Shalom) in the Old Testament," in The Meaning of Peace: Biblical Studies, ed. P. B. Yoder and W. M. Swartley, trans. W. W. Sawatsky (SPS 3; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 16–48; W. Wink, "Neither Passivity nor Violence: Jesus' Third Way (Matt. 5:38–42 par.)," in The Love of Enemy and Nonretaliation in the New Testament, ed. W. M. Swartley (SPS 2; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 102–25; G. Yamasaki, "Shalom for Shepherds: An Audience-Oriented Critical Analysis of Luke 2:8–14," in Beautiful upon the Mountains: Biblical Essays on Mission, Peace, and the Reign of God, ed. M. H. Schertz and I. Friesen (SPS 7; Elkhart, IN: Institute of Mennonite Studies; Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2003) 145–60; J. H. Yoder, The Politics of Jesus: Vicit Agnus Noster (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994). P. B. Yoder and W. M. Swartley, eds., The Meaning of Peace: Biblical Studies, trans. W. W. Sawatsky (SPS 3; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992). R. S. Schellenberg

PEOPLE, CROWD

The "people" or "crowd(s)" refers to the nameless population of *Israel, the common people who are the audience that hears Jesus' teaching, witnesses his healings and exorcism, and responds positively or negatively to his ministry.

1. Terminology and Nature of Study
2. Common Narrative Functions
3. Individual Gospel Presentations

1. Terminology and Nature of Study.

Various Greek terms are used to refer to groups of people or crowds in the Gospels. The most common are ochlos ("crowd"), laos ("people") and plēthos ("multitude"). These are sometimes used synonymously and sometimes with distinct shades of meaning. Ochlos occurs both as a collective singular (100x) and in the plural (49x). The two are generally synonymous (indicating a large crowd of people), though the latter sometimes refers to groups gathered together in one location (Mt 4:25). Laos occurs fifty-five times, all but one (Lk 2:31) as a collective singular. The majority of these are in the Gospel of Luke (36x), which always uses the singular with reference to the people of Israel. Plēthos occurs nine times in the Gospels with reference to human crowds. In John's Gospel the crowds are frequently identified as hoi Ioudaioi ("the Jews" [see 3.4 below]). Of course, lexical studies alone are insufficient to deal with this topic, since the unnamed masses or crowds may be identified with third-person plural verbs (Mk 1:22, 27) or substantival participles (Mk 6:44; 11:9; 15:29; Lk 2:47).

A historical analysis of the crowds that followed Jesus suggests that they were made up primarily of the common "people of the land" (Heb. ʿam hāʾāre), mostly poor peasant farmers, craftsmen and fishermen. Men, women and children are identified as present. The crowds are often portrayed as needy, following Jesus because of his *miracles, his engaging teaching, and his ability to feed the masses. The majority were no doubt Jews, although Jesus also drew crowds in predominantly *Gentile regions.

More fruitful than a historical study is a narrative and theological one, examining how crowds function in the plot of each Gospel and contribute to the evangelists' theological themes. The crowd functions as a narrative character when groups are represented as sharing similar traits and acting in unison. We will first examine common narrative functions and then the four distinct Gospel portraits.

2. Common Narrative Functions.

2.1. Indication of Popularity or Renown. One of the most common narrative functions of the crowd is to indicate Jesus' immense popularity. Large crowds come to Jesus not only from *Galilee, but also from all the surrounding regions (Mt 4:25). The crowds are so great that he must sit in a boat off shore to teach them (Mt 13:2; Mk 4:1). Even when Jesus tries to withdraw with his *disciples, he is inundated by people (Mk 3:7, 20; 5:21). The reason is the excitement generated by Jesus' teaching (Mt 8:1; Mk 2:13; 10:1; Lk 5:1; Jn 8:2) and miracles (Mt 19:2; Lk

5:15; 9:11; Jn 6:2; 12:9, 18). From a narrative perspective, the size of the crowd demonstrates the significance of the person.

2.2. Representative Response of the Population.

A second common narrative function of the crowd is to identify how the general population was responding to Jesus' message and ministry. Amazement is the most common response. The crowds marvel at Jesus' teaching (Mt 7:28; 22:33; Mk 1:22; 11:18), his miracles (Mt 9:33; 12:23; Mk 1:27; Lk 7:16; 11:14) and his presence (Mk 9:15). They are delighted at his repartee with the religious leaders (Mk 12:37; Lk 13:17). Jesus himself identifies the crowd as a gauge of popular response when he asks his disciples, "Who do the crowds say I am?" (Lk 9:18). The response from the crowd is not always positive; it can be skeptical (Jn 7:20), mournful (Lk 23:48), divided (Jn 7:12) or violently opposed (Mt 27:25).

2.3. Embodiment of Great Need. Sometimes the presence of the crowd functions as a social setting of physical and spiritual need. Jesus sees the crowds and has compassion on them because they are like sheep without a *shepherd (Mt 9:36; Mk 6:34). Crowds in need of *healing and exorcism relentlessly pursue Jesus (Mt 12:15; 15:30; Lk 4:42). Before the feeding of the five thousand, Jesus expresses sympathy for the hungry crowds (Mt 15:32; Mk 8:2; Lk 9:13; Jn 6:5).

2.4. An Obstacle to Be Overcome. Crowds in narratives often function as obstacles. In the Gospels they can be an obstacle for those trying to reach Jesus or an obstacle to Jesus trying to pursue his ministry goals. "Because of the crowd" four men are unable to get to Jesus with their paralyzed friend (Mk 2:4), and Jesus' family cannot reach him for the same reason (Lk 8:19). Zacchaeus wants to see Jesus, but his height and the crowd make it impossible (Lk 19:2). At one point Jesus and his disciples are unable to eat because of the intensity of the crowds (Mk 3:20). Jesus must escape the crowds in order to have reflective time with God (Lk 4:42) and to heal a man in private (Mk 7:33). Sometimes the crowds can be an obstacle in Jesus' favor, as when the religious leaders are unable to find him when he slips away "into the crowd" (Jn 5:13).

2.5. A Threatening Force. Related to the function of obstacle is the crowd's role as a threatening force, either against Jesus or against his foes. The threat is positive when Herod wants to eliminate John but is afraid of the people, who consider him a *prophet (Mt 14:5). Similarly, the religious leaders are afraid to arrest Jesus because of the crowd (Mt 21:26, 46; Mk 12:12; 14:2; Lk 20:6; 22:2, 6). A crowd also becomes a threat to Jesus at his arrest in the garden of *Gethsemane (Mt 26:47) and when the chief priests and elders incite the crowd to call for his execution (Mt 17:20).

2.6. Jesus' Audience Distinct from the Disciples.

Sometimes the crowd is simply Jesus' amorphous audience distinct from the disciples. Whereas Jesus speaks to the crowds in *parables, he explains everything in private to the disciples (Mt 13:34, 36). Jesus sends his disciples ahead of him and ministers separately to the crowd (Mt 14:22). Sometimes crowds are mentioned simply to show that Jesus' teaching was directed at a wider audience than the disciples (Mk 8:34; Lk 7:11).

3. Individual Gospel Presentations.

3.1. Mark. Mark prefers ochlos to other terms, using laos and plēthos only twice each. Ochlos occurs thirty-eight times in Mark, all but once in the singular. At its most basic, the crowd in Mark represents the second tier of Jesus' audience, outside the sphere of the twelve disciples, but still recipients of Jesus' message and ministry. Like the Twelve, the crowd accompanies Jesus on the way (Mk 10:46), is the audience for his teaching (Mk 2:13; 4:1-2; 7:14; 10:1), and stands amazed at his teaching (Mk 1:22, 27; 6:2; 11:18) and miracles (Mk 1:27; 2:12; 5:20; 7:37). Jesus speaks both to the Twelve and to the crowd when he says that all would-be disciples must deny themselves, take up their crosses, and follow him (Mk 8:34—9:1).

Yet while viewed as potential disciples (Mk 8:34), the crowd stands outside the Twelve and their special relationship with Jesus. Jesus escapes the crowds to be with his disciples (Mk 4:35; 6:31, 45) and often instructs the Twelve privately after teaching the people (Mk 4:10; 7:17; 9:28; 10:10). The Twelve actively participate in Jesus' teaching, preaching and exorcism ministry, but the crowds do not (Mk 3:14-15; 6:7-14).

The crowds also symbolize the great spiritual needs in Israel and so are the object of Jesus' compassion. Jesus has compassion on them "because they were like sheep without a shepherd" (Mk 6:34). At the second feeding miracle Jesus, before providing the loaves and fishes, says to his disciples, "I have compassion for these people" (8:2).

As the crowds represent Israel in its spiritual need, so they also represent the nation in its rejection of the Messiah (see Christ). It is well known that the disciples in Mark's Gospel are primarily a negative model, failing to comprehend the nature of Jesus' ministry (Mk 4:13; 7:18; 8:32; 9:32) and acting with pride and self-interest (Mk 9:38; 10:13, 37, 41). Yet while Jesus' disciples abandon him at his arrest (Mk 14:50; cf. Mk 14:66-72), the crowds, prompted by the religious leaders, actively seek his execution (Mk 15:8-15). The disciples, the reader knows, will be restored and will carry on the ministry of Jesus (Mk 10:39; 13:9-13; 14:28; 16:7); the crowds, however, have rejected the Messiah and will suffer the consequences.

3.2. Matthew. As in Mark, Matthew's most common word for the general population is ochlos (50x). Matthew, however, prefers the plural (31x) to the singular (19x). Laos ("people") appears fourteen times, but plēthos not at all. As in Luke (see 3.3 below), Matthew uses laos in the LXX sense of the nation Israel (Heb. hā'ām).

Matthew's presentation of the crowds in general echoes Mark's. Large crowds follow Jesus throughout his Galilean ministry. The crowds, though outside the sphere of the disciples, are recipients of Jesus' teaching and ministry. They relentlessly pursue him (Mt 8:18; 13:2), are amazed at his teaching (Mt 7:28; 22:33), and seek him out for healing (Mt 4:23-24; 14:14; 15:30; 19:2). Jesus has compassion on them because they are harassed and helpless, like sheep without a shepherd (Mk 9:36). There appears to be an even stronger sense of allegiance to Jesus in Matthew, and seven times Matthew refers to crowds "following" Jesus (Mt 4:25; 8:1; 12:15; 14:13; 19:2; 20:29; 21:9).

It is well known that Matthew's portrayal of the religious leaders is significantly more negative than Mark's. In this regard, the crowds function as a positive foil for the *scribes and *Pharisees. The religious leaders accuse Jesus of *blasphemy when he offers *forgiveness of sins to a paralyzed man (Mt 9:3), but the crowd is filled with awe and glorifies God when Jesus heals the man (Mt 9:8). The Pharisees say that Jesus casts out *demons by Satan's power (Mt 12:24), while the crowd wonders if this might be the *"Son of David" (Mt 12:23). At Jesus' approach to Jerusalem the crowds appear convinced, proclaiming "Hosanna to the Son of David!" (Mt 21:8-9). During Jesus' last week in Jerusalem the religious leaders repeatedly seek to trap him (Mt 21:23—22:46), but the crowds marvel at his teaching (Mt 22:33).

Yet in the end, the crowds remain faithless and outside the realm of discipleship. They appear to waver on whether Jesus is the Son of David (Messiah) or merely a prophet (Mt 16:13-14; 21:9, 11). The group that comes to arrest Jesus is identified as a "crowd" (Mt 26:47, 55), and at Jesus' trial "all the people" (pas ho laos) cry out against him, "His blood is on us and on our children!" The fickle crowd has now turned against Jesus, losing out on the promise of discipleship and becoming the object of God's wrath.

J. Cousland seeks to harmonize Matthew's apparently schizophrenic perspective of the crowds by claiming that the author is projecting extratextual referents from his own social world into the story. The unbelieving Jews of his day are poised midway between the church, which is the new people of God, and the church's enemy, which is emergent Pharisaism, represented in Matthew's story by the religious leaders. While the religious leaders are irretrievably lost, the unbelieving Jews of his day still have opportunity to respond. In short, although Matthew has divorced himself from formulative *Judaism, he is involved in a "custody battle" for the Jewish people themselves (Cousland, 287).

3.3. Luke. Like Matthew and Mark, Luke frequently uses ochlos for the nameless crowd that follows Jesus (41x [25 sg., 16 pl.]). Luke's most distinctive contribution, however, is his preference for laos in the singular, referring to the people of Israel (35x). The plural appears only in Luke 2:31, where it refers to the Gentile nations. Laos can be synonymous with ochlos, referring generally to the crowds that follow Jesus. Both terms are used of those who hear Jesus' teaching (Lk 5:3, 15; 6:17-18), who are amazed and praise God for Jesus' healings (Lk 11:14; 13:17; 18:43), and who provide an obstacle to the religious leaders trying to arrest Jesus in *Jerusalem (Lk 19:48; 20:19; 22:2, 6).

More commonly, laos has the more specialized LXX sense of the people or nation of *Israel (Heb. hā'ām). This fits Luke's theological emphasis on the remnant of faithful Israel, who stand in continuity with the new covenant people of God. Common Lukan phrases include "all the people" (pas ho ochlos [Lk 2:10; 3:21; 7:29; 8:47; 9:13; 18:43; 19:48; 20:6, 45; 21:38; 24:19]) and the "multitude of the people" (to plēthos tou laou [Lk 1:10; 6:17; 23:27]).

In general, Luke's presentation of the people is more positive than Mark's and Matthew's. Luke does not have Jesus' denunciations of "this people" who give God lip service but whose hearts are far from him (Mt 15:8; Mk 7:6-6, citing Is 6:9-10; cf. Is 6:9-10 in Mt 13:14-15). It is not the crowds, but only the chief priests and rulers who cry out for Jesus' crucifixion (Lk 23:13, 18; contrast Mt 27:15, 25; Mk 15:11). While Matthew and Mark describe the people who pass by the crucifixion as mocking Jesus, Luke states only that they "stood by watching" (Lk 23:35). Only Luke records that this assembled crowd went away in deep sorrow, "beating their breasts" (Lk 23:48). This more favorable presentation of the people prepares the reader for the early chapters of Acts, where the preaching of the *resurrection receives a positive reception among the people of Jerusalem.

3.4. John. John uses ochlos twenty times (laos 3x; plēthos 2x), with some of the same functions as in the Synoptics. Great crowds follow Jesus because of his reputation as a *teacher and healer (Jn 6:2, 22; 12:9, 12). Unique to John, the crowd is described as being divided over Jesus' identity (Jn 7:12, 20, 31, 40-43).

More commonly, John's Gospel refers to the people as hoi Ioudaioi ("the Jews" [67x]). This reflects the Johannine Sitz im Leben, where John's late first-century Christian community is increasingly alienated from the synagogue. Although Jesus and his disciples were, of course, Jews, what was once an internecine debate of Jews versus Jews is now becoming Jews versus Christians, a reality being projected back onto the ministry of Jesus. In some contexts Ioudaioi clearly refers to the religious leaders (e.g., Jn 5:10, 15, 16; 9:22; 19:38), and in others to the Jewish population in general. This represents a challenge for Bible translators, who must decide in each case whether to translate Ioudaioi as "Jewish leaders," "Jews" or simply "the people" (see NLT, TEV, CEV, NCV, NET, TNIV, notes in HCSB). The Jews/people (Ioudaioi) can be favorable (Jn 7:35; 8:31; 11:36, 45) or divided (Jn 10:19) over Jesus, but most commonly they are skeptical or openly hostile. They challenge his claims (Jn 8:57), question his miracles (Jn 2:18; 9:18), accuse him of being demon possessed (Jn 8:48, 52), plot to kill him (Jn 7:1), and attempt to stone him (Jn 10:31; 11:8). In the end, they press Pilate to crucify him (Jn 19:7, 12, 15). With some notable exceptions, John portrays the background crowd as representative of unbelieving Jews, both those hostile to Jesus during his public ministry and those in opposition to the church of John's day. In a larger sense, they are parallel in John's Gospel to "the world," the forces of evil that stand in opposition to God's purpose in the *world.

See also APOSTLE; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; ELDERS; FAMILY; GENTILES; ISRAEL; PHARISEES; SCRIBES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Carter, John: Storyteller, Interpreter, Evangelist (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2006) 67-73; J. R. C. Cousland, The Crowds in the Gospel of Matthew (NovTSup 102; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); R. A. Culpepper, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 125-32; L. Kierspel, The Jews and the World in the Fourth Gospel: Parallelism, Function, and Context (WUNT 2/220; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); J. D. Kingsbury, Matthew as Story (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 23-24; E. S. Malbon, "Disciples/Crowds/Whoever: Markan Characters and Readers," NovT 28 (1986) 104-30;

R. Meyer and H. Strathmann, “λαός,” TDNT 4:29-57; R. Meyer and P. Katz, “ὄχλος,” TDNT 5:582-90; P. S. Minear, “The Disciples and the Crowds in the Gospel of Matthew,” in Gospel Studies in Honor of Sherman Elbridge Johnson, ed. M. H. Shepherd and E. C. Hobbs (AThRSup 3; Evanston, IL: Anglican Theological Review, 1974) 81-109; D. Rhoads and D. Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (2nd ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); R. C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts: A Literary Interpretation, 1: The Gospel according to Luke (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986) 143-66. M. L. Strauss

PHARISEES

Evidence from the ancient sources suggests that in general the Pharisees were quite strict or at least very dedicated in their obedience to the Jewish law, especially regulations concerning food, including tithing and hand washing. Beyond this, scholars today do not agree on the level of political participation of the Pharisees during Jesus’ lifetime. The Pharisees can be traced back as far as the Hasmonean dynasty (the Maccabees), in the early second century B.C. From 1 Maccabees 2:42 we learn of a group known as the Hasidim (Gk. Asidaioi), or “pious ones.” How long they had been on the scene before the Maccabean Revolt is difficult to say, but the group’s main feature is its reaction to *Hellenism. The Hasidim grew and split into subgroups, including Pharisees, *Sadducees and *Essenes, and also spawned movements centered on ascetic, charismatic figures. *Josephus describes the Pharisees’ political engagement during the Hasmonean and *Herodian periods, as well as during the First Jewish Revolt. The NT depiction of Pharisees emphasizes interpretation of the *law and critique of Jesus’ teachings and practices. The number of Pharisees is difficult to estimate, but during the time of Herod the Great, Josephus mentions that six thousand refused to vow allegiance to King Herod and to Caesar in *Rome (Ant. 17.42). The Pharisees as a group cease to be noted as an active community in historical sources shortly after the turn of the first century A.D.

1. Evidence in the Gospels
2. The Pharisees in Sources Outside the New Testament
3. Modern Theories Concerning the Historical Pharisees

1. Evidence in the Gospels.

The Gospels discuss the Pharisees as this group interacts with Jesus. In the effort to distinguish Jesus’ teaching and actions, the Gospels critique the Pharisees’ interpretations of the law. Scholars today are divided on the relative influence held by the Pharisees during Jesus’ lifetime, both in terms of direct political involvement and within the religious debates before and directly after the First Jewish Revolt, at the time when the Gospels were written (Eisenbaum, 117-30). A compelling argument is made that the Gospel writers include historical encounters between Jesus and Pharisees in large part because in the writers’ day the Pharisees were also (or even more so) the key interlocutors of the followers of Jesus (Keener).

In general the Pharisees are presented in the Gospels as being concerned with purity issues such as proper hand washing before meals, food laws and tithing (Mk 7:5; Lk 18:11-12) (see Clean and Unclean). Similar emphases are prominent in early rabbinic sources, and Josephus’s depiction of the Pharisees as being focused on strict discipline and ancestral customs is consistent with this portrait. Additionally, the Gospels hint at some sort of official political clout or at least local authority held by the Pharisees. John presents the Pharisees as being active with the chief priests in making political decisions on behalf of the Jews vis-à-vis Roman imperial presence.

Although the Pharisees generally are viewed negatively in the Gospels, there are also several neutral or even positive comments, especially in Luke’s Gospel. For example, in Luke 13:31 the Pharisees warn Jesus about political trouble. Possibly these Pharisees believed that Jesus held common cause with them in their critique of the political establishment, in this case Herod Antipas. These details suggest that at times some Pharisees expressed benign curiosity or concern toward Jesus. When we compare Matthew and Luke, we find in a few places that Matthew explicitly names Pharisees as Jesus’ antagonists (Mt 3:7-12; 9:32-34; 12:22-24), while Luke identifies them more generally as “the multitudes” (Lk 3:7-9), “some of the people” (Lk 11:14-15) or “others” (Lk 11:16) (see People, Crowd).

1.1. Gospel of Matthew. Matthew speaks of the Pharisees in Matthew 9:11, 14, 34; 12:2, 14, 24; 15:12; 19:3; 21:45; 22:15, 34, 41. He pairs them with the Sadducees in Matthew 3:7; 16:1, 6, 11-12; in Matthew 3 *John the Baptist identifies both groups as a “brood of vipers,” and in Matthew 16 Jesus warns again both groups’ teachings. Matthew speaks of Pharisees and scribes in Matthew 5:20; 12:38; 15:1; 23:2, 13-29. Matthew notes that the chief *priests and the Pharisees went to Pilate after Jesus’ death and asked that guards be posted at the tomb (Mt 27:62-63), suggesting that the Pharisees had some political voice or influence in representing Jewish views before the Roman government. The fact that the Pharisees often are presented as working with another group (scribes, Sadducees, chief priests) cautions the reader against casting the Pharisees as Jesus' arch-enemy. Instead, the picture sketches an interconnecting web of influence by these groups, all of whom fail to appreciate Jesus' message.

In Matthew's Gospel several dramatic encounters with the Pharisees drive home Matthew's point that the Pharisees' teaching and praxis are antithetical to Jesus' message and call. Matthew sets the stage for this with John the Baptist's angry retort to the Pharisees (and Sadducees) who came out to hear him; they were nothing more than a "brood of vipers" (Mt 3:7). A similar charge is laid against the Pharisees (and scribes) by Jesus in Matthew 23:33, in a chapter highly charged with hyperbole and rhetorical sting. This phrase serves as a rhetorical marker, and the pages between the two occurrences of "brood of vipers" tell of a slowly building conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees over God's requirements for righteousness (Mt 5:20) (see Justice, Righteousness). The practices and attitudes so virulently condemned by Jesus in Matthew 23 have attracted his attention throughout his ministry. For example, Matthew 9:11-14 points to different habits of fasting, as well as purity codes for eating, which distinguish Jesus from the Pharisees. A similar situation arises in Matthew 15:1-2, in which the Pharisees point to the "traditions of the elders" to defend their praxis of hand washing before meals. Matthew 12:2 addresses the Pharisees' insistence on a definition of "rest" on the *Sabbath, which precludes Jesus' *healing activities. To these accusations Jesus counters that the Pharisees are blind guides (Mt 15:14), a charge that he will reinforce in Matthew 23. An irreparable rupture occurs in Matthew 21:46 after Jesus offers his parable of the vineyard (Mt 21:33-44) condemning the leadership of the Pharisees and the chief priests. At this point, they determine to arrest him.

Matthew 23 presents Jesus' strongest critique of the Pharisees, although the rhetoric can blind the reader to important points of affirmation. First, Jesus introduces the Pharisees as reading the law of Moses (they "sit on Moses' seat" [Mt 23:2]) in public venues, probably *synagogue services. Jesus commends them, encouraging his disciples to listen carefully to the words that they read aloud. Second, Jesus acknowledges that the Pharisees have rightly paid attention to certain aspects of the law. For example, they consistently tithe every part of their food, including spices (Mt 23:23). Third, Jesus admits that they are concerned to pass along their traditions and practices to others (Mt 23:15). But these positive notes are drowned by the thunderous charges of hypocrisy and blindness. The term *"hypocrite" (Gk. hypokritēs) had a wider range of meanings in Jesus' day than in our own. While it did refer to someone who dissembles or pretends one thing while doing another, it also could carry the sense of someone doing an interpretation or of an actor playing a role on stage. In LXX Job 34:30; 36:13 the term "hypocrite" describes one who turns aside from following God, oppresses the poor and ensnares the people. Such persons resist God as he seeks to teach them. Additionally, Psalms of Solomon 4:1-8 speaks of "those who live in hypocrisy [hypokrisis]," people who make a great public show of almsgiving and zealotry, but when out of the public eye they seek out adulterous affairs and lie when taking *oaths. Jesus seems to use "hypocrites" with this force in Matthew 6:2 when he critiques those who draw attention to themselves when giving alms. Jesus may have been drawing on this sense of the term also in Matthew 23, denouncing the Pharisees for promoting themselves, failing to hear his teachings from God, and blindly pursuing the traditions of the *elders.

1.2. Gospel of Mark. Mark mentions the Pharisees in Mark 2:18, 24; 3:6; 8:11, 15; 10:2, always in conflict with Jesus and the disciples. In Mark 2:16; 7:1-5 the Pharisees act with the scribes, and in Mark 3:6; 12:13 with the *Herodians. In general we find the Pharisees arguing with Jesus about *fasting, *divorce, taxes, food laws and Sabbath practices, disagreements highlighted throughout the Gospels. Two points of interest rise to the surface in Mark's account. First, in Mark 2:18 people hold up to Jesus the disciples of John the Baptist and the Pharisees as models of fasting. Their approval of such fasting suggests widespread support for the practice and sympathy for the Pharisaic approach. Moreover, it implies similarities to the fasting done by John the Baptist's disciples (see also Lk 5:33). Second, in Mark 8:11-15 Jesus warns against the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod (Antipas, Herod the Great's son), connecting the Pharisees and Herod Antipas as enemies of Jesus. Mentioning the Pharisees and Herod together could suggest to the reader that Mark views the Pharisees as having political power, so it is interesting that Mark does not include the Pharisees explicitly in his passion narrative.

Mark's ambiguous evidence to our question of the Pharisees' political influence in Jesus' day is symptomatic of the evidence preserved in all our sources.

Theories of Pharisees' political influence or engagement include a range of viewpoints: (1) open, armed revolt; (2) sporadic, spontaneous, armed revolt; (3) giving verbal encouragement to those who took up arms; (4) striving for direct political power within the Hasmonean and Herodian courts or with the Roman government; (5) striving to influence political leaders such as Herod the Great; (6) holding official positions within the Jewish council/*Sanhedrin; (7) influencing the dialogue about Roman rule over Judea and Galilee. Scholars generally agree that at least during the Hasmonean period and the First Jewish Revolt, the Pharisees were politically influential (cf. items 4, 5 in the foregoing list). The fact that Josephus speaks extensively about minor uprisings occurring throughout the first century A.D. in numerous towns suggests that political resistance was common and promoted. If the Pharisees' views were popular among the people, as Mark's Gospel suggests, then a logical conclusion is that these views in some way were at least consistent with the political action or attitude of resistance that apparently permeated Judea and Galilee (cf. items 1, 2, 3, 7 in the foregoing list). Although Mark does not present the Pharisees as being present during Jesus' passion, he develops a close relationship between the Pharisees and Herodians, the latter being key players in the final week of Jesus' life (Mk 12:13).

1.3. Gospel of Luke (and Acts of the Apostles).

Pharisees are mentioned in Luke 6:2; 11:42-43; 12:1; 16:14; 17:20; 18:10-11; 19:39; with scribes in Luke 5:30; 6:7-11; 11:53; 15:2; with teachers of the law in Luke 5:17-26; 7:30, 33; 14:1-3. Luke does not present the Sadducees together with the Pharisees, but Acts 5:33-34 notes that Gamaliel, a Pharisee, was a member of the ruling council (see also Acts 22:3). This body included the high priest and the Sadducees, and both Pharisees and Sadducees are present at Paul's hearing before the council (Acts 23:6-9). It is logical to assume that Luke knew that Pharisees were present on the council, thus he chose for rhetorical reasons not to mention them at Jesus' trial. These might include his concern to present both Gamaliel, Paul's teacher, and the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead in a positive light. Moreover, because some believers belonged to the sect of the Pharisees (Acts 15:5), Luke may have decided to play down the role of the Pharisees in Jesus' death so as not to antagonize this group of Christians.

Paul's defense in Acts 23:6-9; 26:5 highlights the Pharisees' belief in the "resurrection and in *angels. Luke draws attention to the belief in the resurrection in his description of Jesus' encounter with Pharisees at a meal on the Sabbath (Lk 14:1-14). On the way to the meal, Jesus heals a man, which flouts their definition of Sabbath rest. Once at the house, Jesus notices guests jockeying for the seats of highest honor, which he roundly criticizes. Then he turns to his host and challenges him to offer a place at his banquet to those unable to repay the favor; in so doing, he will be repaid at the resurrection of the righteous. Luke's Gospel generally criticizes wealth and underscores generosity; reinforcing this theme is Luke's statement that the Pharisees were lovers of money (Lk 16:14) (see Rich and Poor). This charge follows Luke's parable of the shrewd manager (Lk 16:1-9) and a call to his disciples to resist the lure of wealth (Lk 16:10-13). The picture that Luke paints here is of the Pharisees deceitfully presenting themselves as virtuous in public while hiding hearts that put human honor above faithfulness to God. This critique against ostentatious display of wealth or status was common in the ancient world, as was the desire to gain honor at all costs.

1.4. Gospel of John. Pharisees are mentioned in John 1:24; 4:1; 7:32, 45-52; 8:3-20; 11:45-57; 12:19, 42; 18:3, and for the most part they function in opposition to Jesus, both in their assessment of his teachings and in the political power that they wield to silence him. They operate in Galilee and Jerusalem, often allied with the chief priests. They convene a council with the chief priests to discuss how to mitigate the influence of Jesus' signs on the people, fearing that if left unchecked, Jesus' ministry would result in Rome taking over the temple and the nation (Jn 11:48). John does not mention scribes or Sadducees explicitly; however, it is possible that some of the priests (Jn 1:19) or chief priests were of the Sadducees. John notes that the Pharisees send an embassy to question John the Baptist about his baptizing practices (Jn 1:24), and they order guards to arrest Jesus (Jn 7:32-47). Some argue the Pharisees had power in the synagogue, citing the healing of the blind man in John 9:13-41. John states that "the Jews" expel anyone from the synagogue who confesses Jesus as the Messiah (Jn 9:22). Johannine scholars debate two points: (1) how to interpret the phrase "the Jews"; (2) whether to equate "the Jews" with the Pharisees. First, the Greek allows that "the Jews" (hoi Ioudaioi) can be rendered as "the Judeans"—that is, those who come from Judea, or perhaps more specifically, from the Jerusalem area. Thus, John would be making a political statement about the influence of Judeans on the Galilee. Others stress the religious connotations of the term, arguing that John presents "the Jews" as the dominant religious interpreters who challenge Jesus' authority and message. Second, in John 1:19-24 we find "the Jews" and "the Pharisees" presented as synonyms, suggesting to some that John 1 and John 9 posit the Pharisees as ruling the Jewish people (in political and/or religious matters). The weight of evidence leans toward understanding "the Jews" as those leaders centered in Jerusalem who speak authoritatively on Jewish legal matters. These leaders would have included Pharisees in their numbers, but we should not assume that every Jewish leader held to Pharisaic teachings.

Within the broader storyline of hostility between Jesus and the Pharisees in John is a secondary narrative of a Pharisee agreeing with Jesus' message. Perhaps the most famous Pharisee in the NT aside from Paul is Nicodemus (Jn 3:1-2; 7:50; 19:39). He visits Jesus at night, asking to know more about his teachings. He becomes a follower, aiding Joseph of Arimathea in Jesus' *burial. Both stories are located in Jerusalem. Another well-known Pharisee from the first century A.D. is Josephus, who makes this statement: "So when I had accomplished my desires, I returned back to the city, being now nineteen years old, and began to conduct myself [politeuesthai] according to the rules of the sect of the Pharisees, which is of kin to the sect of the Stoics, as the Greeks call them" (Life 12). Most see this passage as stating that Josephus joined the Pharisees. A minority suggests that the verb politeuesthai should be rendered as "to engage in public life," so that the passage would read, "Following my protracted wilderness retreat, I returned to the city and began to engage in public affairs" following the school of the Pharisees (Mason). In this assessment, Josephus is following the practice of Roman aristocrats who upon adulthood explore the philosophical schools briefly before settling into their careers as elite members of society. Josephus determined to rule in accordance with Pharisaic ways, even as do the Sadducees, by seeking popular support as did the Pharisees. This reading's political emphasis fits well with John's accent on the Pharisees' political influence during Jesus' lifetime.

2. The Pharisees in Sources Outside the New Testament.

2.1. Josephus. Josephus discusses the Pharisees from three vantage points, those of (1) the Jewish people, (2) the Greco-Roman philosophical schools, (3) the political class, including Hasmonean, Herodian and Roman leaders. Both Josephus and the NT use the term "Pharisees." Yet Josephus also uses other terms to describe groups or people who bear a striking resemblance to the Pharisees. For example, in Jewish Antiquities 20.200-201 Josephus describes the death of James, brother of Jesus, at the hands of Ananus the high priest. The group appalled by this crime is identified as those who follow the law with precision (akribeis). Elsewhere in Jewish Antiquities Josephus has defined the Pharisees in exactly these terms, but it is impossible to know whether he assumed that his audience would make the connection, or whether, by not labeling the group as Pharisees, he was making clear that this group should not be considered Pharisees. Another possible synonym for "Pharisees" is sophistai (Ant. 17.149-166; J.W. 1.648).

2.1.1. Pharisees and the Jewish People. Josephus suggests that the Pharisees had the ear of the people; he notes this both in his historical narrative and in his discussion of the Jewish philosophies (Ant. 13.288, 298; 18.15-17). He claims that one specific reason for their popularity is their teaching on the resurrection of the dead (Ant. 18.14). Josephus's emphasis on the Pharisees' position on fate and free will fits well with their belief in rewards and punishments after death. Questions arise, however, concerning whether Josephus describes the Pharisees as holding to reincarnation or bodily resurrection. The confusion is due to his claims that a new, holy body awaits the righteous at the end of the ages. Because he presents a linear timeline rather than a cyclical view of history, and because he views the body as good not evil, we should lean toward seeing Josephus expressing a type of resurrection rather than a form of reincarnation. Josephus also notes that the Pharisees were more lenient in their application of the law than were the Sadducees (Ant. 13.294; 20.199). Josephus speaks of Pharisees practicing ancestral customs and teachings of the fathers (Ant. 13.296-298; see also Ant. 13.408; 17.41).

2.1.2. Pharisees and Philosophical Schools. The discussion of Pharisaic thought as a Jewish philosophical school occurs in Jewish War 2.119-166; Jewish Antiquities 13.171-173; 18.11-22; The Life 10-12. Josephus describes the Essenes, Pharisees and Sadducees, as well as the followers of the rebel Judas (Fourth Philosophy), as haireseis, which has been variously translated as "sects," "factions," "schools of thought" with discernable membership and definable philosophical beliefs, including their positions on fate/free will (Mason). Josephus contrasts the Pharisees with the Sadducees, a picture supported by the NT (Acts 23:6-10) and rabbinic texts (e.g., m. Yad. 4:6-7) that mention šəḏūkīm (Sadducees) in contrast to pərūšīm (Pharisees). Often the picture drawn of the Sadducees is that of a wealthy, priestly class who had charge over the temple and served as collaborators with the Roman government in ruling Judea and Galilee. M. Goodman challenges this reconstruction, noting that Josephus does not state that Sadducees were wealthy, but only that their arguments persuaded the wealthy. Again, Josephus does not say that the Sadducees ran the temple, but that it was the Pharisees' ideas that must be followed by the priests because the masses were persuaded by the Pharisees (Ant. 18.15). Additionally, the Sadducees were not extinguished in the First Jewish Revolt, but remained a force through at least the last decade of the first century A.D., since Josephus mentioned them in the present tense in his Life, written after A.D. 93. Their existence, then, does not depend upon that of the temple. The evidence suggests that the Sadducees leaned away from ancestral traditions and the general trends embracing resurrection of the dead (see Josephus, J.W. 2.164-166; Ant. 18.16-17; see also Acts 23:7-8). From this explanation of the evidence, then, we should not assume that Pharisees were poor relatives to the Sadducees or that Pharisees did not participate in governing the temple. Indeed, the Gospels confirm that Pharisees were involved in decisions concerning the temple and could be wealthy.

S. Mason argues that in order to fully appreciate what Josephus is doing in his descriptions of the three philosophies (and secondarily with the Fourth Philosophy), we must realize that many ancient authors offered descriptions of the Greco-Roman philosophical schools. A major question addressed by Roman authors was the relationship between free will and fate. According to Josephus, the Pharisees believed in both fate and free will (J.W. 2.162-165; see also Ant. 13.171-173). Perhaps Cicero speaks of a similar idea in describing the view of Chrysippus, who postulated a principal (fate) and a proximate (free will) cause. When someone pushes a drum down a hill, the principal cause of its rolling is its shape, but the proximate cause is the human who pushed it (Cicero, Fat. 41-42). A similar note is taken in m. 'Abot 3:16, where Rabbi Akiba says, "All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is given." Some see Josephus using the language of fate and free will to translate the Pharisees' view about how much they should work for political change and how much they should wait for God to act and bring about change (Wright). By using the language of fate and free will, Josephus could be trying to obfuscate revolutionary tendencies (see Revolutionary Movements).

2.1.3. Pharisees and Politics. Josephus's story of the golden eagle often is cited as evidence of the Pharisees' political engagement. Josephus describes two leaders, Judas and Matthias, who urge their disciples to cut down an eagle (likely a carved stone relief plated with gold) displayed above a temple gate. They did so in broad daylight, believing that Herod the Great had just died. Sadly for them, they were mistaken; Herod's troops arrested about forty men, as well as the ringleaders, and had them killed. In Jewish War 1.648-655 Josephus speaks about those involved as ones who seem to have precision in ancestral customs; importantly, he does not identify the group specifically as Pharisees but rather as sophistai, or Sages (see also Ant. 17.149-166). In Jewish War 2.117-118 Josephus speaks of Judas the Galilean, a sophistēs who established his own sect that promoted violent resistance against the census undertaken by Quirinius after Archelaus was deposed in A.D. 6. The same story is retold in Jewish Antiquities 18.4, but here Josephus mentions that Saddok the Pharisee joined Judas. Scholars differ on whether Josephus intends for his readers to assume that sophistai are the same group as the Pharisees. It is possible that Josephus understands the terms synonymously at least in reflecting their political assessment of Herod and his son's rule.

2.2. Dead Sea Scrolls. The *Dead Sea Scrolls do not identify the Pharisees explicitly, but they do mention the "Expounders of Smooth Things" as a group at odds with their own. In 4Q169 is a story similar to that told by Josephus (J.W. 1.92-98) about unnamed opponents of Alexander Jannaeus who attempt to oust him by seeking out the Seleucid ruler Demetrius III Eukeres. The coup fails, and Jannaeus kills eight hundred foes. When his wife takes the crown, the Pharisees gain power, and they avenge those eight hundred deaths (Josephus, J.W. 1.113; Ant. 13.410). The assumption is that Alexander Jannaeus's opponents were Pharisees and thus the same as the Expounders of Smooth Things. If this identification is correct, we find corroborating evidence for Josephus as to the political involvement by the Pharisees during the Hasmonean period. The Damascus Document notes that the Expounders looked for loopholes in the law and easy interpretations (CD-A I, 18-19). It is possible that CD-A I, 18-21 draws from Isaiah 30:10, in which case the Damascus Document accuses the Pharisees of promoting self-serving falsehoods. It is also possible that the accusation of seeking easy interpretations could be similar to Josephus's statement that the Pharisees were lenient in meting out punishments under the law (Ant. 13.297-298). A final DSS text, 4QMMT, is discussed below, but its evidence supports the NT's claims that the Pharisees were interested in purity issues. Thus, both Josephus's picture of political involvement during the Hasmonean period and the NT's portrait of the Pharisees' interests in purity issues are corroborated by the DSS.

2.3. Rabbinic Sources. The Gospels, Josephus and Paul speak of pharisaïos ("Pharisee"). The Hebrew for "Pharisee" is parûš, and it has been argued that this designation stems from the group's separatist nature (pāraš means "to separate"). The compilers of the Mishnah never refer to themselves as pērûšîm; however, they do distinguish the latter group from the Sadducees (m. Yad. 4:6). The rabbinic term used most to describe what scholars today identify as Pharisees is ḥākāmîm ("Sages"). The Mishnah traces its own views on key purity issues such as tithing, food laws and Sabbath to these Sages. Another term often used to defend the separatist nature of the Pharisees is ḥābērîm ("associates"), describing those who gather in exclusive communities known as ḥābūrôt. In the Mishnah this group shows great concern over hand washing and tithing (m. Demai 2:2-3) over against a group identified as ʿam-hāʾāreš (lit., "people of the land"), undisciplined Jews who do not follow the rabbinic codes for food and tithing purity. But it is unclear whether the ḥābērîm are synonymous with the Sages, or whether two different but related groups are identified. In a few rabbinic sources (m. Hag. 2:2; m. ʾAbot 1:1-18) are lists of authorities, including Gamaliel and Simeon ben Gamaliel. The former is identified as a Pharisee in Acts 5:34, and the latter as such in Josephus, Vita 190-192. This may be evidence that the Sages were Pharisees, or that these men belonged to both groups, as apparently in Josephus's view. Pharisees also might count themselves as part of the Fourth Philosophy (Josephus, Ant. 18.4, 23).

Rabbinic sources present several difficulties for reconstructing first-century A.D. Pharisaic thought and practice. First, the rabbinic evidence for Pharisees is preserved in material written much later than the persons and events described (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Additionally, even if rabbinic sources preserve genuine historical situations from pre-A.D. 70, the later rabbinic content and context involving the Pharisees might be quite different from that of the first centuries B.C. and A.D. (Wright; Goodman). Finally, although many today view the house of Hillel and the house of Shammai as representing two viewpoints among Pharisees pre-A.D. 70, never in the rabbinic corpus are they identified as pērûšîm. The indirect evidence comes from m. ʾAbot 1:1-18, the list noted above that includes Gamaliel.

No negative comments are made about the house of Hillel, while strong criticisms are leveled against the house of Shammai. This bias makes it difficult to assess the preserved opinions.

Even with the above cautions duly noted, some ties between the rabbinic material and the Pharisees' conversations seem likely. Both Josephus and the NT confirm that Pharisees relied on the "traditions of the elders" in practicing the teachings of Moses, and the Mishnah reveals a similar focus on these customs. The comparable views held by earlier Sages described on the Mishnah's pages and the purity issues attributed to the Pharisees in the NT suggest to most scholars that the rabbinic material reflects Pharisaic teachings to one degree or another. Further corroboration comes from the Qumran text 4Q394 (4QMMT^a frag 8 col IV) and 4Q396 (4QMMT^c col II), which highlights legal disputes concerning purity that occupied various groups of Jews in the Second Temple period, including the Pharisees. Although the oral law as it is worked out in the rabbinic texts cannot be historically verified in the first century A.D. (Neusner; Jaffee; Mason), we find the use of extrabiblical traditions and customs to explain, interpret and synthesize the Pentateuch present among the Pharisees and other Jews of this period. The Sages do not draw direct historical or social connections between themselves and Pharisees, but perhaps this is not surprising, since the rabbis understand their enterprise to reach back to the teachings of Moses and to represent the ideal for all Jews, not a particular group from a single era.

3. Modern Theories Concerning the Historical Pharisees.

Today two basic reconstructions are presented on the political engagement of the historical Pharisees during Jesus' lifetime. Either the Pharisees are withdrawn from the wider political arena and focused on details of *table fellowship, or they are politically engaged in addressing *Roman rule and establishing standards for Jewish piety. The evidence points to continued political involvement at the local and national level from the Hasmonean period through to the First Jewish Revolt.

A second key component of any modern theory on the Pharisees relates to the characteristics of their teachings. Some argue that the Pharisees were inventive and focused on dietary laws and table fellowship (Neusner). Others see them as innovative, but in a lenient direction, which appealed to the average Jew (Eisenbaum). Some suggest that they were traditionalists, supporting the ancestral customs and reacting against the innovations of the Hasmoneans and Herodians (Goodman; Wright). The Pharisees are viewed as being on the people's side in maintaining Jewish practices against the encroachment of the Greek and Roman political and social agendas. The majority of the evidence indicates that in general the Pharisees were seen as preserving the highest goals of purity surrounding food laws broadly understood (including, e.g., tithing). A few, such as the covenanters of the DSS, might harass the Pharisees as lenient, but the vast majority of people looked up to them as pious protectors of the traditional practices of Judaism.

See also CLEAN AND UNCLEAN; ELDER; ESSENES; JOSEPHUS; JUDAISM, COMMON; LAW; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS; SADDUCEES; SCRIBES; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. J. D. Cohen, From the Maccabees to the Mishnah (2nd ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2006); P. Eisenbaum, Paul Was Not a Christian: The Original Message of a Misunderstood Apostle (New York: HarperOne, 2009); C. D. Elledge, Life after Death in Early Judaism: The Evidence of Josephus (WUNT 2/208; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); M. Goodman, Judaism in the Roman World: Collected Essays (AGJU 66; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2007); M. S. Jaffee, Torah in the Mouth: Writing and Oral Tradition in Palestinian Judaism, 200 BCE-400 CE (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001); C. S. Keener, The Gospel of Matthew: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); S. Mason, Flavius Josephus on the Pharisees: A Composition-Critical Study (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001); J. Neusner, "The Debate with E. P. Sanders Since 1970," and "The Rabbinic Tradition about Pharisees before 70 C.E.: An Overview," in In Quest of the Historical Pharisees, ed. J. Neusner and B. D. Chilton (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2007) 395-405; J. Neusner and B. D. Chilton, eds., In Quest of the Historical Pharisees (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2007); A. J. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE-66 CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992).

L. Cohick

PHILIP THE TETRARCH. See HERODIAN DYNASTY.

PILATE. See PONTIUS PILATE.

PONTIUS PILATE

Pontius Pilate was the Roman prefect of Judea (A.D. 26-early 37) who authorized Jesus' crucifixion.

1. Sources
2. Pilate's Governorship
3. The Execution of Jesus
4. Pilate's Departure

1. Sources.

Aside from Tacitus (Ann. 15.44.4), all our information regarding Pilate comes from Jewish or Christian sources: *Josephus (J.W. 2.169-177; Ant. 18.35, 55-62, 85-89), Philo (Legat. 299-305), the Gospels (Mt 27:1-2, 11-26, 57-66; Mk 15:1-15, 43-45; Luke 3:1; 13:1; 20:20; 23:1-25, 50-53; Jn 18:28-19:22, 38) and Acts (3:13; 4:27-28; 13:28). We also have two archeological links: a damaged inscription found in Caesarea Maritima in 1961, and a series of inoffensive bronze coins (dated A.D. 29/30, 30/31, 31/32).

2. Pilate's Governorship.

Nothing is known of Pilate before he arrived in Judea in A.D. 26, though he probably was an Italian equestrian (a Roman knight) who rose to prominence through military service. The Caesarea inscription gives his title as praefectus ("prefect"), a military term reflecting the fact that the small but turbulent province had only recently come under direct Roman rule, and the governor's chief task was to maintain law and order (see Rome). Pilate lived in the Roman headquarters at Caesarea Maritima with a small entourage and a body of auxiliary troops, visiting *Jerusalem to keep order during Jewish *festivals.

Early on, Pilate sent a body of troops to spend the winter in the Antonia fortress in Jerusalem. The troops' standards, however, displayed images of the emperor that were forbidden by Jewish law. Large numbers of Jews complained to Pilate in Caesarea, surrounding his house for five days. On the sixth day Pilate ordered his men to draw their swords; the Jews, however, bared their necks and declared themselves willing to die rather than transgress their ancestral laws. Pilate, amazed at their resolve, had the troops removed (Josephus, J.W. 2.169-174; Ant. 18.55-59). This incident usually is dated to Pilate's first winter, in A.D. 26; it is first in Josephus's chronicle and has the air of a new governor testing public opinion. Despite his initial insensitivity, Pilate was willing to compromise rather than begin his governorship with bloodshed.

Some time later Pilate ordered the construction of an aqueduct in Jerusalem. The project was financed by surplus temple funds (see m. Šeqal. 4:2), but once again trouble erupted. The precise cause is unclear. Did Pilate use up too much money? Or was there a problem with the route of the aqueduct (e.g., passing by a burial place)? Whatever the cause, when Pilate was in Jerusalem (presumably for a feast), angry protesters surrounded his tribunal. At his signal, plainclothes soldiers beat rioters with clubs, killing many (Josephus, J.W. 2.172-174; Ant. 18.60-62; possibly Luke 13:1).

Philo adds a story in which Pilate set up gilded shields in honor of the emperor in his Jerusalem headquarters, Herod I's palace (the praetorium). The shields bore no image, but they did contain Tiberius's full name, including his designation as "son of the deified Augustus." Disquiet grew at this reference to a pagan god in Jerusalem until four of Herod's sons (presumably including Antipas and Philip) appealed to Pilate to remove the offensive shields. When he refused, they took their grievance to Tiberius, who angrily ordered Pilate to relocate the shields to the temple of Augustus in Caesarea. Philo's account is full of slurs on Pilate's character: he is "a man of inflexible, stubborn and cruel disposition," and his administration displayed "his venality, his violence, his thefts, his assaults, his abusive behavior, his frequent executions of untried prisoners, and his endless savage ferocity." This description, however, needs to be regarded with great caution: Philo's highly apologetic account has heaped a range of stereotypical character slurs on Pilate so that he acts as a foil to the regal, beneficent Tiberius. The incident may date to the troubled period after the fall of Tiberius's closest adviser, Sejanus (October 18, A.D. 31), when provincial governors were keen to display their loyalty. The Caesarea inscription originally belonged to a "Tiberieum," presumably a building set up in honor of the emperor, and may well come from the same period.

3. The Execution of Jesus.

All four Gospels describe Jesus' trial in front of Pilate, though the details of the accounts vary. Where they all agree is that Jesus was arrested on the orders of the high priest and his advisers, passed to Pilate early the following morning, and, after some kind of a hearing, sent to the cross. There is no reason to doubt the historical reliability of this outline. The high priest Caiaphas owed his position to Rome and clearly had a good working relationship with Pilate; both he and Pilate wanted to keep the peace, particularly in a crowded city at Passover. There was no set legal procedure in the case of a provincial such as Jesus; how Pilate handled the case and what sentence he imposed lay entirely with him as governor. Clearly, Pilate regarded Jesus as a troublemaker, a man with dangerous aspirations, and crucified him under the ironically mocking title "King of the Jews" (see Death of Jesus).

4. Pilate's Departure.

Late in A.D. 36 a Samaritan "messiah" gathered a large crowd of armed followers at the foot of Mount Gerizim, promising to lead them up the mountain and reveal sacred vessels hidden by Moses. Before they could begin their ascent, Pilate sent a detachment of cavalry and heavily armed infantry to block their path; a battle ensued, resulting in many casualties. The Samaritan leaders complained to the Syrian legate Vitellius, who ordered Pilate to account for himself before the emperor. Pilate hurried to Rome but arrived after Tiberius's death (March 14, A.D. 37) to find Gaius Caligula on the throne (Josephus, Ant. 18.85-89).

What became of Pilate is unknown. After more than ten years in Judea, Gaius may well have decided to move Pilate elsewhere. Christian tradition, however, enjoyed speculating about his ending. A body of noncanonical literature testifies to an ongoing fascination with the Roman prefect in the early church. And while Western traditions often judged him harshly, he and his wife were canonized in the Ethiopic Church.

See also ROME; TRIAL OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. K. Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and Interpretation (SNTSMS 100; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998); W. Carter, Pontius Pilate: Portraits of a Roman Governor (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2003); S. Mason, Josephus and the New Testament (rev. ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); B. McGing, "Pontius Pilate and the Sources," CBQ 53 (1991) 416-38; E. P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993); D. R. Schwartz, "Pontius Pilate" in ABD (1992) 5:395-401; J. Taylor, "Pontius Pilate and the Imperial Cult in Roman Judaea," NTS 52 (2006) 555-82.

H. K. Bond

POOR. See RICH AND POOR.

POSTCOLONIAL CRITICISM

Postcolonialism is an umbrella term for investigating the ramifications of colonization, interrogating the systems of knowledge and power that impact the rhetoric of such discourses, and fostering the viewpoints of marginalized peoples while critiquing structures perpetuating cultural domination. In a historical sense, the term postcolonial refers to a recent period of analysis and critique of the history of colonization in the Western world, a period extending from the sixteenth to the early twentieth centuries.

Postcolonial criticism, then, is not a method with specific guidelines for the interpreter handling biblical texts, but rather a sensitivity and perspective attentive to the relationship between the interpretation of texts and the power structures in which those texts are situated, both in the ancient world and in the contemporary world. Deriving from this broader interdisciplinary and sophisticated theoretical approach, proponents interpret literary documents—for example, ancient documents and the later interpretations surrounding those texts—in light of the complex interplay of numerous concerns related to agendas, purposes and representations. One of the primary concerns is whether a given “text” (written or otherwise) supports, critiques or ridicules the colonizer (or the colonized), its discourse and agenda. Do the social structures that are in power force “texts” to construct a view sympathetic with their cause? With this question in mind, postcolonial interpreters examine biblical texts, which often lie between those in power and those disempowered. In addition, postcolonial criticism is concerned with questioning the history of biblical interpretation. Claims of objective interpretation are assumed to hide broader, underlying agendas.

1. Early Theorists and Their Contributions
2. R. S. Sugirtharajah’s Influence
3. Postcolonial Reading of Biblical Texts

1. Early Theorists and Their Contributions.

Numerous contemporary theorists continue to give shape and substance to the approach. Instrumental in its growing popularity were the early theoretical contributions of Edward Said, Homi Bhabha and Gayatri Spivak.

1.1. Edward Said. Said’s project Orientalism (1978) is viewed by many as the formal starting point for the academic interest in this approach. Said’s broad-ranging cultural project was a study of the social history of how the West observed, described and manufactured conceptions of the East as “oriental”—that is, the “other”—often failing to consider the subjectivity of the persons of their study. The assumed objectivity of the West presented a particular kind of “truth” that represented the other in a manner that was less appealing, more sensual (especially Eastern females) and less rational (by Western standards). Among other things, Said’s study contributed ideas advantageous to a larger theoretical framework, such as contrapuntal reading, which is the desire to read at least two documents from different perspectives simultaneously, one from the inside and one from the outside.

To read contrapuntally is to juxtapose the texts of the mainstream with those of the subaltern, or the texts of the colonizer with those of the colonized. This approach allows interpreters to place these documents in “conversation” with one another. This is not an attempt to establish a hierarchy of meaning, as if one text were more valuable than the other; rather, it is to look for gaps as well as links between the two. This strategy may include the reading of “primary” texts as well as “secondary” interpretations of primary texts. Accordingly, one reads “marginal” or “indigenous” scholarship alongside “mainstream” (usually European/North American, Western, white, male) scholarship.

1.2. Homi Bhabha. Bhabha, and the later Said, recognized the complex structures in place for investigations of the other. Sometimes the indigenous take on or assume the rhetoric of the colonizers, living simultaneously in two complex worlds. Bhabha contributes the concept of ambivalence or hybridity, the coming together of two spaces in which neither space is completely abolished, thereby creating an “ambivalent” or a “hybrid” space. Bhabha refers to this as a “third space.” In an interview with W. J. T. Mitchell, Bhabha describes an example of what he calls a “vegetarian Bible.” Hindus were willing to become Christian Hindus if the Christian priests relinquished eating meat. Christian Hindus, and the “Bible” they translated into the Indian language, became a hybridized and newly developed space partly separated from the English-speaking Western world.

1.3. Gayatri Spivak. Spivak, more than Said or Bhabha, investigated the literary-linguistic side of postcolonial studies. In an oft-quoted essay, “Can the Subaltern Speak?” Spivak questioned the potential of the indigenous/marginalized to have their own say. In the traditional, historical and academic record others represent the subaltern, the natives about whom the historical events are generally recorded. If one follows colonial history only, “the subaltern has no history and cannot speak” (Spivak, 28). Such history is an elitist perspective. Spivak’s clarion call (along with others, such as Ranajit Guha and Dipesh Chakrabarty) has sensitized postcolonial theorists to redirect some of their projects in a more intentional way.

2. R. S. Sugirtharajah’s Influence.

No person is more often associated with postcolonial criticism than R. S. Sugirtharajah, of the University of Birmingham. From his groundbreaking edited (and updated) collection Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World, widely used as a textbook in biblical and theological classes, to his role as editor of the The Bible and Postcolonialism series, he continues to discern and foster new conversations under this approach. At present, he has two Festschriften in his honor, contributing to his impact on the field (Premnath; Liew 2009). Sugirtharajah challenges fellow sojourners to rethink the centrality of the Bible—that is, the collection of ancient documents of the ancient Near Eastern and Mediterranean worlds. De-centering the text (even the biblical text) is one objective of some postcolonial interpreters, a phenomenon overlooked in some earlier examinations “from the margins.” The centrality of the Bible was one predicament, according to Sugirtharajah, in the early stages of liberation theology. Theologically, Sugirtharajah desires to foster a more vibrant interreligious dynamic, one perhaps akin to the “third space” that Bhabha envisioned. Even the religious notion of “monotheism,” despite its theological emphasis in the NT, has damaging implications for contemporary Christianity, according to Sugirtharajah, especially for those desiring to reside in a more polytheistic, global and less exclusive religious world.

3. Postcolonial Reading of Biblical Texts.

In the field of biblical studies there are presently three directions that postcolonial interpreters have taken. First, some interpreters recognize and explore the context of the Roman Empire as the setting for the documents of early Christianity. Do these treatises critique or perpetuate Roman political policies? Are they in favor of empire or not? Most scholars who pursue this direction generally recognize the difference between the imperialistic tendencies of ancient Rome and those of the modern Western world. Rome maintained imperialism without capitalism in the modern sense. But it was an imperializing force nonetheless. Other postcolonial scholars, such as S. Moore, would not neatly classify the group performing “empire studies” as explicitly engaging in postcolonial interpretation. An emphasis of this approach is on the political nature of these tracts, which serves as a corrective to the concentrated focus on the theological dimension of early Christian texts.

Second, some postcolonial interpreters (e.g., M. Dube, R. Boer, R. S. Sugirtharajah) appropriate Said’s idea of contrapuntal reading as a fundamental aspect of exegetical work. For example, G. Soares-Prabhu investigates the so-called Great Commission passage in Matthew 28 in light of Buddhist texts. This type of recently developed “intertextual” reading can be particularly useful for Christians who desire more thoughtfully engaging interreligious dialogues.

Third, an important area of postcolonial criticism explores how the heirs of indigenous colonized communities interpret the biblical texts. How do the “subalterns,” affected by centuries of economic abuse, read the Bible missionaries brought with them? As an old African proverb goes, “When the white man came to our country, he had the Bible, and we had the land. The white man said to us, ‘Let us pray.’ After the prayer, the white man had the land, and we had the Bible” (see Dube 2001). How do indigenous people wrestle with Scripture in their non-Western context after the White missionaries have departed?

All three approaches remind contemporary interpreters to keep specific issues at the center of the investigation: sensitivity to issues of power relations within the stories, including attention to issues of “land,” “race” and “gender”; commitment to the other (in/outside the story world); “contrapuntal” reading, which intermixes “traditional interpretations” with “marginal interpretations”; and a sensitivity “to help reposition [the Bible] in relation to its oriental roots and Eastern heritage” (Sugirtharajah 2001, 257-58). Such concerns are highlighted in the primary texts under discussion but also provide clues into the secondary literature attempting to guide an understanding of the primary texts.

In addition, this approach reminds interpreters to stay attuned to the following questions: (1) Who has the power to tell or interpret stories? (2) To whom do the stories/texts belong? (3) Who controls the meaning? (4) Against whom are the stories or interpretations aimed? (5) What is their ethical effect? (6) Who has power to access data? (7) What role does gender play? (8) What methods count as appropriate? (9) Does the text/story take a clear stance against ruling powers? (10) How is “otherness” constructed in the story?

As these questions demonstrate, this approach considers issues of power, status, identity, economics, ethnicity, and so forth, and the complexities of such in any given texts. It operates, then, on several levels at once. First, it is sensitive to the issues surrounding the text under interpretation. Second, it is sensitive to the issues surrounding the interpretations of the text under interpretation. Third, it is sensitive to the issues surrounding the culture of the interpreter who is investigating the text under interpretation. In all, it is about margins, the borders and the other, all terms—margin, border, other—that are themselves becoming contested (Liew 2009).

In A Postcolonial Commentary on the New Testament Writings commentators on the four Gospels tackle the biblical texts from postcolonial angles. Their collective example provides some sense of the variety within postcolonial approaches to the Gospels. All of these interpreters situate their respective Gospels within the Roman imperial context, though each one handles the implications of that setting differently. These interpreters recognize the ambivalent stances that their Gospel takes with respect to exclusive claims of justice (W. Carter, F. Segovia), the complexity of replacing authority with an alternative authority (T. Liew, F. Segovia) or the ambiguous political stance of the Gospel toward the empire (V. Burrus, T. Liew). The question of whether the Gospels function as “postcolonial literature” is addressed and complicated by all of these interpreters. The hybridity of the Gospels may be their most common feature. The canonical Gospels utilize the imperial language of “gospel” (euangelion), “authority” (exousia) and “power” (dynamis) (see Authority and Power) to describe God’s own imperial venture, with attempts to redefine the meaning of these terms. Resituating these terms may be necessary in order to communicate its message in this first-century A.D. Greco-Roman context. More disturbing for these commentators is the borrowing of the signs of imperial power in order to narrate the evidence of God’s work in the world, including division (Mt 10:34; Lk 12:51), destruction (Mt 22:1-14) and gender oppression (Mk 7:24-30). Jesus not only suffers under the imperial will (Mk 10:33-34), but also he will repay with equal “imperial” force (Mk 9:1; 14:62). While Jesus’ earthly presence symbolizes peace, his end-time return is described, in analogous imperial fashion, as one of violent revolution. Sometimes the “colonized” imitate the rhetoric and actions of their “colonizers.” In Bhabha’s words, “Hybridity is the revaluation of the assumption of colonial identity through the repetition of discriminatory identity effects. It displays the necessary deformation and displacement of all sites of discrimination and domination. It unsettles the mimetic or narcissistic demand of colonial power but re-implicates its identifications in strategies of subversion that turn the gaze of the discriminated back upon the eye of power” (Bhabha 1995, 34-35).

Postcolonial criticism, then, is not a method in any traditional way. It is a sense, like a “sixth sense.” Interpreters may add this approach to other methods that they utilize. However, they should remain attentive to the implications of their conclusions, especially the effect of those interpretations on those persons on the margins of society.

See also AFRICAN-AMERICAN CRITICISM; FEMINIST AND WOMANIST CRITICISMS; LATINO/LATINA CRITICISM; ROME.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Ashcroft, G. Griffiths and H. Tiffin, eds., The Post-Colonial Studies Reader (London: Routledge, 1995); H. Bhabha, Location of Culture (London: Routledge, 1994); idem, “Signs Taken for Wonders,” in The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. B. Ashcroft, G. Griffiths and H. Tiffin (London: Routledge, 1995) 29-35; R. Boer, Last Stop before Antarctica: The Bible and Postcolonialism in Australia (BibPost 6; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); P. Childs and P. Williams, An Introduction to Post-Colonial Theory (New York: Prentice Hall, 1997); L. Donaldson, ed., Postcolonialism and Scriptural Readings (Semeia 75; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2001); L. Donaldson and K. Pui-lan, eds., Postcolonialism, Feminism, and Religious Discourse (New York: Routledge, 2002); M. Dube, Postcolonial Feminist Interpretation of the Bible (St. Louis: Chalice Press, 2000); idem, “Reading for Decolonization (John 4:1-42),” in Postcolonialism and Scriptural Readings, ed. L. Donaldson (Semeia 75; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2001) 37-59; T. B. Liew, “Postcolonial Biblical Studies,” in Mark and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies, ed. J. C. Anderson and S. D. Moore (2nd ed.; Minneapolis, Fortress, 2008); idem, ed., Postcolonial Interventions: Essays in Honor of R. S. Sugirtharajah (Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 2009); S. D. Moore and F. F. Segovia, eds., Postcolonial Biblical Criticism: Interdisciplinary Intersections (BibPost; London: T & T Clark International, 2005); D. N. Premnath, ed., Border Crossings: Cross-Cultural Hermeneutics (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2007); K. Pui-lan, “Jesus/The Native: Biblical Studies from a Postcolonial Perspective,” in Teaching the Bible: The Discourses and Politics of Biblical Pedagogy, ed. F. F. Segovia and M. A. Tolbert (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1998) 69-85; E. Said, Orientalism: Western Conceptions of the Orient (New York: Vintage, 1978); idem, Culture and Imperialism (New York: Vintage, 1993); F. F. Segovia, Decolonizing Biblical Studies: A View from the Margins (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2000); F. F. Segovia and R. S. Sugirtharajah, eds., A Postcolonial Commentary on the New Testament Writings (BibPost 13; London: T & T Clark, 2007); G. M. Soares-Prabhu, “Two Mission Commands: An Interpretation of Matthew 28.16-20 in the Light of a Buddhist Text,” in Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World, ed. R. S. Sugirtharajah (rev. ed.; Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2006) 331-46; G. C. Spivak, “Can the Subaltern Speak?” in The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. B. Ashcroft, G. Griffiths and H. Tiffin (London: Routledge, 1995) 24-28; idem, A Critique of Postcolonial Reason: Toward a History of the Vanishing Present (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999); R. S. Sugirtharajah, Asian Biblical Hermeneutics and Postcolonialism: Contesting Interpretations (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1997); idem, The Bible and the Third World: Precolonial, Colonial, and Postcolonial Encounters (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001); idem, Postcolonial Criticism and Biblical Interpretation (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002); idem, Postcolonial Reconfigurations: An Alternative Way of Reading the Bible and Doing Theology (St. Louis: Chalice Press, 2003); idem., ed., Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World (rev. ed.; Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2006).

E. B. Powery

PRAETORIUM. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

PRAYER

Christian theology often has been marred by an unfortunate tendency to caricature first-century A.D. Judaism by projecting stilted portrayals of later rabbinic teaching back into the time of Jesus. Such misrepresentation has infected the Christian perception of Jewish prayer by highlighting the supposed legalism, formalism and predictability of memorized, statutory prayers recited with little or no room for spontaneity or individual expression to a distant God with whom there was little hope of personal intimacy. Nothing could be further from the truth. Second Temple Judaism was anything but straight-jacketed or monolithic. Setting aside possible evidence of increasing formalism in later rabbinic texts, the earliest of which postdate Jesus by more than a century, we may safely say that Jewish prayer in the first century A.D. was a highly diverse, lively spiritual practice characterized by all the admirable and the unfortunate traits characteristic of any other human religious activity. Furthermore, the four Gospels portray Jesus as a man deeply embedded in his own time who was also a religious innovator whose unique self-understanding and authoritative claims inaugurated a vision of prayer as intimate communication with the heavenly Father mediated through the only Son.

1. Jewish Prayer Practices in the Time of Jesus
2. Jesus' Prayer Habits
3. The "Lord's Prayer"
4. Prayer in the Gospels

1. Jewish Prayer Practices in the Time of Jesus.

From ancient times (1 Chron 23:30; Ps 5:3; 55:17; 88:13; Ezra 9:5; Dan 9:21; Jdt 9:1; Pss. Sol. 6:4) morning and evening were occasions for prayer and recitation of the Shema (originally Deut 6:4, but eventually expanded to include Deut 6:5-9; 11:13-21; Num 15:37-41). Josephus regarded this practice as a Mosaic ordinance (Ant. 4.212-213), typically obeyed in the privacy of the home. Technically, the Shema is a statement of faith more than a prayer, but it was made a prayer by the addition of introductory and concluding words of blessing. Portions of it have been discovered on tiny scrolls at Qumran, providing material evidence for the Palestinian use of phylacteries and of Shema recitation in Second Temple Judaism. Many associated these prayers with the morning and evening sacrifices in the Jerusalem temple, which could be called a "house of prayer" (Is 56:7; Mk 11:17 par.). Thus, the time of sacrifice was "the hour of prayer" (Acts 3:1; 10:9, 30), even though there is no evidence of coordinated communal prayer within the temple precincts, and the arena immediately surrounding the altar was an area of silence. For the Qumran community, which viewed the Jerusalem temple as apostate, the morning and evening prayers were associated with the rising and setting of the sun rather than sacrifice (1QS X, 1-3, 11; 1QH^a XX, 4-7; 1QM XIV, 12-14 [see Josephus, J.W. 2.128-129]). Philo attests similar solar associations among the Egyptian Therapeutae (Contempl. 27-28).

Midday prayer also has an ancient pedigree (Ps 55:17; Dan 6:10; 2 En. 51:4; Acts 10:9; Did. 8:3) and is associated with the three-times-a-day recitation of the Eighteen Benedictions (Shemoneh Esreh; also known as the Tefillah [Prayer] and the Amidah [Standing]), which eventually became the quintessential prayer of rabbinic Judaism (m. Ber. 4:1-5:5). The Tefillah is composed of three opening benedictions of praise; thirteen petitions for spiritual (three requests), material (four requests) and social (six requests) blessings; and three concluding benedictions of thanksgiving. However, there is no evidence that the Tefillah existed in more than a rudimentary form prior to the destruction of the temple (A.D. 70), in which case it would have reflected distinctly Pharisaic prayer habits, although similar benedictions, in different words and various orders, are attested more widely (2 Macc 1:24-29; Sir 36).

The synagogue was known as a “place of prayer” (Josephus, Life 277; Ag. Ap. 2.10; see Mk 1:21; Acts 13:15) where congregational involvement was encouraged. Every adult male could share in leading the assembly, and all could offer petitions in their own words. There is no evidence that prayers were recited in unison from a fixed text during Sabbath assemblies. In fact, evidence suggests that, at least among certain groups, rote recitation of memorized prayers was forbidden (m. Ber. 4:4). Together with the rabbinic warning never to write prayers down (“Those who write down benedictions are as though they burned the Torah” [b. Šabb. 115b]), such regulations reflect ancient concerns that all prayer be offered with kawwanah—concentrated, heartfelt devotion.

Reciting a blessing before each meal was also widely practiced (Deut 8:10; Josephus, J.W. 2.131; 1QS VI, 4-5; m. Ber. 6-8), and this custom was inherited by the early church from Jesus’ own practice (Mk 6:41; 8:6-7; 14:22-23; Rom 14:6; 1 Cor 10:30; 1 Tim 4:4).

The diversity found in the content and habits of prayer in Second Temple literature demonstrates that first-century A.D. Jewish prayer was anything but formalized. Prayer was democratic and egalitarian; individuals were welcome to approach Yahweh as a relational God who engaged in personal interaction with the faithful.

2. Jesus’ Prayer Habits.

Investigating Jesus’ prayer habits must presuppose certain conclusions about his religious and cultural context (see 1 above) as well as the content of the canonical gospels (see 3, 4 below). Inevitably there is a circular dimension to the discussion, but the interaction of historical and literary analysis may produce a plausible portrait of Jesus’ prayer life.

Jesus was reared in a pious Jewish home (Mt 1:19, 24-25; Lk 1:38; 2:21-24, 39, 41-42, 51-52) in which undoubtedly he learned to pray at an early age. Such instruction would have included lessons in how to offer *blessings over meals, morning and evening prayers with the Shema, perhaps afternoon prayer, and the encouragement to cultivate his own relationship with Yahweh through praise, confession and petition offered spontaneously as needed. The Gospels reflect this upbringing when they depict Jesus, later in his life, praying in early morning (Mk 1:35), late in the day (Mk 6:46 par.), before major decisions (Lk 6:12) and praising the Father for a successful mission (Lk 10:21-22 par.). Jesus, in turn, passes on his personal approach to prayer by teaching and modeling daily prayer to his disciples (Lk 11:1-4 par.), petitioning the Father in a time of crisis (Mk 14:32-42 par.) and turning to Yahweh as he faces death (Mk 15:33-37; Lk 23:46).

Jesus regularly attended *Sabbath synagogue services where he would have participated in communal prayer (Lk 4:16), although the Gospels describe only occasions where he preached to the congregation (Mk 1:21-29, 39; 3:1; 6:2; Mt 9:35; Lk 4:15-21; 13:10). He shared the notion of the temple as a house of prayer, at least ideally (Mk 11:17 par.); his temple cleansing testifies to his passion for that ideal (Mk 11:12-16 par.; cf. Is 56:7; Jer 7:11). Yet, as with his synagogue appearance, the Gospels prefer to focus on Jesus’ teaching in the temple precincts (Mt 21:23; 24:1; Mk 11:27; 12:35; 13:1; Lk 2:41-50; 19:47-48; 20:1; 21:37-38; Jn 7:14, 28, 32, 45; 8:2, 20, 59; 10:22-39; 18:20).

Since the work of J. Jeremias, biblical scholars have given considerable attention to Jesus’ use of the Aramaic word ’abbā’ (meaning either “my Father” or “the Father”) in prayer. In Jeremias’s view, Jesus’ turn to *God as “my Father” was the central statement of his identity and mission, expressing a unique relationship with God that could only have come as “a word of revelation.” Jeremias’s argument consisted of several related points: addressing God personally as “my Father” was unknown in Palestinian Judaism prior to the NT period; the Hebrew words ’ab (“Father”) and ’ābī (“my Father”) had been completely supplanted by ’abbā’ in both Aramaic and Hebrew; ’abbā’ was the standard word used by children to address their father; whenever Jesus prayed, he always addressed God as ’abbā’; Jesus’ practice in this regard was unprecedented. However, Jeremias’s arguments have not withstood the test of time.

First, as even Jeremias admitted, referring to God as “Father” was not unprecedented in Second Temple Judaism (Tob 13:4; 3 Macc 2:21; 5:7; 7:6; Wis 2:16; 11:10; Jub. 1:25, 28; 1QH^a IX, 35; Josephus, Ant. 2.152). Furthermore, God could even be addressed directly in prayer as “Father/my Father” (Sir 23:1, 4; 51:10; 3 Macc 6:3, 8; Wis 14:3; Jos. Asen. 12:8, 14-15; Apocr. Ezek. frg. 2; 4Q372 I, 16).

Second, Jeremias’s claim that ’abbā’ was the only term available to express “my Father” in first-century A.D. Aramaic and Hebrew is now known to be incorrect. The Hebrew words ’ab and ’ābī are standard terms in both Aramaic and Hebrew texts from the period (4Q372 I, 16; 1QH^a XVII, 35; 1Qap-Gen ar II, 19, 24; III, 3; 4Q213a I, II, 12; 4Q539 2, 3).

Third, the Gospels describe Jesus praying to ’abbā’ only once, in Mark’s version of the *Gethsemane incident (Mk 14:36), hardly a typical situation. Elsewhere, “Father” is always rendered by the Greek patēr, which is just as likely a translation of 'ab or 'ābī as of 'abbā'. Better evidence for Jesus' use of 'abbā' appears in Paul's references to the word in Romans 8:16-17; Galatians 4:6-7, letters written to Hellenistic communities that would have had no other reason to know Aramaic. But this is a tenuous basis for asserting that Jesus always and only prayed to God as 'abbā'.

Fourth, there is no reason to assume that the intimacy of Jesus' relationship with Yahweh was tied to or dependent upon a particular word, whether 'abbā', 'ab or 'ābī. Nor is there evidence to say that intimacy with God as Father was the distinguishing feature of Jesus' prayers. Divine fatherhood certainly was a matter of relational intimacy, but it also concerned divine lordship (Ps 2:7; Mal 1:6; Jub. 1:24-25; Pss. Sol. 17:26-27; Mt 5:16, 45; 6:9-10 par., 32-33 par.; 7:21; 10:29; 11:25-27 par.; 15:13; 16:27; 20:23; 26:53; Mk 13:32 par.; 14:36; Lk 22:29) as well as God's work as redeemer (Ex 4:22; Is 63:16; Jer 31:20; 4Q372 I, 16; Mt 6:12-13 par.; 16:17; 18:10-14; 26:29; Mk 11:25 par.; Lk 23:34, 46; 24:49).

Indeed, Jesus' prayers were unique, but not because he prayed to God as 'abbā', 'ab or 'ābī. They were unique because Jesus, in praying to his Father, did so as the one, unique Son, a self-understanding rooted in his own religious experience (on this point Jeremiah was correct) (see Son of God). It was Jesus' claim to a unique identity that set his prayers apart, not an idiosyncratic vocabulary. A quintessential example appears in Luke 10:21-22 (// Mt 11:25-27). Though often referred to as a "thunderbolt from the Johannine sky," Jesus' prayer is more accurately described as the Synoptic preview of the Johannine vision (something that Jeremiah also observed). Jesus harnessed conventional language to unveil a new, revelatory reality: "No one knows who the Son is except the Father, and no one knows who the Father is except the Son and whomever the Son wishes to reveal him to." Filial intimacy with the God of Abraham, an intimacy historically available to members of the old covenant, is now experienced exclusively through Jesus, the Father's unique Son.

3. The "Lord's Prayer."

The iconic prayer of Christian devotion traditionally known as the "Lord's Prayer" appears in Matthew 6:9-13 and Luke 11:2-4. Didache 8 shows that some in the first-century A.D. church recited this prayer three times each day as a replacement for the Shema and Tefillah. Each of these two Gospels presents a different version of Jesus' words (see Table 1).

Matthew shows his familiarity with Jewish practice by introducing the prayer as a model rather than a fixed formula (recall the Jewish aversion to memorizing written prayers). Matthew's Jesus says, "Pray like this/in this manner" (houtōs proseuchesthe). Jesus instructs his followers in the concerns and priorities that he expects to animate their lives, a format typical of prescribed prayers. Elaborating on any or all of the petitions was standard practice. Perhaps this accounts for the two different canonical versions of the prayer. Or they may reflect the evolution of two liturgical traditions, although it is equally possible that they exhibit the editorial interests of the Gospel writers, especially Matthew (see 4 below).

Matthew's version divides into two sections of three petitions each united by parallel grammatical constructions (see Table 2). Luke's introduction describes a disciple asking Jesus to teach him how to pray. The various sects of Second Temple Judaism were distinguished by religious, social and political emphases that naturally would tailor group-specific approaches to prayer. In approaching Jesus as he does, this disciple notes that "John the Baptist taught his disciples how to pray appropriately. The Teacher of Righteousness played a similar role at Qumran. According to Luke, at least some of Jesus' disciples expected comparable instruction from him. Their request, coupled with Jesus' positive response, indicates that Jesus and his followers viewed themselves as a distinct group animated by particular concerns. Furthermore, since the disciple makes his request after observing Jesus at prayer, the narrative implies that Jesus taught what he modeled and modeled what he taught, a crucial principle for Christian theology and practice. This prayer is simultaneously the Lord's prayer, conveying his priorities, and the disciples' prayer, instructing them (and all Christians) in how their prayers become like his. Disciples are expected to appropriate Jesus' priorities, conforming their lives to his passions. Since Luke's entire version is contained within Matthew's, the longer tradition will be analyzed here.

3.1. The Address: "Our Father." Although the address in Matthew's version ("our Father who is in heaven") is more elaborate than the one in Luke's version ("Father"), there is no essential difference between them. Relating to God as Father connotes personal intimacy but also acknowledges God as the Creator (Deut 32:6; Acts 17:28), King (Ps 2:7; Mal 1:6; Jub. 1:24-25; Pss. Sol. 17:26-27) and Redeemer (Ex 4:22; Is 63:16; Jer 31:20), dimensions of divine Fatherhood directly addressed in the first three petitions. Matthew's collective address ("our Father") is no less intimate than Luke's, since the one praying understands

Table 1. Lord's Prayer in Matthew and Luke

Matthew 6:9-13 Our Father in heaven May your name be sanctified May your kingdom come May your will be done As in heaven, so also on earth Give us today our daily bread Forgive us our debts As we also have forgiven our debtors And do not lead us into temptation But deliver us from evil.	Luke 11:2-4 Father May your name be sanctified May your kingdom come Give us each day our daily bread Forgive us our sins As we also forgive everyone who sins against us And do not lead us into temptation.
--	---

that relationship with God results from an individual's membership within the covenant community. That the Father "is in heaven" does not put God at a distance but rather acknowledges divine sovereignty over all the earth, for heaven is the Father's throne room (Mt 5:34). The phrase also coheres with Matthew's preference for referring to "the kingdom of heaven" instead of "the kingdom of God." Jesus is inviting his disciples to follow him and enter into their own unique relationship with God as Father.

3.2. The First Petition: "May Your Name Be Sanctified." "The name" is a circumlocution for God's person. To know another person or a deity by name is to be in relationship with that person or deity. To act in someone's name is to act by that person's authority on his or her behalf. "To sanctify the name" was the traditional Hebrew way of calling for the public display of God's holiness (Lev 22:32; Is 29:23; Ezek 36:23; 1 En. 61:12). Thus, the first petition instructs disciples to ask that God would reveal his holiness to the world, something that God alone can do. Jesus almost certainly had in mind the words spoken through the prophet Ezekiel in which Yahweh declares, "I will show the holiness of my great name" by delivering Judah from Babylonian captivity (Ezek 36:21-23; 38:16, 23; 39:7, 25-27). Ezekiel's association of Yahweh's commitment to deliver Judah with the promise to pour out the Spirit on all people, thereby transforming Judah's "heart of stone into a heart of flesh" (Ezek 36:26-27; 39:29 [cf. Jer 31:31-34]), gives a specific focus to the manner in which God "sanctifies the name": it occurs when the end-time gift of the Spirit comes to transform God's redeemed people, and Yahweh is shown to be the one and only true God. Jesus the messianic Son fulfills Ezekiel's vision through his inauguration of the kingdom.

God's holiness is now revealed in the cosmic plan of redemption unfolding through Jesus. Disciples are to share in this endeavor, praying for the Father's ultimate success.

3.3. The Second Petition: "May Your Kingdom Come." Jesus was not the first to associate the sanctification of God's name with prayer for the coming *kingdom. An ancient prayer known as the Kaddish states, "May his great name be magnified and sanctified according to his will in the world he created. May he establish his kingdom in our lifetime, in our days." Yahweh sanctifies his name by establishing the long-awaited kingdom on earth (Pss. Sol. 17; 1QM XII, 7-8). The kingdom's consummation is the establishment of God's royal rule over creation demonstrated in the *judgment of all those in rebellion and the eternal *blessing of all the righteous. Jesus' particular formulation of "the kingdom coming" remains unparalleled in Jewish literature, where typically it is God who comes to the nation (1 Chron 16:33; Ps 96:13; 98:9; Is 26:21; 35:4; 40:9-10; 1 En. 1:3-9; 25:3; Jub. 1:22-28; As. Mos. 10:1-12). Now Jesus and the kingdom come together, for he inaugurates the Father's victory on earth (laying the foundation for the "already but not yet" eschatology characteristic of the NT). Jesus' disciples must live as obedient citizens within the kingdom, submitting to the king's authority, demonstrating the transformative power of the Father's life-giving Spirit. However, kingdom obedience should not be confused with the kingdom's coming; this is not a request that people behave in a manner sufficient for the establishment of God's reign, or that human transformation may inaugurate the kingdom. Only the Father brings the kingdom through the gospel proclamation of his Son. Thus, prayer for the kingdom's coming is multi-

Table 2. Matthew's Two Parallel Petitions

Set One 1. May your name be sanctified 2. May your kingdom come 3. May your will be done	Set Two 4. Give us our daily bread 5. Forgive us our debts/sins 6. Deliver us from evil dimensional. The petitioner (1) surrenders daily to the comprehensive, existential demands of Jesus' lordship; (2) embodies the self-sacrificial, ethical expectations of kingdom citizenship; (3) eagerly anticipates the Father's final victory at Jesus' parousia.
--	---

Some late manuscripts of Luke's Gospel replace the kingdom clause with "May your Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us." This change accords with Luke's special interest in the Spirit's activity (seventeen references, versus six in Mark and twelve in Matthew). Since the Spirit's arrival is evidence of the kingdom's presence, the petition requests the spiritual empowerment necessary for obedient kingdom living.

3.4. The Third Petition: "May Your Will Be Done." The first three petitions offer variations on a theme, repeating the same request in different ways; thus, nothing substantive is lost by the absence of this petition from Luke's version of the prayer. Furthermore, the third petition in Matthew is identical to a unique phrase also found in Matthew's version of Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane (evidence of Matthean redaction?). On that occasion, the Matthean Jesus prays, "My Father [pater mou], if it is not possible for this cup to be taken away unless I drink it, may your will be done" (Mt 26:42). Jesus does not teach his disciples to perform anything that he himself does not implement. At his moment of greatest crisis Jesus embodies the principal lessons of the first half of the Lord's Prayer: *discipleship is always theocentric, never egocentric; it is animated by the kingdom's coming; thus prayer, even when petitionary, is not so much a means of getting what one wants as it is a continual (re)submission to the Father's purposes.

The clause "as in heaven, so also on earth" probably is intended to modify all three of the preceding requests, as was first suggested by Origen (Or. 26.2). Jewish prayer typically was cosmic in scope, anticipating the eventual obedient coordination of every dimension in God's creation. Since heaven is the ultimate location of God's throne (Mt 5:34), praying "on earth as it is in heaven" anticipates the coming of the *Son of Man on heaven's clouds, when the Father's lordship becomes cosmically uncontested.

3.5. The Fourth Petition: "Give Us Our Daily Bread." The transition from the first to the second set of petitions has long been the subject of debate. There are two basic positions: first, there is no transition to speak of because the second half of the prayer is as *apocalyptically oriented toward future fulfillment as the first; second, there is a definite shift at the prayer's midpoint, with petitions four through six turning away from apocalyptic hopes to focus on the real-world necessities of temporal well-being. Perhaps it is wiser to reject the demand to choose, allowing the entire prayer to remain apocalyptically oriented while reading petitions four through six as instructive in how to submit temporal concerns to the primacy of God's apocalyptic kingdom (cf. Mt 6:33-34).

The sole adjective in the entire prayer, epiousios, which modifies "bread," appears nowhere else in Greek literature (apart from later Christian references). Three different etymologies have been suggested: (1) from the preposition epi plus the noun ousia ("being, existence"), yielding either "the bread necessary for physical existence" or "the spiritual bread from heaven;" (2) from the temporal phrase epi tēn ousan [hēmeran] ("for the present [day]"), yielding "enough bread for today;" (3) from the feminine participle of epeimi ("to come upon, arrive"), yielding "give us today our bread for the coming day." This last option also may be read materially (real bread for now) or spiritually (spiritual bread preparing us for the parousia). Although the etymology remains uncertain, the freedom with which Jewish prayers asked God for immediate, physical necessities should give priority to a straightforward, material understanding.

Disciples are invited to pray for their material needs, but they should not forget the emphasis on (1) needs not desires, (2) essentials not luxury or abundance, (3) daily requirements not accumulation or excess, and (4) necessities for faithful citizenship in the kingdom of God not temporal society. Authentically praying the first three petitions radically reshapes a disciple's perspective on what constitutes genuine necessity.

3.6. The Fifth Petition: "Forgive Us." The variation in Matthew's use of "debt" and Luke's use of *"sin" is evidence of the prayer's origin in Palestine, where Aramaic was commonly spoken. The Aramaic word hōbā' means "debt, money owed," but it can metaphorically designate "sin, guilt" (as indebtedness to another). Matthew and Luke offer two translation variants of a shared Aramaic source (oral or written?). The apparent conditionality of this request ("forgive us as we forgive others") must be interpreted within the full context of Jesus' teaching (Mt 5:23-26, 43-48; 6:14-15; 18:21-35; Lk 6:35; 7:36-50; 17:4). The Father's *forgiveness is always a gift to the undeserving (Ps 19:12; 25:11, 18; Is 40:2; 55:6-7; Jer 31:34; 33:8; 36:3, 7; Ezek 36:25-32; 11Q5 XIX, 9-11, 13-14; Tefillah benedictions 5, 6), but Jesus frequently reminds disciples that a tree is identifiable by its fruit (Mt 3:10; 7:17-19; 12:33; Lk 8:43-45). Grace received overflows as grace extended to others. An unforgiving disposition indicates alienation from God's *mercy. Because the fifth petition presumes daily self-examination, confession and *repentance, the continual experience of God's mercy should create a humility that willingly forgives others.

3.7. The Sixth Petition: "Do Not Lead Us to Temptation." The final petition, containing the prayer's only negative request, asking God not to do something, presents several ambiguities. First, the Greek word peirasmos may mean either "temptation to do wrong" or "testing to be approved." The Letter of James, for example, uses peirasmos in both senses when discussing life's struggles (Jas 1:2 [testing]; Jas 1:12-14 [temptation]). Second, commentators debate whether Matthew's additional clause "but deliver us from evil" refers to "evil" (i.e., acts of personal wickedness) or to the "evil one" (i.e., Satan). Third, interpreters disagree over whether the person praying asks for preservation through life's turmoil or for preservation from the final tribulation at the end of history (Rev 3:10). The tenor of the second half of the Lord's Prayer, turning as it does to the disciple's temporal, material needs, together with parallels such as Sirach 2:1; 33:1; 11Q5 XXIV, 1—texts that describe God's responsibility for both sending and delivering from testing—indicates that the most likely sense is "Do not lead us into worldly tests, but rescue us from wickedness."

The tension in the request is palpable. The disciple is being taught to pray, "Father, do not lead us into the tests that you provide for our growth." But again, Jesus' experience provides the key. Both Jesus' forty days in the wilderness (Mk 1:13 par.) and his agony in Gethsemane (Mk 14:32-42 par.) illustrate Jesus' grappling with this very tension as he follows the Father obediently into a crisis situation while also praying for the Father to deliver him out of it (compare Sir 2:1; 33:1). Such seemingly contradictory behavior is actually a faithful recognition that there is no need to go searching for trials, since obedient discipleship will bring them readily enough; and while the origins of life's struggles often remain inscrutable, the Father's resources are always available. Whether a difficulty is merely circumstantial or deliberately sent either by God to test us or by Satan to tempt us is best evaluated in retrospect. In any case, the origins of the trial are irrelevant to the final outcome, for the Father never sends an impossible test (1 Cor 10:13), and demonic temptation need never prove irresistible (Jn 16:33; Heb 2:18; Jas 1:14; 1 Jn 4:4; 5:4-9). Gethsemane is paradigmatic. The disciples' behavior contrasts with Jesus' actions as their failure to pray presages their failure in the moment of testing/temptation (Mk 14:38 par.). For Jesus, Gethsemane (and his fasting in the desert) was a test that he endured even though both entailed satanic temptation. For the disciples, an opportunity for growth in Gethsemane became a temptation that they failed even though they were led into it by Jesus. Jesus' faithful endurance also demonstrates how the sixth petition is connected to the third, tying together the end of the prayer's first half with the end of the prayer's second half: "Father, do not lead me into testing, but may your will be done, and may I always obey." Such daily prayer, introspection and situational awareness are essential to enduring discipleship.

4. Prayer in the Gospels.

Appreciating each Gospel as a unique, literary achievement is an important dimension of NT interpretation. Whether reflecting diverse oral and/or written traditions (e.g., Q), editorial activity or a combination of both, each of the four Gospels presents the subject of prayer somewhat differently. Adequately grasping NT teaching requires both an appreciation for the literary dimensions of each Gospel (rather than harmonizing them into a single narrative) and valuing the different ways in which each book depicts the historical Jesus. These two approaches need not conflict and may prove to be mutually illuminating.

4.1. Mark. Mark's Gospel opens with the *Holy Spirit descending on Jesus as a heavenly voice declares that he is God's unique Son, who now takes up the roles of Davidic king and Isaianic *servant (reading Mk 1:11 as a conflation of LXX Gen 22:2; Ps 2:7; Is 42:1). As Son of God, Jesus experiences the Spirit's direction (Mk 1:12-13) and empowerment for his proclamation of the kingdom (Mk 1:14-15, 21-22, 39), the performance of exorcisms (Mk 1:23-28, 32-34, 39) and *healing of the sick (Mk 1:29-31, 40-42). The first prayer reference depicts Jesus rising early in the morning to pray (Mk 1:35) and then instructing his disciples in the next step of their itinerary (Mk 1:38-39). The implication is that the Spirit-empowered Son of God receives divine direction through prayer. Mark's second prayer reference (Mk 6:46), coming hard on the heels of John's martyrdom (Mk 6:14-29) (and earlier references to hostility [Mk 3:6, 21-22; 6:2-6, 11, 14-29]), reiterates that Jesus obeys the Father regardless of opposition. Thus, Mark begins to unfold a complex Christology: Jesus fulfills his mission through the combination of personal identity, empowerment by the Holy Spirit and faithfulness in prayer.

Mark 9:29, the third prayer text, extends the value of prayer from Jesus to the disciples. Although they too have experienced great success in preaching, exorcism and healing (Mk 6:7-13), when confronted by a demon-possessed boy, their attempts at exorcism failed because they failed to pray (Mk 9:17-29). Apparently, they had forgotten that kingdom service requires ongoing, prayerful dependence on the Father (Mk 9:29). In other words, they had yet to fully appropriate the example modeled by Jesus. Here Mark indicates the connections between his *Christology (Jesus as the prayerful Son) and successful discipleship (and the theological category of sanctification).

The fourth prayer text (Mk 11:17, 24-25) further expands upon the disciples' role in the kingdom. Jesus accuses the temple leaders of subverting God's intentions that the sanctuary be a house of prayer for all (Mk 11:17). In contrast, Jesus appoints his followers as the new house of prayer, replacing the apostate leadership (Mk 11:18) soon to be destroyed by God (Mk 11:12-17, 20-25). The mountain being removed through the disciples' prayers (Mk 11:23) is Mount Zion, now representative of any obstacle that would stand in the way of God's coming kingdom. The community of Jesus' praying followers becomes the new location of the Father's holy presence on earth, as well as the new hub for his kingdom expansion.

Mark finally includes two incidental references to prayer, one ethical (Mk 12:40), the other concerning prayer for relief during the Roman siege of Jerusalem (Mk 13:18), before reaching the climax of his prayer theme in Gethsemane (Mk 14:32-39). Jesus and the disciples are juxtaposed. Jesus pursues obedience through his greatest test/temptation by praying, while his disciples fall asleep, neglecting their spiritual preparation for the trial ahead. Thus, Mark's prayer theme portrays Jesus both as the paradigmatic man of prayer to be emulated by every disciple and as the unique agent of God's kingdom whose own prayer life was essential to his successful mission.

4.2. Matthew. Matthew reproduces Mark's basic prayer themes in presenting Jesus as both exemplary and unique in his prayer life. First, Jesus prays as John's martyrdom foreshadows his own destiny (Mt 14:1-12, 23), again suggesting that his persistent faithfulness to Calvary is in some measure due to his prayerful communion with the Father. Second, the community of disciples will become the new house/temple of prayer (Mt 21:12-13, 18-22; cf. Mt 18:15-20). Third, Gethsemane remains paradigmatic for prayer's role in spiritual perseverance (Mt 26:36-46). Matthew also adds didactic texts supplementing his special portrait of Jesus as the final prophet like Moses. Thus, Jesus authoritatively prays for and blesses little *children (Mt 19:13), and he introduces the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:9-13) with apodictic, ethical injunctions: disciples pray for their persecutors (Mt 5:44); they will not pray in ways calculated to gain public recognition (Mt 6:5-6); and they pray not to bend God's will but instead to place their trust in God's goodness (Mt 6:7-8).

Most importantly, as the final prophet like Moses, Jesus thanks the Father for answering his prayers (Mt 11:25-27), thereby revealing the content of Jesus' petitions. This Son has an exclusive, filial relationship with the Father in which "all things have been committed to him," including his role as sole revealer of the Father to others, another crucial christological affirmation. It is through the medium of Jesus' prayers that disciples are enabled to find faith.

4.3. Luke. Luke's Gospel says more about prayer than any other, sharing Mark's perspectives but with significant alterations. First, Luke's introductory chapters serve as a pre-Pentecost, linking the work of the Holy Spirit with the prayers of the faithful (Lk 1:10, 13; 2:37; cf. Acts 1:8, 14; 2:1-4, 42).

Second, Jesus continues to receive divine guidance through prayer (Lk 5:16, replacing Mk 1:35 // Lk 4:42); he also remains exemplary in his prayerful obedience on the Mount of Olives, unlike the sleeping, unfaithful disciples (Lk 22:39-46). Here Luke's editing highlights Jesus' paradigmatic role as the "pray-er" par excellence (Crumpp 1992). However, Luke omits Mark's materials linking prayer and discipleship where Jesus exhorts the disciples about prayer and exorcism (Mk 9:29; cf. Lk 9:43-44) and curses the fig tree (Mk 11:24-25), replacing this symbol of judgment with Jesus' prophetic lament over Jerusalem (Lk 19:41-44). In both cases Luke reserves Mark's lessons about the importance of prayer to kingdom ministry and the disciples' status as God's new "house of prayer" for fuller treatment in Acts.

Third, the Lukan Jesus teaches extensively about the ethics and nature of prayer. The Q traditions about praying for enemies (Lk 6:28), reciting the Lord's Prayer (Lk 11:2-4), and using prayer for public display (Lk 20:47) need no comment. Luke's special material includes three assurances: the Father (1) is always eager to receive his people's prayers, never viewing any petitioner as "shameless," no matter the request or the circumstances (Lk 11:5-10 [in Lk 11:8 the word anaideia, traditionally rendered as "persistence," is better translated as "shamelessness"]); (2) will answer prayer only with good things (Lk 11:11-13), beginning with the best gift of all, the Holy Spirit (Lk 11:13; cf. Mt 7:11); (3) hears prayer the first time it is offered, unlike the unjust judge who responds only to repetition (Lk 18:1-5). Nonetheless, the Father answers in his own time, expecting that the faithful will persist in their prayers (even when seemingly unanswered) until the end of time (Lk 18:6-8; 21:36). Perseverance in prayer, not to be confused with repetitious prayer, even while suffering is the sign of faith for which the Son of Man will search when he comes (Lk 18:8).

Finally, Luke develops the christological theme of Jesus the intercessor, the Father's prayerful agent of divine revelation. Thus, Jesus prays while receiving his baptismal commission (Lk 3:21), before choosing the Twelve (Lk 6:12), before Peter's christological confession (Lk 9:18), before his *transfiguration (Lk 9:28-29) and before the disciples ask him how to pray (Lk 11:1). Luke's lesson is that spiritual illumination, especially insight into the truth of Jesus' identity, is made possible through his prayers. Disciples exercise faith as a direct result of Jesus' intercessions (Lk 10:21-22); the disciples persevere and overcome satanic accusation only because Jesus prays for them (Lk 22:31-32). Whereas other NT writers describe Christ taking up the cause of heavenly intercession after his *ascension and glorification (Rom 8:34; Heb 7:25; 1 Jn 2:1; cf. Acts 7:54-60), Luke insists that Jesus had already begun his work as (heavenly) intercessor during his earthly ministry of humiliation.

4.4. John. John's prayer material expands the christological theme of Jesus the intercessor. As the preexistent Word (*logos) that became flesh (Jn 1:1-18), Jesus comes "in the name of the Father" (Jn 5:43; 10:25), meaning that he lives to glorify God by doing only those things that the Father wants him to do (Jn 5:19-30; cf. Jn 8:49-50; 11:4; 13:31-32; 14:13; 15:8; 17:4; see also Deut 18:19-20). The resurrection of *Lazarus (Jn 11:1-44) serves to demonstrate that Jesus' petitions are always answered positively (Jn 11:21-22, 41-44) because he only asks according to God's will, which means that he always prays "in the name of the Father." The so-called High Priestly Prayer (Jn 17) depicts Jesus the intercessor praying for the fulfillment of the Father's will in his life (Jn 17:1-5), the lives of his disciples (Jn 11:6-19) and all future believers (Jn 11:20-26). Such wholesale obedience to the Father is the central tenet of discipleship and the focus of Jesus' prayer because the Father desires the same type of relationship with every disciple that he has with the Son: to be one (Jn 17:11, 20-23, 26). Jesus therefore "sends them [disciples] into the world" just as the Father sent him (Jn 17:18; 20:21). In other words, disciples are sent "in the name of Jesus" just as Jesus was sent "in the name of the Father." On this basis, Jesus assures his followers, "Whatever you ask in my name, I will do" (Jn 14:13-14; 15:7-8, 16; 16:23, 26). In other words, Jesus promises the Father's positive response to prayer when it is aligned with his will, a point made explicit in 1 John 5:14: "This is our assurance we have in him, that whatever we ask according to his will, he hears us." In his own way, John agrees with the Synoptics. The praying Jesus is paradigmatic and unique, simultaneously. The intercessions of Jesus the intercessor make possible and exemplify the miraculous possibilities available to every disciple who intercedes "in the name of Jesus," in oneness with the Father and the Son.

See also DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; FAITH; FASTING; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. E. Balentine, Prayer in the Hebrew Bible: The Drama of Divine-Human Dialogue (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. H. Charlesworth, M. Harding and M. Kiley, eds., The Lord's Prayer and Other Prayer Texts from the Greco-Roman Era (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994); D. Crump, Jesus the Intercessor: Prayer and Christology in Luke-Acts (WUNT 2/49; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1992); idem, Knocking on Heaven's Door: A New Testament Theology of Petitionary Prayer (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006); O. Cullmann, Prayer in the New Testament, trans. J. Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); S. E. Dowd, Prayer, Power, and the Problem of Suffering: Mark 11:22-25 in the Context of Markan Theology (SBLDS 105; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); idem, "Toward a Johannine Theology of Prayer," in Perspectives on John: Method and Interpretation in the Fourth Gospel, ed. R. B. Sloan and M. C. Parsons (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1993) 317-35; D. K. Falk, Daily, Sabbath, and Festival Prayers in the Dead Sea Scrolls (STDJ 27; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998); M. Greenberg, Biblical Prose Prayer: As a Window to the Popular Religion of Ancient Israel (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983); R. Hammer, Entering Jewish Prayer: A Guide to Personal Devotion and the Worship Service (New York: Schocken, 1994); F. Heiler, Prayer: A Study in the History and Psychology of Religion (London: Oxford University Press, 1932); J. Heinemann, Prayer in the Talmud: Forms and Patterns (SJ 9; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1977); D. Instone-Brewer, Traditions of the Rabbis from the Era of the New Testament, 1: Prayer and Agriculture (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus (London: SCM, 1976); M. Kiley et al., eds., Prayer from Alexander to Constantine: A Critical Anthology (London: Routledge, 1997); R. N. Longenecker, ed., Into God's Presence: Prayer in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eermans, 2001); P. D. Miller, They Cried to the Lord: The Form and Theology of Biblical Prayer (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); S. Pulleyn, Prayer in Greek Religion (OCM; New York: Oxford University Press, 1997); S. C. Reif, Judaism and Hebrew Prayer: New Perspectives on Jewish Liturgical History (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992); E. Schuller, “The Psalm of 4Q372 1 within the Context of Second Temple Prayer,” CBQ 52 (1992) 67–79; K. Snodgrass, “Anaideia and the Friend at Midnight,” JBL 116 (1997) 505–13; A. Steinsaltz, A Guide to Jewish Prayer (New York: Schocken, 2000); M. M. Thompson, “Intercession in the Johannine Community: 1 John 5:16 in the Context of the Gospel and the Epistles of John,” in Worship, Theology and Ministry in the Early Church: Essays in Honor of Ralph P. Martin, ed. M. J. Wilkins and T. Paige (JSNTSup 87; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992) 225–245; R. A. Werline, Penitential Prayer in Second Temple Judaism: The Development of a Religious Institution (SBLEJL 13; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998).

D. M. Crump

PREDICTIONS OF JESUS' PASSION AND RESURRECTION

Acts 3:22 and 7:37 identify Jesus as the “prophet like Moses” (quoting Deut 18:15). Jesus is thus viewed by the early church as the proclaimer and interpreter of God’s past, present and future counsel. According to the Gospels, Jesus’ *prophetic ministry ranges from interpreting the Mosaic *law (Mt 5–7), proclaiming the nearness of the *kingdom of God (Mk 1:14–15), the prediction of the destruction of *Jerusalem and the *temple (Mk 13:2; Lk 13:33–35) to the prediction of his parousia as the *Son of Man (Lk 17:24). Of particular interest, however, are those predictions of Jesus that focus on his own immediate future. They testify to an inescapable crisis in the earthly life of Jesus. This article will explore these latter predictions, paying particular attention to the relationship between implicit and explicit predictions of Jesus’ *death and *resurrection.

1. The Accounts of the Gospels
2. Implicit Predictions of Jesus
3. Explicit Predictions of Jesus
4. Jesus as Interpreter of His Destiny
5. Conclusion

1. The Accounts of the Gospels.

The Synoptic Gospels in particular contain repeated predictions of the *passion and resurrection of Jesus.

In the second half of each of the Synoptics three major passion-resurrection predictions serve as significant landmarks in the unfolding narratives. Like birth pangs signaling a delivery, they point to Jesus’ inescapable mission awaiting him in Jerusalem. Each of the Synoptic Gospels reports the predictions within the same thematic context. The first prediction follows Peter’s confession of Jesus as the Messiah, the second prediction follows the narrative of the transfiguration and the *healing of the epileptic boy, and the third prediction essentially follows the discourse with the rich young man (note Matthew’s insertion in Mt 20:1–16). Except for Luke 18:35–43, all three predictions in each of the Synoptic accounts are followed by a *discipleship theme stressing the anticipated rejection and vindication that will be shared by Jesus and his *disciples.

1.1. The Predictions in Mark. The three major Markan predictions (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:32–34) are conspicuously placed within their narrative context. Mark 8:27–32 introduces a marked change of focus from chronicling the demonstration of Jesus’ exousia (“power”) (Mk 1:1–8:26) to the final test of his exousia (Mk 8:27–16:8, [9–20]). Furthermore, Mark 8:27–32 leads to the first instruction of the disciples that the Son of Man must die and rise after three days. Mark 10:32–34, on the other hand, is placed immediately prior to the entry into Jerusalem via Jericho. Mark clearly presents a climactic development beginning with the first prediction focusing on rejection, moving to the theme of being delivered into human hands (Mk 9:31), and then finally to humiliation and death in the third prediction.

1.2. The Predictions in Luke. While Luke displays great similarities to the arrangement of the Markan narrative, here the passion-resurrection predictions (Lk 9:18–22; 9:44; 18:31–33) take a subordinate place within the overriding theme of the necessity to hasten to, and suffer in, Jerusalem (see Lk 9:51; 13:33). Luke does, however, mention that Jesus’ impending work in Jerusalem is an “exodus” that must be accomplished (Lk 9:31). This suggests that Jesus will act as the “prophet like Moses” who delivers his people from enslavement.

1.3. The Predictions in Matthew. Matthew appears to be least concerned among the Synoptic evangelists to emphasize these predictions (Mt 16:13–23; 17:22b–23; 20:17–19). Nevertheless, in Matthew’s section prior to the passion narrative we may notice a certain significance attributed to these predictions as well.

1.4. The Predictions in John. John refers to the impending crisis in terms of the “lifting up” (hypsōō) of the Son of Man. By means of this verb, both crucifixion and exaltation may be implied (Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34). The latter concept is closely related to the glorification (doxazō) (see Glory) of the Son of Man (Jn 12:23; 13:31; 17:5; 21:19). The most direct, albeit implicit, statement recorded in John is the saying about the temple in John 2:19-22 (cf. Mk 14:58 // Mt 26:61; Mk 15:29 // Mt 27:39). Jesus predicts the tearing down (see Jn 10:11) and raising up of his body within three days. By comparing his body with the temple, Jesus may be alluding to the building of a living temple (cf. Mk 12:10-11 // Ps 118:22; 1 Cor 3:16-17; 6:19; 2 Cor 6:16; Eph 2:21; 1 Pet 2:5; Rev 21:22) (see 2.1.3 below).

2. Implicit Predictions of Jesus.

Certain redactional (see Redaction Criticism) and form-critical (see Form Criticism) analyses of these explicit predictions have led exegetes such as G. Strecker and W. Kümmel to the conclusion that historically there is little authentic data to be derived from these sayings. According to these and other exegetes, the sayings more or less appear to bear the mark of predictions after the event (vaticinia ex eventu). Especially the third major passion-resurrection prediction seems to betray, in their eyes, post-Easter knowledge (see 3.1. below). In order to arrive at a historically convincing view regarding Jesus' predictions of his immediate future, it is crucial to consider implicit predictions alluding to a crisis event of rejection and vindication.

2.1. References to Rejection and Vindication.

The Gospels transmit a rich cluster of rejection-vindication sayings. This includes the eschatological prospect (Mk 14:25 // Mt 26:29; Lk 22:16, 18), the metaphor of the cup (Mk 10:38-39 // Mt 20:22-23; Mk 14:36 // Mt 26:39; Lk 22:42; Jn 18:11), the metaphor of *baptism (Mk 10:38-39 // Mt 20:22-23; Lk 12:50), the metaphor of the hour (Mk 14:35, 41 // Mt 26:39, 45; Lk 22:53), the parable of the wicked tenants (Mk 12:1-12 // Mt 21:33-46; Lk 20:9-19), as well as the saying about the sign of *Jonah (Mt 12:38-40; 16:1-2; Lk 11:29-32). What do these veiled predictions signify in detail?

2.1.1. The Eschatological Prospect. The matrix of the *eschatological prospect spans a great arch between the death of Jesus and the consummation of the kingdom in the messianic banquet (see Table Fellowship). Jesus anticipates his death not as a cul-de-sac but rather as a necessary passage leading eventually to the consummation of the kingdom of God.

2.1.2. The Metaphors of the Cup, Baptism and the Hour. The metaphors of the cup and of baptism in particular refer to Jesus' impending crisis in terms of a severe yet temporary outpouring of divine *judgment. Against the background of the OT (for cup, see Is 51:17-23; Jer 25:15-29; for flood/baptism, see Job 9:31; Ps 18:17; 32:6; 42:8; 69:2, 14-15; 124:4-5; 144:7; Is 8:7-8; 43:2; Jon 2:4), these metaphors refer to internal (cup) and external (baptism) inundation in the wrath of God. Luke 12:49-50 clearly establishes the fact that this event of divine judgment is temporary, not permanent. Jesus' inundation in judgment is followed by the outpouring of the fire of division upon the earth as well as suffering for the disciples (see Mk 10:38-39). The metaphor of the hour (see Jn 2:4; 7:30; 8:20; 12:23, 27; 13:1; 17:1) undergirds the anticipation of a severe, divinely appointed, yet temporary event.

2.1.3. The Parable of the Wicked Tenants. The authentic citation of Psalm 118:22-23 at the end of this parable (Mk 12:10-11 // Mt 21:42; Lk 20:17-18) both confirms the eschatological prospect by stating the fact of rejection and vindication and proclaims the establishment of the messianic foundation stone. By indirectly identifying himself as the rejected stone (i.e., the son of the vineyard owner), Jesus views his impending rejection as a step toward the establishment of a new messianic rule. Despite (and we might add "through") rejection, God will establish his Messiah (see Christ).

2.1.4. The "Sign of Jonah" Saying. The sign of *Jonah is the vindication of the preacher (Jonah = Jesus) as an eschatological warning to *repentance. While refusing to give a heavenly and visible sign demanded by the *Pharisees (Mk 8:12), Jesus promises the sign of the invisible yet consequential divine vindication of the mortally endangered preacher (Mt 12:38-40 par.).

3. Explicit Predictions of Jesus.

Only against the background of these diverse intimations of impending rejection and vindication (see also 1.4 above, regarding implicit statements in John) can a historical and material investigation of the explicit predictions of death and resurrection promise to be convincing. The segregated investigation of Jesus' implicit predictions and his explicit intimations has been the Achilles heel of modern, critical exegesis. If Jesus, however, spoke about his impending rejection and vindication by means of the rich spectrum of images outlined above, then the question of the historical authenticity of predictions of death and resurrection appears in a considerably different light. In addition, arguments adduced against the authenticity of these predictions often are based on uncertain literary-critical and form-critical grounds.

3.1. Explicit References to Passion and Resurrection. Detailed investigation of the three major Synoptic passion-resurrection predictions (see references cited in 1.1-3 above) yields the observation that each of them possesses its own linguistic and contextual integrity. Each prediction functions within a plausible historical setting (note esp. the first prediction at the beginning of the journey toward Jerusalem and the third prediction immediately prior to entry into Jerusalem). Multiple attestation and Semitic coloring (see esp. the first and second predictions) further support that which the Synoptic evangelists claim to transmit: genuine predictions of the historical Jesus.

Some exegetes, such as F. Hahn, argue that the available form of the predictions reflects post-Easter redaction, while a core goes back to Jesus' vague prediction of an imminent crisis event. Most notably, the detailed descriptions contained in the third prediction appear to support this argument. Jesus predicts his being delivered up to the chief priests, being condemned to death, being delivered up to the *Gentiles, being mocked, insulted, spat upon and scourged, being killed and raised after three days. Detailed comparison, however, between the third Markan passion-resurrection prediction (Mk 10:33b-34) and the Markan passion narrative (see esp. Mk 14:43-44; 14:64; 15:1; 15:20, 31; 14:65; 15:19; 15:15; 15:24; 16:6) shows that both in terms of the sequence of events and in word usage the third passion prediction precedes the very old Markan passion narrative. J. Jeremias adds the observation that this most detailed prediction contains no features that would not be generally known in capital proceedings in Palestine at the time of Christ. Further detailed study discloses the weakness of arguing that these predictions were composed in part or in total after the event.

3.2. The Relationship to Passion-Parousia Sayings. C. H. Dodd and more recently K. Berger (among others) have suggested that Jesus' words about his impending crisis may have been sufficiently ambiguous to have been the source for both resurrection and early parousia sayings. Matthew 10:23; Mark 9:1 (// Mt 16:28; Lk 9:27); Mark 13:30 (// Mt 24:34; Lk 21:32) as well as Luke 17:24-25; Mk 14:62 (// Mt 26:64) seem to suggest the imminent occurrence of the parousia. It is indeed true that we do not possess any saying of Jesus that directly relates the events of death-resurrection and parousia to each other. However, three factors distinguish the vindication-resurrection sayings from the early parousia sayings and thus call into question the argument that they were originally interchangeable.

First, there is a difference regarding time references. While the vindication-resurrection event occurs immediately following rejection and death, the parousia event is merely an imminent event (compare the specific "three days" reference to speedy recovery with the vague time frames in Mt 10:23; Mk 9:1; 13:30).

Second, the vindication-resurrection sayings convey a degree of urgency absent in the early parousia sayings (compare dei ["one must"] in Mk 8:31 and mellei ["one will have to"] in Mk 9:31 with the general anticipation of fulfillment regarding the parousia sayings). Whereas the vindication-resurrection occurs in the paradoxical context of the judgment of the righteous, the parousia marks the triumph of the Son of Man (Mt 10:23).

Third, the references to vindication-resurrection display a different relationship to the event of rejection and death. Whereas references to vindication-resurrection following rejection and death function as complementary contrasts, death-parousia sayings merely display a loose connection to one another (see Mk 14:25; Lk 13:35; 17:24-25; the inverted order parousia-death in the last example illustrates the loose connection between the two events). It is therefore most convincing to argue that Jesus predicted his immediate vindication-resurrection from rejection-death side by side with his imminent parousia.

4. Jesus as Proclaimer and Interpreter of His Destiny.

Historiographical research frequently separates the facts of history from their interpretation by following generations. On the basis of the preceding observations, I conclude that Jesus functions as the divine interpreter of his own history. The disciples are being given interpretive keys by which they may eventually understand the events of the death and resurrection of the Messiah. The following specific points may be noted.

4.1. The Anticipation of Death. H. Schürmann and others have emphasized the fact that Jesus' message inherently carried an element of danger. Jesus' claim to exousia (Mt 5:17-48), his controversial inclusion of sinners in the offer of entry into the kingdom, and his opposition to the ruling clergy of his day (cf. Mk 6:1-6 // Lk 1:14-30; Mk 12:1-12 // Mt 21:33-46; Lk 20:9-19) suggest that Jesus must have been facing the possibility of death. This prospect would have been all the more likely in light of the execution of *John the Baptist and the rejection of Jesus' own message by the religious authorities. The predictions of rejection and death (e.g., Lk 17:25; Jn 10:11; 12:7) thus operate in a realistic historical setting.

4.2. The Resurrection Assurance. Jesus' predictions of vindication and resurrection (see also Mk 9:9 // Mt 17:9; Mk 14:28 // Mt 26:32) mark the first step toward interpreting the event of his death as a God-intended, universally significant event. Far from being a fateful and tragic end of Jesus' ministry, the cursed event has a particular meaning before God.

4.3. The Ransom Saying. Jesus reportedly interpreted his death as a ransom (see Servant of Yahweh) for many (Mk 10:45 par.), thus alluding to Isaiah 53:11b, 12b. This "Son of Man" saying, which stands up as authentic under critical scrutiny (see Page), marks the interpretive teaching of Jesus as the foundation of early Christian belief in the sacrificial death and justifying resurrection of Jesus.

4.4. The Eucharistic Words. Jesus' eucharistic words during the last Passover meal with his disciples (Mark 14:22-24 par.) underline the fact that he attributes a profound redemptive meaning (see Weihs; Backhaus) to his impending death (see Last Supper).

5. Conclusion.

Mark 9:10 reports that prior to Easter the disciples were unable to understand Jesus' teaching regarding his resurrection. This suggests that resurrection predictions were not as explicit in the ears of the disciples as they now appear in the light of 1 Corinthians 15:4. Hearing them as predictions of the Messiah, whose eternal reign rather than death was expected (Dan 7:13-14), the consternation on the part of the disciples is understandable. Furthermore, from the perspective of the disciples, resurrection was to occur at the end of the age to all people (Dan 12:2). Their lack of understanding Jesus' reference to his individual resurrection is therefore all the more plausible. In the minds of the disciples both rejection-vindication and death-resurrection predictions were, before the Easter event, opaque and/or offensive teachings of Jesus as the Messiah. After the resurrection, however, Jesus' implicit and explicit predictions took on a new dimension and provided the disciples with a framework for interpreting these wholly unparalleled events (see Weihs) that had taken place before their eyes according to the divine will.

See also DEATH OF JESUS; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; RESURRECTION; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; SON OF MAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. Backhaus, "Lösepreis für viele (Mk 10,45). Zur Heilsbedeutung des Todes Jesu bei Markus," in Der Evangelist als Theologe: Studien zum Markusevangelium, ed. T. Söding (SBS 163; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1995) 91-118; H. F. Bayer, Jesus' Predictions of Vindication and Resurrection: The Provenance, Meaning, and Correlation of the Synoptic Predictions (WUNT 2/20; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986); K. Berger, Die Auferstehung des Propheten und die Erhöhung des Menschensohnes: Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zur Deutung des Geschickes Jesu in frühchristlichen Texten (SUNT 13; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1976); J. Blank, "Der eschatologische Ausblick Mk 14,25 und seine Bedeutung," in Kontinuität und Einheit: Festschrift für Franz Mussner, ed. P.-G. Müller and W. Stenger (Freiburg: Herder, 1981) 508-18; C. H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (2nd ed.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979); C. A. Evans, "Did Jesus Predict His Death and Resurrection?" in Resurrection, ed. S. E. Porter, M. A. Hayes and D. Tombs (JSNT-Sup 186; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 82-97; H. Frankemölle, "Hat Jesus sich selbst verkündet? Christologische Implikationen in den vormarkinischen Parabeln," (BiLe, 13, 1972) 184-207; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology: Their History in Early Christianity (London: Lutterworth, 1969); J. Jeremias, The Servant of God (2nd ed.; London: SCM, 1965); M. R. Licona, "Did Jesus Predict His Death and Vindication/Resurrection?" JSHJ 8 (2010) 47-66; idem, The Resurrection of Jesus: A New Historiographical Approach (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2010); H. K. McArthur, "On the Third Day," NTS 18 (1971-1972) 81-86; S. H. T. Page, "The Authenticity of the Ransom Logion (Mark 10:45b)," in Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (2 vols.; GP 1, 2; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980) 1:137-61; J. M. Perry, "The Three Days in the Synoptic Passion Predictions," CBQ 48 (1986) 637-54; H. Schürmann, Gottes Reich, Jesu Geschick: Jesu ureigener Tod im Licht seiner Basileia-Verkündigung (Freiburg: Herder, 1983); K. R. Snodgrass, The Parable of the Wicked Tenants: An Inquiry into Parable Interpretation (WUNT 27; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1983); G. Strecker, "Die Leidens- und Auferstehungsvoraussagen im Markusevangelium," in Eschaton und Historie: Aufsätze (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979) 52-75; V. Taylor, "The Origin of the Markan Passion Sayings," in New Testament Essays (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972) 60-71; A. Weihs, Die Deutung des Todes Jesu im Markusevangelium:

Eine exegetische Studie zu den Leidens- und Auferstehungsansagen (FB 99; Würzburg: Echter, 2003); M. V. Zolondek, "The Authenticity of the First Passion Prediction and the Origin of Mk 8:31-33," JSHJ 8 (2010) 237-53. H. F. Bayer

PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD

In the past the emphasis of Gospel and Jesus studies has been on Jesus' relationship to royal messianism and his conflict with the *Pharisees as the dominant party in Judea. Discussion of priesthood focused primarily on the characterization of the chief priests during Jesus' last days. A sea change in scholarship began with E. P. Sanders, who argued for the essentially priestly (and temple-focused) character of first-century A.D. Jewish life. Sanders's claim that the Pharisees were not the force to be reckoned with (as the Gospel writers portray them) has been criticized by some (e.g., Hengel and Deines), but others have, from various angles, endorsed Sanders's arguments for the centrality of the priesthood in first-century A.D. Jewish life.

A concerted scholarly focus on priestly and cultic material in the OT, combined with a more sympathetic study of priestly material in the sources (and the evidence of recently published *Dead Sea Scrolls) and less reliance on *rabbinic material (which characterized Jeremias's Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus), is transforming our understanding. A well-established scholarly tradition focuses on the priests' sociopolitical and *economic position (e.g., Sanders; VanderKam). There is increasing focus on the theology of priesthood, especially the symbolism of the accoutrements and rites of priesthood in the context of a temple and liturgical cosmology (e.g., Barker 1991, 2003, 2004; Hayward; Fletcher-Louis 2001, 2002, 2004a, 2004b, 2004c, 2007a, 2011, 2012). The sources do not separate the politics and the theology of priesthood. Scholars agree that the priests function as God's representatives. But a growing number think that both the Bible and first-century A.D. Jews had a rich and complex theology of priesthood that went much further than mere divine representation, and that this, intertwined with their political position and an equally complex theology of the *temple, explains important (and otherwise puzzling) aspects of the Gospel records.

1. Sources
2. Qualifications and Functions
3. Meaning and Theology of the Priesthood
4. Priesthood in the First Century A.D.
5. The Gospels, Jesus and the Priesthood

1. Sources.

Perhaps because priests often were *scribes, the primary sources for priests and priesthood are many and varied. Besides all the relevant biblical texts (especially Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Ezekiel, 1-2 Chronicles, Zechariah, Malachi), many of our sources for Jewish antiquity are either clearly written by priests (the Aramaic Levi Document, texts in the Qumran library, the works of Flavius Josephus) or have a strong priestly focus and are likely to be written by priests (1 Enoch, 2 Enoch, Ben Sira (and its Greek translation, Sirach), Jubilees, Joseph and Aseneth, Letter of Aristeas, Aristobulus, Testament of Moses, Pseudo-Philo, Apocalypse of Abraham). Equally, there are hardly any sources that are overtly nonpriestly or, antipriestly (though see Pss. Sol. 8; 17). For the shape and character of priesthood in first-century A.D. Judaism there is considerable agreement among the diverse historical sources, though material in early rabbinic texts does not always coincide with the evidence of texts from the first century (such as Philo and Josephus).

Individual primary texts have their own emphasis and perspective on priesthood that reflect different positions among competing parties and groups (of Sadducees, Pharisees, *Essenes, the priests of Leontopolis and others) and the development of theologies over time (starting with very old biblical material, through late fourth-century traditions in the Aramaic Levi Document, 1 Enoch, Philo and some of Josephus's sources, through to legal and mystical material from the rabbinic era). However, for the most part the Gospels seem to assume the priestly realities and theology of a common *Judaism (shared by all the parties), and all the relevant Gospel texts can be explained given the evidence in the other sources for the roles of the priests in Jesus' world.

2. Qualifications and Functions.

Priests were priests by birth (in the line of Aaron, the Levite). Torah defines their essential duties. The priesthood oversaw the running of the temple in general (Ezek 44:14; Sir 45:24; Josephus, Ant. 3.191) and had particular responsibility for the making of sacrifices as an expression of thanksgiving, for atonement for sins and for hearing individuals undertake vows. They inspected the offerings of lay Israelites' (Philo, Spec. 1.166), but otherwise they performed their duties in silence (Let. Arist. 92-95), while the Levites were responsible for music and for the policing and administrative oversight of the wider temple space (see Num 3:5-10; 18:3-4; Ezek 44:11, 14). Priests received tithes (with the Levites) and were charged with blessing the people (Lev 9:22-24; Num 6:23-26; Deut 21:5; cf. Ben Sira/Sir 50:20-21; Jub. 31:15; 1QS II, 1; m. Tamid 5:1; 7:2).

For their work in the temple priests wore special clothing (Ex 28—29; 39:1-30; Ezek 44:17-19; Ben Sira/Sir 45:7-12; Let. Arist. 96-99; Josephus, J.W. 5.228-237; Ant. 3.151-187) and were anointed with oil (Ex 28:41; 1 Chron 29:22). The responsibility for the management of the nation's ritual purity (Lev 11—15; Num 19) also entailed some work outside of the temple, as in, for example, the inspection of cases of *leprosy (cf. Mk 1:44; Lk 17:14). In the first century, priests officiated in the temple a couple times a year according to a rota divided into twenty-four "courses," a detail reflected in the account of Zechariah's service in Luke 1:5-9 (cf. 1 Chron 24; Josephus, Ant. 7.363-365).

This left plenty of time for the fulfillment of other responsibilities. Along with the Levites, they were God's appointed teachers of Israel (Lev 10:10-11; Num 31:21-24; Deut 27:9-10; 31:9-13; 33:10; Mal 2:7; Ezek 44:23; Ezra 7:10; cf. Hecataeus of Abdera XL,3.5-6; Sir 45:17; Jub. 31:15; 1Q28b III, 23). In line with their intimate knowledge of Torah and knowledge of God's righteousness (Ps 132:9; Sir 45:26), they had judicial responsibility, both locally and at a national level, with the high priest chairing the national court, the *Sanhedrin (Josephus, Ant. 4.218; Hecataeus of Abdera XL,3.5; cf. Deut 17:8-9; 21:5; 2 Chron 19:8-11; Ezek 44:24). Historically, the king had, at one time, acted as judge (2 Sam 8:15; 1 Kings 3:9-28; 10:9; Jer 22:3; 23:5), but the requirements of Mosaic law, which preceded the institution of kingship, prevailed in the Second Temple period (cf. Aramaic Levi Document 3:17; 6:1; Ben Sira/Sir 45:17; Jub. 30:18-21; 31:15; T. Levi 8:17; 1Q28b III, 27-28; Josephus, Ant. 4.218; Ag. Ap. 2.187).

Some responsibilities were not peculiar to the priestly calling, even if they were in some sense appropriate to the priest's defining role as mediator. Both priests (e.g., Ezra 9:5-15; Joel 2:17; Josephus, Ant. 11.326-328; 3 Macc 2) and nonpriests (e.g., the king in 2 Sam 24:17; Moses in Ex 33:12-23; Daniel in Dan 9; angels in Tob 12:12) were intercessors. Priests led the nation in prayer (Wis 18:21; Philo, Spec. 1.97; 3.131; Mos. 2.133; Josephus, Ant. 3.191), and according to reliable rabbinic tradition, this included recitation of the Shema in the daily temple liturgy (m. Tamid 5:1). By virtue of their ritual access to God and their intimate knowledge of Scripture, and through the high priest's breastpiece (known in the Greek as the logeion, "the oracle"), they could be expected to serve as prophets and prophetic interpreters of scriptural prophecy (see 3.1 below). Their God-ordained duties, especially teaching Torah and administrative oversight of the temple, combined with the free time for education and training that their duties afforded meant there "was a significant overlap in the Second Temple period between the priestly elite and the scribal elite" (Himmelfarb, 15). That is, they were skilled in writing, counting and associated activities, such as calendrical observation and calculation and the keeping of genealogical records (see Ezra 7:1-6; Neh 13:13; Aramaic Levi Document 9:1-18; 12:1-9; T. Levi 8:17; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 1.29-35). The temple evidently had its own library of both biblical and other traditions (see Josephus, Ant. 3.38; 4.303-304; 5.61; cf. Let. Arist. 3; 2 Macc 2:13-15). But, of course, in the first century A.D. and outside of the temple there were many scribes who were not priests, some of whom handled copies of Scripture.

The priesthood was strictly separated from the rest of the nation. For example, priests' clothing was not to be worn "by an outsider" (Sir 45:13), nor by the priests themselves outside the temple (Lev 10:7; 21:12; Ezek 44:19; Josephus, Ant. 18.91-92). They had exclusive use of a special brand of anointing oil and incense (Ex 30:31-33; Num 16:40). Ordinary Israelites were prohibited from wearing ša'atnēz, a mixture of wool and linen (Lev 19:19; Deut 22:11), but this was required for priestly garments (Josephus, Ant. 4.208, cf. m. Kil. 9:1). Nonpriests were prohibited access to priestly food (Ex 29:33; Lev 22:10-16). Even the Levites were prohibited physical access to the holy things reserved for the priests. Scripture warned against any who would challenge these boundaries, especially the king (2 Chron 26:16-21; cf. Num 16-17; Heb 7:14). Priests were not supposed to own land (though some did [see Josephus, Life 422]), but they were provided for by a system of tithes (Num 18:21-32; Neh 10:37-39) and offerings (of firstfruits, firstlings and the share of any meat Israelites butchered at home for private use). Some have seen in Exodus 19:6 a claim that every individual Israelite was a member of a royal priesthood (cf. 1 Pet 2:5, 9; Rev 1:6; 5:10). However, Jews from at least the fourth century B.C. onward seem to have taken the language of Exodus 19:6 (Israel "will be for me a mamleket kōhānīm and a holy nation") to mean that Israel, as a nation, is to be ruled by priests, not that all Israelites are priests (see, e.g., Aramaic Levi Document 4:7; 11:6; 2 Macc 2:17) (see Schwartz).

3. Meaning and Theology of the Priesthood.

In various ways, Jews invested the obvious, practical realities of the priestly office (sketched above) with deeper meaning as part of their understanding of the temple and its liturgy. In particular, priesthood was interpreted in the context of the belief that the temple was a microcosm (with the roofed sanctuary as heaven, the courtyard and altar the land, and the bronze laver “the Sea” [1 Kings 7:23-26, cf. Josephus, Ant. 3.179-183]), and that it functioned as a restored Eden (see Hayward; Barker 2004). The full theological ramifications of priestly identity focused on the roles and vestments of the high priest.

Torah envisages one priest who is “exalted above his fellows” (Lev 21:10): a high priest (variously called the “head priest” [2 Chron 31:10; Ezra 7:5; 1QM XV, 4]; the “first/preeminent priest” [LXX Ezra 7:5]; the “great priest” [Lev 21:10; Sir 50:1]). He alone entered the holy of holies on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16), and he alone, at other times, wore the full set of glorious, gold and multicolored, bejeweled garments given to Aaron at Sinai (Ex 28; 39; Lev 8:7-9). In addition to the tunic, sash and linen undergarments worn by all priests (Ex 28:39-42; 39:27-29; Lev 8:13), the high priest had a multicolored “ephod” (ēpōd) and a “breastpiece [hōšen] of judgment” carrying stones engraved with the names of the twelve tribes, a blue robe with pomegranates and golden bells at its lowest fringe, and a distinctive turban carrying a gold leaf (šîš) inscribed with the four-lettered name of God, the Tetragrammaton (Let. Arist. 98; Philo, Mos. 2.114-115; Josephus, Ant. 3.178, J.W. 5:235; cf. Ex 28:36).

Investigation of the biblical description of these garments, in the context of wider ancient Near Eastern traditions (see Fletcher-Louis 2004a; 2004b; 2007a; Meyers; Propp) and ancient Jewish commentary on them, along with associated traditions surrounding the high priest or high priestly figures (Hayward; Barker 2003; 2004, Fletcher-Louis 1997; 2002; 2012) leads to the conclusion that the high priest was considered a uniquely divine representative of Israel’s God, the true human being, with his full set of garments symbolizing, also, the whole cosmos.

3.1. The High Priest a Divine Office. On the basis of Exodus 28:2, 40 (garments “for beauty and for glory”), the (high) priest is regularly ascribed “glory” (Heb. kābôd; Gk. doxa; also Heb. hōd, hādār; Aram. yēqār [Aramaic Levi Document 13:4-5, 15-16; Ben Sira/Sir 45:7-8, 12, 20, 26; 50:7, 11; 1 Macc 14:4-5; 15:32, 36; Jub. 31:14; 1Q28b III, 25; IV, 28; V, 18; 4Q511 35, 4; 4Q418 81, 5; 4Q491c 1, 8; 4Q408 3 + 3a, 5; Let. Arist. 96, 98, T. Levi 8:5; cf. 2 En. 22:8; 71:9]). He is even “wrapped in garments of glory” and splendor (Ben Sira 50:11 [cf. scholion to Megillat Ta’anit for Kislev 21]), in a way reminiscent of the language that the psalmist uses for Yahweh (e.g., Ps 29:1; 97:6; 104:1-2), and he is described in language that evokes the “appearance of the likeness of the glory of Yahweh,” the human form seated on the God’s throne-chariot in Ezekiel 1:26-28 (see also Ben Sira/Sir 50:7; cf. 4Q405 23 II, 8-9).

In Ben Sira/Sirach the description of the high priest Simon in chapter 50 echoes so precisely the details of the poem to Wisdom in chapter 24 that the high priest appears to be the very embodiment of *Wisdom. Philo identifies the high priest with the logos (Fug. 108-110; Spec. 1.81; Migr. 102; cf. Somm. 1.215), implicating him in the work of creation. This accords with his role in the cultic drama: on the stage of the temple microcosm the high priest plays the role of the creator God, Yahweh, whose name he speaks and wears (as the designer label). This is worked out in detail in Ben Sira/Sirach 50, where the story of creation in Genesis 1 is applied to the high priest’s activities (Fletcher-Louis 2004c). In the OT God’s creative work is sometimes depicted as the activity of a warrior, overcoming forces of chaos inimical to the order of creation (e.g., Ps 74:12-17; 89:8-14). The high priest also seems to play the role of the divine warrior, his pomegranates and golden bells symbolizing thunder and lightning (Josephus, Ant. 3.184; J.W. 5.231) that accompany Yahweh in his theophany (cf. Ex 19:16; Ps 18:13-14; 77:18; Josephus, Ant. 2.343-344; 3.80; 5.60-61; 6.27); and, in one passage the sash with which he is girded (Ex 28:39) is described as a (slain) Leviathan, the twisting serpent that Yahweh slays (Josephus, Ant. 3.154-156; cf. Ps 74:14; Is 27:1-2). There was widespread interest in the light-giving properties of Aaron’s garments, especially the stones of the hōšen, which were somehow related to the mysterious Urim and Thummim, radiating light (Let. Arist. 97; Josephus, Ant. 3.215-217; 4Q376; 1Q29; L.A.B. 26:9, 13, 15), a light that was connected to the perfect (uncreated) light of Genesis 1:3 (see Fletcher-Louis 2003, 232-51).

These aspects of the (high) priestly identity are best explained by the belief that the high priest is God’s divine cult statue, the living image-idol (šelem) of God. Parts of his attire (esp. the breastpiece and ephod, the precious stones with their engravings as of a seal, the robe with its pomegranates and the rosette on the turban) are those that, generically, belong to the garments that clothe cult statues in the wider ancient Near East and in Greco-Roman antiquity (cf., e.g. Jer 10:4-9; Ezek 16:15-22) (see Fletcher-Louis 2004a; 2004b; 2007a). It is fitting that Aaron should be so dressed because the tabernacle as described in Exodus 25–40 recapitulates Genesis 1, and so Aaron in the tabernacle-as-microcosm is what Adam was created to be in the macrocosm: the šelem ʾelohîm, the cult statue of the one, true, creator God (on Adam as divine cult statue, see Herring). Several texts show that this is how Exodus 28 was understood at the end of the Second Temple period. The true high priest was identified with Adam, the true human being, or he served as the representative of humanity (Jub. 32:8; Philo, Somn. 1.215; 2.188; cf. Lev 21:17–23; Ezek 28:12–15), wearing the garments of the first man (see the texts discussed in Hayward, 45–48). And the high priest was deemed the perfect cult statue of God, fulfilling the original intention for Adam as God's šelem (Josephus, Ant. 11.325–337; L.A.B. 25–26; 2 En. 22–67). This way of understanding the high priest helps explain the existence of texts that express or describe worship directed to the high priest (and to high priestly figures) (Hecataeus of Abdera in Diodorus Siculus, Bib. hist. 40.3.4–6; Ben Sira/Sir 7:27–31; 50:1–21 [esp. 50:20–21]; T. Levi 17:3; Josephus, Ant. 11.331–335; b. Yoma 69a; 4Q405 23 II; Dan 7:13–14; 2 En. 57; 64; cf. Dan 7:13–14; 1 Macc 3:3–9; 14:4–15; 1 En. 48:5; 62:6–9; Jos. Asen. 29:6; T. Reu. 6:12; 3 En. 12–16).

But it should be stressed that proskynēsis, praise and even sacrifice (in Sir 7:27–31) directed to the high priest were unlike that offered to human beings in the Greco-Roman world—for example, to the ruler cult surrounding Alexander the Great and the Roman emperor. This is because the priesthood may best be conceived as an “office,” not a matter of personal identity. Scripture lays down no specific personal, moral requirements of priests; rather, they are set apart by ritual and physiognomic purity, and by certain lifestyle restrictions (Lev 21). Historically, the priesthood was given to the Levites and Aaronides in view of their acts of faithfulness and zeal at Sinai (Ex 32; cf. Deut 33:9; Num 25). For the descendants of Aaron, as for all Israelites, there were expectations of right behavior, but the role itself was not to be earned or bought (by contrast to priesthood in the Greco-Roman world). Wearing his special clothing, having passed through the necessary rituals of purification, and in fulfilling carefully circumscribed duties, the high priest no longer has an individual, private identity; his own personality is occluded by the identities of those whom he now represents in his public office (God, Adam, the nation, the cosmos). And having passed through the rites that equip him for his office, he is perfect, sinless (Philo, Spec. 102; Fug. 108). This also means that, in worshiping the high priest, Jews did not risk transgressing their belief in one God. When non-Jews made Alexander the Great a god, in recognition of his own personal achievements, he became the thirteenth member of the pantheon (Aelian, Var. hist. 5.12), but Israel's high priest is Yahweh (at key moments in the liturgy); he was not a second god.

The fact that the (office of) high priest is God's living image-idol helps explain other traditions. He is God's prophet (T. Levi 8:2, 15; Josephus, J.W. 1.68–69; Ant. 3.192, 214–218; 11.326–328; 13.282–83, 299–300, 322; Jos. Asen. 22:13; 23:8; 26:6; 4Q376 1 II; Philo, Spec. 4.192)—an agent of revelation, through visions and the oracular power of his apparel—just as statues of gods were believed to communicate messages from the gods. The fact that slandering or disobeying the high priest was viewed as a capital offense (see Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.194; cf. Josephus, Ant. 13.293–295) also reflects the fact that the high priest is this kind of human representative of Yahweh. Finally, it goes also with those texts that say that the (high) priest is God's “angel” (not merely his “messenger”) (Mal 2:7; Hecataeus of Abdera XL.3.5; 1Q28b IV, 25; 4Q511 35, 4; T. Mos. 10:2), especially the evidence that he could be identified with the angel who carries God's name in Exodus 23:20–22 (on LXX Ex 23:20–22, see van der Kooij; and cf. 3 En. 15).

3.2. The Royal Priest. Torah puts the priesthood at the head of the nation in all spheres of life. Israel is allowed a king (Deut 17:14–20) but is required to have a high priest, who is the anointed one, the messiah (Ex 28:41; Lev 4:5; 1 Chron 29:22; Ben Sira/Sir 45:15; 1QS IX, 11; 4Q375 I, 9). A king should be accountable to the Levitical priests (Deut 17), and throughout the Second Temple period, with the partial exception of the Herodian period, the nation was led by the high priest and his colleagues. From Aristobulus I (104–103 B.C.) onward, the Hasmonean high priests claimed also the title “king” (Josephus, J.W. 1.70, cf. Josephus, Ant. 13.301; 20.241). Earlier Hasmonean high priests adopted many of the trappings of royalty (see, e.g., Simon Maccabee in 1 Macc 14).

Some have thought that the priesthood was supposed to be concerned only with temple worship, a realm separate from political and civil realities (Jeremias; Rooke; cf. Bond, 33–34). And it has sometimes been assumed that the Hasmonean combination of the priesthood and kingship was a novelty, that the absence of a king alongside the chief priest for most of the postexilic period has to be explained by the constraints of the policies of the nation's foreign rulers (the Persians, Greeks and then Romans), and that Herodian and Roman rule corrupted the priesthood by forcing it to engage in the political sphere. However, the consistent witness of the sources from the pre-Maccabean period (e.g., Neh 12; Zech 3:1-10; Aramaic Levi Document 4:17; 11:6; Hecataeus of Abdera XL,3.4-7; cf. 1 Macc 12:20-23; Josephus, Ant. 11.297-301, 302-303, 306-312, 329-339; 12.226-227; 1 En. 1—36) has the priest lead the nation without a king and only sometimes with a governor (VanderKam), and numerous sources ascribe royal prerogatives to the high priest in a way that indicates a self-conscious theology of royal priesthood that resisted a separation of the political and the cultic. This is to be expected because the laws of Moses (esp. Ex 28—29; see also Zech 3—6) view the high priest as a royal figure (see Davies, 157-61; Propp, 524-25, 732). Some aspects of Aaron's garments are distinctively royal (the mišnepet, "turban," of Ex 28:4, 39; cf. Ezek 21:26 [MT 21:31]; Is 62:3; the nēzer, "diadem," of Ex 29:6; cf. 2 Sam 1:10; 2 Kings 11:12; Ps 89:39 [MT 89:40]; 132:18; 2 Chron 23:11), while others (the multicolored, bejeweled breastpiece and ephod) are fitting for a king (though not the sole prerogative of the king) because kings in the ancient Near East also functioned as the living image-idol of the god, and those aspects of Aaron's garments signify his divine image-idol identity. Many were happy to say the high priest wore a crown (Heb. ātārā; Aram. kēlil; Gk. stephanos [Zech 6:11; Ben Sira/Sirach 45:12; Josephus, J.W. 5.235; Ant. 3.172, 187; 20.12; Philo, Mos. 2.114; T. Levi 8:2, 9; cf. Ezek 28:12; 1Q28b IV, 2-3; 11Q18 14 II, 2-5; 4Q405 23 I, 6; Philo, Mos. 2.116; Fug. 111, 118; Let. Arist. 98]), and one biblical passage sees him sitting on (al) a throne (Zech 6:13; cf. Ps 110:1, 4; 4Q491c 1, 5-6; 2 En. 24:1).

Conventional biblical language for kings could even be applied to the priesthood (see Is 11:2 in Aramaic Levi Document 3:6; cf. T. Levi 2:3; 4:5; 18:5, 7; also Gen 49:10 in Aramaic Levi Document 11:6 [discussed in Stone, Greenfield and Eshel, 35, 184-88]), and for some, the royal priest fulfilled the model of Melchizedek, king and priest of God Most High in Salem, who brought out bread and wine to Abraham (Gen 14:18-20; cf. Ps 110:4; Aramaic Levi Document 5:2-8; T. Levi 8:5; 18:2, 7; T. Mos. 6:1). Aaron's breastpiece of judgment functioned as a war oracle (Num 27:21), and already in the Pentateuch (Gen 34; Ex 32:27-29; Num 25), and all the way down through the postexilic period, not just under the Hasmoneans, priests are warriors, leading battles, both spiritually and physically (Num 27:21; Deut 20:2-4; 2 Macc 15:12-16; T. Levi 5-6; 1QM; Josephus, Ant. 13.282-283, Jos. Asen. 23:14-17; 26:6; 27:6, T. Mos. 10:2; 11Q13 III, 9-14; cf. Josephus, Ant. 13:284-287). So it is unsurprising that under Roman rule the high priest's garments, which symbolized kingship and could function as a war oracle, were, for the most part, kept under Roman (or Herodian) control, under lock and key in the Antonia Fortress, except for use at festivals (Josephus, Ant. 15.404-408; 18.90-93; 20.5-14).

4. Priesthood in the First Century A.D.

4.1. Position in Jewish Society. After centuries of leadership under (royal) high priests, Roman rule brought a dramatic change in the nation's model of governance, with *Herod the Great claiming both the title "king" and, for the first time in the postexilic period, the authority to appoint and depose the high priest. After Herod (and his immediate successor, Archelaus) the priesthood regained much of the power that it had lost, especially when the Roman authorities based themselves in Caesarea Maritima (not Jerusalem), though none of the high priests in the first century A.D. made the kind of claim to kingship that had been a feature of Hasmonean rule. Roman control of their vestments was, in part, designed to prevent that possibility. In any case, Rome twice invested royal authority in a Herodian descendant who significantly qualified the power of the high priesthood, Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 41-44) and Agrippa II (A.D. 48-66). Given the well-established royal, judicial and military elements of the high priest's office, we can be sure that Rome's rule frustrated the aspirations of successive incumbents to the position. It is not surprising that on the outbreak of revolt in A.D. 66 the nation's chief priests played a leading role toward the formation of a new, independent nation state.

In the decades before the war the ruling Jewish elite owed their position to the biblical view that the nation should be governed by a high priest, the inextricable relationship between the priesthood and ancestry, and the education that equipped them both for governance of a temple-state and for the realpolitik of empire-wide Jewish community relations. This meant that the aristocracy, based in the nation's mother city, was, for the most part (but not exclusively), priests, and power was concentrated in a few high priestly families (all of whom, we have no reason to doubt, were of Zadokite lineage). Both the NT (Mt 2:4; Mk 8:31; Lk 9:22) and other sources (e.g., Josephus, J.W. 2.243; Ant. 20.205; Life 193) refer to a body of chief priests ruling alongside the high priest. This seems to have comprised priests of the high priestly families permanently resident in the capital, with positions of national and cultic responsibility and membership of the Sanhedrin. It included some who had once been the high priest (e.g., Lk 3:2; Jn 18:13, 19–24; Josephus, J.W. 2:243; Ant. 20:205; Life 193). Almost certainly, all of the high priests in the first century A.D. were “Sadducees (Josephus, Ant. 20:199; Acts 5:17; cf. Josephus, Ant. 13:293–298). Many aristocrats were Sadducees, though not all of them (Josephus, Life 12, for example, followed the Pharisees).

With some confidence, we estimate that there were eighteen thousand to twenty thousand priests and Levites in the first century A.D. (Sanders, 181). So, most priests (like Zechariah in Luke 1) lived economically and culturally normal Jewish lives, far from the machinations of international power politics. Because the duties of the priest’s office might take up only a few weeks of a year’s work, priests lived throughout the land and at all levels of society. Judging by passages in Josephus and Philo, we infer that some struggled to make a living (Philo, Spec. 1.154; Josephus, Ant. 20:181, 206). *Essenism was a thoroughly priestly movement, and the name “Essene” probably reflected widespread piety surrounding the high priest’s breastpiece, which some called essēn (see, e.g., Josephus, Ant. 3:163; cf. Josephus, J.W. 2:119 on the Essēnoi). Some Pharisees were priests (e.g., Josephus, Life 197), but we do not know what proportion. Sanders has argued that priests were a self-standing group with their own professional traditions. However, there is also evidence to suggest that on taking up public office, priests had to choose whether to follow the teachings of one of the leading parties (e.g., Josephus, Life 12). In short, “the priests” were not a monolithic body, though the “chief priests” seem to have been a well-defined group based in Jerusalem.

4.2. Infighting and Causes of Discontent. Priests sometimes fought among themselves, the most celebrated cases being the struggles over the high priesthood between reformers and traditionalists in the second century B.C. that led to the rise of the Maccabees and the conflict between the Jerusalem priesthood and the founders of the Dead Sea community at Qumran (see also the creation of the Oniad temple at Leontopolis in Egypt [Josephus, Ant. 13:62–68]). According to Josephus, conflict flared up again in the years before the Great Revolt (Josephus, Ant. 20:180–181, 206, 213), and other sources reflect ongoing struggles between rival priests or priestly theologies, and between the masses (that included lower ranking priests) and the ruling chief priests (e.g., Pss. Sol. 2:1–21; 8:11–13; 17:5–12, T. Levi 17:11; T. Mos. 5–10; 1 Enoch; 2 Enoch).

There were many causes of conflict: the choice of liturgical calendar (whether solar or lunisolar), the location of the temple (with rival temples at Shechem and Leontopolis in Egypt); the purity of priests, especially those in positions of power (e.g., Josephus, Ant. 13:288–296, 372; T. Mos. 5–7); liturgical theology and practice (with sharp disagreements between Pharisees and Sadducees on some ritual details); the accusation of moral corruption against priests in power, the relationship with Rome and its policies; and the relative positions of priests and Levites (Josephus, Ant. 20:216–218). In particular, there were also competing views of the relationship between the high priest and a king in God’s intended order: some evidently saw no need now for a king at all (albeit the high priest carried some royal power); others wanted an overt recognition of the high priest as the king; while others hoped for, or set about, the creation of a diarchy whereby a king and a priest ruled together. Although the royal functions of the high priest were a well-established tradition grounded in Scripture, all agreed that a king (from the tribe of Judah) could not function as a priest (2 Chron 26:12–21; Josephus, Ant. 20:226; cf. Num 16–17; Heb 7:14).

4.3. Hope for a Priestly Messiah. Officially, a mediator between God and his people, during “the years of direct Roman rule . . . the high priest was the man in the middle, between the secular ruler and the people . . . representing the people to the ruler and the ruler to the people” (Sanders, 322), and struggling, all the time, to find a modus vivendi between the expectations of the superpower and the (Pharisaic-led) piety of the people. For many Jews, the serving high priests were unfit for the job, and there is widespread evidence of a hope for a coming, God-appointed priest who would replace the (Sadducean) high priest appointed by Rome (or by the Herodian king). Some expected a new high priest without a king (T. Mos. 10:2; 2 En. 68–72; cf. 4Q541 9 I; Lk 1:16–17; 3:15; Josephus, Ant. 14:40–41; 20:226). The Qumran community and other Jews believed that the nation should be governed by a king, alongside and subordinate to a high priest (1Q28b IV–V; 1QS IX, 10–11; 1Q28a II, 11–23; T. Jud. 21:1–4; Josephus, Ant. 18:4; cf. Deut 17:14–20; Jer 33:17–22; Zech 4:14; 6:13). Some have seen a focus on the priesthood in the political theology of the Roman period as a new development (e.g., Bond, 193n24); however, it reflects both the dominance of the priesthood throughout the postexilic period (VanderKam) and the vision of the Pentateuch (see above).

The most important text for the expectation of a high-priest messiah is likely to be the vision of a “one like a son of man” in Daniel 7 (see Son of Man).

Commentators have been divided over the identity of this figure, some arguing that it is an angel, others that it is simply a literary symbol for Israel. In the light of biblical and wider beliefs about the priesthood, a true high priest, appearing at a future (eschatological) Day of Atonement, may better explain all the relevant data, including Jesus' references in the Gospels to "the Son of Man" (Lacocque; Fletcher-Louis 1997; 2006; 2007b; 2011).

5. The Gospels, Jesus and the Priesthood.

The Gospels accurately reflect the position of the priestly aristocracy both in the *passion narratives and at earlier points in Jesus' life (Mt 2:4; Jn 1:19; 7:32, 45). Jesus does not engage with many issues that occupied priests (such as calendar and ritual particulars), and swaths of his teaching apparently have no direct relationship to the symbolic world of the priesthood. However, the traditional view of scholars that the Gospels present Jesus' self-understanding in terms of a royal messianism (see Christ), and that neither Jesus himself nor the Gospels owe anything of substance to the theology of priesthood for his mission, is being revised in the light of a better understanding of the theology of priesthood and the fact that the priest-messiah was required to play a central role in Israel's government (e.g., Kerr; Barker 2004; Bond; Fletcher-Louis 2006; 2007b; Perrin; Attridge).

5.1. Jesus and His Disciples as Priests. There are quite a few texts that suggest that Jesus behaved as a (high) priest. Jesus is called "the holy one of God" (ho hagios tou theou [Mk 1:24; Lk 4:34; Jn 6:69]), a title used exclusively of Aaron in the Bible (Ps 106:16; cf. Num 16:7; Ben Sira/Sirach 45:6). In some healing stories he has contact with the contagiously impure (a leper, a woman in menstrual flow, and a corpse [Mk 1:40-45; 5:25-34, 35-43 par.; cf. Num 5:1-4]), and life-giving power flows out from him to remove the impurity. Such "contagious holiness" recalls the power of the high priest in his anointed garments (Ex 30:29; Ezek 44:19; Wis 18:20-25).

Jesus forgave *sins (Mt 9:1-8; Mk 2:1-12; Lk 5:17-26; 7:36-50; cf. Jn 20:23), behavior that for a first-century Jew could be derived from an understanding of the responsibilities of the true high priest, as God's representative and real presence (Ex 28:38; Lev 10:17; cf. 2 En. 64:5). In the transfiguration story Jesus' garments become dazzling white (Mk 9:3; cf. Mt 17:2; Lk 9:29) in a way that recalls the light-giving properties of the high priest's garments in general and, in particular, his dazzling white linen garments of the Day of Atonement (see Philo, Somn. 1.216-217; cf. m. Yoma 3:6). Language in the context (esp. Matthew's version [Mt 16:13-17:13]) associates the mountaintop revelation of Jesus' identity (see Transfiguration) with the installation of a new (royal) high priest at the New Year festivals (1 Macc 10:21; Jub. 32:2-9; Josephus, Ant. 15.50-52; cf. Josephus, Ant. 13.303-308; J.W. 1.73) (see Fletcher-Louis 2001). Jesus' detachment from ordinary *family ties finds, in at least one passage (Lk 14:25-33, discussed in Fletcher-Louis 2000), inspiration from the behavior of the priestly tribe (see Ex 32:27-29; Deut 33:9).

Such priestly themes also connect directly to the "Son of Man" title. In Mark 2:10 it is as "Son of Man" that Jesus claims to forgive. The argument of Mark 2:23-28 can be seen to rely on the notion that since Jesus is the Son of Man, who is the true high priest, his contagious holiness gives a Galilean cornfield the legal status of the temple, where there is a new order of priests, who, like God himself (Gen 2:2), are allowed to work on the *Sabbath (cf. Jn 5:17) (Fletcher-Louis 2007b). In the narrative block of the incidents of Caesarea Philippi and the transfiguration (Mt 16:13-17:13; Mk 8:27-9:13), Jesus wants his disciples to understand that he is not just the (royal) Messiah; he is also Daniel's priestly Son of Man (Mk 8:31, 38; 9:9, 12 par.) (Fletcher-Louis 2001). Indeed, many of the Gospel "Son of Man" sayings are illuminated or explained through a consideration of their possible relationship to biblical and postbiblical priest traditions.

The Son of Man comes in God's *glory (Mk 8:38; 13:26 par.; cf. Mt 25:31; Jn 12:23; 13:31), as we should expect of the high priest who is described receiving glory in God's presence (i.e., in the sanctuary) in Daniel 7:14, whence he would be expected to return (as if from heaven to earth). The Son of Man suffers in a way that some texts suggest was sacrificial. Some first-century A.D. Jews expected the eschatological high priest to suffer (4Q541 9 I, 2-7), and the language of Daniel 7:13 (he "was brought near" [haqrēbūhī]) can in other contexts (e.g., Ezra 6:10, 17) be taken to mean something "was offered" (as a sacrifice). In Mark 10:45 (and Mt 20:28) he will give his life as a "ransom" (lytron), a strange word for a human life, but one that is (uniquely) used of the Levites already in LXX Numbers 3:12, 46, 48-49. Like the (royal) high priest in his garments (see above), the Son of Man will come (as the divine warrior) with thunder and lightning (Lk 17:24; cf. Mt 24:27).

The "Son of Man" title provokes the issue of *blasphemy. This is to be expected. If Jesus as the Son of Man is the true eschatological (royal) high priest, then all should submit to him (1 Macc 14:43; T. Jud. 21:1; T. Sim. 7:1; T. Reu. 6:5-7); to do otherwise would be blasphemous (Josephus, Ant. 13.293-295; Ag. Ap. 2.194). But since Jesus is a Davidide, how could he be Daniel's coming high priest? In one saying (Mt 12:31-32; Lk 12:10) Jesus deems the failure to recognize him as the one whom Daniel foresaw forgivable, for it is understandable that it would not occur to those living under the framework of the Mosaic covenant that Jesus could qualify for such a high priestly role. In the end, Jesus has to justify his dangerous and strange claim to be a king who is a priest through appeal to Psalm 110:1-4, which describes a sacral king after the order of Melchizedek (Mk 14:62; cf. Mk 12:35-37 par.). In the same breath he claims, publicly, in the Sanhedrin, to be the fulfillment of Daniel 7:13 and Psalm 110:1. From the Sanhedrin's point of view, this is an attack on the "eternal" office (Sir 45:7, 13, 15, 24) of high priest, which Caiaphas currently fills. Jesus' words imply that Caiaphas is not fit for office, and thus they constitute blasphemy. And his words make a direct attack on the Mosaic, God-given constitution that barred the line of Judah, and of David, from the priestly office. That too was blasphemy (Mt 26:65; Mk 14:64). Yet, in other ways the Gospel trial scene seems to imply a transition from Caiaphas to Jesus as true high priest (see Bond). Caiaphas's tearing of his garments, for example, may imply, that he himself is the one not fit for office (cf. esp. Mt 26:65 with Lev 21:10).

In Matthew 25:31-46 the Son of Man's identity is inextricable from that of the "little ones," as we should expect of a high priest who bears the people of God over his heart (Ex 28:9-29; cf. Jub. 32:8; Philo, Somn. 2.188); and, as befits the royal high priest, he is enthroned (cf. esp. Zech 6:13; 4Q491c 1, 5-6). Here too, and in other places (e.g., Mt 24:30; Mk 13:26; Lk 18:8; 21:27, 36; Jn 5:27), the Son of Man has a judicial authority that reflects the high priest's role as supreme judge and divine warrior. So too in other logia Jesus says that his receiving the respect that he is due, as the true high priestly Son of Man, will be the criterion of divine judgment in the eschatological dénouement (Mt 16:27; Mk 8:38; 9:26; Lk 12:8-9). During his ministry there is, then, a supreme irony that Jesus, who as high priestly Son of Man is the true head of the nation, is judged guilty of being a rebellious son, a drunkard and glutton, who does not respect his elders (Mt 11:19; Lk 7:34; cf. Deut 21:18-21).

The healed *blind man has the right response to the Son of Man (who is "sealed" by the father [Jn 6:27; cf. Aaron in Ex 28:11, 21, 36]): *worship (Jn 9:35-38). And, on other occasions, it is as the true high priest that Jesus receives the worship (which ultimately belongs to God himself). In Matthew 2:11 the magi fall down and worship the infant Jesus and give him presents fit for a royal high priest (gold [Ex 28:5-6, 11], frankincense [Ex 30:34; Lev 2:1], myrrh [Ex 30:23]). That is, for Matthew, their prostration fulfills biblical texts that look forward to the nations' pilgrimage to Zion and worship of Israel's god (esp. Ps 72:10-11; Is 60:6). In Luke 24:50-53 Jesus departs from the disciples with the distinctive two-handed blessing of the priest (Lev 9:22; Ben Sira/Sirach 50:20-22). This closing scene of Luke's Gospel reprises the opening one. There, Zechariah has an encounter in the hēkal-as-heaven and comes out to the people (Lk 1:5-25); here, Jesus ascends to heaven, receiving the disciples' worship as he goes.

5.2. Jesus and His Movement Against the Priesthood? Some think that Jesus' fate at the hands of the Jerusalem authorities stems from his critique of the (corrupt) priesthood (e.g., Perrin). Certainly, Jesus' teaching prowess, reputation as a prophet and as a worker of powerful deeds against the people's spiritual enemies (the *demons), and even as a divine warrior in defeating chaos (e.g., Mk 4:35—5:20 par.) would give the chief priests cause to envy him (Mt 27:18; Mk 15:10), to be indignant at (Mt 21:15) or threatened by behavior that usurped their own responsibilities. Jesus' action in the temple (Mk 11:15-19) and teaching in Jerusalem (esp. Mk 12:1-12 par.; Mk 12:28-34; Mt 22:7, 12) seem only to have encouraged their fears. But, the Gospels do not position Jesus against the priesthood per se; and in two double-tradition passages he laments the violence suffered by the priesthood and the temple establishment, even at its own hands (Mt 23:34-36 // Lk 11:49-51 [cf. 2 Chron 24:20-21; Liv. Pro. 23]; Mt 23:37-39 // Lk 13:34-35).

5.3. The Gospel of Luke. Luke takes for granted the tight connection between *apocalyptic experiences, priestly spirituality and the prophetic calling (Lk 1:5-25) and is keen to affirm the piety that could be modeled by the ideal, "blameless" priest (Lk 1:6). But he can also record Jesus directing sharp criticism at the dangers of a priestly concern for purity (Lk 10:29-37). And Luke's Jesus can claim for his movement the zeal of a class of warrior priests (see, on Lk 14:25-35, Fletcher-Louis 2000).

5.4. The Gospel of John. Some (e.g., Heil) have seen priestly elements in the Christology of John, especially in the fight over Jesus' seamless garment in John 19:23 (cf. Ex 28:32; 39:23; Lev 21:10; Josephus, Ant. 3.161), but others have doubted. However, Caiaphas's depiction as teacher and prophet in John 11:49-51 shows John lived and breathed priestly traditions (cf. Jn 18:15-16), and A. Kerr has demonstrated that the complex theology of priesthood emerging from recent scholarship has many points of connection to John's distinctive Christology (cf. Barker 1991; Bond, 133-40).

Jesus is the priestly "holy one of God" (see 4.1 above), the light of the world (Jn 8:12; cf. Jn 1:4-5, 7-9; 3:19-21; 9:5; 11:9-10; 12:35-36, 46), like the radiant, solar high priest (e.g., Ben Sira/Sir 50:5-7; 1Q28b IV, 27; 4Q541 9 I, 3-5; cf. 2 En. 22:8-10; L.A.B. 26:13; 3 En. 12:3-4), and he has been "consecrated" by the Father (Jn 10:36; cf. Ex 28:41; 29:1; 30:29-30; Lev 8:12). Various themes throughout the early chapters that have a priestly background come together in the *prayer in John 17 (see Attridge). Jesus "consecrates" himself (Jn 17:19; cf. Jn 17:17). Jesus has God's glory, and he manifests God's name (Jn 17:6, 26); both are (high) priestly prerogatives (Mal 2:2; Let. Arist. 98; 1Q28b IV, 25-28; Pss. Sol. 17:5). Jesus and his followers have a mutual indwelling (Jn 17:6, 9-10, 12, 24; 10:29; 12:32; 13:3; 14:20) that recalls the high priest's representation of God's people, even as Jesus simultaneously is "in the Father." There are also echoes of the Aaronic blessing (Num 6:22-27) in John 17:11-15. Ultimately, the disciples, who themselves are "consecrated" (Jn 17:17, 19), get to share in Jesus' priestly ministry (cf. Jn 20:23). Even John's Logos doctrine can be explained through recourse to theological reflection on the biblical priesthood in the Greek-speaking Diaspora (Barker 1991).

Although (high) priestly themes and ideas appear throughout the Gospels, Jesus (and his disciples) do not straightforwardly lay claim to existing (Aaronic) priestly categories. In particular, many of the trappings of office (special clothing, rites of purification, temple space and time) seem to disappear. And, ultimately, Jesus is remembered in the bread and the wine that recall the (pre-Mosaic) order of Melchizedek (cf. Gen 14:18; T. Levi 8:5).

See also ESSENES; JUDAISM, COMMON; PHARISEES; SADDUCEES; SANHEDRIN; SCRIBES; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Alexander, The Mystical Texts: Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice and Related Manuscripts (LSTS 61; London: T & T Clark, 2006); H. W. Attridge, "How Priestly Is the 'High Priestly Prayer' of John 17?" CBQ 75 (2013) 1-14; M. Barker, "Temple Imagery in Philo: An Indication of the Origin of the Logos?" in Templum Amicitiae: Essays on the Second Temple Presented to Ernst Bammel, ed. W. Horbury (JSNTSup 48; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991) 70-102; idem, The Great High Priest: The Temple Roots of Christian Liturgy (London: T & T Clark, 2003); idem, Temple Theology: An Introduction

(London: SPCK, 2004); H. K. Bond, Caiaphas: High Priest and Friend of Rome (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2004); J. A. Davies, A Royal Priesthood: Literary and Intertextual Perspectives on an Image of Israel in Exodus 19.6 (JSOTSup 395; London: T & T Clark, 2004); C. Fletcher-Louis, "The High Priest as Divine Mediator in the Hebrew Bible: Dan 7:13 as a Test Case," SBLSP (1997) 161-93; idem, "Jesus Inspects His Priestly War Party (Luke 14:25-35)," in The Old Testament in the New Testament: Essays in Honour of J. L. North, ed. S. Moyise (JSNTSup 189; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000) 126-43; idem, "The Revelation of the Sacral Son of Man: The Genre, History of Religions Context and the Meaning of the Transfiguration," in Auferstehung—Resurrection: The Fourth Durham-Tübingen Research Symposium; Resurrection, Transfiguration and Exaltation in Old Testament, Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity (Tübingen, September, 1999), ed. F. Avemarie and H. Lichtenberger (WUNT 135; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001) 247-98; idem, All the Glory of Adam: Liturgical Anthropology in the Dead Sea Scrolls (STDJ 42; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); idem, "God's Image, His Cosmic Temple and the High Priest: Towards an Historical and Theological Account of the Incarnation," in Heaven on Earth: The Temple in Biblical Theology, ed. T. D. Alexander and S. Gathercole (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2004a) 81-99; idem, "The Worship of the Jewish High Priest by Alexander the Great," in Early Christian and Jewish Monotheism, ed. L. T. Stuckenbruck and W. E. S. North (JSNTSup 263; London: T & T Clark, 2004b) 71-102; idem, "The Temple Cosmology of P and Theological Anthropology in the Wisdom of Jesus ben Sira," in Of Scribes and Sages: Early Jewish Interpretation and Transmission of Scripture, 1: Ancient Versions and Traditions, ed. C. A. Evans (LSTS 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2004c) 69-113; idem, "Jesus as the High Priestly Messiah: Part 1," JSHJ 4 (2006) 155-75; idem, "Humanity and the Idols of the Gods in Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities," in Idolatry: False Worship in the Bible, Early Judaism and Christianity, ed. S. C. Barton (New York: T & T Clark, 2007a) 58-72; idem, "Jesus as the High Priestly Messiah: Part 2," JSHJ 5 (2007b) 57-79; idem, "Religious Experience and the Apocalypses," in Experientia, Volume 1: Inquiry into Religious Experience in Early Judaism and Christianity, ed. F. Flannery, C. Shantz and R. A. Werline (SBLSymS 40; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2008) 125-44; idem, "Jewish Apocalyptic and Apocalypticism," in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, 3: The Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011) 1569-607; idem, "2 Enoch and the New Perspective on Apocalyptic," in New Perspectives on 2 Enoch: No Longer Slavonic Only, ed. A. Orlov, G. Boccaccini and J. Zurawski (SJSI 4; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2012) 127-48; J. C. Greenfield, M. E. Stone and E. Eshel, The Aramaic Levi Document: Edition, Translation, Commentary (SVTP 19; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); C. T. R. Hayward, The Jewish Temple: A Non-Biblical Sourcebook (Routledge, London, 1996); J. P. Heil, "Jesus as the Unique High Priest in the Gospel of John," CBQ 57 (1995) 729-55; M. Hengel and R. Deines, "E. P. Sanders' 'Common Judaism,' Jesus, and the Pharisees," review of E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah and Judaism: Practice and Belief, JTS 46 (1995) 1-70; S. L. Herring, "A 'Transubstantiated' Humanity: The Relationship between the Divine Image and the Presence of God in Genesis 1:26," VT 58 (2008) 480-94; M. Himmel-farb, A Kingdom of Priests: Ancestry and Merit in Ancient Judaism (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006); J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, trans. F. H. Cave and C. H. Cave (London: SCM, 1967); A. R. Kerr, The Temple of Jesus' Body: the Temple Theme in the Gospel of John (JSNTSup 220; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); A. Lacocque, The Book of Daniel, trans. D. Pellauer (London: SPCK, 1979); C. L. Meyers, Exodus (NCamBC; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005); N. Perrin, Jesus the Temple (London: SPCK; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); W. H. Propp, Exodus 19-40: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 2A; New York: Doubleday, 2006); D. W. Rooke, Zadok's Heirs: The Role and Development of the High Priesthood in Ancient Israel (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000); E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE-66 CE (London: SCM, 1992); D. R. Schwartz, "'Kingdom of Priests': A Pharisaic Slogan?" in Studies in the Jewish Background of Christianity (WUNT 60; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1992) 57-80; J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); A. van der Kooij, "LXX Exod 23 and the Figure of the High Priest," in On Stone and Scroll: Essays in Honour of Graham Ivor Davies, ed. J. K. Aitken, K. J. Dell and B. A. Mastin (BZAW 420; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2012) 537-49. C. Fletcher-Louis

PROPHETS, PROPHECY

This article considers a theme of considerable importance in the context of the Bible as a whole and of the Jesus tradition in particular. Prophecy has three dimensions: speaking for God, predicting the future, and the authority to speak thus, without resort to or the permission of tradition or any other human authority. All three themes run through the New Testament, epitomized in the paradigmatic prophetic text in the New Testament, the Apocalypse of Jesus Christ, or the Revelation to John.

1. Literary Context
2. Synoptic Gospels
3. Gospel of John
4. Conclusion

1. Literary Context.

In the NT, generally, prophets are less communicators of divine words than divine agents. Indeed, NT prophets and prophecy are reminiscent of the stories told about the lives of the prophets such as *Elijah and Jeremiah, the former being explicitly linked with *John the Baptist (Mt 17:11-13 par.), and the latter mentioned by Peter in answer to Jesus' question regarding his identity (Mt 16:14 par.). As in the OT, prophecy can include words of warning and prediction (Mk 13:2; Lk 3:7-9; 19:41-44; Acts 21:11) as well as social critique (Mk 12:38-40), with the enigmatic character of biblical antecedents now being disclosed (Mt 13:35).

The Gospels show much concern with the way ancient prophecies and other scriptural texts relate to the present generation (Mt 23:36 par.; cf. 1 Cor 10:11) and how the key actors in the divine drama, to which they bear witness, are themselves imbued with a sense of vocation (Mt 11:2-6) and special charisma imitating, and indeed transcending, the prophets of old (Mt 12:41-42). Some believed that something special was happening that both linked with the past and set apart the present (Lk 16:16). This is particularly clear in the Gospel of Luke, which exhibits the sense of the present as a time of fulfillment, an auspicious time: "Blessed are the eyes that see what you see! For I tell you that many prophets and kings desired to see what you see, but did not see it, and to hear what you hear, but did not hear it" (Lk 10:23-24 [cf. 1 Pet 1:10-12]). Likewise, we find the idea of an ongoing prophetic experience sitting alongside the belief in the climactic prophetic moment with John the Baptist and Jesus (Lk 7:28; 16:16). The prophetic environment is captured in Luke's infancy narratives, where figures such as Zechariah (Lk 1:67) and Anna (Lk 2:36) indicate a resurgence of the prophetic spirit, here intimately linked with the writer's conviction about the messianic figure whose life he tells of (Simeon is not explicitly stated to be a prophet, though he "looked forward to the consolation of Israel, and the Holy Spirit rested on him" [Lk 2:25]). All of this is in keeping with early Christian belief that eschatological salvation was not wholly in the future and had broken into the present in the resurrection of Jesus and the experience of the Spirit. Early Christians seem to have regarded prophecy as a mark of the return of the eschatological Spirit and as such constituted a key element in their identity.

Of all the NT texts outside the Gospels relating to prophecy, Acts 2:17 encapsulates as well as any the view that prophecy is in some sense not just "fulfilled" but actually renewed and, indeed, restarted. In the quotation from Joel in Peter's speech on the day of Pentecost, Joel 2:28-32 is quoted. The introduction "in the last days" sets the tone for the significance of what is happening and marks the moment as eschatological. The promise in Acts about the prophetic spirit inspiring men and women is an important theme of Acts (Acts 11:27; 13:1; 15:32; 21:9-10; cf. the false prophet in Acts 13:6). Visions are a crucial part of the narrative (see Dreams and Visions). The threefold telling of Paul's conversion (Acts 9; 22; 26) sets *apocalyptic vision as a motor of divine providence. Also important is the account of the events leading up to Peter preaching to Cornelius in Acts 10. Hidden in the story is a guide to the workings of the prophetic spirit.

In *rabbinic sources there is some evidence that the return of the *Holy Spirit to the people of God was considered to be a mark that the new age had in fact dawned. In a passage such as t. Sotah 13:3 the prophetic Spirit had departed from Israel with the last of the prophets to return "in the last days." Such a belief probably was based on passages such as Malachi 4:5 and possibly Deuteronomy 18:15 (cf. Mk 8:28). Whether this was widespread is unclear. It seems unlikely that there was a widely held belief concerning a period without prophecy, in the light of passages in the writings of *Josephus, where we find a variety of different prophetic figures (e.g., J. W. 1.78-80 [cf. Acts 5:37]; 6.300-309; Ant. 18.63-64 [cf. Jn 7:12, 47]; 20.97-99 [cf. Acts 5:36]; 20.169-172 [cf. Acts 21:38]). There may have been a concerted attempt by the learned elite to confine the activity of the divine spirit to the eschatological events and thereby implicitly undermine any claim to prophetic wisdom in this age.

In the Bible various figures are said to be anointed, including prophets (Is 61). Qumran texts refer to "a prophet" (1QS IX, 11; 4Q175). The expectation of a prophet who should come in the last days is, like the hope for a descendant of David, firmly rooted in Scripture (Deut 18:15-22, quoted in 4Q175). Similar expectation is attested in the NT (Jn 1:31; 6:14). Related to this belief was another rooted in Scripture: the expectation that Elijah would come (Mk 6:15; 8:28; 9:11-13). According to Malachi 4:5-6, the coming of Elijah will be before the great and terrible day of the Lord: "And he will turn the hearts of fathers to their children and the hearts of the children to their fathers." In other words, Elijah's coming reverses the process, which the messianic distress had set in motion, when dissension and strife were the order of the day (m. Sotah 9:15; Mk 13:12; Jub. 23:9). In addition to this restoring function, Elijah's coming seems to link with the coming of the prophet like Moses in one important way: the interpretation of Torah. In 1 Maccabees 4:46 we find that the desecrated stones of the temple are removed to a suitable place until a prophet arose who would be able to tell the people exactly what should be done with them. Similarly in the Mishnah (m. 'Ed. 8:7) the coming of Elijah will be the time when disputed issues over ritual cleanness and other disputed halakic issues would be settled (m. B. Meš'i'a 1:8; 2:6; 3:4-5; m. Šeqal. 2:5). Elijah's departure on the chariot of fire (2 Kings 2:11) contributed to a vital expectation. It is no surprise, therefore, that John and Jesus were identified as Elijah, embodiments of the returning Elijah (Mk 6:14-16).

The theme of prophecy strikes the reader of the Gospels most forcibly in connection with the fulfillment of biblical prophecy, particularly in the redactional comments in the Gospel of Matthew (e.g., Mt 1:23; 2:6; 12:18-21; 13:14-15; 15:8-9; 21:4-5; see also Mk 1:2-3; Lk 3:4-6; Jn 12:15, 40), but also embedded in the tradition of Jesus throughout the Gospels (e.g., Mt 12:41; Lk 4:16-19; 7:27; 11:32; Jn 1:23). The similarity of such contemporary application to the prophetic interpretation found in the Habakkuk commentary from the *Dead Sea Scrolls (1QpHab) has often been noted. In both there is a sense that definitive interpretation of obscure prophetic texts has been illuminated by events interpreted by an authoritative teacher, or in relation to the events in his life, as we find in fulfillment formulae in the Gospels.

2. Synoptic Gospels.

The complexity of traditions associated with the prophet, rooted as it is in the Torah (Deut 18:15-22; cf. Acts 3:22) and in prophetic pronouncements, is of great importance for understanding the figures of John the Baptist and Jesus. The visionary revelation as the basis of authority, the tradition of rejection and suffering, the hints that this suffering might be vicarious, and above all the eschatological character of both Spirit and prophecy indicate how many themes converge on prophecy.

2.1. John the Baptist. According to the Gospels, the preaching of John the Baptist played a crucial role in the initial stages of Jesus' ministry. The baptism of John was important for Jesus. The Gospels record that Jesus saw a close link between himself and John in his understanding of his ministry. In Luke 7:28 (cf. Lk 1:76) John is indeed a prophet, but also "more than a prophet." But while John can be called the "greatest among those born of women," the least in the kingdom of God is greater than John. John stands at the fulcrum of the ages; he stands on the brink of the age of fulfillment, but he himself is not part of it (Mt 11:12-13; Lk 16:16; Tuckett, 407). Jesus sees the ministry of John the Baptist as initiating a decisive break with the old order of the law and the prophets, but he asserts that the fulfillment, to which John bears witness, is inaugurated in his own ministry (Mt 11:2-6). There is something special about his eschatological role that sets him apart from those like Zechariah who prophesied (Lk 1:67) and those others before John (Lk 16:16). Thereby, John is set apart as the prophet like Elijah, of unique eschatological importance (Mt 11:10; Lk 1:17; 7:26-27; cf. Mal 4:5).

The Gospels portray John as an eschatological prophet who looked forward to the coming of one mightier than he (Mk 1:7); it is the one mightier than John who would baptize with the Holy Spirit. The baptism with the Holy Spirit is an eschatological judgment (Lk 3:16). According to the Gospels, John seems to have expected the great and terrible Day of the Lord (cf. Mal 4:5). The evidence from Josephus's account concerning the Baptist (Ant. 18.116) suggests that there may well have been a significant eschatological component, as Josephus tells us that John was put into prison because "Herod was afraid that his preaching would cause an insurrection, explicable if we suppose that John's preaching had a subversive element. It is the eschatological element in John's message that is most significant, according to the NT. Mark implicitly (Mk 9:12-13 [though this saying need not imply an identification of John with Elijah]) and Matthew explicitly (Mt 11:14; cf. Lk 7:27) identify John with the Elijah who is to come (cf. Mal 4:5), and all the Synoptic Gospels quote the verse in Malachi 3:1 in connection with John the Baptist (Mt 11:10; Lk 7:27; cf. Mk 1:2).

2.2. Jesus' Prophetic Vocation. As far as Jesus is concerned, the tradition suggests that he saw a close link between himself and John in his understanding of his ministry. The earliest layers of the tradition record that there was contact between John and Jesus after the former had been put into prison. The Baptist sent his disciples to inquire whether Jesus was in fact the one who was to come (Mt 11:2 par.). In Luke 7:31-35 Jesus characterizes John and himself as part of the same mission. Luke 7:32 shows that two different approaches of God's messengers are both rejected by the people. The saying indicates how closely Jesus saw his ministry being linked with that of the Baptist (cf. Jn 3:22-24; 4:1).

Jesus' own call seems to have depended on it (Mk 1:11; cf. Mk 11:27-33). In this prophetic-type call there is an echo of Ezekiel 1:1 in Mark 1:10, and Jesus is presented as believing that he had been commissioned by God to speak and act in the way he did. The baptism accounts have affinities with the call experiences of prophets such as Isaiah, Ezekiel and Second Isaiah (Is 6:1; 42:1; 64:1; Ezek 1:1). Indeed, Mark's version presents it as a personal experience in which a vision of the Spirit and a divine voice proclaim the nature of Jesus' relationship with God. His speech resembles the authoritative divine pronouncement of the prophets, "Thus says the Lord," prefaced as it is with the solemn "Truly, truly, I say to you." While the methods of scribal interpretation of Scripture as set out in Sirach 39 may be found in the Jesus tradition (e.g., Sir 39:2-3: "He will . . . penetrate the subtleties of parables; he will seek out the hidden meanings of proverbs and be at home with the obscurities of parables"), that sense of one acting with authority, "not as the scribes" (Mk 1:22), is prevalent throughout. There is a sense in which the authority claim attributed to Jesus goes beyond the "prophetic" category. The "Thus says the Lord" of the prophets is almost an exact parallel to the authority claims of Jesus in the Gospels. Nevertheless, it is striking that the stereotyped formula does not appear in the Gospels.

According to Mark 1:22 (cf. Mk 11:28), Jesus' teaching differed from that of the scribes, and the distinctive feature about it was its authority. He had the reputation of being a prophet (Mt 21:11; Lk 7:16; 9:8; 24:19; cf. Jn 6:14; 7:40, 52; 9:17). At the heart of later rabbinic religion was the belief that their interpretation of the Torah was no novelty, but rather could be traced back in its essentials to the prophets and ultimately to Moses (Pirke 'Abot 1:1): "Moses received the Law from Sinai and committed it to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders and the elders to the prophets and the prophets committed it to those of the great synagogue" (cf. later tradition that Moses received the oral Torah on Sinai [Exod. Rab. 47:7]). This concern for tradition and the application of insights from the past to the needs of the present is absent from Jesus' teaching as we now have it. In the interpretations of the law of Moses in the *Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:21-48; cf. Mk 2:6) no reference is made to previous doctrinal authorities, but instead the interpretations are introduced with the emphatic "I," indicating that Jesus considered himself to be an interpreter at least on a par with the doctrinal authorities of his own day.

Jesus based his *authority to speak in this way on a conviction, probably based on the baptismal experience at Jordan (Mk 11:28). With this prophetic-type call there is no record of Jesus submitting his message to any doctrinal authority for confirmation, for he believed that he had been commissioned by God to speak and act in the way he did. His assertion that the final revelation of God's kingdom was already effective, and the events leading to its consummation were imminent, was a critical interpretation of the Jewish traditions of such importance that its authenticity was likely to have been questioned by those who did not share his methods and interpretations. Perhaps we may see the significance of the saying against the temple in Mark 14:58 in a new light if we realize that what Jesus presented was a threat to the authority of the *Sanhedrin and the temple, the former as the place whence the Torah went forth to the whole of Israel (m. Sanh. 11:2), and the latter the place where God's presence was said to dwell (cf. Mt 12:6: "one greater than the temple is here"). In his message Jesus was asserting that a more definitive experience of God was both imminent and immanent.

The question of Jesus' authority lies behind the Beelzebul controversy (Mk 3:22-30; Lk 11:14-23). In this story, some suspect that Jesus' powers showed the influence of the powers of darkness. This was a charge that continued to be of importance in Jewish traditions about Jesus (e.g., "Jesus practiced magic," with the implication that he was possessed by an alien supernatural power, "and led Israel astray" [b. Sanh. 43a]). The issue of authority also comes up particularly in John's Gospel, where, throughout the book, Jesus claims the authority to speak of the things of God because of his direct experience of God (e.g., Jn 7:16-24).

Elsewhere, inspiration by the Spirit is important (Mt 12:28 [though the Lukan parallel, Lk 11:19, does not mention the Spirit; cf. Acts 10:38]; Lk 4:1). The account of Jesus' preaching in the synagogue in Capernaum (Lk 4:16-30), peculiar to Luke, is based on the fulfillment of Isaiah 61. Other material in the Synoptic Gospels seems to indicate that Jesus thought of himself as a prophet, inspired by the Spirit (Mt 13:57; 12:39; Lk 13:33-34). He was also thought to be a prophet by his contemporaries, as certain reports concerning reaction to Jesus indicate (Mt 21:11; 26; Lk 7:16; 24:19; cf. Jn 1:45; 6:14; 7:40; 9:17). Indeed, it is significant that at his trial Jesus is asked by the soldiers to prophesy (Mk 14:65), though it should be pointed out that in Matthew 26:68 // Luke 22:64 "prophesy" seems to be used sarcastically as a call for Jesus to identify who it is that hit him.

Jesus challenges his generation and places himself in the long line of prophets who have done the same (Lk 11:49-51). Like Elijah and Jeremiah, he is rejected by his contemporaries (Mk 6:4; cf. Jer 15:10; 20; Lk 4:24; Jn 4:44). Indeed, arguably the journey to Jerusalem represents the heart of a sense of prophetic vocation, if Luke is taken as guide: "'Yet today, tomorrow, and the next day I must be on my way, because it is impossible for a prophet to be killed outside of Jerusalem.' Jerusalem, Jerusalem, the city that kills the prophets and stones those who are sent to it! How often have I desired to gather your children together as a hen gathers her brood under her wings, and you were not willing!" (Lk 13:33-34). The theme of the suffering of the prophets is part of the oldest layers of the Gospel tradition (e.g., Mt 5:12; 23:29-30) and is one that is taken up elsewhere in the NT (e.g., Rom 11:3; 1 Thess 2:15; Rev 11). Whether Jesus regarded himself as fulfilling the role of the figure prophesied in Isaiah 53 is not as clear as it might appear. With the exception of Luke 22:37 (cf. Mt 12:17-21), there is no explicit quotation from Isaiah 53 on the lips of Jesus, and the explicit quotations of it in the NT are notoriously few in number (Acts 8; 1 Pet 2:22).

What is evident in the Gospels is a repeated emphasis on the inevitability of suffering. This is seen in sayings about the necessity of the *Son of Man suffering. These, at least in their present form, may be later reflections on the events of Jesus' *death and *resurrection (e.g., Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34), though Luke 9:44 suggests that there may have been an earlier form of that tradition. The preordained nature of the prophetic vocation as one that involves suffering is evident especially in Matthew 23:29-36 // Luke 11:47-52 (cf. Mk 6:4; Lk 4:24; Jn 4:44). The Lukan version suggests divine wisdom commissioning emissaries (Lk 11:49), perhaps before the foundation of the world, Jesus included, who could expect to be without honor (Mk 6:4) and indeed suffer (Lk 11:50; cf. Lk 13:33-34; Mt 5:12). Matthew's version omits the reference to the *wisdom of God. The result is that it seems that it is Christ who sends the prophets and wise men (Mt 23:34). The necessity of the suffering of the emissary of God, echoing what we find in, for example, the prophecy of Jeremiah, is an important theme in the Gospel tradition and is also evident in Lives of the Prophets, an ancient Jewish apocryphal text.

3. Gospel of John

Prophets make their occasional appearance in the Gospel of John. Reference to the biblical prophets aside (Jn 1:23, 45; 8:52-53; 12:38), the high priest has prophetic powers; questions are raised about the prophetic character of John the Baptist (Jn 1:21, 25; 6:45) and also of Jesus (Jn 4:19, 44; 6:14; 7:40, 52; 9:17). In the case of Jesus (Jn 5:36; cf. Jn 6:14), and to a lesser extent John the Baptist (Jn 1:31), the prophetic activity is seen in connection with the performance of deeds, whereas in the case of the high priest, it is his words that are indicative of their prophetic role.

One theme in particular makes only an isolated appearance in the Synoptic Gospels but is very frequent in the Gospel of John: Jesus as the emissary of God (e.g., Jn 7:16; 12:44-45). The institution of agency in the Jewish sources concerns a situation where an individual is sent by another to act on the sender's behalf: an agent is like the sender, with the latter's full authority (Mek. Exod. 12:3; cf. m. Ber. 5:5) (Borgen). Thus, to deal with the agent is to deal with the sender, as in, for example, Sipre on Numbers 12:8: "With what is the matter to be compared? With a king of flesh and blood who has an agent in the country. The inhabitants spoke before him. Then said the king to them, You have not spoken concerning my servant but concerning me." Jesus is a spokesman of the divine, a heavenly agent, akin to but exceeding in authority and nature the angelic agents. J.-A. Bühner has argued for a blending of the angel motif and the prophet motif in the Jewish tradition and suggests that this may be a key to answering the background of Johannine Christology (Bühner, 271, 427). Like angels, prophets were regarded as speaking with the voice of God (e.g., Deut 18:18-20; Jer 1:9), and in later Jewish tradition we find the identity of the angel/messenger (Bühner, 341-73).

The Johannine Jesus is impelled by some higher call, appealing to a higher authority, which, rather than the law of Moses, becomes the criterion for his action. The Johannine Jesus claims to offer revelation of God and also in his words, from what he has seen and heard in heaven. The law, which came through Moses, becomes part of the testimony, along with the words of John the Baptist and the deeds or signs of Jesus (Jn 5:46). Jesus claims not to have spoken on his own authority, for "the Father who sent me has himself given me a commandment about what to say and what to speak. And I know that his commandment is eternal life. What I speak, therefore, I speak just as the Father has told me" (Jn 12:49-50).

The Gospel of John is what J. Ashton has called "an apocalypse in reverse" (Ashton, 371), in that the heavenly mysteries are to be sought not in heaven or through access to a body of written knowledge but primarily, and uniquely, in and through Jesus, the revelation of the hidden God (Jn 14:8; 1:18) who also reveals the mysteries of God (Jn 6:46). What we find in the Gospel of John relates to the theme of the attainment of knowledge of the divine mysteries and, supremely, the mysteries of God, but interpreted consistently christologically. One is tempted to suggest that when in 4QInstruction the reader is told to meditate on the rz nhyh ("the secret of what is to come") and study it always, "this is, in the Gospel of John, the divine plan embracing past, present and future but focused in Christ" (Ashton, 57).

4. Conclusion.

Prophecy is a crucially important feature of the Gospels, historically, theologically and hermeneutically. The sense of present communion with the divine, in which tradition and accepted channels of authority are relativized by the prophet's conviction that his vision or word has an authority, which is at least as great as that of the authoritative texts from the past, typifies much of what is central to the NT. Both in the prophetic figures mentioned by Josephus and the major figures in the NT we find characters whose significance depended not solely, or even primarily, on their words, their prophecy, but rather on the actions. They were the ones who believed that in what they did the eternal impacted on the contingent and conditioned actual events (Mannheim, 192-98). The Gospel narratives offer us accounts of characters who were not just hoping for a changed world but set out in the context of the present to make articles of faith a reality: Elijah appears, and the Son of Man goes as it is written of him. This means that their convictions and action disrupt patterns of behavior. This in turn typifies the ethos of earliest Christianity. It is exemplified by a saying extant only in Luke's Gospel, where Jesus says, "I must be on my way, because it is impossible for a prophet to be killed outside of Jerusalem" (Lk 13:33).

See also APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING; ELIJAH AND ELISHA; ESCHATOLOGY; JOHN THE BAPTIST; MOSES; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, "A Sixtieth Part of Prophecy: The Problem of Continuing Revelation in Judaism," in Words Remembered, Texts Renewed: Essays in Honour of John F. A. Sawyer, ed. J. Davies, G. Harvey and W. G. E. Watson (JSOTSup 195; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 414-33; J. Ashton, Interpreting the Fourth Gospel, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991); idem, "'Mystery' in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Fourth Gospel," in John, Qumran and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. M. L. Coloe and T. Thatcher (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2011), 53-68; D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983); J. Barton, The Oracles of God: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel after the Exile (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1986); M. Bockmuehl, This Jesus: Martyr, Lord, Messiah (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); P. Borgen, "God's Agent in the Fourth Gospel," in The Interpretation of John, ed. J. Ashton (2nd ed.; SNTI; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997) 83-96; J.-A. Bühner, Der Gesandte und sein Weg im 4. Evangelium: Die kultur- und religionsgeschichtlichen Grundlagen der johanneischen Sendungschristologie sowie ihre traditions- geschichtliche Entwicklung (WUNT 2/2; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997); F. Flannery-Dailey, Dreamers, Scribes, and Priests: Jewish Dreams in the Hellenistic and Roman Eras (JSJSup 90; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (London: Duckworth, 1982); J. Kovacs and C. Rowland, Revelation: the Apocalypse of Jesus Christ (BBC; Oxford: Blackwell, 2004); M. Lieb, The Visionary Mode: Biblical Prophecy, Hermeneutics, and Cultural Change (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1991); V. MacDermot, The Cult of the Seer in the Ancient Middle East: A Contribution to Current Research on Hallucinations Drawn from Coptic and Other Texts (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971); K. Mannheim, Ideology and Utopia: An Introduction to the Sociology of Knowledge (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1960); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); C. Trevett, Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); C. M. Tuckett, Q and the History of Early Christianity: Studies on Q (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996). C. Rowland

PROTEVANGELIUM OF JAMES. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

PURITY AND IMPURITY. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAR; JUDAISM, COMMON; LAW.

Q

Q

For over a century “Q” has been used to refer to the 230 or so sayings of Jesus that Matthew and Luke share but are not found in Mark (see Synoptic Problem). In 1861 H. J. Holtzmann built on earlier discussion of the sources of the Gospels and claimed that Matthew and Luke had drawn on two main sources: Mark’s Gospel and a collection of the sayings of Jesus. (Later Holtzmann would modify his position by positing that Luke also knew and used Matthew.) The latter soon came to be referred to by German scholars as Quelle (“source”). In 1890 J. Weiss abbreviated Quelle to “Q” and this quickly gained wide acceptance.

In the twentieth century the Q hypothesis has been the basis of nearly all study of the origin and development of the Gospel traditions. This article sets out both the strengths and weaknesses of the Q hypothesis. The final section sketches the different ways the theological perspective of Q has been understood.

1. Terminology and Importance of the Q Hypothesis
2. The Case for the Q Hypothesis
3. The Nature and Extent of Q
4. Questioning the Q Hypothesis
5. The Theology and Purpose of Q

1. Terminology and Importance of the Q Hypothesis.

1.1. Terminology. Over the course of the past century the term “Q” has been used in several ways. Although formerly “Q” often served as a shorthand way of referring to non-Markan traditions shared by Matthew and Luke, the more precise term for this is in fact “double tradition.” Whereas “double tradition” can technically apply to any analysis of shared material between two Gospels, scholars who use the phrase without explicit definition invariably have Matthew and Luke in view. Today most employ “Q” to refer to a reconstructed text and/or body of oral tradition(s), whether composite or unitary. Whatever its precise character, Q is regarded as largely coterminous with the scope of traditions shared by Matthew and Luke and established in a fairly fixed order. Scholars accept that with few exceptions Luke has preserved the original order of the Q traditions, though not necessarily the original wording. Hence, it has become customary to refer to Q passages with the Lukan chapter and verse numbers. For example, Q 7:22 is a reference to the Q tradition that lies behind Luke 7:22. Such practice has become codified in what is now often considered the definitive reconstruction of the sayings collection, The Critical Edition of Q (2000), the culminating results of a years-long project undertaken by over three dozen scholars under the leadership of J. Robinson, P. Hoffmann and J. Kloppenborg.

1.2. Importance. The Q hypothesis is important in current study of the Gospels for two reasons.

1.2.1. Q as Authentic Jesus Tradition. Many early supporters of the Q hypothesis believed that Q provided direct access to the authentic teaching of Jesus. Typically, the criterion of “multiple attestation” has attracted wide support in discussions of the authenticity of the Gospel traditions (see Criteria of Authenticity). Thus, traditions found in several strands of the Gospel tradition (Mark, Q, traditions found only in Matthew [M] or only in Luke [L], traditions underlying the Fourth Gospel) are more likely to be authentic than traditions less widely attested. Moreover, the apparently primitive cast of Q and its formal similarity to another sayings collection, the Gospel of Thomas, have led some scholars (e.g., Crossan; Borg) to ascribe even more weight to Q as a witness to the historical Jesus. However, others (e.g., Schröter; Perrin) have questioned the heuristic value of comparing Q to the Gospel of Thomas, just as still others (Kloppenborg Verbin) object that even when the theorized redactional layers are taken into account, there are inadequate grounds for drawing a straight line from the earliest layer of Q to the historical Jesus.

1.2.2. Q as Representative of Diversity in Early Christianity. Following seminal studies by H. Koester and J. Robinson, some have claimed that the existence of Q underlines the diversity of earliest Christianity. Since Q did not contain *passion or *resurrection traditions (although it presupposes both), the Q “community’s” understanding of the Christian faith differed markedly from Paul’s or Mark’s strong emphasis on the centrality of the cross (see Death of Jesus) and resurrection. Q is alleged to represent a very early form of Christianity in which, for example, Jesus was understood to be God’s *Wisdom, or Wisdom’s representative, or in which expectations of the imminent return of Jesus as an *apocalyptic “Son of man” figure were dominant. Wisdom and apocalyptic strains concurrent within Q have been separated out and have served as a basis for hypothesizing successive layers of redaction, which in turn have been utilized to reconstruct a socioreligious history of the Q “community.”

2. The Case for the Q Hypothesis.

Four main arguments have been advanced in support of the view that both Matthew and Luke used Q as a primary source as well as Mark. Although some are stronger than others, taken cumulatively, these arguments are confirmation for many that there are good grounds for accepting that both Matthew and Luke used Q.

2.1. Verbal Agreement. There is often very close verbal agreement between Matthew and Luke that extends over several verses. As examples, the following four passages should be compared carefully: (1) Matthew 3:7-12 // Luke 3:7-9, 16-17; (2) Matthew 4:1-11 // Luke 4:1-13; (3) Matthew 11:2-11, 16-19 // Luke 7:18-28, 31-35; (4) Matthew 23:37-39 // Luke 13:34-35. In line after line of the Greek text (and even in an English translation) there is such close verbal correspondence that it is quite arguable that Matthew and Luke are drawing on traditions from the same source. If both evangelists drew on independent traditions (i.e., oral traditions that had not been collected into a source), much greater divergence in wording would be expected. This observation is supplemented by an appeal to Markan priority: even though Matthew and Luke are different Gospels, both have used Mark. Thus, it is likely, so the argument runs, that where they agree closely in non-Markan sections, both are using a common source.

Although in many of the non-Markan passages that Matthew and Luke share the verbal agreement is striking, in the following three passages (and in many others) it is not. Both Matthew and Luke include the *parable of the man who built his house on the rock (Mt 7:21, 24-27 // Lk 6:46-49), but the wording differs considerably. In Matthew 23:4, 6-7, 13, 23, 25-27, 29-32, 34-36 // Luke 11:39-52 a large number of similar sayings are found in the same order; in some sayings the wording is very close, but in others there is striking variation. Both Matthew and Luke include what is clearly the same parable of the pounds, but their versions of the lengthy parable differ in numerous details (Mt 25:14-30 // Lk 19:11-27).

Supporters of the Q hypothesis account for the differences in the wording of non-Markan traditions in two main ways. Since both Matthew and Luke often revise the wording of Mark quite extensively, we should not be surprised to find that they have also done so with the second main source that they utilized. This is a plausible argument, and in some passages the evangelists’ *redaction of Q can be discerned with little difficulty.

But why have the evangelists revised some Q traditions quite considerably but not others? Some have suggested that the variations in some passages are so great that it is likely that Matthew and Luke drew on two different editions of Q. In other words, Q was revised and even extended (perhaps more than once); it was utilized at different stages in its evolution by Matthew and by Luke. Some writers use the abbreviations Q^{Mt} and Q^{Lk} to refer to the versions of Q used by Matthew and Luke. This has resulted in rather elaborate genealogies to explain the differences between Matthew and Q (see, e.g., Betz, 43-69). Others have explained such differences by ascribing them to the vagaries of the oral traditioning process (Dunn; Baum), a solution that sits well with the last two decades’ interest in oral studies within NT research (see Orality and Oral Transmission). Such appeals have not gone uncriticized (e.g., Burkett), particularly because they struggle to explain how the oral medium is consistent with the extensive, shared sequence between Matthew and Luke (see 2.2 below), a pillar for the two-source hypothesis. At any rate, some such explanation seems necessary to account for the close verbal similarity in some passages and differences in others.

2.2. The Phenomena of Order. Although Matthew weaves his sources together (especially in the five large discourses) and Luke places them in “strips” or blocks, there are some significant agreements in the order in which the non-Markan traditions are found in Matthew and Luke. These agreements in order cannot be coincidental and strongly suggest the use of a common source. For example, the following individual sayings or small units appear in Matthew in the same order: Luke 3:7-9, 16-17; 4:1-13; 6:20b-21, 22-23, 29, 30, 32-35, 36, 37-38, 41-42, 43-44, 46, 47-49; 7:1-10, 18-23, 24-26, 27, 28, 31-34, 35. In at least 85 percent of the Q traditions it is possible to ascertain the common order or to determine which evangelist disturbed the common order.

In this connection, another much-discussed line of evidence is doublets. In several passages in Matthew and Luke we find that essentially the same material is repeated; these repetitions are known as doublets. "Source" doublets occur where Matthew and/or Luke use the Markan form of a saying but elsewhere also include a similar saying that can best be explained as stemming from Q. The following two doublets are particularly striking (though there are many more): (1) "The one who has, to that one will more be given . . ." (Mk 4:25 // Mt 13:12 // Lk 8:18), with a similar saying at Matthew 25:29 // Luke 19:26; (2) "Whoever wants to follow me must deny themselves . . ." (Mk 8:34-35 // Mt 16:24-25 // Lk 9:23-24), with a similar saying at Matthew 10:38-39 // Luke 14:27; 17:33.

Although H. Fledderman urges that no one should underestimate the evidentiary importance of such doublets (Fledderman 2005, 60), this is still a line of evidence with its own attendant consequences and limitations. For example, the phenomena of shared order and doublets may militate against the possibility that both evangelists were drawing on independent oral traditions. Why should so many traditions appear in both Gospels in the same order, especially when there is often no obvious reason for their juxtaposition? At the very least, Matthew and Luke seem to have drawn on a cycle of oral traditions with a fairly fixed order. C. Tuckett considers doublets one of the weakest arguments for the two-source hypothesis because their presence often is explicable on a variety of grounds (Tuckett 1996, 10-11).

2.3. Q as a Coherent Entity. The Q material hangs together as an entity. With several exceptions, the Q traditions may be regarded as sayings of Jesus. Many supporters of the Q hypothesis go further and claim that the non-Markan traditions shared by Matthew and Luke betray a similar theological outlook. There is admittedly a level of circularity in this kind of argument. Since portions of Q are reconstructed on the basis of its perceived coherence with other Q sayings material, both the consistency of Q and the probative value of this value are subject to question. Perhaps more promising are renewed attempts to define Q's genre and literary aims on a macrolevel (Järvinen; Fleddermann 2012).

The cumulative force of the preceding arguments is impressive, but the case for Q falls short of absolute proof. Even the strongest supporters of Q accept that the hypothesis is less securely established than Markan priority. However, for many, Q remains a valid working hypothesis for study of the Gospels.

3. The Nature and Extent of Q.

The evidence is marginally stronger for concluding that Q was a written document rather than a collection of oral traditions transmitted with a fairly fixed order. However, the need for comparative studies of the transmission, revision and expansion of oral and written traditions in antiquity remains. Although most of the early supporters of Q thought that it was a collection of sayings in Aramaic (and therefore earlier and more reliable than traditions that circulated in Greek), this view is no longer widely accepted. It was based partly on one interpretation of the comments of Papias (early second century), quoted by Eusebius (at the beginning of the fourth century): "Matthew collected the sayings [ta logia] in the Hebrew language [i.e., perhaps Aramaic] and each one interpreted [or 'translated'] them as he was able." However, since Papias also uses ta logia to include Mark's narratives, as well as sayings of Jesus, most scholars now conclude that Papias was referring to canonical Matthew and not Q. If so, Papias's phrase "in the Hebrew language" may either be a reference to the Jewish features of Matthew's Gospel or a mistake.

Several scholars have claimed that some Q traditions that differ considerably in Matthew and in Luke rest on the evangelists' differing, or even in some cases mistaken, translations of underlying Aramaic traditions. However, the linguistic evidence is not clear-cut, and Matthew's and Luke's knowledge of Aramaic is not demonstrable (see Languages of Palestine). On the other hand, there is some linguistic evidence supporting the conclusion that Q was composed originally in Greek. Since there is often close verbal correspondence in Matthew's and Luke's Q traditions, it is probable that both were drawing on traditions in the same language, Greek. Q probably was originally a little larger than the 230 or so verses shared by Matthew and Luke. Since both Matthew and Luke omit some Markan material, why should we suppose that both have incorporated Q in full? Hence, some of the traditions found only in Matthew or in Luke (M or L) may have belonged originally to Q, though the precise extent of such additional Q traditions is not clear. Two examples will show just how difficult it is to be sure. Matthew 11:28-30 follows immediately after a Q block and, according to some, even though these verses are not found in Luke, they may have belonged to Q. However, if they did belong to Q, why did Luke omit traditions that he surely would have included had he known them? Luke 4:16-30 is at least partly independent of Mark. Did Luke include some Q traditions in this important passage, even though there is no trace of non-Markan material in the equivalent passage in Matthew? Since some of the non-Markan traditions in Luke 4:16-30 cohere well with a number of Q traditions, several scholars accept this suggestion.

4. Questioning the Q Hypothesis.

Until about four decades ago the two-document hypothesis (i.e., Markan priority and Q) was accepted widely by scholars from very different backgrounds. Earlier objectors to the Q hypothesis had made little headway. Some claimed that the alleged contents of Q are so heterogeneous that it is unlikely to have existed as a distinct source; this point will be discussed below. Others noted that no other writing quite like Q seems to have existed in the early church, though the discovery of the Gospel of Thomas partly undermined this point. Other objectors claimed that the considerable variations in the proposed reconstructions of Q eroded confidence in the hypothesis. More recently, however, reconstructions have shown that there is broad agreement about the contents of Q.

Since 1965, however, several fresh attempts to undermine the Q hypothesis have offered alternative explanations of the evidence. Several rival hypotheses have been vigorously supported and must be considered seriously. On the two-Gospel hypothesis (to be distinguished from the two-document hypothesis), first set out in 1789 by J. J. Griesbach and recently defended vigorously by W. Farmer, A. McNicol and others, Luke has used Matthew, and Mark has used both the earlier Gospels. Other scholars (most notably A. Farrer, M. Goulder and M. Goodacre) retain Markan priority and dispense with Q by claiming that Luke has used Matthew. Both of these alternative solutions to the Synoptic problem eliminate the need for any form of the Q hypothesis by claiming that Luke used Matthew.

If this claim is accepted, major implications follow for our understanding of the origin, transmission and development of the Gospel traditions. On this view, the earliest form of the traditions must always lie behind Matthew's Gospel, not Luke's; hence, Matthew is particularly important in historical reconstruction. If Luke has used Matthew, then he has used this major source freely indeed. He is the first "interpreter" of Matthew, which he has dismantled in order to write his own very different Gospel. For the following reasons, advocates of the Q hypothesis find this most unlikely.

4.1. The Matthean Discourses. If Luke has used Matthew, what has happened to Matthew's five impressive discourses? On this view, a small part of Matthew's *Sermon on the Mount in Matthew 5-7 reappears in Luke 6:20-49, but the rest of the material is either scattered (apparently haphazardly) throughout Luke's Gospel and set in different contexts or is omitted completely. Why would Luke want to do this? Matthew's other discourses have been treated similarly. For example, Matthew's second discourse in Matthew 10 reappears in no fewer than seven different chapters in Luke.

Although attempts have been made to account for Luke's rather odd treatment of the Matthean discourses, they have convinced few. M. Goulder recognizes that Matthew's fifth discourse poses particular difficulties for his hypothesis. He has to concede that Luke has carefully separated the Markan and non-Markan parts of Matthew 24-25. The former are included in Luke 21, the latter are isolated (by marking a copy of Matthew with a pen) and included in Luke 12-13; 17; and, we may add, Luke 19. This is a tortuous explanation of Luke's methods.

4.2. The Matthean Expansions of Mark. If Luke has used Matthew, we would expect him to have adopted some of the expansions and modifications that Matthew makes to Mark. But hardly a trace of them can be found in Luke. Where Matthew and Mark have the same tradition, Luke opts for Mark's version and ignores Matthew's; at the same time, he rearranges Matthew considerably. Why did Luke find Matthew so unattractive, when in almost all other parts of early Christianity it became the favorite Gospel?

Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi provides a good example. At Luke 9:18-21 Mark's account (Mk 8:27-30) has been used, but there is no sign in Luke of the major addition Matthew makes to Mark at 16:16-19. Here several sayings of Jesus addressed to Peter, including the words "On this rock I will build my church," have not been used.

Why, then, does Luke omit so many of Matthew's numerous expansions of Markan material? This point has often been pressed by those who deny that Luke has used Matthew. Goulder replies as follows. Luke has a "block policy": "When he [Luke] is treating Markan matter he has Mark in front of him, and he has made it his policy not to keep turning up Matthew to see what he has added. . . . Luke does not include the additions because he had decided on a policy which involved letting them go" (Goulder, 1:44). This leads Goulder to suggest that once a Markan block has been dealt with, Luke sometimes comes back to Matthew's additions to Mark: some of the additions are transferred to other contexts, some are ignored unintentionally, some are rewritten.

4.3. Agreements of Matthew and Luke Against Mark. According to some scholars, a further phenomenon erodes the plausibility of the view that Luke used Matthew: the minor agreements of Matthew and Luke against Mark. A number of scholars have appealed to the minor agreements in order to undermine the Q hypothesis and also to offer clear-cut support for Luke's use of Matthew. The minor agreements, it is countered, can be turned against this alternative hypothesis. For those who entertain Luke's use of Matthew, it is clear that in Markan contexts Luke sometimes prefers Matthean words or phrases. But it must also be acknowledged that in Markan contexts Luke makes it his policy not to keep turning up Matthew to see what he has added. On this evidence, champions of Q will counter that the minor agreements do not undermine the Q hypothesis, for if Luke did use Matthew, he must have redacted the first Gospel quite perversely. Nevertheless, the sheer weight of minor agreements and their quality is fair reason to be cautious; accordingly, E. P. Sanders calls minor agreements "the Achilles' heel" of the two-source hypothesis (Sanders and Davies, 76).

4.4. Variations in Similar Non-Markan Traditions. Where Matthew and Luke contain similar non-Markan traditions, most scholars accept that it is difficult to decide which evangelist has the earlier form of the tradition. But scholars who claim that Luke has used Matthew must accept that it is always Luke who has changed Matthew's earlier form of the tradition. Their attempts to defend this view often look like special pleading.

For example, if Luke has used Matthew, then he has abbreviated Matthew's earlier and fuller version both of the Beatitudes (Mt 5:1-12) and of the Lord's *Prayer (Mt 6:9-13). Why would Luke want to do this? In both cases it is difficult to discover plausible reasons; it is much less difficult to suppose that while Luke has retained Q traditions with few changes, Matthew has expanded them.

4.5. Variations in Placing Q Sayings Relative to Markan Contexts. After the temptations of Jesus (Mt 4:1-11 // Lk 4:1-13) Luke and Matthew never use the Q sayings that they share in the same Markan context. If Luke has used Matthew, then he has carefully removed every non-Markan (Q) saying from the Markan context that it has in Matthew and placed it in a different context.

4.6. Implied Differences between Luke's Treatment of Mark and Matthew. One final point sums up several of the above observations. If we accept that Luke has used Mark, then with the help of a synopsis we can readily discover the changes of various kinds that he has made to Mark. On the whole, he has retained the order of Mark's traditions and has considerable respect for their content, especially when he is quoting sayings of Jesus. If Luke has also used Matthew, we would expect him to have modified his second source in broadly similar ways. But this is by no means the case.

5. The Theology and Purpose of Q.

Were Q traditions brought together simply as an anthology or summary of the sayings of Jesus? How coherent are they? Do they contain one primary theological perspective? Were Q traditions selected, arranged and modified for particular theological or pastoral reasons? Discussion of these questions has been approached from three quite different angles.

5.1. The Relationship of Q to the Earliest Kerygma. At the turn of the twentieth century several writers on the purpose of Q accepted that it must have contained an account of the death and resurrection of Jesus as well as a collection of his sayings. However, since in their passion and resurrection narratives Luke and Matthew share no more than a few phrases that are not found in Mark, it is impossible to sustain this view.

In his influential study of Q, A. Harnack insisted that Q was a source of unparalleled value. It had been compiled without any discernible bias, "whether apologetic, didactic, ecclesiastical, national or anti-national" (Harnack, 171). Mark had exaggerated apocalypticism and subordinated the "purely religious and moral element" of Jesus' message (Harnack, 250-51). Q, on the other hand, was a relatively complete account of "the message of Jesus" that expressed clearly the very essence of Christianity for twentieth-century people.

Harnack's theological presuppositions were challenged by K. Barth and R. Bultmann, who insisted that proclamation of the cross and the resurrection, not the teaching of the historical Jesus, was at the heart of the earliest Christian preaching. Harnack's confidence in Q as "the message of Jesus" was also challenged by the work of the first form critics (see Form Criticism). They insisted that since all the Gospel traditions have been shaped by the faith and the needs of the post-Easter communities, not even Q provides direct access to the teaching of Jesus.

So what was the relationship of Q to the kerygma or proclamation of the earliest post-Easter communities? M. Dibelius, B. H. Streeter and T. W. Manson all saw Q as a supplement to the early kerygma of the cross and resurrection of Jesus. Q traditions were used as ethical guidance and encouragement for those who had accepted the kerygma.

Although this general view held sway for some time, it was strongly challenged by H. E. Tödt. Tödt noted that many Q traditions are not hortatory and argued that the purpose of Q can be uncovered by elucidating the Q community's use and development of Son of Man sayings. The community did not develop a passion kerygma, but was convinced that Jesus, who had reestablished fellowship with his followers as the risen one, is also the one who, as the coming Son of Man, would be the eschatological guarantor of that fellowship. Tödt's proposals depended heavily on an unlikely view of the Son of Man traditions in Q, but other scholars followed his lead and showed that Q traditions had been arranged and shaped in the light of christological concerns. G. Stanton drew attention to the importance of the accounts of the *baptism and *temptations of Jesus that stood at the beginning of Q; together with Matthew 11:2-6 // Luke 7:18-23 (and related passages), they confirm that for the Q community, the prophetic *eschatological promises were being fulfilled in the actions and words of Jesus. The past of Jesus (including his rejection by those to whom he was sent), as well as his soon-expected parousia, was important to the Q community (see Apocalypticism and Apocalyptic Teaching).

5.2. Redaction-Critical Studies. In the 1950s the ways the four evangelists reshaped and arranged the traditions at their disposal were studied intensively (see Redaction Criticism). It soon became possible to show that "redaction" of earlier traditions had been carried out in accordance with particular theological emphases. Discussion of Q from this perspective was pioneered by D. Lührmann and has been continued by a number of scholars. Attention is focused on the ways originally separate traditions have been linked together in Q and on sayings that have been "created" by the Q community in order to clarify or interpret earlier traditions. Separation of original tradition and later redaction is obviously much more difficult and hypothetical than it is in the case of Matthew's and Luke's redaction of their sources, but that has not deterred scholars from trying to discern the primary purposes of the compiler(s) of Q. Along these lines, some have argued that several blocks of Q traditions share strikingly similar literary features or theological emphases. For example, R. Piper has shown that Q traditions include a number of collections of proverbs, or aphorisms, which develop an argument in similar ways. This paved the way for work like that of W. Arnal, who attempts to supplement genre analysis with a sociological mirror reading of Q's proposed context.

But it is not easy to discern the overriding concern of the final redactor of Q. Hence, it is no surprise to discover that some have suggested that Q traditions underwent two or more major redactions. Reconstructions of possible stages in the development of Q traditions are likely to be influenced strongly by the investigator's presuppositions concerning the transmission and development of Gospel traditions, and even by views on the development of earliest Christianity.

5.3. The Literary Genre of Q. Since an appreciation of the literary genre of a writing is a crucial first step in interpretation, it is surprising that earlier writers on Q paid so little attention to its literary genre. J. Robinson remedied this in a bold claim that Q was part of a "trajectory" of sayings genres that extended from Proverbs to gnostic writings (especially the Gospel of Thomas) and the mishnaic tractate 'Abot. On this view, the wisdom sayings in Q are dominant, and Jesus is portrayed primarily as the representative of the heavenly Sophia (Wisdom). Robinson's proposals were refined and extended in J. Kloppenborg's major study The Formation of Q. Kloppenborg notes that the writings with which Robinson associates the literary genre of Q are much more homogeneous than Q itself. He argues that the formative component of Q consisted of a group of six "wisdom speeches" that were hortatory in nature and in their mode of argumentation, similar to other wisdom writings. This stratum was subsequently expanded by the addition of groups of sayings that adopted a critical and polemical stance with respect to *Israel; the *temptation story (Mt 4:1-11 // Lk 4:1-13), which was the final addition to Q, gave it a more biographical cast. Those who are impressed by the wisdom character of Q will typically identify it as an instruction genre, a Hellenistic gnomologia, or a collection of *chreiai.

M. Sato argues that the literary genre of Q is comparable with OT prophetic writings. In all three of the main stages of Q's composition many individual Q traditions are prophetic in form and in emphasis. Whereas for Kloppenborg prophetic traditions in Q are subsidiary to wisdom traditions, for Sato precisely the reverse is the case. Debate on the genre of Q is likely to continue for some time.

Many thus surmise that Q existed as a written document; its 230 or so sayings of Jesus were used and partly reinterpreted by both Matthew and Luke. If so, we can be less certain about Q's earlier history, literary genre, overall theological perspective and purpose. Although clusters of traditions with related themes can be identified, Q contained such varied material that it is unwise to claim that it had one primary theological perspective or that it was used in the early church in any one specific way. The Q hypothesis will continue to be prominent in tradition-critical study of the Gospels, but also in discussion of the origin and nature of the earliest expressions of Christian faith.

See also FORM CRITICISM; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; REDACTION CRITICISM; SYNOPTIC PROBLEM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Arnal, "The Rhetoric of Marginality: Apocalypticism, Gnosticism, and Sayings Gospels," HTR 88 (1995) 471-94; A. D. Baum, Der mündliche Faktor und die synoptische Frage: Analogien aus der antiken Literatur, der Experimentalpsychologie, der Oral Poetry-Forschung und dem rabbinischen Traditionswesen (TANZ 49; Tübingen: Francke, 2008); H. D. Betz, The Sermon on the Mount: A Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, Including the Sermon on the Plain (Matthew 5:3-7:27 and Luke 6:20-49), ed. A. Y. Collins (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); M. J. Borg, Meeting Jesus Again for the First Time: The Historical Jesus and the Heart of Contemporary Faith (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco: 1995); D. R. Burkett, Rethinking the Gospel Sources, 2: The Unity or Plurality of Q (SBLECL 1; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2009); D. R. Catchpole, Studies in Q (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, trans. B. L. Woolf (New York: Scribner, 1935); J. D. G. Dunn, "Altering the Default Setting: Re-envisioning the Early Transmission of the Jesus Tradition," NTS 49 (2003) 139-75; W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis (New York: Macmillan, 1964); A. M. Farrer, "On Dispensing with Q," in D. E. Nineham, ed., Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot (Oxford: Blackwell, 1955) 55-58; H. T. Fleddermann, Q: A Reconstruction and Commentary (BTS 1; Leuven: Peeters, 2005); idem, "The Plot of Q," Ephemerides Theologicae Lovaniensis 88 (2012) 43-69; M. Goodacre, The Case Against Q: Studies in Markan Priority and the

Synoptic Problem (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2002); M. Goodacre and N. Perrin, eds., Questioning Q: A Multidimensional Critique (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); M. D. Goulder, Luke: A New Paradigm (2 vols.; JSNTSup 20; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989); A. Harnack, The Sayings of Jesus: The Second Source of St. Matthew and St. Luke, trans. J. R. Wilkinson (London: Williams & Norgate, 1907); P. M. Head, Christology and the Synoptic Problem: An Argument for Markan Priority (SNTSMS 94; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997); R. A. Horsley with J. A. Draper, Whoever Hears You Hears Me: Prophets, Performance, and Tradition in Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); A. Järvinen, "The Son of Man and His Followers: A Q Portrait of Jesus," in Characterization in the Gospels: Reconceiving Narrative Criticism, ed. D. Rhoads and K. Syreeni (JSNTSup 184; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); J. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); J. Kloppenborg Verbin, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); D. Lührmann, Die Redaktion der Logienquelle: Anh.: Zur weiteren Überlieferung zum Alten und Neuen Testament (WMANT 33; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1969); T. W. Manson, The Sayings of Jesus: As Recorded in the Gospels According to St. Matthew and St. Luke, Arranged with Introduction and Commentary (London: SCM, 1949); N. Perrin, "Some Implications of Dispensing with Q," in Questioning Q: A Multidimensional Critique, ed. M. Goodacre and N. Perrin (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004) 165-73; R. A. Piper, Wisdom in the Q Tradition: The Aphoristic Teaching of Jesus (SNTSMS 61; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989); J. M. Robinson, "LOGOI SOPHON: On the Gattung of Q," in Trajectories Through Early Christianity, ed. J. M. Robinson and H. Koester (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1964) 71-113; J. M. Robinson, P. Hoffmann and J. Kloppenborg, The Critical Edition of Q: Synopsis Including the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark and Thomas, with English, German, and French Translations of Q and Thomas (Minneapolis: Fortress; Leuven: Peeters, 2000); E. P. Sanders and M. Davies, Studying the Synoptic Gospels (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1989); M. Sato, Q und Prophetie: Studien zur Gattungs- und Traditionsgeschichte der Quelle Q (WUNT 2/29; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988); J. Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte: Studien zur Rezeption der Logienüberlieferung in Markus, Q

und Thomas (WMANT 76; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997); G. N. Stanton, "On the Christology of Q," in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament, ed. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973) 27-42; B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins (London: Macmillan, 1924); H. E. Tödt, The Son of Man in the Synoptic Tradition, trans. D. M. Barton (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1965); C. M. Tuckett, Q and the History of Early Christianity: Studies on Q (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1996); idem, "The Current State of the Synoptic Problem," in New Studies in the Synoptic Problem: Oxford Conference, April 2008; Essays in Honour of Christopher M. Tuckett, ed. P. Foster et al. (BETL 239; Leuven: Peeters, 2011) 9-50.

G. N. Stanton and N. Perrin

QORBAN. See LAW.

QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS

It has become customary to think of the quest of the historical Jesus in three phases: the original quest chronicled by Albert Schweitzer beginning in the eighteenth century and ending with Schweitzer himself in 1906; the post-Bultmannian "New Quest" of the 1950s; and the contemporary "Third Quest." However, this scenario owes as much to the enterprising spirit of British publishers as to anything else. Schweitzer's original German title, Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1906)—"From Reimarus to Wrede: A History of Life-of-Jesus Research"—suggested a sober history of biographical research within a strict timeline. The English version of the title, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, was coined by translator William Montgomery and his publisher, Adam and Charles Black. It heightened the impression that critical research showed that the Jesus of history was different (as Schweitzer himself insisted) from the Christ of the creeds, orthodox theology, liberal scholarship and Christian piety. It also reinforced the misconception that Schweitzer had explored the entire quest of the historical Jesus and his place in history. As it was, Schweitzer began with Hermann Samuel Reimarus in 1778 and ended with himself in 1906 (extended to 1912, but not radically changed in the second edition).

History repeated itself in the case of the New Quest. Its historian and leading advocate, James M. Robinson, recalled that the term had its origin in discussions with the editor of the SCM Press in London regarding a paper that Robinson had presented to the Oxford Congress on the Four Gospels in 1957. Robinson's original title was "The Quest of the Historical Jesus Today." It was intended not to supersede Bultmann but rather to develop his ideas. The eventual title given to Robinson's book, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (1959), was "an afterthought."

Given this history, it was perhaps inevitable that any change of direction should be labeled "The Third Quest." The term gained prominence through N. T. Wright's revision of Stephen Neill's The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861-1986 (1988). Wright drew attention to renewed interest in Jesus as a figure in Jewish history, linked with the discovery of new materials, including the Dead Sea Scrolls. The fact that the term "Third Quest" appeared in a history of NT interpretation published by a major university press enhanced its status as a defining category.

It is debatable whether the term "Third Quest" should be used to describe all historical Jesus scholarship after the sudden demise of the New Quest, or whether it should be restricted to work that emphasized the Jewishness of Jesus and methodologies associated with it. If the former is the case, then the Third Quest appears to be a continuation, albeit a new phase, of the "Old Quest." If the Third Quest entails new and distinctive methodologies, it implies a new enterprise running alongside surviving remnants of previous quests.

"Third" implies two predecessors, suggesting that Schweitzer was right in insisting that the quest began with Reimarus, and that there were no prior attempts to discover the historical identity of Jesus. It also downplays half a century of scholarship exemplified in Britain by the generation of C. H. Dodd and T. W. Manson, in North America by B. W. Bacon and H. J. Cadbury, and in Europe by Joachim Jeremias and Oscar Cullmann.

It is not surprising that scholars found it necessary to invent the facetious term "The No Quest" to fill gaps in the three-quests scenario. In what follows it may be necessary sometimes to use terminology generated by the three-quests scenario, but the discussion will make clear its inadequacy.

This article focuses on the history of postbiblical developments.

1. The Quest of the Theological Jesus
2. Quests Before the Quest
3. Schweitzer's Quest in Context
4. From Harnack to Grundmann
5. From Bousset to Bultmann and the "New Quest"
6. European Alternatives
7. The English-Speaking World
8. The Ongoing Quest
9. Concluding Reflections

1. The Quest of the Theological Jesus.

Until the sixteenth century, the Christian church was more concerned with what could be called “the quest of the theological Jesus”—Jesus as construed within the context the belief systems of Christian tradition. Appreciation of this context is a prerequisite for understanding the quest of the historical Jesus.

1.1. Jesus Within Judaism. Initially, the quest of the historical Jesus began as an internal Jewish controversy. It is arguable that it was formally inaugurated by a delegation of scribes sent from Jerusalem to investigate Jesus’ reputation as an exorcist and healer (Mk 3:22-27; cf. Mt 12:22-30; Lk 11:14-22). To modern ears—Christian and Jewish—their findings may sound bizarre. The healings were real, but they were empowered by Beelzebul: Jesus was Satan-possessed. In the world of Second Temple Judaism the Torah was clear: a prophet who led people astray in the service of an alien deity—in this case Beelzebul—by means of signs and wonders was not to be heeded. His appearance should be viewed as a test of Israel’s fidelity to God. Such a prophet should be put to death so that evil might be purged from Israel (Deut 13:1-5; cf. Ex 20:1-7; Deut 5:6-10). From the first, history and theology were inextricable.

The charge of leading people astray in the service of Beelzebul was one of several found in the canonical Gospels. Another delegation challenged Jesus’ violation of cultic purity (Mk 7:1-23; cf. Mt 15:1-20; Lk 7:37-41). Charges included breaking the Sabbath, being a stubborn and rebellious son (Deut 21:18-21; cf. Mt 11:19; Lk 7:34) and blasphemy. The charges involved capital offenses. Eventually, Jesus was convicted of blasphemy connected with prophetic claims (Mt 26:63-68; Mk 14:61-65), a charge that dated from the beginning of his activity (Mt 9:3; Mk 2:6; Lk 5:21). In the Synoptic narratives confessions of Jesus as the Christ were made only after the negative charges (Mt 16:13-20; Mk 8:27-30; Lk 9:18-21).

1.2. Jesus Within Christianity. Second-century Christian literature (e.g., the writings of Justin Martyr [d. 165]) indicates that negative rumors persisted, and controversies continued in the Greco-Roman world in the time of Origen and Eusebius. However, with “the parting of the ways”—the separation of Christianity from Judaism—the center of gravity of theological concern began to shift. The internal debate within Christianity moved from the canonical Gospels’ apologetic defense of the righteous historical identity of Jesus to his theological identity as the *Son of God and the Savior of humankind.

This shift of interest was indicated by several factors. In the Western church Yeshua of Nazareth came to be known by the Latin name “Jesus,” which was not used in his lifetime, except possibly by *Pontius Pilate and the soldiers involved in the crucifixion. The Latin form served to contextualize him for the Latin-speaking part of the Roman Empire. However, it did so at the expense of turning him into a virtual Gentile, obscuring the fact that the Greek and Hebrew forms of his name—Iēsous and Yēšúaʿ (or Yēšū, for short)—were also the OT name of “Joshua,” and with it the possibility that Yeshua of Nazareth was engaged in a second, but peaceful, conquest of the land of Israel.

Another factor in this shift was the almost-imperceptible way in which the term “Son of God” acquired the sense of “God the Son,” or simply “the Son.” In biblical contexts “Son of God” could indicate the nation of Israel (Hos 11:1; cf. Mt 2:15), a newly anointed king (Ps 2:7), peacemakers (Mt 5:9) or Jesus as the Spirit-anointed messianic Son (Mt 3:17; Mk 1:11; Lk 3:22; cf. Acts 10:36-38).

Patristic Christology was dominated by *theological interpretation, which looked for truth behind the phenomena of history and Scripture. Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200) did not question the veracity of biblical narratives. His celebrated recapitulation theory set out in Against Heresies sought patterns in the divine work of redemption and restoration beneath the surface of biblical history (Haer. 3.16.6). Eve through disobedience brought death to herself and the human race; Mary by her obedience brought salvation (Haer. 3.22.4). Through a tree humankind was made debtor to God; through a tree came cancellation of the debt (Haer. 5.17.3).

Irenaeus championed a trend in which atonement theory and the circumstances surrounding Jesus’ death ran, as it were, on separate tracks. It gave an explanation “from above,” which was related to the course of events “below” at a single point—the death of Jesus. Many regard On the Incarnation by Athanasius (ca. 296–373) as the classic patristic statement of Christology in terms of soteriology. The argument was summed up in this statement: “He became man that we might become divine, and he revealed himself through a body that we might receive an idea of the invisible Father; and he endured insults from men that we might inherit incorruption” (Inc. 54).

Controversy over Jesus’ sonship came to a head with Arianism. The Alexandrian presbyter Arius accused his bishop, Alexander, of downplaying Jesus’ humanity. Both sides agreed that divinity entailed immutability and impassibility. The followers of Arius argued that since Jesus suffered and died, he was subject to change and suffering, and therefore he could not be fully God like the Father. The supporters of Alexander argued that since only God could save, Jesus must be fully divine in order to be the savior of humankind. The Council of Nicea (325) condemned Arius and defined Jesus' sonship as "consubstantial with the Father" (homoousion tō patri). The dispute raged on until the Council of Constantinople (381), which endorsed Nicea, while modifying its formula to produce what is called the Nicene Creed.

The debate entered a new phase as the rival schools of Alexandria and Antioch disputed whether the incarnation involved assumption of flesh in a more general sense, or whether the preexistent Word was united with a particular man. The Council of Chalcedon (451) put together a patchwork formula, drawing on formulations from both schools. It affirmed that the Son was consubstantial with the Father regarding his divinity and consubstantial with human beings regarding his humanity—like them except for sin.

The opening chapter of Schweitzer's Quest of the Historical Jesus was devoted to problems bequeathed by Chalcedon. As Schweitzer saw it, Chalcedon's doctrine of the two natures of Christ dissolved the unity of the personality of Jesus and cut off the last possibility of a return to the historical Jesus. "The contradiction was elevated into a law." The humanity of Jesus was preserved as an appearance. But the deception of the formula kept Jesus "prisoner and prevented the leading spirits of the Reformation from grasping the idea of a return to the historical Jesus" (Schweitzer 2001, 5). The dogma had to be shattered before people could even grasp the thought of his existence.

The attempt to derive a rationale for the incarnation apart from consideration of Jesus' life was taken to new heights by Anselm (ca. 1033–1109) in his Cur Deus Homo. The title could be translated as Why Did God Become Man? or Why the God Man? Anselm undertook to prove by logical steps that even if nothing were known about Christ, the human race could not be saved without him (Cur Deus Homo 1.3–4). However, the ensuing argument depended on a combination of theological and culturally conditioned beliefs, including sin as a debt, the alternative of making satisfaction or punishment, human inability to make satisfaction because of sin, the need to make up the number of fallen angels, and Jesus' death as a work of supererogation, for which Christ chose the salvation of humankind as a reward.

1.3. Jesus in Talmudic Judaism. Following the destruction of the *temple and the ruinous wars with *Rome that left *Jerusalem devastated, Jewish identity was preserved through oral law, which became the basis of the Mishnah (oral teaching). The two main centers of Jewish life were Palestine and Babylonia, which in time produced interpretations of the Mishnah for their respective communities in the form of the Talmuds (teaching). The Jerusalem Talmud dates from around A.D. 400; the Babylonian Talmud, generally regarded as more authoritative, was produced a hundred years later (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

The Talmuds contain veiled polemical references to Jesus, calculated to show the superiority of Judaism. They ridicule Gospel accounts of Jesus' birth and maintain that Jesus was rightfully executed as a blasphemer and idolater. On account of their garbled characterizations, scholars in the Christian tradition have tended to dismiss their historical value. However, more recent scholarship has called for reassessment (Peter Schäfer, Jesus in the Talmud, 2007) (see Jesus in Non-Christian Sources).

P. Schäfer contends that the characterizations indicate a high degree of familiarity with Matthew and John and represent a sophisticated anti-Christian polemic. The Jerusalem Talmud was more restrained, as it emanated from Roman Byzantine Palestine at a time when Christian influence on political power was in ascendance. In Babylonia, on the other hand, the Jewish community enjoyed relative freedom, and the compilers of the Babylonian Talmud did not feel the same constraints in depicting their hostility to Jesus. It would seem that Jewish tradition, no less than Christian tradition dating from roughly the same period, contributed to lines of division that have persisted down to modern times.

2. Quests Before the Quest.

2.1. Issues in Reformation Christology. In the Leipzig Disputation (1518) Martin Luther (1483–1546) defended the "theology of the cross" in contrast to the "theology of glory." The latter denoted the presumptuous speculations of scholastic theologians about God's inner being. It bypassed God's revelation in the sufferings of Christ on the cross. For Luther, the Gospel that best expressed the theology of the cross was John. Luther's Preface to the New Testament (1522) pronounced John to be the "principal" Gospel; it truly "showed Christ," presenting much teaching but few works. Luther's preference for John represented a trend that lasted for centuries, using John as a lens for interpreting the other Gospels.

However, a younger generation of scholars developed a Lutheran scholasticism that keenly debated the relative merits of kenōsis and krypsis to explain the Son's divinity and humanity. Kenōsis ("emptying") suggested renunciation or nonuse of divine attributes—such as omnipotence, omnipresence, omniscience—during Jesus' earthly life. It claimed the support of Philippians 2:6–11, but kenōsis raised questions of whether such limitation of divinity was merely temporary or even an incarnation at all. Krypsis ("hiding" or "hiddenness") argued for Christ's full, but hidden, possession of divine attributes. But this seemed to imply that the cosmic functions of the Word continued to operate—perhaps unknown to Jesus himself—while he was a baby in the manger, asleep during the storm on the lake, or conversing with the Pharisees.

The Calvinist alternative argued, "Since the God-head is incomprehensible and everywhere present, it must follow that it is indeed beyond the bounds of its assumed humanity, yet it is nonetheless in the same, and remains personally united with it" (Heidelberg Catechism, question 48).

An issue of a different kind surfaced in Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion (1509–1564). It turned on the rise of skepticism, which had already begun in the age of the Renaissance (see 2.2 below). Since Calvin's Institutes expounded Reformed theology, it raised the question of the legitimation of the Reformed belief system over against Catholicism. Calvin argued that the church could not be the final authority, because its claims rested ultimately on the Bible. The Word of God in Scripture was the basic source and criterion of Reformed faith. But this answer raised questions about how one knows that Scripture is the Word of God, and whose interpretation is correct. For Calvin, "The highest proof of Scripture derives in general from the fact that God in person speaks in it. . . . We ought to seek our conviction in a higher place than human reasons, judgments or conjectures, that is, in the secret testimony of the Holy Spirit" (Institutes 1.7.4). Calvin supplemented this argument by external "proofs." Miracles and prophecy (miraculous fulfillment of predicted events) were invoked to confirm the supernatural authority of the accompanying revelation (Institutes 1.8.5–10). Catholic apologists replied that Calvin's view was subjective, and that continued miracles in the Catholic Church proved that God was still on its side. Calvin retorted that he was supported by Jesus' miracles, which brought glory to God (Jn 7:18; 8:50). Modern "miracles" were like those claimed in Augustine's day by the Donatists; they were pseudomiracles, "delusions of Satan," calculated to lead people astray (Institutes, prefatory address) (cf. Deut 13:2–6; Mt 24:24).

It fell to the Arminian Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) to bring into the open the question whether Deuteronomy 13:2–6 might be applied to Jesus himself. In The Truth of the Christian Religion (1627) Grotius promptly dismissed the thought on the grounds that Jesus' works brought glory to God. Moreover, Jesus forbade worship of false gods.

2.2. The Rise of Skepticism. From Calvin's day onward miracles and prophecy became increasingly important for their extrinsic role in legitimating belief systems, first in Protestant and Catholic polemics, and then in disputes between Christianity and secular skepticism. Among the factors in the rise of skepticism was the rediscovery in the Renaissance of ancient skepticism (Richard Popkin, The History of Skepticism: From Savonarola to Bayle, 2003). Interest in the skepticism of Pyrrho (d. ca. 270 B.C.) was stimulated by publication of Outlines of Pyrrhonism by Sextus Empiricus (ca. A.D. 200), Lives of Eminent Philosophers by Diogenes Laertius, and the writings of Cicero.

Early Pyrrhonism in the form of systematic doubt was employed by Catholic apologists as a new "engine of war" against Calvinism. In return, Protestants deployed systematic doubt against Catholicism. Skepticism about the reliability of the senses and the ability of reason to discover ultimate truth provided the horizon within which truth claims in philosophy, science and religion would be judged. Rationalism and empiricism (a term connected with the methods and name of Sextus Empiricus) were just two developments.

Hobbes and Spinoza sought to preempt appeal to miracles as warrant for invoking religious beliefs in the political sphere. In chapter 37 of Leviathan (1651) Thomas Hobbes (1558–1679) defined a miracle as "a work of God (besides His operation by way of nature, ordained in the Creation) done for the making manifest to His elect the mission of an extraordinary minister for their salvation." However, he warned against false prophets and ignorance of natural causes. The state, as "God's lieutenant," had the right to demand public conformity, but privately everyone was free to believe or not believe acts that "had been given out for miracles."

Benedictus de Spinoza (1632–1677) also discussed miracles in an apparent digression. In chapter 6 of his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (1670) he argued that since the laws of nature were laws of God, nothing could occur outside them. Hence, we could not gain knowledge of God from “violations” of divine law. John Locke (1632–1704) argued that miracles furnished empirical evidence for accepting beliefs that were above reason (An Essay Concerning Human Understanding [1690]; The Reasonableness of Christianity [1695]; and his posthumously published Discourse of Miracles [1706]). They functioned like the credentials of an ambassador.

The purpose of David Hume’s (1711–1776) section “Of Miracles” in his Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1748) was not to show the impossibility of miracles, but rather to challenge their role in establishing belief systems. Hume’s definition was also a refutation: “A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can be imagined” (Enquiry, 10.90). He concluded, “No human testimony can have such force as to prove a miracle, and make it a just foundation for any such system of religion” (Enquiry, 10.98).

The importance of Hume’s argument lay not in its novelty, but rather in the way that Hume deployed arguments that had been around for more than a century. Use of analogy—comparing reports of the past with contemporary understanding of reality—played an increasingly important part in the quest of the historical Jesus.

2.3. Alternatives to Orthodoxy. In the period from the Reformation to the Age of Enlightenment two streams of construing the identity of Jesus emerged. The first may be described as broadly Unitarian. What they had in common was rejection of the doctrine of the Trinity and the Nicene view of the personal divinity of Jesus, while desiring to retain Christian identity. The second stream was Deism—a term given to describe various attempts to supplant theistic Christianity.

2.3.1. Forms of Unitarianism. During the 1530s Michael Servetus (ca. 1511–1553) composed treatises on the errors of the concept of the Trinity, arguing that the term itself was unbiblical. Orthodoxy compounded misunderstanding of biblical language with patristic mistakes about “natures” and “persons.” Servetus’s tragic execution was precipitated by his Christianismi restitutio (1553), which was composed as a reply to Calvin’s Institutio christianae religionis.

Socinianism derived from the Latinized names of two Italian scholars who were uncle and nephew, Lelio Francesco Mario Sozini (1525–1562) and Fausto Paolo Sozzini (1539–1604). The latter’s De Jesu Christo servatore (1594) attacked the penal view of atonement. God was only one person. Although Jesus should be honored as the agent of salvation, it did not follow that he possessed a divine nature.

In Britain the terms “Socinianism” and “Arianism” often were used interchangeably. However, Socinianism affirmed the exaltation of Jesus to divine status, whereas thoroughgoing Arianism was anti-Trinitarian. The leading English Arians—Isaac Newton (1642–1727), William Whiston (1667–1752), Samuel Clarke (1675–1729)—were intimately connected by Cambridge, science, biblical studies, and with one another. Newton was Lucasian Professor of Mathematics and subsequently Master of the Mint, but privately he was an almost obsessive student of Scripture. Newton himself seems to have been more anti-Athanasian than pro-Arian. He saw himself as a faithful follower of Scripture and ante-Nicene Christology.

William Whiston was Newton’s assistant and handpicked successor. Whiston shared many of Newton’s convictions but was less circumspect. His plea to the archbishops of Canterbury and of York for a more accommodating approach to Christology backfired, and he was removed from his professorship (1710). Today he is remembered less for his Arianism than for his translation of the works of Josephus (1737).

Samuel Clarke became a Newtonian at Cambridge. He translated Newton’s Opticks into Latin in order to make Newton’s ideas more accessible on the continent. Clarke’s reputation for Arianism was based on his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity (1712). In the uproar, the bishops ruled that Clarke should not be required to retract, on the condition that he agreed to publish nothing further on the subject. In his historical-critical handling of the church fathers, Clarke represented the way of the future. In his handling of the NT, Clarke (like Newton and Whiston) remained in the precritical age, taking texts at their apparent face value and drawing logical deductions. It is questionable whether any of the three merited the title “Arian.”

The leading advocate of Unitarianism in Britain was the discoverer of oxygen and Presbyterian minister turned Unitarian, Joseph Priestley (1733–1804). Priestley sharply criticized the preexistence and divinity of Christ and also the satisfaction theory of atonement. His extensive writings included harmonies of the Gospels in Greek (1777) and English (1780), the two-volume History of the Corruptions of Christianity (1782) and An History of Early Opinions Concerning Jesus Christ (1786). Following rioting against him in England, Priestley settled in America (1794), where he was instrumental in turning Thomas Jefferson to Unitarianism.

Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) was the framer of the Declaration of Independence and third president of the United States (1801–1809). Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity convinced him that one could be a Christian without believing in the Trinity or divinity of Christ. Other writings inspired Jefferson to examine the life of Jesus. They remained unpublished in his lifetime (Jefferson's Extracts from the Gospels: "The Philosophy of Jesus" and "The Life and Morals of Jesus," ed. Dickinson W. Adams et al., 1983).

Jefferson's "The Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth" was literally a cut-and-paste compilation, produced by snipping extracts from editions of the Gospels in Greek, Latin, French and English and pasting them in a book in parallel columns. Jefferson freely cut verses in half in order to eliminate the supernatural. References to the Holy Spirit were cut out, as were narratives of *miracles and exorcisms. The *Sermon on the Mount was extensively preserved, as were *parables emphasizing social responsibility. The *Last Supper was edited so as to include the Johannine account of footwashing, while omitting the meal itself. Jesus was condemned for blasphemously claiming to be the Son of God. The narrative concluded with the burial of Jesus.

2.3.2. Deism. Etymologically, "deism" (Lat. deus = "god") indicates belief in a transcendent God, as does "theism" (Gk. theos = "god"). However, the terms differed in usage. Since the sixteenth century, "deist" was used to describe someone who professed belief in God the Creator but not in the deity of Christ. It became associated with "freethinking," a euphemism for atheism.

Deism is commonly dated from the Latin work, published in Paris, De veritate (1624) by Edward Herbert (ca. 1582–1648). De veritate (On Truth) advocated rational religion based on innate common notions in response to skepticism and institutional religion. The 1645 edition openly attacked revealed religion.

Charles Blount (1654–1693) was a private scholar whose ideas were indebted to Herbert, Hobbes and Spinoza. Blount translated The First Two Books of Philostratus Concerning the Life of Apollonius Tyaneus (1680). Public outcry prevented further publication, but from then on Apollonius was invoked as a rival to Jesus, a "divine man," thought to be a familiar figure in the ancient world. An anonymous tract attributed to Blount, Miracles No Violations of the Laws of Nature (1683), paraphrased Spinoza with quotations from Hobbes.

A landmark in the history of deism was Christi- anity Not Mysterious, by John Toland (1670–1722). Toland was an Irish self-described freethinker. He posed as a defender of Locke but argued against him. Belief above reason was untenable because assent could not be given to what was not understood. Toland warned of mysteries, pagan ideas and priestcraft, which had at first been tolerated in Christianity but later allowed to distort it. They should be stripped away to reveal Jesus as a preacher of purest morals. Toland's Nazarenus: Or, Jewish, Gentile, and Mahometan Christianity (1718) argued that the earliest Jewish Christians were Nazarenes or Ebionites. They were not the heretics depicted by Christian orthodoxy, but rather honest believers who followed the teaching of Jesus, unencumbered by later orthodoxy. The "Mohametan Gospel" could be traced to Ebionite Christianity. Toland's Jesus was the Jesus of enlightened humanism. Toland is credited with having coined the term "pantheist."

Anthony Collins (1676–1729), who, like his friend Locke, had found political refuge in Holland, and to whom Toland dedicated several writings, argued that prophecies already fulfilled in their own time had been misapplied to Jesus. Isaiah 7:14 (cf. Mt 1:22–23) was not a prediction of the miraculous conception of Jesus, but rather a sign for the prophet's generation of the birth of a child. Hosea 11:1 (cf. Mt 2:15) was not a prediction concerning the holy family's return from Egypt, but rather a saying about Israel's exodus. Collins concluded that such examples were instances of rabbinic allegorical interpretation, demonstrating that Christianity was based on irrational fantasy. Collins did not consider the alternative that they might represent intertextual identification of later events in terms of descriptions of earlier events.

Prophecy was a pillar of contemporary apologetics. The other pillar, miracles, was attacked by Thomas Woolston (1670–1731), an eccentric Cambridge scholar who had been deprived of his fellowship. Woolston published a series of six Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour in View of the Present Controversy Between Infidels and Apostates (1717–1729), examining fifteen miracle stories and pronouncing them absurd, incredible and immoral. With an eye on the claim that the Gospel miracle stories were moral and elevating, Woolston observed that if Apollonius of Tyana had turned water into wine (cf. Jn 2:1–10), we would have reproached his memory. The star of Bethlehem was a "Will-a-Whisp." The resurrection of Jesus was "the most self-evident imposture that was ever put upon the World."

The last major work by a deist writer was Christianity as Old as the Creation: Or the Gospel, a Repub- lication of the Religion of Nature (1730), by Oxford scholar Matthew Tindal (1655–1733). It has been variously described as “the Bible of deism” and “devoid of originality.” It was a rambling tirade, littered with comments on OT morality, by a writer who described himself as a “Christian Deist.”

English deism was well known in Germany, and the ground was well prepared for Reimarus, whom Schweitzer credited with originating the quest of the historical Jesus. Learned periodicals published reports of debates. Writings by English deists and replies by opponents were published in translation. Lecture courses and biographies treated leading personalities. Reimarus himself visited England and Holland in 1720–1721. His library was well stocked with deistic writings, which were cited in the full text of his Apology or Defense of the Rational Worshippers of God (first published in 1772). Today Reimarus is regarded as the leading German deist of his time. In one major respect Reimarus advanced beyond English deism. The deists were preoccupied with subverting orthodoxy; Reimarus built on their work a theory of a Jewish political Jesus who died vainly trying to establish the kingdom of God on earth.

3. Schweitzer's Quest in Context.

The study by Albert Schweitzer (1875–1965) known in English as The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1911; German original, 1906) has acquired near-canonical status as the definitive history of the quest. This is understandable in view of Schweitzer's awesome grasp of the literature, especially in the second German edition (1913), which in English was published as the “First Complete Edition” (2001). Because of limitations of space, this section will focus on Schweitzer's assessment of Reimarus as the inaugurator of the quest, and on his view of the three defining stages of the subsequent quest.

3.1. The Origin of Schweitzer's Quest. In order to appreciate Schweitzer's Quest of the Historical Jesus, three background facts are relevant. First, as an undergraduate at the University of Strassburg, Schweitzer studied theology and philosophy. Upon graduation, he proceeded to a doctorate in philosophy with a dissertation on Kant's Philosophy of Religion (1899). His research included Kant's Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793), which treated the figure of Jesus as “the personified idea of the good principle.” Although Schweitzer regarded Jesus as a historical figure, Kant's influence was such that Schweitzer's research methods and conclusions about Jesus could be said to have been conducted within the limits of reason alone.

Second, The Quest of the Historical Jesus was actually Schweitzer's second attempt to deal with the historical Jesus. To complete his habilitation in theology (the qualification for teaching at university level), Schweitzer wrote a two-part dissertation with the overall title The Lord's Supper in Relationship to the Life of Jesus and the History of the Early Church (1901). Part 1 was The Problem of the Lord's Supper According to the Scholarly Research of the Nineteenth Century and the Historical Accounts (ET, 1982), and part 2 was The Mystery of the Kingdom of God: The Secret of Jesus' Messiahship and Passion (ET, 1914). It described events that led up to the *Last Supper. Initially, Jesus believed that he was called to be the herald of the *Son of Man. In that expectation, he sent out his *disciples on a mission, expecting the messianic woes—the tribulation preceding the end-time conflict with the powers of evil—to befall them. Jesus assured the Twelve that they would not have gone through all the towns of Israel before the Son of Man would come (Mt 10:23). When the disciples returned unscathed, Jesus realized that the Son of Man was not someone else. Rather, he himself was called be the one who would unleash the tribulation and give his life a ransom for many (Mt 20:28; Mk 10:45). At first, Jesus revealed the mystery of the kingdom to Peter, James and John. Later, Peter told it to the Twelve, and Judas told it to the high *priest. Caiaphas secured Jesus' conviction by the *Sanhedrin from Jesus' own mouth. Jesus was convicted of blasphemy by his prophetic claim to be the messianic Son of Man, who would come on the clouds of heaven (Mt 26:53–56 par.).

Third, Schweitzer began forming his ideas as early as 1894 on the basis of Johannes Weiss's Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (1892; ET, 1971). What Schweitzer was not to know was that on the day his dissertation was published, another book on the same subject was published by William Wrede (1859–1907), The Messianic Secret in the Gospels. Wrede had studied under the liberal theologian A. B. Ritschl at Göttingen, where he had also come under the influence of the history-of-religions school. The German titles of both Schweitzer's book and Wrede's contained the word Geheimnis, but it was translated differently in English. In Schweitzer's book it became “mystery”; in Wrede's it meant “secret.” Wrede's work not only eclipsed Schweitzer's, but actually undermined it by arguing that the so-called messianic secret could not be traced earlier than Mark and his community, and that it belonged to dogma, not history. The scholarly world followed Wrede rather than the relatively unknown Schweitzer.

This led Schweitzer to write the book that we know as The Quest of the Historical Jesus, which would vindicate him by forcing readers to decide between Wrede's "thoroughgoing skepticism" and Schweitzer's "thoroughgoing eschatology." It was not that Schweitzer himself believed in eschatology; he believed only that he could demonstrate historically that Jesus' belief in eschatology was the key to his teaching and actions. In retrospect, it could be said that Schweitzer's final alternative offered two different forms of "thoroughgoing skepticism" with regard to the historical Jesus.

3.2. Reimarus and the Inauguration of the Quest. Schweitzer dated the quest from the publication in 1778 of an anonymous piece, "On the Intention of Jesus and His Disciples." It was taken from a manuscript by Hamburg scholar Hermann Samuel Reimarus (1694–1768), whose Apology or Defense of the Rational Worshippers of God had been withheld from publication on account of its dangerous ideas and the threat of censorship. Among the circle permitted to see it was the dramatist Gotthold Ephraïm Lessing (1729–1781), who was living in Hamburg at the time. Upon his appointment as librarian to the Duke of Brunswick, Lessing took up residence in Wolfenbüttel. Between 1774 and 1778 Lessing published extracts from Reimarus's manuscript under the title Fragments from an Unnamed Author, which he had ostensibly found in the duke's library. The extracts came to be known as the Wolfenbüttel Fragments and were subsequently published in German editions of Lessing's collected works. Confirmation of the author's true identity came long after Reimarus's death.

Reimarus's Fragments (ET, 1970) included an attack on the historicity of the *resurrection narratives. The notoriety of this article was surpassed by that of the fragment "On the Intention of Jesus and His Disciples." Jesus was a pious Jew, dedicated to calling Israel to repentance in order to establish the kingdom of God on earth. He did not intend to introduce novel teaching or found a new religion. As time went on, Jesus made the fatal mistake of embracing political messianism. He miscalculated popular support, and his belief in divine intervention proved misplaced. He died disillusioned with the God who had forsaken him (Mk 15:34).

Christianity might well have ended then but for the ingenuity and duplicity of Jesus' disciples. When it became clear that there would be no general persecution, they emerged from hiding. They proclaimed that Jesus had been raised from the dead and would return to establish the promised kingdom. Eschatology was thus the key to understanding both Jesus and the disciples, but in both cases it was mistaken. Jesus wrongly believed that God would establish his kingdom on earth through him; the disciples were guilty of encouraging false expectations of the coming kingdom.

The Wolfenbüttel Fragments provoked numerous replies, the weightiest from the founder of "liberal theology," J. S. Semler (1725–1791). Semler's Answer to the Fragments (1791) was virtually a line-by-line refutation, written from the standpoint of moderate orthodoxy. In the meantime, Lessing protested that although he did not fully agree with the Fragments, they did raise important questions. His standpoint expressed the Age of Enlightenment's confidence in reason and sought to detach religion from history by claiming that nothing in history could be demonstrated beyond doubt. In On the Proof of the Spirit and of Power (1777) Lessing wrote, "If no historical truth can be demonstrated, then nothing can be demonstrated by means of historical truths. That is: accidental truths of history can never become the proof of necessary truths of reason" (Lessing, 53). History might exemplify rational truth, but such truth was not dependent on history. To Lessing, Jesus was one of the great educators of the human race, being "the first reliable, practical teacher of the immortality of the soul" (The Education of the Human Race [1780]) (Lessing, 92).

For Schweitzer, Reimarus was like a bolt from the blue, without predecessors or immediate successors. In fact, the history of theology down to Johannes Weiss appeared retrograde. But every sentence of Weiss's Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (1892; ET, 1971), which Schweitzer pronounced equally important as David Friedrich Strauss's first Life of Jesus, was "a vindication, a rehabilitation of Reimarus as a historical thinker." However, Reimarus's relationship to the English deists puts a question mark against the place assigned to him by Schweitzer as the inaugurator of the quest of the historical Jesus.

3.3. The Three Stages of Schweitzer's Quest. Schweitzer identified three defining moments in the subsequent quest of the historical Jesus (Schweitzer 2001, 198). The first was Strauss's victory over the question of whether an account of the historical Jesus should be "either purely historical or purely supernatural." The second, which was worked out by the Tübingen school and later by Schweitzer's mentor, H. J. Holtzmann, was whether it should be "either Synoptic or Johannine." The third defining moment was whether it should be “either eschatological” (Johannes Weiss) or “noneschatological” (German liberal theology). However, this defining moment morphed into the ultimate choice between “thoroughgoing skepticism” (William Wrede) and “thoroughgoing eschatology” (Schweitzer himself). The view that Schweitzer put forward was a restatement of the view that he had argued in The Mystery of the Kingdom of God.

For Schweitzer, the outcome of these issues was cumulative. Any reconstruction of the historical Jesus must satisfy three criteria: it must be (1) “purely historical,” with the supernatural eliminated; (2) based solely on the Synoptic tradition, with John discounted as late and unhistorical; (3) thoroughly “eschatological,” in the sense that Jesus’ life and teaching were determined by Jesus’ conviction that his martyrdom would inaugurate the kingdom of God on earth.

3.3.1. Stage 1: Strauss and the “Purely Historical” Jesus. Schweitzer identified David Friedrich Strauss (1808–1874) as the scholar who forced the question of either a purely historical or a purely supernatural Jesus. In order to appreciate Strauss, it is important to see him in relation to the scholarship of his time. We need not dwell on the authors of fictitious lives of Jesus, such as K. F. Bahrtdt and K. H. Venturini, to whom Schweitzer devoted ample discussion. More significant for understanding Strauss are the rationalist theologian at the University of Heidelberg, H. E. G. Paulus (1761–1851), and the founding faculty member of the University of Berlin who was also the most creative theologian of the century, Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834).

Paulus was the author of a two-volume Life of Jesus (1828), which Schweitzer described as “fully developed rationalism.” It undertook to explain the events depicted in the Gospels in a rational way, including the resurrection, which was a case of resuscitation from a coma. The truly miraculous aspect of Jesus was his “pure and serenely holy disposition.”

Schleiermacher’s account of Jesus was more complex. Schleiermacher rejected the scholastic doctrine of the Trinity as three separate-but-related divine individuals, and the incarnation as what happened when one of them assumed flesh. Instead, he saw the Redeemer’s consciousness of God as an existence of God in his own person (The Christian Faith, §94). In his posthumously published lectures (The Life of Jesus [1864; ET, 1975]) he drew attention to the role of the Spirit in the life of Jesus. Jesus’ intimate relationship with the Father through the indwelling of the Spirit enabled him to claim to be the Son of God.

“According to the creedal conception he would have had to say, I have the Son of God in me” (Schleiermacher, 95).

Strauss studied theology at the University of Tübingen, where F. C. Baur was his mentor. On completing his doctorate, Strauss went to Berlin to study under the leading philosopher of the day, G. W. F. Hegel. However, Strauss had hardly settled in when Hegel died. Strauss remained in Berlin, hoping to hear Schleiermacher’s lectures on the life of Jesus. However, Schleiermacher was not offering the course, and Strauss had to make do by borrowing lecture notes. He returned to Tübingen, resolved to write his own life of Jesus, avoiding the “supernaturalism” of Schleiermacher and the “vulgar rationalism” of Paulus. The outcome was The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835–1836; ET, 1846; repr., 1972).

Strauss accepted a basic historical framework for the life of Jesus: he had grown up at Nazareth; he was baptized by John the Baptist; he made disciples; he went about teaching, opposing Pharisaism and summoning people to the messianic kingdom; he fell victim to the hostility of the *Pharisees and died on the cross. However, this outline was overlaid by the creative imagination of the church, which interpreted these events as the fulfillment of OT beliefs and institutions. Messianic expectation predetermined that the Messiah should perform miracles and act like a new *Moses and a Davidic king (see Christ; Son of David). Once Jesus acquired the reputation of being the Messiah, popular belief created myths about him. This was in line with the general myth-making tendencies of religion. The historical Jesus was turned into the mythical Messiah. Strauss sought to rescue the underlying truth of Christian faith by appealing to the philosophy of Hegel, who had taught that reality was the manifestation of the Absolute Spirit. The incarnation was the mythological symbol of the divine manifestation in humankind in general.

Strauss’s work provoked great outcry. Within five years some sixty replies appeared. A widely respected conservative response was August Neander’s Life of Jesus Christ (1837; ET, 1851). Strauss published three series of replies to critics and made revisions to his work. But his radical views cost him his academic career, and he turned to literature and politics.

In later life Strauss returned to theology, writing a rehabilitation of Reimarus (1862) and a bitter critique of Schleiermacher on the posthumous publication of lectures on the life of Jesus, The Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History (1865; ET, 1977). His Life of Jesus Adapted for the German People (1864; ET, 1865) was prompted by the popularity of J. E. Renan's Life of Jesus (1863) in France. It retained Strauss's earlier mythical explanation but dropped the Hegelian philosophy. The desupernaturalized Jesus depicted by Strauss emerged as one of the great improvers of the ideal of humanity. As a schoolboy, Friedrich Nietzsche had been turned against Christianity by Strauss's Life of Jesus. However, Nietzsche subjected Strauss's The Old and the New Faith (1872) to remorseless criticism in the first of his Untimely Meditations (1873) on account of Strauss's bourgeois outlook.

In retrospect, Schweitzer was mistaken in seeing Strauss's antisupernaturalism as the first defining moment in the quest of the historical Jesus. It may have been the turning point for Schweitzer himself, but for scholarship and the churchgoing public it proved not to be so. In any case, the desupernaturalism of Jesus was initiated by the deists. At the same time, Strauss's demythologizing of Jesus left an indelible mark on Schweitzer himself, whose Jesus was demythologized in all but name.

3.3.2. Stage 2: The Synoptic Jesus as the Historical Jesus. Schweitzer's second defining moment raised the question of whether reconstructions of the historical Jesus should be based on the Synoptic Gospels or John (see Synoptics and John). It took place in two stages: first, through the Tübingen school of F. C. Baur, then through Schweitzer's own mentor, H. J. Holtzmann.

The priority of Matthew was widely accepted in the early nineteenth century. Among those who did so was Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860), leader of the Tübingen school. Baur insisted upon a purely historical approach that avoided supernatural explanations. For him, the key to NT study was tendency criticism (Tendenzkritik), which sought to identify and evaluate sources by discovering their basic tendencies. Baur believed that Matthew was the earliest Gospel, because of its Jewish character. Historically, John was remote from the time of Jesus. But since Matthew was written around A.D. 130, it was only relatively more historically reliable. Baur's view of Jesus was akin to that of Schleiermacher. Jesus had a unique consciousness of God. As the highest emissary of God, he mediated divine knowledge. Baur repudiated his former student, Strauss, on the grounds that he practiced criticism without undertaking adequate critical account of the Gospels. The Tübingen school enjoyed great notoriety, but membership was limited to Baur himself and a handful of disciples. Their views were too extreme for most scholars.

In the meantime, the traditional view of the priority of Matthew began to be overturned. The year that saw the appearance of Strauss's Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835) also witnessed publication in Latin of an article by Karl Lachmann, "On the Order of Narratives in the Synoptic Gospels." Lachmann's article was the first to treat seriously the order of events as the key to understanding Synoptic relationships. Lachmann saw Mark as the middle term between Matthew and Luke. It told the same basic story; Matthew and Luke deviated from Mark by adding new material, each in his own way. Lachmann's work led to the growing popularity of the view that Matthew and Luke were dependent on Mark for their common account of events.

The leading proponent of the theory of two sources behind the Synoptic tradition was Heinrich Julius Holtzmann (1832–1910). Die Synoptischen Evangelien (1863) argued that oral tradition regarding Jesus crystallized into two sources behind the Synoptic Gospels. Holtzmann called the narrative behind Matthew and Luke the "A" source, which was designated in German as Urmakus ("early Mark"). It had a primitive style of narrative and language, and it may have been based on the memories of Peter as narrated by John Mark. Later Holtzmann made Mark one of the two primary sources. The other source (now called "Q," short for Quelle ["source"]) was identified by Holtzmann as "L" (short for Logia ["sayings"]). It provided the basis of Jesus' teaching, which was free from the eschatological fanaticism that Schweitzer saw as the key to understanding Jesus. Holtzmann saw Jesus as a religious genius who in his lifetime established the kingdom of God on earth. John was not a reliable source for reconstructing Jesus' life. Like Baur, Holtzmann thought that John was shaped by later Hellenistic philosophical influences.

By the end of the nineteenth century, traditional views of the apostolic authorship and priority of Matthew and the apostolic authorship of John were supplanted by the two-source theory (Mark and Q) as the substratum for recovering the historical Jesus. This tendency was linked with discounting the miraculous and supernatural. The result was a portrait of Jesus that followed Mark's general outline while embodying moral teaching from Q.

Perhaps the most widely translated and notorious life of Jesus was the Vie de Jésus (1863), by former Catholic seminarian and rising Semitic scholar J. E. Renan (1823–1892). However, Renan's career as a professor at the Collège de France was terminated as a result of his remark that Jesus was such an incomparable human that he would not contradict those who called him God. His biography of Jesus was inspired by the ambiance of the Holy Land, which he visited in the course of an expedition to Phoenicia. It eschewed critical discussion of sources and method, seeking instead to retell the Gospel stories in a way that was credible to the modern French reader. Renan added imaginative splashes of local color to the scenes that he described, writing with the assurance of a man who had got to the bottom of things. What made Jesus the Son of God was his realization that true worship depended not upon places and ritual, but rather upon spirit and truth (Jn 4:23). Renan claimed that his Christ was rooted in "genuine history." His method was to follow closely the original narratives, discard impossibilities, sow seeds of doubt, and suggest conjectures about how events might have happened.

Strasbourg Protestant scholar T. Colani complained that Renan's Christ was not the Jesus of history, but that of the Fourth Gospel without a metaphysical halo. He set out his own views in Jesus Christ and the Messianic Beliefs of His Time (1864). Colani believed that there was no connection between the historical Jesus and Jewish messianic beliefs. The eschatological teaching attributed to Jesus in the Gospels (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 17; 21) was not authentic. Jesus had predicted the destruction of the temple, and the disciples had asked when it would occur (Mt 24:3; Mk 13:4; Lk 21:7). Jesus replied that he did not know (Mt 24:36; Mk 13:32; Lk 21:33). The so-called Little Apocalypse that comes between the question and answer was the work of overzealous, eschatologically minded Jewish Christians who could not accept Jesus' confession of ignorance. The views of neither Renan nor Colani commended themselves to Schweitzer as credible accounts of the historical Jesus.

3.3.3. Stage 3: Johannes Weiss and the Eschatological Jesus. There is something deeply paradoxical about Schweitzer's third defining moment in the course of the quest of the historical Jesus with regard to Johannes Weiss, the protagonist of the eschatological Jesus, and Schweitzer himself as his advocate. Both believed that eschatology was the key to Jesus' self-understanding, but neither actually believed in eschatology.

Johannes Weiss (1863–1914) was a member of the "History of Religions" school. The term was originally applied to a group of younger researchers at the University of Göttingen in 1890s. Theologically, they were heirs of A. B. Ritschl (1822–1889), the leading liberal theologian of his day. Methodologically, their research focused on the ancient world as the context for locating the study of Judaism and Christianity. Weiss was the son-in-law of Ritschl, and so long as Ritschl was alive, he did not publish his findings. Weiss's Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (1892; ET, 1971) was totally at variance with Ritschl's view of the kingdom as God's ethical lordship over humankind. According to Weiss, the kingdom that Jesus proclaimed was transcendent and superworldly. It belonged to the future. Jesus was a rabbi or prophet who believed that the kingdom would come after his death. He would be installed as Son of Man in the coming kingdom.

Schweitzer called his own version "thoroughgoing eschatology" (konsequente Eschatologie), insofar as he believed that Jesus proactively sought to establish the kingdom, whereas Weiss saw Jesus as more the prophet of the kingdom. It enabled him to offer the sole alternative to Wrede's skepticism, which made it possible to understand the motives and actions of the historical Jesus. It did so at the price of making the historical Jesus alien to the modern world.

3.4. Schweitzer's Jesus. Schweitzer confessed, "There is nothing more negative than the result of the critical study of the Life of Jesus" (Schweitzer 2001, 478). Critical research had totally demolished the orthodox picture of Jesus the founder of the kingdom of God who died for the sin of the world. It had also destroyed the rationalistic liberal Jesus, the preacher of the ethical kingdom of God on earth. In the knowledge that he was the coming Son of Man, Jesus laid hold of the wheel of the world. When it finally turned, it crushed him. Instead of realizing the eschatological dream, he destroyed it. However, what mattered was not the Jesus of critical research, but rather the immeasurable greatness of one who was strong enough to think of himself as "the spiritual ruler of mankind and to bend history to His purpose" (Schweitzer 2001, 369).

Terms such as "Messiah," "Son of Man" and "Son of God" survive merely as "historical parables." It is "the spirit which goes forth from Him and in the spirits of men strives for new influence and rule" that "overcomes the world." He comes to us as one unknown, without a name. But those who follow his commands for their generation will experience "Who He is." Schweitzer was in some ways the forerunner of twentieth-century demythologization: it was not Jesus' mythological program of eschatology that was important, but rather the spirit that imbued it.

Schweitzer's work did not meet with universal approval. The leading authority on the parables of Jesus, Adolf Jülicher, complained that Schweitzer was practing subjective, dogmatic criticism. The leading British authority on eschatology, R. H. Charles, refused to consider Schweitzer in the second edition of his Eschatology (1913), because he showed no first-hand knowledge of the sources and made no fresh contribution. More recently, James M. Robinson accused Schweitzer of using Matthew in a way that could be justified only by the precritical view of Matthew as an eyewitness. Schweitzer seems to have been eclectic in drawing alternately from Matthew and Mark but suppressing parts of both that did not fit his narrative, especially moral teaching that he jettisoned as an interim ethic that would be superseded in the coming kingdom.

The original ending of Schweitzer's Quest of the Historical Jesus offered a choice between the "thoroughgoing skepticism" of Wrede and Schweitzer's "thoroughgoing eschatology." In 1913 it became a choice between liberals like his mentor, Holtzmann, and Schweitzer himself. Holtzmann claimed that the historical Jesus was still relevant; Schweitzer insisted that the Jesus-cult must be replaced by Jesus-mysticism. In words that might have been taken from Lessing, Schweitzer laid down the prior essential assumption "that religion is by nature independent of any sort of history" (Schweitzer 2001, 406).

4. From Harnack to Grundmann.

This section traces developments from the liberalism of Harnack, through the great era of investigation into Jesus' world, to constructs of Jesus and Christianity under the Third Reich.

4.1. Harnack and His Critics. A bestselling book on Jesus in the early twentieth century was based on a series of public lectures at the University of Berlin on the essence of Christianity. They were delivered extempore by the great church historian Adolf Harnack (1851–1930). In English the book was entitled What Is Christianity? (1901). It eclipsed Schweitzer's book published in the same year, though this did not diminish the friendship between the two, which endured until Harnack's death.

Harnack maintained the Ritschlian tradition, depicting Jesus as a teacher whose message was summed up under three headings: the kingdom of God and its coming; God the Father and the infinite value of the soul; the higher righteousness and the commandment to love. Jesus was the appointed way to the Father. In a study of the Sayings of Jesus (ET, 1908) Harnack argued that Q conveyed the best "portrait" of Jesus, though Mark must remain "in power."

Among Harnack's severest critics were the Catholic modernists Alfred Loisy (1857–1940) and George Tyrrell (1861–1909). Harnack was the target of Loisy's book The Gospel and the Church (1902; ET, 1903). Loisy agreed that Jesus' preaching centered on the kingdom of God. "Jesus announced the kingdom of God, and what came was the church." Loisy's remark is frequently taken to imply that the church was an anticlimax. It meant, in fact, the opposite. The way for Jesus' teaching to be realized on earth was through the church. Harnack's mistake was defining the essence of Christianity in terms of returning to the Gospels. For Loisy, the procedure was like identifying a grown man by making him return to the cradle.

In Christianity at the Cross-Roads (1909) Tyrrell summed up Loisy's argument: "The Christ that Harnack sees, looking back through nineteen centuries of Catholic darkness, is only the reflection of a Liberal Protestant face, seen at the bottom of a deep well." The jibe has often been applied to attempts in general to recover the historical Jesus. However, it could be applied to any reconstruction of Jesus, including Loisy's, since every act of understanding requires the interplay of the "horizons" of the interpreter and those of the interpreter's object. What matters is sensitive, informed, critical interplay.

The most thoroughly researched and influential book on Jesus by a Jewish scholar was Jesus of Nazareth: His Life, Times, and Teachings (1922; ET, 1925), by Joseph Klausner (1874–1960). He accused Harnack of making Jesus, the historical Jew, disappear in much the same way as the early heretic Marcion had done. Klausner acknowledged Julius Wellhausen's claim that "Jesus was not a Christian but a Jew." In some respects, Jesus was "the most Jewish of the Jews." There was nothing in his teaching that could not be paralleled in the OT, the Apocrypha, and talmudic and midrashic literature. Jesus even surpassed Hillel in his positive statement of the Golden Rule. However, Judaism could not embrace Jesus, because of his indifference to the needs of Jewish national life.

4.2. The Recovery of Jesus' World. Serious attempts to recover the world of Jesus began with Emil Schürer (1844–1910). His textbook on NT background evolved into the multivolume History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (ET, 1890–1891). In time, Schürer's account of the Pharisees and his reduction of Jewish piety to two themes—life under the law and messianic hope—were seen to reflect liberal Protestant bias. Inevitably, the work became dated, though it was given new life in the form of The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.–A.D. 135) (4 vols., ed. G. Vermes, F. Miller and M. Goodman, 1973–1987).

Gustaf Dalman (1855–1941) is best known for his study of Aramaic and his research into Jesus in the context of Second Temple Judaism. The Words of Jesus (1898; ET, 1902; 2nd ed., 1930) sought to ascertain the meaning of Jesus' words as heard by Aramaic-speaking hearers. The title of Jesus-Yeshua (1922; ET, 1929) is a reminder that Jesus was not known as "Jesus" by his contemporaries, but rather as "Yeshua." Dalman claimed that Jesus knew three languages: Aramaic, his mother tongue; Greek, the language of government and trade; and Hebrew, the language of Scripture and theological discourse. An appendix contained parallels in Jewish literature to Jesus' sayings, showing their thoroughly Jewish character (see Languages of Palestine).

The Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch ("Handbook to the New Testament from Talmud and Midrash") was conceived and managed by Hermann L. Strack (1848–1922). Compilation of the material for the first four volumes was the work of Paul Billerbeck (1853–1932). The editing of further volumes was entrusted to Joachim Jeremias. The work was not strictly a commentary, but rather a compilation of more than forty thousand annotations. Jeremias maintained that the work opened up the Jewish world for nonspecialists. Critics argued that the alleged parallels could be misleading in the absence of expertise in evaluating contexts and sources. Perhaps the biggest problem was the assumption that rabbinic Judaism represented normative Judaism, in contrast to *Hellenism, Diaspora Judaism and sectarian Judaism. A project intended to replace Strack-Billerbeck has been initiated by A Comparative Handbook to the Gospel of Mark (2010), first in the series The New Testament Gospels in Their Judaic Contexts.

Most of the works noted in this section could be described as background without a portrait, since the figure of Jesus was conspicuously absent. Nevertheless, they contributed significantly to the quest of the historical Jesus. The alternative was to reconstruct a Jesus without historical religious and cultural context.

4.3. The Shadow of the Third Reich. Reconstruction of the impact of National Socialism on German theology has been largely pioneered by Jewish scholars and historians of the Holocaust (see Susannah Heschel, The Aryan Jesus: Christian Theologians and the Bible in Nazi Germany [2008]). It involves scholars who were committed members of the Nazi party and others who deplored it.

Adolf Schlatter (1852–1938) belonged to the tradition of evangelical scholarship from Luther onwards that held the Jewish nation responsible for the *death of Jesus (see Anti-Semitism). He also openly criticized Jews for the malaise that afflicted German society and the church. On the other hand, Schlatter was a passionate advocate for understanding the Jewishness of Jesus. He possessed an unrivaled command of biblical and rabbinic literature.

For Schlatter, the historical Jesus was the Christ of faith, who was to be found in the world of the text of the NT. In the preface to his commentary on Matthew (1929) he made a statement that encapsulated his understanding of the knowledge of Jesus: "It is right and proper that we read the Gospel for the sake of Jesus, for it was written for his sake. To reach Jesus we must listen to the evangelist. Were he to disappear from us, we would be severed from the course of history and left to our own imaginations. Jesus speaks to humanity through his disciples."

The scholar who merits the dubious title "the Jesus specialist of National Socialism" is Walter Grundmann (1906–1976). However, in order to see Grundmann in perspective, it is necessary to examine the work of Rudolf Otto, to whom Grundmann was indebted. Rudolf Otto (1869–1937) is remembered chiefly for his work on Das Heilige (1917; ET, The Idea of the Holy, 1923). Otto regarded the holy as a unique category, the numinous, which was a mysterium tremendum et fascinans, a mystery that inspires fear and awe and also attracts and exalts. Jesus was the embodiment of the holy. As such, he was more than a prophet; he was the Son.

In later life Otto wrote The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man (1934; 2nd ed., 1940; ET, 1938). Jesus was a Galilean itinerant charismatic preacher, healer and exorcist. Otto followed Walter Bauer in stressing the distinctive Galilean freedom from Judean attachment to the law and to Pharisaism. Instead of proclaiming judgment, Jesus preached the new age of the kingdom, which would follow the messianic woes. Jesus himself lived in the miracle of the new age, mediating through speech and parable its charismatic power. Initially he believed that the Son of Man was distinct from himself (Lk 12:8), but later he came to think that he as Son of Man must suffer to bring about the kingdom. The Last Supper was a prophetic sign of his willingness to accept this messianic obligation.

The claim that Jesus was not Jewish had numerous nineteenth-century protagonists, including the philosopher J. G. Fichte, and the biblical scholars J. E. Renan and Friedrich Delitzsch. In the Nazi period Walter Grundmann made the theory a cornerstone of his account of Jesus. Grundmann joined the National Socialists in 1930. He obtained his doctorate under Gerhard Kittel, whom he assisted in preparing his Theologisches Wörterbuch. Although he lacked the customary habilitation, he was preferred over the more qualified Günther Bornkamm for the chair of NT and völkische Theologie at Jena in 1936. Hitler himself subsequently signed his tenure. Grundmann was appointed director of research of the Institute for Investigation into Jewish Influence on German Church Life and Its Eradication, located in neighboring Eisenach.

In 1940 Grundmann published Jesus der Galiläer und das Judentum ("Jesus the Galilean and Judaism") with a view to giving an answer based on "scientific scholarship" to "inquiring Germans" on the burning question of Jesus' relationship to Judaism. Following Otto, Grundmann described Jesus as a "charismatic" who possessed an inner vision, which gave him absolute authority in his teaching and deeds. Inevitably, it brought him into conflict with the Jews. However, Jesus threw back at them their charges of impurity and of leading the people astray. It was they who opposed God and led people astray, adopting the cynical ploy of handing Jesus over to the Romans, representing him as a dangerous political messiah.

Grundmann claimed that for centuries Galilee had been separate politically and ethnically from Judea. The Galilean origin of Jesus was beyond doubt. It followed "with the greatest probability" that Jesus belonged to one of the ethnic streams that existed in Galilee. Grundmann discounted the strands in the Gospels linking Jesus' birth to Bethlehem and suggesting childhood visits to Jerusalem. He ascribed to the Palestinian Judean Christian community passages that linked Jesus with David's line. Jesus was not an earthly ruler, but rather the proclaimer of a spiritual kingdom, which was welcomed by the Hellenistic world.

In 1943 Grundmann was conscripted and served on the Russian front. At the end of the war he was released from prison camp and returned to Jena, but he was not reinstated in his chair. Eventually, he was made head of the Predigerseminar at Eisenach, and he became a leading churchman and scholar in the German Democratic Republic. His numerous writings included Die Geschichte Jesu Christi (1956; 3rd ed., 1961). This massive work introduced current scholarship to postwar readers. It avoided discussion of Grundmann's earlier book, but the conflict between the Galilean Jesus and the Judeans remained. It took the form of a clash between "the innermost concern of religion" and "the defect of late Jewish official religion," with its exaggerated demand for "cultic purity."

5. From Bousset to Bultmann and the "New Quest."

Radical German thought about the historical Jesus may be seen as a development of the History of Religions school, with Wilhelm Bousset setting the critical agenda, and Rudolf Bultmann being its last great representative. In two respects Bultmann differed from Bousset. Bultmann embraced *form criticism as he interpreted the Gospels within Bousset's history-of-religions framework. Bousset belonged to the world of liberal cultural Protestantism, whereas Bultmann combined the history of religions with dialectical theology.

5.1. Bousset. Wilhelm Bousset (1865–1920) taught at Göttingen—the birthplace of the History of Religions school—before moving to Giessen in 1916. Seminal studies on Hellenistic Judaism and gnosticism laid the foundations of Bousset's later work and that of Bultmann.

Bousset's most influential work was Kyrios Christos (1913; ET, 1970). In a foreword to the 1965 reprint Bultmann declared that its central theme was also that of NT theology: the history of belief in Christ. This evolutionary process began with the primitive Palestinian community, which venerated Jesus as the apocalyptic Son of Man. The canonical Gospels were characterized by the dogma of the Messiah, miracle stories, the messianic secret and Jesus' sacrificial death. At a later stage the title Kyrios ("Lord"), derived from the mystery cults, was bestowed on Jesus, turning him into a cult hero (see Lord).

Paul introduced Christ mysticism, which turned Jesus into a "supraterrestrial" power. Baptism became a rite of initiation into the deity. Paul's Christ-Adam typology put Christ's bestowal of the Spirit at its center. These "perilous" speculations were derived from Jewish *apocalyptic, Babylonian and Egyptian myths of the dying and rising god, and gnosticism. The Johannine circle completed the estrangement from the human Jesus of Nazareth by adopting thoroughgoing docetism. As the eternal Son of God, Jesus dispensed divine secrets and bestowed eternal life. Paul's stress on the Spirit faded from view.

5.2. Bultmann. The theology of Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) combined the tradition of the History of Religions school with the dialectical theology associated with Karl Barth.

The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921; ET, 1963) adapted Bousset's historical stratification of the NT to the oral history of Gospel material before and after it received written form. Bultmann drew on the form criticism that Hermann Gunkel had applied to the OT, and the pioneering work of Martin Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (1919), and K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (1919). Together, these writings shaped radical German scholarship for the next half-century. Instead of treating Mark as a historical portrait of Jesus, form criticism posited that Mark consisted of disconnected units of oral tradition shaped by (and sometimes created by) the "life setting" (Sitz im Leben) of the early communities.

Bultmann saw Mark as a random collector of stories, "not sufficiently master of his material to venture on a systematic construction himself." His Gospel was the first of a new literary genre, which depicted "the Christ myth" as a book of secret epiphanies. Matthew and Luke strengthened "the mythical side" by adding infancy narratives and Easter stories from sources inaccessible to Mark.

A characteristic of the Bultmann school was the criterion of double dissimilarity. Bultmann gave the following definition: "We can only count on possessing a genuine similitude of Jesus where, on the one hand, expression is given to the contrast between Jewish morality and piety and the distinctive eschatological temper which characterized the preaching of Jesus; and where on the other hand we find no specifically Christian features" (Bultmann 1963, 205). The criterion was not only an outcome of Bultmann's critical study of history; it was also the expression of his theological conviction about divine transcendence, which was linked to his dialectical theology.

Bultmann described this "distinctive eschatological temper" in Jesus (1926; ET, Jesus and the Word [1934]). Jesus was "the bearer of the word" that assures forgiveness by God. The word implies a relationship between speaker and hearer. Human beings are constrained to decision by the word, which brings a new element into their situation. The word therefore becomes to them an event; for it to become an event, the hearer is essential. This event brings eschatology into the present.

Bultmann maintained a lifelong friendship with Karl Barth. Bultmann's theology was characterized by Sachkritik ("subject criticism," or "theological criticism"), which sought to identify the Sache—the matter or essential meaning—as distinct from its form. (Barth's view may be characterized as Sachexegese ["theological exegesis"], which sought theological themes, unhampered by Bultmann's radical criticism.) Bultmann's Sachkritik "distinguishes what is said by what is meant and measures what is said by its meaning" (Bultmann 1968, 241). This understanding of the Sache of the NT formed the basis of Bultmann's identification of the cross and resurrection as the core of NT kerygma and of his program of demythologization.

Bultmann's Sachkritik was graphically outlined in his epoch-making paper on "New Testament and Mythology." The paper dates from 1941 and was published in the first volume of the series Kerygma und Mythos (1948; ET, Bartsch, 1:1-44). Bultmann was restating the view of mythology held by the History of Religions school for over half a century but drawing on dialectical theology and the categories of Heidegger's existentialist philosophy. The thought world of the NT—the three-decker universe of heaven, earth and hell, angels and demons, supernatural interventions, cosmic catastrophe, resurrection, judgment, eternal salvation and damnation—was mythological. As such, it needed to be demythologized so as to make way for the true scandal of Christianity: the message of the cross and resurrection, which alone could liberate humankind and lies beyond objectification.

Bultmann's commentary The Gospel of John (1941; ET, 1971) was a tour de force of Johannine reinterpretation. The dualism of the discourses—light and darkness, truth and falsehood, above and below, freedom and bondage—derived from gnosticism. However, John the consummate theologian (an honor that he shared with Paul) deployed these contrasts against gnosticism. The coming of the Son in judgment was not a dramatic event in the future; rather, the Son's mission was complete in the present (Jn 3:18). Bultmann's multivolume Theology of the New Testament (1948-1953; ET, 1951-1955) laid down the premise: "The message of Jesus is a presupposition for the theology of the New Testament rather than a part of that theology itself. . . . Christian faith did not exist until there was a Christian kerygma; i.e., a kerygma proclaiming Jesus Christ—specifically Jesus Christ the Crucified and Risen One—to be God's eschatological act of salvation. He was first so proclaimed in the kerygma of the earliest Church, not in the message of the historical Jesus" (Bultmann 1951-1955, 1:3).

The theme of how Jesus the proclaimer became the proclaimed dates from Bultmann's 1933 essay "The Christology of the New Testament" (ET, Bultmann 1966, 262-85). Bultmann restated his overall view in Primitive Christianity in Its Contemporary Setting (1949; ET, 1956). In his lectures at Yale and Vanderbilt Bultmann explained how the task of demythologizing and detaching faith from history was comparable to Paul's and Luther's insistence on justification by faith alone apart from works of the law (Bultmann 1960, 84).

5.3. The "New Quest." The "New Quest" of the historical Jesus was largely confined to Bultmann's former students and followers in Germany and the United States. Signs of unrest appeared in 1953 at the meeting of "Old Marburgers," when Ernst Käsemann (1906–1998) presented a paper on "The Problem of the Historical Jesus" (ET, Käsemann, 15–47). Like others who followed him in the New Quest, Käsemann protested fidelity to Bultmannian methodology and disavowed any attempt to write a biography of Jesus. Nevertheless, Käsemann feared relapse into docetism if the exalted Lord of the kerygma was detached from the humiliated Lord in history. The way forward was to discover the earthly Jesus through the kerygma.

Jesus of Nazareth (1956; ET, 1960), by Günther Bornkamm (1905–1990), was the first book on Jesus in the Bultmann school since Bultmann's study thirty years earlier. Whereas Bultmann had stressed the eschatological transcendent kerygma, Bornkamm focused on the new age already dawning through Jesus' words and actions. Although the Gospels did not provide enough information "to paint a biographical picture of Jesus," Bornkamm valued more than did Bultmann the substratum of history in the Gospels. "Quite clearly what the Gospels report concerning the message, the deeds and the history of Jesus is still distinguished by an authenticity, a freshness, and a distinctiveness not in any way effaced by the Church's Easter faith. These features point us directly to the earthly figure of Jesus" (Bornkamm, 24). On the other hand, Jesus stood out from the world of Judaism, which was like "a soil hardened and barren through its age-long history and tradition" (Bornkamm, 55–56).

The most concise, and perhaps the most negative, overview of Jesus produced in the New Quest came from Hans Conzelmann (1915–1989). It took the form of a 1959 encyclopedia article, later expanded into a booklet. Conzelmann's "Jesus Christus" was firmly based on the criterion of double dissimilarity: "Whatever fits neither into Jewish thought nor the views of the later church can be regarded as authentic" (Conzelmann, 16). Jesus moved almost exclusively within the framework of Palestinian Judaism. The oldest stratum of the Synoptic tradition showed no influence from Hellenistic ideas (Conzel-mann, 17). True to Bultmann, Conzelmann affirmed that at the heart of Jesus' teaching was "the absolute promise of salvation," which because of its unconditional nature was "the crisis of all security" (Conzelmann, 42).

Reginald H. Fuller (1915–2007) was a British scholar who came to America in the 1950s. At this stage in his career he was an enthusiastic follower of Bultmann, though the perspective of Fuller's Foundations of New Testament Theology (1965) was perhaps closer to Bousset. Fuller's method was determined by the criterion of double dissimilarity. He traced the kerygma to Jesus' self-understanding. "Jesus understood his mission in terms of eschatological prophecy and was confident of its vindication by the Son of man at the End. As eschatological prophet he was not merely announcing the future coming of salvation and judgment, but actually initiating it in his words and works" (Fuller, 130).

The most enthusiastic advocate of the New Quest was also its historian, James M. Robinson (1924–). Robinson saw his contribution as a development of Bultmann's Jesus. The Old Quest was impossible and illegitimate because Jesus of Nazareth cannot be reached by "reconstruction of his biography by means of objective historical method" (Robinson 1959, 29). Wrede had demonstrated that Mark was not writing objective history, and K. L. Schmidt had shown that the order of events in the Gospels was not based on historical memory. The tradition about Jesus "survived only in so far as it served some function in the life and worship of the primitive Church. History survived only as kerygma" (Robinson 1959, 37). On the other hand, the quest for meaningful existence gave impetus and direction for "a serious quest of the historical Jesus" (Robinson 1959, 75). Such a quest must not "dodge the call of the kerygma for existential faith in the saving event, by the attempt to provide an objectively verified proof of his historicity" (Robinson 1959, 76). Robinson expanded the argument of his original book in a reprint, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus and Other Essays (1983).

In July 1959 Bultmann responded to the New Quest in an address to the Heidelberg Academy of Sciences on "The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus" (ET, Bultmann 1964). Bultmann observed that Old Quest sought to get behind the kerygma in order to discover the historical Jesus. Today the situation was reversed. "The emphasis lies on elaborating the unity of the historical Jesus and the Christ of the kerygma" (Bultmann 1964, 15). Without the historical Jesus, there would be no kerygma. However, as Wellhausen had observed, Je-

Jesus was a Jew and not a Christian. Jesus did not demand faith in himself. The historical Jesus was the presupposition of the kerygma—the “that,” but not the “what.”

Toward the end of his address Bultmann lined up his former students and rebuked them one by one for their lack of rigor in maintaining that Jesus the proclaimer must now be the Christ who is proclaimed. Even Robinson’s efforts to demonstrate the continuity between Jesus and the kerygma blurred the difference between them so that (as R. H. Fuller clearly saw in his review of Robinson’s book) the kerygma was made unnecessary (Bultmann 1964, 39). What Bultmann faulted in the New Quest was not defective critical scholarship, but rather inconsistency regarding the dialectical significance of the kerygma of the cross and resurrection.

Bultmann’s Heidelberg address had the effect of taking the wind out of the sails of the New Quest, and the crew abandoned ship. James M. Robinson threw his prodigious energies into two enterprises. The first was his role in editing and translating the Coptic codices discovered at Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt in 1945 (The Nag Hammadi Library in English [1977; 4th ed., 1996]). The other was the International Q Project, which culminated in The Critical Edition of Q (2000), edited by Robinson and others. Robinson wrote a substantial number of studies collectively published in The Sayings Gospel Q (2005). Not only was it possible to reconstruct a Q community; it was also possible to reconstruct a Jesus behind it. “Jesus himself made no claims to lofty titles or even to divinity. Indeed to him, a devout Jew, claiming to be God would have seemed blasphemous! He claimed ‘only’ that God spoke and acted through him” (Robinson 2005, xi).

6. European Alternatives.

In the hindsight of contemporary scholarship, the criterion of double dissimilarity looks absurdly restrictive. But to those of Bultmann’s generation, who had experienced the horrors of the twentieth century, dialectical theology offered hope. It seemed not unreasonable to see institutional religion—both pre-Christian Judaism and incipient Catholic Christianity—as the product of human religiosity and to view the kerygma of the cross and resurrection in terms of the Wholly Other. To use Barth’s analogy, God’s word was like a vertical line intersecting a horizontal plane at a single point. In the meantime, alternative approaches to the historical Jesus challenged the Bultmann tradition. Among the most notable were those of Joachim Jeremias and Oscar Cullmann.

6.1. Jeremias. The most concerted attempt by a Christian scholar to locate Jesus within Judaism was made by Joachim Jeremias (1900–1979), who spent most of his career at Göttingen. Jeremias’s lecture “The Present State of the Debate about the Problem of the Historical Jesus” (1956) set out his case against Bultmann (repr., Jeremias, 1–17). Bultmann came close to surrendering the message of “the Word became flesh” to docetism and dissolving Heilsgeschichte (salvation history) into preaching. Rabbinic literature must be studied to help recover Jesus’ opposition to “the religiosity of his time.” Aramaic should be used to help identify what lies behind the Greek of the NT. The message of Jesus flowed from his conviction that God’s kingdom was about to break into history. These issues constituted Jeremias’s agenda.

Though it might not be possible to recover Jesus’ actual words, it was possible to hear his ipsissima vox, the voice of Jesus with its distinctive manner of speaking. It was characterized by (1) “Truly I say to you,” an idiom used to emphasize Jesus’ pronouncements; (2) the use of the theological passive (e.g., “Your sins are forgiven”) as a circumlocution for God’s activity through Jesus; and (3) a predilection for similitudes and parables.

The nature of Jesus’ distinctive voice occupied Jeremias in a series of pivotal works. The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (1935; 3rd ed., 1960; ET, 1966) was a major investigation of the Last Supper, which Jeremias saw as a Passover meal, in which the words of Jesus related Jesus’ death to salvation history. The Parables of Jesus (1947; 6th ed., 1962; ET, 1963) urged that the purpose of the parables was to compel hearers to come to a decision about Jesus’ person and eschatological mission. In The Prayers of Jesus (ET, 1967), Jeremias explained Jesus’ use of Abba (“Father”) as an Aramaic term of intimacy and submission, and the Lord’s Prayer as an eschatological prayer for the coming of God’s kingdom.

Issues raised by Jeremias continue to be discussed and specific interpretations challenged. However, his main contribution still stands. In an age in which dissimilarity from Judaism was regarded as a test of authenticity, Jeremias boldly reversed it, maintaining that Jesus could not be understood apart from his Jewish historical context.

6.2. Cullmann. Oscar Cullmann (1902–1999) was the last of his generation of European scholars who shaped the scholarship of his day. In Peter: Disciple, Apostle, Martyr (ET, 2nd ed., 1962) Cullmann rejected the Bultmann school’s argument that the idea of the church was incompatible with Jesus’ eschatology. The Christology of the New Testament (1957; ET, 1959) developed a functional *Christology based on the titles of Jesus, using form criticism to “arrive at Jesus’ self-consciousness.” Cullmann’s Christology was bound up with his linear view of time, outlined in Christ and Time (1946; ET, 1951; rev. ed., 1964). In opposition to Greek cyclical views and the eschatologies of Schweitzer, Bultmann and Barth, Cullmann claimed that the Hebrew view of time was linear—past, present, future. In so doing, he revived salvation history, which had been propounded by J. C. K. Hofmann in the nineteenth century. Cullmann’s last major book, Salvation in History (1965; ET, 1967), enlarged upon these views.

7. The English-Speaking World.

7.1. British Scholarship. In comparison with European scholars, British scholarship was more restrained. It was virtually ignored by Schweitzer in the first edition of his Quest of the Historical Jesus.

Inspired by a visit to the Holy Land, F. W. Farrer’s Life of Christ (1874) set the model for the rest of the century. It was filled with imaginative descriptions of places and events, but it did not tamper with orthodoxy. The most erudite British life of Jesus, written by a Viennese Jewish convert to Christianity, Alfred Edersheim, was The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1883). Edersheim’s standpoint was pre-critical orthodoxy. British critical scholarship was largely a conservative and constructive response to impulses from Europe. It was led by William Sanday (1843–1920) at Oxford and F. C. Burkitt (1864–1935) at Cambridge.

Sanday’s years at Oxford were dedicated to reconciling modern scholarship with orthodox tradition. His knowledge of German enabled him to become the leading interpreter of European scholarship of his day. His Outlines of the Life of Christ (1905) was a reprint of an encyclopedia article. A second edition (1906) contained updates on the state of scholarship. The Life of Christ in Recent Research (1907) introduced Wrede and Schweitzer to English readers. Sanday confessed that, as far as he knew, no one accepted Wrede’s reconstruction. But Schweitzer’s book was “the most striking work of its kind.” However, it was as great a mistake to explain everything in terms of eschatology as it was to treat eschatology as “a mere appendage.”

Sanday’s enthusiasm for Schweitzer waned after hearing the lectures of Ernst von Dobschütz. Meanwhile, Burkitt’s enthusiasm grew. Schweitzer’s Von Reimarus zu Wrede was translated by his former student William Montgomery, and Burkitt himself supplied an introduction. In 1910 Sanday published Christologies Ancient and Modern as a prelude to his life of Jesus. He suggested that the work of William James on the unconscious mind might provide an analogy for understanding divine immanence. Sanday returned to the topic in a brief study of Personality in Christ and in Ourselves, which he republished with Christologies Ancient and Modern in a single volume under the title Christology and Personality (1911). The “high-water mark” of human language—Paul’s words “Nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me” (Gal 2:20)—suggested an analogy of how divinity could be present in humanity. Toward the end of his life, Sanday pondered the significance for Christology of the descent of the Spirit on Jesus.

Sanday pioneered faculty seminars on the Gospels. An outcome was Studies in the Synoptic Problem (1911), the first major British treatment of the subject (see Synoptic Problem). Among writings by members of the seminar were John Hawkins’s linguistic study Horae Synopticae (1899; 2nd ed., 1909) and B. H. Streeter’s The Four Gospels (1924). The latter expanded the two-documentary source favored by most European scholars to Mark, Q, M (material in Matthew indicating a “Judaistic tendency”) and L (Lukan material combined with Q to form Proto-Luke). Streeter believed that his four-document hypothesis helped to explain a range of issues, including Luke’s reference to “many” predecessors (Lk 1:1). It broadened the basis of evidence for the “authentic teaching of Jesus.” Streeter’s book replaced Burkitt’s The Gospel History and Its Transmission (1906) as the standard British textbook.

Burkitt contended that the apocalyptic vision was “no mere embroidery of Christianity.” Eschatology challenged the world and its priorities. However, Burkitt’s Jesus was not the Jesus of Schweitzer’s “thoroughgoing eschatology.” Jesus could not wholly be explained. In Jesus Christ: An Historical Outline (1932) Burkitt urged that the burden of Mark 13 was to watch and wait. The resurrection of Jesus was “a well-attested fact” in the sense that those who shared Peter’s experience were convinced that Jesus was alive again. In his last years, Burkitt brushed aside form criticism. He had no time for the theory of Jesus’ words and deeds as the product of communal imagination. Tradition rested upon historical reminiscence going back to Peter, Mark and Q.

C. H. Dodd (1884–1972) began his academic career at Oxford, where he also spent his retirement. Dodd taught at Mansfield College, Oxford, before becoming Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism at Manchester (1930). He succeeded Burkitt at Cambridge (1935), retiring in 1949. His book The Parables of the Kingdom (1935; revised, 1961) proposed “realized eschatology” in reply to Schweitzer’s “thoroughgoing eschatology.” While Jesus employed apocalyptic symbolism to express the divine dimension, his parables show that the kingdom—the reign of God—had already become a reality. Subsequently, Dodd redefined his position: the eschaton had dawned with Jesus, but it was also “in process of realization.”

In History and the Gospel (1938; rev. ed., 1964) Dodd responded to the negative form criticism of the Bultmann school. He drew attention to the fact that singly attested material taken from different forms and genres portrayed Jesus as “an historical personality distinguished from other historical personalities of His time by His friendly attitude to outcasts and sinners” (Dodd 1964, 66). This convergence of strands anticipated what Gerd Theissen would call “cross-section evidence.”

In retirement Dodd published two major works on John. The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953) explored John against its background and discussed main themes. Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (1963) argued that the tradition underlying John was ancient and independent of the Synoptic tradition. Dodd’s final book, The Founder of Christianity (1970), challenged the skepticism of the New Quest and urged renewed study of the historical Jesus. The Gospels included remembered and interpreted facts. The resurrection faith of the church was based on genuine memory of the empty tomb.

T. W. Manson (1893–1958) followed in the footsteps of Dodd but by no means was overshadowed by him. He succeeded Dodd at Mansfield College and later at Manchester University, when Dodd went to Cambridge. In The Teaching of Jesus (1931) Manson proposed an interpretation of the Son of Man that radically challenged the German tradition. The Son of Man was the final term in an OT series including the remnant of Isaiah, the *Servant of Yahweh in Deutero-Isaiah, the “I” of the psalmists, and the Son of Man in Daniel 7, all of which were collective embodiments of “the Remnant idea.” Unlike German scholars who identified the Son of Man as an apocalyptic figure based on eschatological expectation (1 En. 37–41), Manson saw no difficulty in tracing the concept to Jesus’ application of Daniel 7:13. Manson recognized that in some instances the term could simply mean “that man,” “a certain man,” or “I.” However, some passages, such as Luke 9:58 and Matthew 8:20, suggested a more specific meaning. This sense was indicated in sayings after Peter’s confession. Just as the Son of Man in Daniel 7 indicated corporate identity, so the passion predication about the Son of Man carried the implication that, together, Jesus and his followers were called to service and self-sacrifice in the redemptive purposes of God (Mk 10:45). Initially the disciples embraced this calling. But at the Last Supper Judas deserted. In Gethsemane the remaining disciples fell away (Mk 14:26–31, 50; Lk 22:31–34). Jesus was left alone to suffer as the Son of Man.

In response to form criticism, Manson remarked that a story that could have a Sitz im Leben in the life of the church should not automatically be excluded from also having a Sitz im Leben in the life of Jesus. His response to Bultmann and Schweitzer was summarized in “The Life of Jesus: Some Tendencies in Present-Day Research” (Manson 1964), his contribution to a Festschrift for Dodd.

Form criticism, as the study of units of narrative and teaching, was in itself “interesting but not epoch-making.” But it got mixed up with two dubious assumptions. One was that the first generation of Christians were not interested in the life of Jesus, and only some thirty years later did they become suddenly fascinated. Then the life of Jesus had to be created out of nothing. The other assumption was that Gospel incidents and sayings were remembered in detail apart from their original context. Manson contended that episodes are typically remembered in conjunction with their historical context.

Schweitzer’s reconstruction exhibited two flaws: his interpretation, especially of Matthew, was uncritical; and his Jesus was “a deluded fanatic.” Manson endorsed Burkitt’s view that Jesus changed eschatology, not by “spiritualizing” it but rather by transforming it through his own ministry as a “prologue.”

In some respects, Manson anticipated the criterion of double similarity and double dissimilarity. Terms such as “messiah” and “kingdom” were used in ways that were similar to but dissimilar from their meaning in Judaism. Their use in the Gospels was not identical with subsequent Christian use but served to explain the origin of the church. This meant that there was no escape from historical enquiry, but also that there was no need to be despondent about its prospects.

Vincent Taylor (1887–1968) devoted his career to the dual role of training ministers for the Methodist Church and explaining scholarship to the wider public. The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (1933; 2nd ed., 1935) remains one of the best and balanced introductions to form criticism. It showed that it need not follow the negative direction taken by Bultmann, and it introduced other form critics besides Bultmann and Dibelius. Taylor wrote two trilogies relating to the historical Jesus. The first considered his death: Jesus and His Sacrifice (1937); The Atonement in New Testament Teaching (1940; 3rd ed., 1958); Forgiveness and Reconciliation (1941). The second trilogy was devoted to his life: The Names of Jesus (1953); The Life and Ministry of Jesus (1954); The Person of Christ in New Testament Teaching (1958). Both trilogies were works of survey and synthesis. Taylor's crowning achievement was his commentary on Mark (1952; 2nd ed., 1966), which remains unmatched as an encyclopedic resource.

The traditions of British NT scholarship initiated by Sanday and Burkitt, and carried forward by Dodd and Manson, were carried further by C. F. D. Moule, A. E. Harvey, John A. T. Robinson and, somewhat idiosyncratically, Austin Farrer. C. F. D. Moule (1908–2007) was educated at Cambridge, where he spent his academic life. Moule's The Origin of Christology (1970) rejected the tradition of Bousset and Bultmann that insisted on evolutionary Christology, culminating in the deification of Jesus. Moule proposed a developmental process beginning with "four well-known descriptions of Jesus": Son of Man, Son of God, Christ, and Kyrios. In his Bampton Lectures at Oxford A. E. Harvey approached the Jesus of the Gospels from the standpoint of the historical constraints imposed upon him (Jesus and the Constraints of History [1982]). The NT studies done by John A. T. Robinson (1919–1983) revealed an inquiring mind that was not afraid to adopt radical conclusions, even if they happened to be unfashionably conservative. Redating the New Testament (1976) argued that no hard data precluded the composition of the NT before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, whereas The Priority of John claimed that, historically and theologically, John was first among equals.

7.2. North American Scholarship. The history of theological scholarship in America mirrored that of America at large. For a long time it lagged behind Europe, to which it looked for leadership. In the field of Jesus studies it was not until well into the twentieth century that America began to gain independence.

B. B. Warfield (1851–1921) taught systematic theology at Princeton Theological Seminary from 1887 until his death. At the time, the seminary was a bastion of Calvinistic orthodoxy. Like his predecessors, Warfield went to Germany to complete his education. Many of his writings were reprinted posthumously in ten volumes (1927–1932). Christology and Criticism (1929) and Critical Reviews (1932) kept readers abreast of European scholarship. They gave the impression that every new critical idea contained something profoundly wrong. At the heart of Warfield's criticism was his steadfast belief in the "two natures" formula of Chalcedon as the key to the complicated locks of the NT. It authenticated the "Great Reality" of Christology.

For Warfield's contemporary B. W. Bacon (1860–1932), at Yale, the key was higher criticism. Bacon was an early exponent of the two-source theory of the Synoptic Gospels. His Studies in Matthew (1930) saw Jesus as a new Moses, the giver of a new law, modeled after the five books of Moses. To Bacon, Matthew was a legalist who missed the essential point of Jesus' sympathy with prophetic protests against the law.

At the University of Chicago Shailer Mathews (1863–1941) advocated sociological interpretation in The Social Teachings of Jesus (1897) and Jesus and Social Institutions (1928). Mathews credited his revolutionary portrait of Jesus not to the study of Second Temple Judaism, but rather to his work on the French Revolution.

Whereas Mathews progressed from conservatism to liberalism, Shirley Jackson Case (1872–1947) described himself as "born a liberal." Case's first book, The Historicity of Jesus (1912), anticipated what was later called the "criterion of double similarity and double dissimilarity." Jesus fitted into the Jewish world, but his message of God's saving presence made him distinct. Contemporary Christian faith could not be detached from the historical Jesus. Jesus: A New Biography (1927) paid attention to literary criticism, social orientation and form criticism. Other members of the Chicago school included Clyde Weber Votaw (1864–1940), who identified the Gospels as forms of ancient biography. Edgar J. Goodspeed (1871–1962) is remembered for his translation work and his Life of Jesus (1950). Goodspeed did for American readers what Renan did for French readers nearly a century earlier, only without the offensive agnostic overtones. He retold the familiar story, without critical apparatus, using imagination to fill in the gaps.

Chester C. McCown (1877–1958) was a product of the Chicago school who spent his professional career at the Pacific School of Religion. The Search for the Real Jesus (1940) followed in the footsteps of Schweitzer, but beginning with Strauss and Baur, and telling the story from the standpoint of the social gospel. The kingdom of God was not merely an internal state of moral goodness and spiritual happiness, but rather "a society ruled by the divine will."

The most respected NT scholar at Harvard was

Henry J. Cadbury (1883–1974), who wrote three books on Jesus. The best known of the three was The Peril of Modernizing Jesus (1937). Today modernization is sometimes called “contextualization,” but to Cadbury, the more Jesus was depicted in terms of another culture, the more removed he was from his own. The process of modernizing Jesus began in the early church. The Gospels give at best a selection of sayings and events. Modern predilections were prone to dismiss elements such as apocalyptic language and miracles, even though they were embedded in historical tradition. Interpreters were also apt to fill in gaps by attributing to Jesus their own outlook. Jesus: What Manner of Man? (1947) was intended as a “more positive” book, focusing on Jesus’ “habits of thought and argument.” It addressed questions such as wisdom, parables and authority. In the end, Jesus was, like every personality, “an enigma.” The Eclipse of the Historical Jesus (1964) contains reflections on the quest of the historical Jesus. Much of the quest was “wishful thinking,” assuming that Jesus shared a modern mindset. Cadbury’s own contribution remained like sketches prepared for a portrait that was never painted.

Leander E. Keck (1928–) devoted an entire book to the question of A Future for the Historical Jesus (1971). In the 1970s he edited a series, largely reedited reprints, of lives of Jesus. His aim was to encourage fresh discovery and lively debate with classic tradition, in order to enrich and make more precise the contemporary debate. The series ranged widely with editions of Reimarus, Strauss, Schleiermacher, Strauss’s critique of Schleiermacher, Weiss, Loisy, Herrmann and Mathews. In his running debate with Bornkamm, Keck urged that Bornkamm needed not praise but reappraisal (cf. Dieter Lührmann, “Bornkamm’s Response to Keck Revisited”). The historical Jesus was “the parable of God.” The future should begin with the past—Jesus’ Jewish past, as Keck explained in Who Is Jesus? History in Perfect Tense (2001).

8. The Ongoing Quest.

The closing quarter of the twentieth century saw increasing globalization of Jesus research. Among the factors were jet travel, multinational publishing, the Internet, academic guilds—notably the Society of Biblical Literature and the Society for New Testament Studies—and focus on specialized topics that transcended national boundaries. In previous ages the quest of the historical Jesus was more or less a Protestant pursuit. Starting in the 1970s, Jewish and Catholic perspectives came increasingly to the fore.

8.1. Wright and the “Third Quest.” The scholar most closely linked with the Third Quest is N. T. Wright (1948–). Wright’s prodigious writings include shorter books on the historical Jesus and a monumental series (still in progress), Christian Origins and the Question of God. The series includes The New Testament and the People of God (1992), Jesus and the Victory of God (1996) and The Resurrection of the Son of God (2003). Helpful roadmaps and responses include essays collected in Jesus and the Restoration of Israel (1999 [edited by C. Newman]) and in Jesus, Paul and the People of God (2011 [edited by N. Perrin and R. B. Hayes]). Wright described his approach as “critical realism”—a process of knowing that acknowledges “the reality of the thing known, as something other than the knower” and gains access to this reality along “the spiralling path of appropriate dialogue or conversation between the knower and the thing known” (Wright 1992, 135).

In contrast to the Bultmann school’s criterion of double dissimilarity, which insisted that the authentic Jesus was dissimilar to both the religion of Judaism and post-Easter Christian expressions of faith, Wright proposed a criterion of double dissimilarity and double similarity. “Along with the much-discussed ‘criterion of dissimilarity’ must go a criterion of double similarity: when something can be seen to be credible (though perhaps deeply subversive) within first-century Judaism, and credible as the implied starting-point (though not the exact replica) of something in later Christianity, there is a strong possibility of our being in touch with the genuine history of Jesus” (Wright 1996, 132).

Wright’s reconstruction identified the overarching theme of biblical history as *exile and restoration. Although Judeans had returned from exile in Babylon, and the Jerusalem temple had been rebuilt, many felt that Israel’s God had not returned. The hope of the prophets remained unfulfilled. Israel was in a state of continuing exile (Wright 1992, 268–72). Hope centered on a new exodus and the establishment of God’s kingdom on earth (Wright 1996, 202–14). Within this framework Jesus assumed the “profile of a prophet” who announced the advent of God’s kingdom, with Jesus’ life and teaching understood as the reenactment of “the central drama” of Israel. “The real return from exile, including the real resurrection from the dead, is taking place, in an extremely paradoxical fashion, in Jesus’ own ministry” (Wright 1996, 127).

Despite Wright’s wide learning, his strongest critics suspect that F. C. Baur’s verdict on his former pupil Strauss might also apply to Wright: he has undertaken a critique of Gospel history, without critique of the Gospels. They see Jesus and the Victory of God as a vast precritical harmonization of the Gospels, based largely on an eclectic reading of the Synoptic Gospels to the neglect of John, without due examination of the narrative features of Matthew, Mark and Luke.

8.2. Crossan and the Jesus Seminar. The Jesus Seminar in America was broadly contemporary with N. T. Wright and the Third Quest in Britain. It was launched in California by Robert Funk's Weststar Institute in 1985. Whereas Wright proposed new methodology stressing Jesus as the climax of Jewish history, the Jesus Seminar applied traditional critical methodologies with renewed vigor.

The leading members of the Jesus Seminar were its cochair, Robert W. Funk (1926–2005) and John Dominic Crossan (1934–). From the outset, the Jesus Seminar assumed major discrepancies between the historical figure of Jesus and representations of him in American religion and the canonical Gospels. The Jesus Seminar's quest was a search for reliable, recoverable data as a basis for understanding Jesus as he really was (Funk 2001).

The Jesus Seminar published papers and interim reports through its academic journal, Forum: Foundations & Facets, culminating in The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (1993 [edited by R. W. Funk and R. W. Hoover]) and The Acts of Jesus: The Search for the Authentic Deeds of Jesus (1998 [edited by R. W. Funk]). In speaking of five Gospels, the Jesus Seminar deliberately included the Gospel of Thomas alongside the NT Gospels, thereby relativizing the concept of canonicity (see Canon). Borrowing from the old practice of printing Bibles with the words of Jesus in red, the Jesus Seminar followed a color scheme used in casting votes for identifying degrees of authenticity: red (Jesus very probably said or did this); pink (Jesus probably said or did this); gray (Jesus probably did not say or do this, or at least no firm judgment was possible); black (Jesus very probably did not say or do this).

The portrait of Jesus that emerged was that of an itinerant sage and healer who broke with dogma and convention. His conception was a normal human one. Jesus preached not apocalyptic eschatology about the end of the world, but rather social-political liberation through subversive parables, aphorisms and praxis.

The publication of his book The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (1991) coincided with Crossan's tenure at the Jesus Seminar and laid the foundation for subsequent writings. He described his approach as a triple process that moved from the general to the particular. It was like a military operation that involved campaign, strategy and tactics. The campaign consisted of an analysis of the socioeconomic world in which Jesus lived—life in a remote Mediterranean corner of the Roman Empire under the Pax Romana. Strategy involved compiling an inventory of canonical and extracanonical texts, arranged according to chronology and independent attestation. Finally, tactics involved interpretation of the Roman colonization of the Mediterranean world. Jesus was a Mediterranean peasant philosopher, dedicated to subverting Roman subjugation through his itinerancy—"a symbolic representation of unbrokered egalitarianism."

Crossan's Jesus turned out to be a composite figure that combined the aphoristic teaching and lifestyle of Hellenistic Cynicism with Jewish magic. But Cynics do not appear to have practiced magic, and Jewish magicians do not seem to have been attracted to Cynicism. Current research has not uncovered conclusive evidence of Cynic activity in Galilee in Jesus' day. Moreover, Crossan paid scant attention to what orthodox Jews thought that they should do to magicians and those who led the people astray.

Methodologically, Crossan's databases represent a sophisticated form of source criticism in which multiple attestation and chronological stratification determine the value of sources. However, it has not stood up to close scrutiny. Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter draw attention to methodological flaws in Crossan's insistence upon the criterion of multiple attestation (Theissen and Winter, 238–39). On the one hand, Crossan's insistence on the inclusion of noncanonical texts (see Gospels: Apocryphal), in which primacy was allocated to the noneschatological, virtually ensures that he ends up with a non-eschatological Jesus. On the other hand, multiple attestation is a weaker criterion than cross-section evidence and resistance to tendencies of the tradition in singly attested material in diverse traditions, which preserve comparable and converging pictures of Jesus. Inevitably, Crossan's source-critical method ignored the tendencies of texts and thereby made little or no use of literary criticism in discerning their character. It paid scant attention to the religious and social aspects of texts and their explanatory power to illuminate incidents and sayings, which in turn might suggest conceivable historical contexts in the world of Second Temple Judaism.

The most probing critique of the Jesus Seminar, and by extension of its cochair Crossan, was written by Birger Pearson: "The Gospel According to the 'Jesus Seminar': On Some Recent Trends in Gospel Research" (reprinted in the 1997 collection of his essays, The Emergence of the Christian Religion). Pearson concluded, "The Jesus of the Jesus Seminar is a non-Jewish Jesus. To put it metaphorically, the seminar has performed a sneak epispasm on the historical Jesus, the surgical procedure removing the marks of circumcision. . . . The ideology driving the Jesus Seminar is, I would argue, one of 'secularization'" (Pearson, 56-57).

Crossan's later writings seem no longer to depend on the elaborate methodology of The Historical Jesus. The portrait of Jesus as a homespun Galilean Cynic philosopher appears to have faded. What remains is a Jesus pitted against Rome (God and Empire, 2007).

8.3. The Quest for the Political Jesus. Interest in Jewish life in the Second Temple period gained impetus through the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in the late 1940s. Focus on the political struggle against Roman oppression received indirect stimulus from the climate of the post-World War II situation: growing awareness of the Holocaust, tensions of the Cold War, liberation movements in the Third World, and the creation of Israel as an independent state in 1948. Israeli struggle for independent nationhood invited comparison with previous liberation movements. The Masada excavations of the 1960s drew attention to anti-Roman freedom fighters and martyrs. This section focuses on two issues: (1) Zealots; (2) Jesus and politics.

8.3.1. The Zealots. The dissertation of William R. Farmer on Maccabees, Zealots, and Josephus (1956) pioneered investigation into Jewish nationalism and raised the question of Jesus' links with it. Subsequent debate about the Zealot movement centered on the 1961 dissertation by Martin Hengel (1926-2009), the foremost European authority on Christian origins in the context of Judaism and Hellenism: The Zealots: Investigations into the Jewish Freedom Movement in the Period from Herod I Until 70 A.D. (1961; ET, 1989).

*Josephus described as "so-called zealots" a faction that committed gross atrocities as it seized power during the winter of A.D. 66-67 (J.W. 2.651; 4.161; 7.268-270) (see Hengel 1989, xiii-xv, 380-404) (see Revolutionary Movements). Josephus's phraseology raised the question of whether they were a new group of freedom fighters known as Zealots, or whether their roots reached back to the Maccabees. A tradition of scholarship in America from Kirsopp Lake to Morton Smith and Richard A. Horsley took Josephus's statements to mean that the Zealots were of recent origin (see Horsley 1986). Horsley went on to reconceive Jewish history from Jesus to the war with Rome as a mounting spiral of violence resulting from exploitation of the masses, popular protest, and severe repression leading to open revolt when the situation became intolerable. Horsley formulated a reply to Hengel in Jesus and the Spiral of Violence (1987).

Accordingly, the Zealots should be seen not as a "foil" for Jesus' activity, but rather as a violent faction in the war's final stages. Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom called for peaceful social revolution in village life: egalitarian family relations, cancellation of debts, reconciliation with enemies. It was intended to prepare for the kingdom of God, which would break the spiral of violence and end the established order.

European scholarship tended to side with Hengel in seeing violence and the Zealot movement as related factors, which periodically surfaced from the Maccabees to the war with Rome. They grew out of the religious tradition regarding the sacredness of the land, which belonged to Yahweh, who granted Israel the sovereign right to inhabit it as sojourners (Lev 25:33). This conviction lay at the heart of *Jubilee Year theology. The land of Israel was not to be profaned. The violent priest Phinehas was honored as the prototype of zeal for Yahweh (Num 25:6-13; 1 Chron 9:20; Ps 106:2-30; 1 Macc 2:24-26) (see Hengel 1989, 146-228).

The Zealot motif and the role of politics was taken further by G. S. F. Brandon (1901-1971) in The Fall of Jerusalem and the Christian Church (1951), Jesus and the Zealots (1967) and The Trial of Jesus (1968). He argued that although Jesus himself may not have been a Zealot, he was far more political than Christian tradition made him out to be. The connections of Simon with the Zealot movement and the political context of Jesus' death were indisputable. Moreover, early Christians were like Josephus in their desire to dissociate themselves from extreme Jewish nationalism. Mark transferred responsibility for the crucifixion from the Roman to the Jewish authorities. Mark's portrait of an apolitical Jesus was changed by Matthew and Luke into a "pacific Christ" for their respective churches. John portrayed Jesus as "insulated from the political unrest" that agitated Jewish society (see Trial of Jesus).

A sociological perspective was introduced by Gerd Theissen (1943-). Theissen's brilliant experiment in Wirkungsgeschichte (the study of historical effects), The Shadow of the Galilean: The Quest of the Historical Jesus in Narrative Form (ET, 1987; updated, 2007), took the form of a historical novel. Some of the characters, such as the narrator—a young, traveling grain merchant based in Sepphoris—were fictional. Others, such as Pontius Pilate and Barabbas, were historical characters woven into a fictional narrative in which Jesus himself did not actually appear. However, Theissen's endnotes meticulously document the factual basis of the story's setting.

Theissen's earlier programmatic essay Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (ET, 1978) followed a more conventional format. The Jesus movement began in Palestine as a band of "wandering charismatics" proclaiming the imminent rule of God. It met with failure within Judaism, but it achieved success in the local communities of the Hellenistic world. In The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition (ET, 1991) Theissen applied sociology to form criticism in the formation of the Synoptic tradition. The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, by Theissen and Annette Merz (ET, 1998), is an authoritative guide to issues.

8.3.2. Jesus and Politics. All too often studies of this question give the impression that politics and religion in first-century A.D. Judaism could be understood in terms of the Age of Enlightenment's separation of church and state. It would be nearer the mark to say that every political issue had a religious dimension. Jesus' stance was apolitical political, insofar as he does not appear to have aligned himself to any particular movement, ideology or the bellicose sections of the Torah. Nevertheless, his teaching and praxis had political ramifications.

Modern appraisals include Oscar Cullmann's Jesus and the Revolutionaries (ET, 1970) and Alan Richardson's The Political Christ (1973). Martin Hengel supplemented his work The Zealots by a series of short studies that included Was Jesus a Revolutionary? (ET, 1971), Victory over Violence (ET, 1973) and Christ and Power (ET, 1977). Jesus' action in the temple was a token, prophetic sign. In view of the proximity of the Antonia fortress overlooking the temple, Jesus would have needed an army if he had intended to launch a political coup. If the Romans had seen it as more than a religious commotion, they could easily have intervened. In the event, it was the religious authorities that planned to arrest Jesus (Mk 12:12).

A number of scholars—most notably Mennonite theologian and Notre Dame ethics professor John Howard Yoder (1927–1997) in his book The Politics of Jesus: Vincit Agnus Noster (1972; 2nd ed., 1994)—have identified the Jubilee Year as the key to Jesus' program. Yoder claimed that Jesus' agenda was shaped by his resolve to implement the Jubilee Year, and that Luke in particular highlighted this interpretation.

Jesus' reading from Isaiah 61:1–2 (Lk 4:18–19) in the *synagogue at Galilee marked the inception of the Jubilee Year as "the year of the Lord's favor." Yoder saw Jesus' teaching about forgiveness, especially the petition about forgiving debts in the Lord's Prayer, as implementation of the ordinances of Leviticus 25. Captives would be released. Jesus' exhortations not to be anxious about food or clothing were encouragement to trust in a year when there would be no repayments of debt, seedtime or harvest. Yoder's interpretation was attractive but problematic. Luke does not mention the Jubilee explicitly, and Jubilee Year terminology does not appear in the NT. The proclamation of release to the captives in Luke 4:18–19, with reference to Isaiah 61, fits better the exile theology discussed in 8.1 above.

The most comprehensive review of issues and exegetical questions remains Jesus and the Politics of His Day (1984 [edited by Ernst Bammel and C. F. D. Moule]). However, the vigorous debate continues. Marcus J. Borg argued that the key issue was one of paradigms (Conflict, Holiness, and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus [1984; 2nd ed., 1998]). Differences between Jesus and his adversaries centered on orthopraxis. For the Pharisees, the dominant paradigm was holiness; for Jesus, it was justice, mercy and faithfulness. Klaus Berger, in his Novum Testamentum article "Jesus als Pharisäer und frühe Christen als Pharisäer" (1988), traced the conflict to different concepts of purity. The Pharisees' attitude was essentially "defensive": avoiding contact with whatever was contaminated and following the prescribed rituals of the Torah when contact was unavoidable (see Clean and Unclean). For Jesus, holiness was "offensive." In virtue of his anointing by the Spirit, Jesus made the impure pure, the common holy, and the excluded included.

8.4. The Quest for Jesus the Jew. In an early account of the Third Quest, N. T. Wright identified as leading proponents two senior colleagues at Oxford, Geza Vermes and E. P. Sanders (Neill and Wright, 379–96). Both approached their subject as historians, and both stressed Jesus' fundamental Jewishness. Both appeared to meet Wright's criterion of double similarity and double dissimilarity. But even then, Vermes, Sanders and Wright seemed to be going in different directions. Donald A. Hagner's The Jewish Reclamation of Jesus (1984) remains unsurpassed as an analysis of twentieth-century Jewish scholarship. This section is devoted to highlighting the diversity of contemporary accounts of the Jewishness of Jesus in Jewish and non-Jewish scholarship.

8.4.1. Jewish Scholarship. Geza Vermes (1924–

2013) was born in Hungary of a Jewish family, which converted to Catholicism in the 1930s. His parents perished in the Holocaust. Vermes himself became a Catholic priest and obtained a doctorate for work on the Dead Sea Scrolls. He came to England, where he taught at the University of Newcastle, before moving to Oxford, where he became the first Professor of Jewish Studies.

In Jesus the Jew (1973; 2nd ed., 1981) Vermes contended that the Jesus of history was neither the Christ of the Christian church nor the apostate villain of Jewish legend. Rather, he fitted the profile of the holy man (Hasid) and “man of deed” (miracle-worker). This profile was shaped by Honi the Rain-Maker (d. 65 B.C.), who was reputed to have drawn a circle that he refused to leave until God gave rain (m. Ta’an. 3:8). Even more important was Jesus’ younger contemporary, the Galilean charismatic Hanina ben Dosa (58–82), whose story was modeled on the miracle-working prophets Elijah and Elisha. Tradition portrayed Hanina ben Dosa as a man of prayer, renowned for successfully interceding for the sick, even at a distance, and helping the needy. However, Jesus was “second to none in profundity of insight and grandeur of character” (Vermes 1973, 224).

Vermes’s Jesus the Jew was followed by Jesus and the World of Judaism (1983; 2nd ed., 2003, published as Jesus in His Jewish Context) and The Religion of Jesus the Jew (1993). Together, the books form a trilogy representing not a scholarly consensus or comprehensive engagement with other scholars, but rather “one man’s reading of the Synoptic Gospels.” These sources “to some extent at least, recount history” in reporting “the life and message of Jesus” and were “unaffected by accretions deriving from the creative imagination of nascent Christianity.” However, the resurrection and the parousia were attributable to the doctrinal and apologetic needs of the early church (Vermes 2003, 23).

Paula Fredriksen (1951–) is often associated with Vermes as the two foremost twentieth-century Jewish interpreters of Jesus in the English-speaking world. However, one fundamental difference is immediately apparent. Vermes’s Jesus was a Galilean charismatic on the margins of Judaism; Fredriksen’s Jesus stood in the mainstream of orthodoxy, albeit with apocalyptic expectations of the kind associated with E. P. Sanders and Albert Schweitzer.

In From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of the New Testament Images of Jesus (1988; 2nd ed., 2000) Fredriksen traced the evolution of Christology from Jesus’ preaching about the coming kingdom of God. Jesus went to Jerusalem to celebrate Passover. The enthusiastic crowds may have hailed him as “the messiah.” “Proceeding to the Temple, Jesus then pronounced the nearness of the End through a prophetic gesture. Overturning tables in the outer court, he symbolically enacted the impending destruction of Herod’s temple, soon to be replaced by the eschatological Temple of God. . . . What Jesus hoped would be the final Passover of the world turned out, instead, to be the last for him” (Fredriksen 1988, 129–30).

Fredriksen enlarged this sketch in Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity (1999). Most contemporary scholars are guarded in their use of the Fourth Gospel as a historical source and follow Mark in placing Jesus’ action in the temple at the climax of his activity. However, Fredriksen felt free to give equal weight to John, who indicated that much of Jesus’ activity took place in Jerusalem (cf. Jn 2:13, 23; 4:45; 5:1–2; 7:25; 10:22; 11:18, 55; 12:18) (Fredriksen 2000, 237–41). Pontius Pilate must have known that Jesus was harmless. However, Pilate’s politics allowed him to sanction Jesus’ death. But why?

Fredriksen operated on the principle “where the evidence thins, we must speculate” (Fredriksen 2000, 254). “Perhaps Caiaphas said something to Pilate like, ‘You know about the rumor spreading this week that Jesus of Nazareth is messiah. Some people actually expect him to reveal himself this Passover. The crowd seems restless’” (Fredriksen 2000, 254). Pilate knew what to do. He arrested Jesus by stealth at night, reasoning, “Let them wake up to their messiah already on a cross the next morning. Killing Jesus publicly, by crucifixion, would go a long way toward disabusing the crowd. Let him hang indicted by their own belief: KING OF THE JEWS. A nice touch—an insult to the idea itself as well as to their convictions” (Fredriksen 2000, 254). Alternatively, perhaps it was Caiaphas himself who decided that Jesus’ death was the only way to put an end to the wild hopes growing among the city’s pilgrims.

In retrospect, Fredriksen’s speculations belong more to the realm of the historical novel than critical history, especially regarding the personalities involved in the death of Jesus. She glossed over the deep divisions between Jesus and the Judeans in both the Synoptic Gospels and John (see C. Brown 2011d).

David Flusser (1917–2000) was preeminent in the world of Second Temple scholarship. Flusser’s thoughts about the historical Jesus were distilled in a short book that underwent revision over the years. Jesus first appeared in German (ET, 1968; reissued as The Sage from Galilee: Rediscovering Jesus’ Genius [2007]). Flusser viewed Jesus as a Pharisee in the broad sense, somewhat close to the school of Hillel, but also as a charismatic who clashed with the Pharisees over their attachment to institutional Judaism. It was not the Pharisees, but rather the *Sadducees, led by Caiaphas the Sadducean high priest, who handed Jesus over to Pilate for execution. As a rule, Jesus did not heal non-Jews; in fact, the Synoptic picture shows Jesus as a Jew who worked only among Jews.

8.4.2. Non-Jewish Scholarship. One of the most bracing and provocative twentieth-century attempts to situate Jesus in his historical context was E. P. Sanders's Jesus and Judaism (1985).

In Paul and Palestinian Judaism (1977) Sanders laid out the direction of his future thought. He broke with the traditional Protestant view that Paul's theology was essentially a condemnation of Pharisaic legalism. Jewish belief could be described as covenantal nomism: membership of the people of God was constituted by the covenant with Abraham and maintained by keeping the law. Paul taught participationist eschatology: "In Christ one dies to the power of sin, and does not just have trespasses atoned for" (Sanders 1977, 465). Christ was the means of entering God's covenant people.

Sanders's Jesus and Judaism depicted Jesus as an observant Jew whose action in the temple was a prophetic sign of a new temple and the restoration of Israel. If Jesus occasionally seemed to relativize the law, it was because of his sense of living at the turn of the ages, which suggested that the Mosaic law was not final and absolute (Sanders 1985, 261). Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah (1990) defended Sanders's earlier contention that Jesus' attitude toward the law on a variety of issues from Sabbath to fasting was fundamentally orthodox. The book's central themes were "common Judaism," identified by commitments ranging from the role of the temple to the future hope of Israel, and "groups and parties," which focused on Sadducees, Essenes and Pharisees. The Historical Figure of Jesus (1993) was a less technical book, designed for more general readers.

As with his work on Paul, Sanders saw the Gospel narratives about Jesus as solutions, which posed the problem of identifying the questions. Again the result was covenantal nomism and restoration eschatology (Sanders 1985, 335-37). Sanders described himself as "a liberal, modern, secularized Protestant" who could no longer defend the Christology or social gospel of his upbringing (Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 334). In retrospect, Sanders's Jesus looked very much like the Jesus of Albert Schweitzer: a Jesus who expected the advent of God's kingdom as a result of his actions. However, Sanders protested that Schweitzer's view rested on dubious exegesis. It lacked the backing of the "restoration eschatology" that Sanders inferred from his "more or less undisputed facts" (Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 328-30). What Schweitzer and Sanders had in common was the sad conclusion that Jesus was profoundly mistaken. In neither case did the kingdom come, as expected. A new Jerusalem temple did not replace the old temple.

Bruce Chilton's work at Cambridge on the kingdom of God was published as God in Strength: Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom (1979; repr., 1987). It was followed by his edition of articles in The Kingdom of God (1984). Study of the Targumim—oral Aramaic paraphrases of Scripture in synagogue worship—led to The Glory of Israel: The Theology and Provenance of the Isaiah Targum (1982), A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (1984), Profiles of a Rabbi: Synoptic Opportunities for Reading about Jesus (1989) and Judaic Approaches to the Gospels (1994).

A new direction opened up with Chilton's The Temple of Jesus: His Sacrificial Program within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (1992). The discussion turned on the meaning of pure sacrifice. Chilton's interpretation was based on two convictions. The first went back to the tradition that sacrifice should be linked with offering one's own property. Laying hands on the sacrificial animal was a token of ownership. The second conviction was that in the spring of A.D. 30 Caiaphas had introduced the novel practice of allowing animals to be purchased within the temple precincts (Chilton 1992, 107-8). Jesus' action in the temple was a failed attempt to restore the practice of pure sacrifice. Jesus' failure contributed to his growing conviction that common meals were themselves the equivalent of sacrifice offered to God. "This is my body" and "This is my blood" replaced the words "This is my sacrifice"—words thought to have been uttered in the presenting of an offering in the temple. Jesus' social eating "took on a new and scandalous element: the claim that God now preferred a pure meal to impure sacrifice in the Temple" (Chilton 1992, 154).

Whereas the earlier writings meticulously documented Chilton's argumentation, his Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (2000) eschewed footnotes except to explain technicalities. What follows is a highly imaginative reconstruction of Jesus' life in which an early experience of the divine presence at the Jerusalem temple is followed by a marginal life in the temple precincts, a formative visionary experience and release from sin while a disciple of John the Baptist, and a subsequent ministry of healing and forgiveness.

Chilton's interpretation of the final events in Jerusalem followed the path sketched earlier in The Temple of Jesus. Jesus "wanted to ensure that his Galilean followers would climb Mount Zion with their own offerings, not merely with mammon with which to buy the priests' produce" (Chilton 2000, 228). However, the elation that Jesus felt in driving out the merchants dissipated as he realized that his plan could not succeed. Jesus resorted to holding communal meals (see Table Fellowship) that were invested with "a revolutionary new meaning," as he spoke of sharing his "blood" and his "flesh" (Chilton 2000, 250). They became the prototype of what later Christians called the Eucharist, the Mass and Holy Communion. Jesus' interpretation of these meals as replacement for temple sacrifice provoked disaffection among followers (Jn 6:60-71) and antagonized the Sanhedrin (Chilton 2000, 254-55). By agreeing to execute Jesus, Pontius Pilate was motivated by the desire to show the power brokers in Rome that he was in control. At the same time, he ensured that Caiaphas remained forever in his debt. Chilton interpreted the resurrection narratives from the perspective of Kabbalah mysticism. "The disciples' mystical practice of the Chariot only intensified after Jesus' death, and to their own astonishment and the incredulity of many of their contemporaries, they saw him alive again" (Chilton, Rabbi Jesus, 272). In the end, Chilton's Jesus "entices each one of us to meet him in that dangerous place where an awareness of our own weakness and fragility shatters the self and blossoms into an image of God within us. That is the gift that his biography and death have left us, and it is what makes Rabbi Jesus the treasure of the Church and the unique possession of no institution, no person on earth" (Chilton 2000, 291).

In diametrical opposition to Chilton's reconstruction was that of British scholar Maurice Casey. Casey's massive study Jesus of Nazareth: An Independent Historian's Account of His Life and Teaching (2010) crowned a career of scholarship characterized by dauntingly informed research that challenged conservative and liberal assumptions alike. In Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel (1998) Casey had argued that reconstruction of Mark's source, based on knowledge of Second Temple Aramaic made possible by the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, was vital for the recovery of the historical Jesus. In An Aramaic Approach to Q Casey rejected the idea that Q represented a single Greek document, and he posited an early Aramaic source that was the basis of a Greek translation that was variously edited. This research was subsequently integrated into Jesus of Nazareth.

Casey stressed the need for criteria that identified historical plausibility (Casey 2010, 101-41), particularly in terms of Jewish context and attention to Aramaic. He drew a distinction between memory and social memory. The latter was prone to adapt traditions and historical facts to beliefs and spiritual needs of social groups (Casey 2010, 132-41). The criterion of double dissimilarity (Casey 2010, 104-5) was useless because it posited an artificial Jesus, disconnected from the world of Judaism and from anything that the early church might have inherited. Historical plausibility is exemplified by Mark's story of people bringing the sick and possessed at sundown for healing. The Sabbath was over, and people were permitted to carry burdens, including the sick (Mk 1:32; cf. Jer 17:21-22). It fitted Jewish Sabbath observance, whereas Gentile Christians might not be so scrupulous (Casey 2010, 106-7).

God was at the center of Jesus' life and activity (Casey 2010, 199-235). Two major concepts were God's fatherhood and his kingdom/kingship. Jesus summed up his view of God in what we know as the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:9-13; Lk 11:2-4). Jesus addressed God as "Father" (Aram. abba), using an everyday, relatively intimate term as the natural way in which one should approach God. His call to repentance was a call to return to God and to follow in the way taught by Jesus. It embodied the meaning of the Aramaic word tub ("return") and is illustrated by the parable of the prodigal's return to his father (Lk 15:11-32). Repentance implied a once-and-for-all return rather than repeated actions, which explains the relatively rare occurrence of the term in the teaching of Jesus.

Jesus went deliberately to Jerusalem to die his atoning death for the redemption of Israel (Casey 2010, 401-53). His first major action there was to take control of the court of the Gentiles (Mk 11:11, 15-17; cf. Mt 21:10-17; Lk 19:45-46), where he threw out those who were selling and buying in the temple. The effect of Jesus' action was to turn the court into a place of prayer (Is 56:7). In stopping anything from being carried through the court, Jesus effectively stopped the carrying of small animals and birds for sacrifice, and coins brought for the purchase of sacrificial animals. Casey interpreted Jesus' action not as an attack on the sacrificial system as such, but rather as a recall to the true function of the temple.

In the meantime, Jesus continued to preach in the temple. He celebrated the Passover with his closest followers, among whom were the women who accompanied him. During the meal he predicted his betrayal by one of the Twelve, in accordance with the Scriptures. He interpreted the bread and wine with reference to his atoning death and the impending establishment of the kingdom. Following his arrest, Jesus was taken to Pilate, who had him executed as an insurrectionist—"The King of the Jews" (Mt 27:37; Mk 15:26; Lk 23:38; Jn 19:19)—along with two other insurrectionists. Among modern scholars who have stressed the Jewishness of Jesus, Maurice Casey was unique in his dedication to the importance of the Aramaic sources that he posited behind Mark and Q. Yet the fact remains that among the myriads of texts and fragments that have been discovered, no such Aramaic sources have been found. Casey's conclusions rested upon his personal reconstruction of them.

8.4.3. Postscript. The foregoing account has examined only a cross-section of scholars who merit attention. Selection has been determined by a desire to include both Jewish and non-Jewish scholars, focusing on those who have caught the public eye. If a "blind sampling" were taken, it might be difficult to determine which authors were Jewish and which were not. The Jewish-Christian dialogue described here is a model of mutual appreciation and understanding. At the same time, it gives the impression of passing over lightly issues that were once matters of deep division (see, e.g., 1.1 above).

8.5. Exorcism and Healing. The work that came closest to reopening the question of the Beelzebul charge was Jesus the Magician (1978), by Morton Smith (1915–1991), who contended that magic was the key to explaining the Christian "official portrait" of Jesus and also Jewish and pagan rejection of him. Celsus and other sources claimed that Jesus learned magic in Egypt (cf. Origen, Cels. 1.28.38; b. Šabb. 104b). Smith was inclined to see Matthew's account of the flight of the holy family to Egypt (Mt 2:13–23) as an implausible cover-up designed to counter them. He linked the charge that Jesus was possessed by a demon to Gospel accounts of the descent of the Spirit on him. Smith found further confirmation in the use of Jesus' name in Greek magical papyri (collection edited by K. Preisendanz; a subsequent English edition, dedicated to Smith, The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation [2nd ed., 1992], was edited by H. D. Betz). The Christian Eucharist was essentially a magical rite.

Jesus the Magician has the appearance of being a counterpart to the "Secret Gospel of Mark," which Smith claimed to have discovered in the course of his researches in the monastery of Mar Saba, near Bethlehem, in 1958. Morton Smith's claims were based on photographs of a copy of a letter attributed to Clement of Alexandria, which no one else was permitted to see.

Initially, Smith's discovery was hailed as being equally important as the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Nag Hammadi library. But enthusiasm waned, as parallels were drawn with a popular novel by James H. Hunter entitled The Mystery of Mar Saba (1940). Scholars continued to treat Smith's work with respect, and some pronounced it to be earlier than canonical Mark. It was included with hesitation by its editor, Helmut Merkel, in the first volume of New Testament Apocrypha (ET, 2nd ed., 1991 [edited by W. Schneemelcher]). The text purports to relate the encounter with the risen Christ by a naked young man who sought initiation into the mysteries of the kingdom of God. Merkel noted that each sentence in the brief text corresponded to parts of verses from the canonical Gospels. Smith's discovery was judged a forgery by Stephen C. Carlson (The Gospel Hoax [2005]) and by Peter Jeffery (The Secret Gospel of Mark Unveiled [2006]). Although Smith has his defenders, others regard his Secret Gospel of Mark as a hoax that tested the credulity of the academic world.

Throughout history the exorcism and miracle narratives have been subjected to intense scrutiny (see C. Brown 1984; 2011a). A meticulous study of their relation to magic is David E. Aune's 1980 essay "Magic in Early Christianity" in Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt. Aune concluded that magic was a characteristic of early Christianity from its inception. However, he warned that magic was a characteristic of all religions, and that he used the term without pejorative connotations.

Among the issues that received attention in the twentieth century was whether Jesus fitted the profile of the "divine man" (theios anēr), the itinerant holy miracle worker who was thought to be a common feature of the Greco-Roman world. It attracted attention in the Bultmann school through the researches of Ludwig Bieler published in his two-volume Theios Aner: Das Bild des "Göttlichen Menschen" in Spätantike und Frühchristentum (1935–1936; repr., 1976). More recent scholarship has determined that theios anēr was an imprecise concept, not particularly associated with miracle working.

The most famous rival to Jesus was the first-century itinerant wonder-working holy man Apollonius of Tyana, whose memory was preserved by Philostratus in a biography commissioned by Julia Domna, wife of the emperor Septimius Severus. Philostratus's Life of Apollonius relates numerous bizarre tales, such as a plague being averted at Ephesus by stoning a demon disguised as a beggar. When the stones were removed, the beggar had been transformed into a dog (Vit. Apoll. 4.10). Of the various wonders linked with Apollonius, the one that comes closest to the Gospel narratives is the account of a funeral procession in Rome of a young girl who apparently died on her wedding day (Vit. Apoll. 4.45). She was revived by Apollonius, though Philostratus leaves readers to judge whether or not there were natural causes. The episode seems to conflate two Gospel stories, both recorded by Luke: the raising of the widow of Nain's son (Lk 7:11-17) and the raising of Jairus's daughter (Lk 8:40-56 [// Mt 9:18-25; Mk 5:21-43]).

A consideration that may help bring closure is comparison of Philostratus's work with Luke-Acts. Their prefaces contain truth claims employing similar style and language (Lk 1:1-4; Acts 1:1-2; Vit. Apoll. 1.2-3). While various incidents suggest comparison with the Synoptic Gospels generally, Luke remains a constant factor. Some suggested parallels occur only in Luke. Among them are the youthful wisdom showed by Jesus and Apollonius (Lk 2:48; Vit. Apoll. 1.7-8). Other incidents reflect stories that belong to Acts. Examples are the gift of languages (Acts 2:8; Vit. Apoll. 1.19); encounters with consuls (Acts 13:4-12; Vit. Apoll. 7.11-12); perilous sea voyages and welcome by followers (Acts 26:27-28:30; Vit. Apoll. 8:14-15).

Howard Clark Kee surveyed the question in two major monographs: Miracle in the Early Christian World (1983) and Medicine, Miracle, and Magic in New Testament Times (1986). He concluded the latter by observing, "What remains central in the New Testament . . . is the conviction that God is alone in control of human destiny, even though the powers of Satan have for a time seized control or sought to thwart the divine plan. That plan is being accomplished through an agent whom God has chosen and empowered. . . . The divine redemptive purpose and instrument of the accomplishment are . . . epitomized in the Q saying of Jesus, 'If, indeed, it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you' (Lk 11:20)" (Kee, 126-27).

It should be noted that in biblical times healers were considered to be agents of Yahweh (Ex 15:25-26; Deut 32:39). The practice of medicine was associated with magic and pagan religion, and it was through a radical shift in the Diaspora that physicians came to be seen as God's agents in healing (Sir 38:1-15) (see Kee, 19). The healer (iatros [Mk 2:17; Lk 4:23; 8:43]) was not a qualified physician in the modern sense, but rather one who practiced healing. Certain contexts imply remuneration. Priests were not healers, but they functioned as public health inspectors in the case of skin diseases (Mk 1:44; cf. Lev 14:1-4). In Luke 4:23 sickness and healing are metaphors for sin and restoration.

In Jesus the Exorcist (1993) Graham H. Twelftree compared the exorcisms of Jesus with exorcisms in first-century A.D. Palestine. His detailed examination of NT data led him to conclude that exorcism was an integral part of the activity of the historical Jesus. Jesus' exorcisms marked the first stage of the defeat of Satan, which showed Jesus empowered by "the eschatological Spirit of God" (Twelftree, 228) (cf. Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20). The final defeat of Satan would take place in the judgment. Exorcisms were "the focus of the coming kingdom."

More recently, Amanda Witmer pursued a theme of her mentor, Richard Horsley, in arguing that spirit possession reflected and contributed to "a broader discourse of the problematic nature of living under foreign rule and the effects of this on all levels of life, including societal, village, family and individual" (Witmer, 205). Jesus' exorcisms were perceived by the Jewish and Roman ruling elite as a dangerous political threat. Witmer brings to the fore a conflict of viewpoints regarding interpretation of the demonic. A number of scholars hold that "demons" were real. However, they were not beings, like humans, but rather a dimension of oppressive socioeconomic conditions. The root problem was the systemic structure of societies, which resulted in "possession" as the sole means of coping.

8.6. Catholic Contributions. Catholic attitudes toward biblical studies may be divided into two phases. The first was characterized by hostility to modernism. The second was marked by growing awareness of the value of critical study.

8.6.1. The Modernist Crisis. The early years of the twentieth century saw the Roman Catholic Church engulfed in controversy over modernism (see 4.1 above). Pope Leo XIII is remembered today for his social teaching and concern to define the Church's relationship to modern thinking, while remaining true to its past. His encyclical Providentissimus Deus (1893) asserted the inerrancy of the original texts and warned against exegesis that disregarded the norms and authority of the Church. The "analogy of faith” and Catholic teaching as received from the authority of the Church should be followed “as the supreme norm.”

Toward the end of his pontificate Leo XIII established the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1902), chiefly to answer questions of authorship, date and historical truth of the Gospels, and other parts of Scripture. Between 1905 and 1915 it issued fourteen brief responsa defining the Church’s teaching. In more recent times the nature of its pronouncements changed from “decrees” to “letters” and “instructions.” One of the great biblical scholars of the age was the Dominican Marie-Joseph Lagrange (1855–1938), who welcomed Leo XIII’s encouragement of scholarship. Although Lagrange was an OT scholar, accusations of German rationalism inhibited further work in the OT, and he applied his labors to magisterial commentaries on Mark (1911), Luke (1920), Matthew (1923) and John (1925).

Leo’s successor, Pius X, formally condemned modernism. His decree Lamentabili (1907) identified sixty-five errors drawn largely from the writings of Alfred Loisy and his “school.” At issue was the critical approach to Scripture, the person of Jesus and the authority of the Church. The decree was followed by the encyclical Pascendi Domini Gregis (1907) and the oath against modernism, Sacrorum Antistitum (1910), which remained in force until 1967.

8.6.2. Current Scholarship. A major turning point came in 1943 with Pius XII’s encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu. It marked the fiftieth anniversary of Providentissimus Deus and urged that its directives be followed. While honoring the Latin Vulgate, the encyclical granted permission for translations of Scripture to be made from the original languages. The study of textual criticism was encouraged, as was that of authorship, written and oral sources, and literary types. Priests were exhorted to study Scripture and support their teaching by drawing on “sacred history.”

This development was carried further by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), which defined revelation as a divine unfolding through words and deeds of the history of salvation. “In the process of the composition of the sacred books God chose and employed human agents, using their own powers and faculties in such a way that they wrote as authors in the true sense, and yet God acted through them and solely as he willed” (Dei Verbum §11) (see further C. Brown 1991). Among the leading post-Vatican II NT scholars in America are the Jesuit Joseph A. Fitzmyer (1920–), who taught in various schools prior to his appointment at the Catholic University of America (1976–1986), and Raymond E. Brown.

Raymond E. Brown (1928–1998) was a priest and member of the Society of Saint-Sulpice. He was the first Catholic to hold a tenured professorship at Union Theological Seminary, New York, where he taught from 1970 until retirement in 1990. Brown rose to prominence for his two-volume Anchor Bible commentary The Gospel According to John (1966–1971), which identified layers of development before the Gospel reached its final canonical form. In his later years he devoted attention to the Gospel narratives of the birth and death of Jesus. The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus (1973) was a preliminary investigation of biblical data, in contrast with doctrinal developments. It was followed by massive commentaries on Gospel narratives of Jesus’ birth and death, The Birth of the Messiah (1973; 2nd ed., 1993) and the two-volume The Death of the Messiah (1994).

The most ambitious and comprehensive account of the historical Jesus by any scholar in the English-speaking world is that of John P. Meier (1942–), who taught at the Catholic University of America and Notre Dame. His book A Marginal Jew had its origin in Raymond Brown’s invitation to write an article on the historical Jesus for the second edition of the Jerome Biblical Commentary (1990). Meier reflected that it was perhaps symptomatic of the state of Catholic biblical studies in the 1960s that the original edition contained no such article. Meier’s early articles, which included reflections on contemporary theologians, were collected in his book The Mission of Christ and His Church (1990). To date, four volumes of Meier’s A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus have been published. The first volume, The Roots of the Problem and the Person (1991), deals with method, sources and Jesus’ background and early life. The second volume, Mentor, Message, and Miracles (1994), discusses John the Baptist, the kingdom of God, and the healing and nature miracles. The third volume, Companions and Competitors (2001), deals with disciples, Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes and other groups. The fourth volume, Law and Love (2009), explores Jesus’ ethical teaching. A projected fifth volume will discuss Jesus’ last days and death.

Meier distinguished between “the real Jesus” and the “historical Jesus” (Meier, 1:21–31). The “real Jesus” is Jesus as he was in the totality of his person and existence, but much of his life is now irretrievably lost. “We cannot know the ‘real’ Jesus through historical research, whether we mean his total reality or just a reasonably complete biographical portrait. We can, however, know the “historical Jesus” (Meier, 1:24). “The historical Jesus is not the real Jesus, but only a fragmentary hypothetical reconstruction of him by modern means of research” (Meier, 1:31). The “theological Jesus” is the Christ of Christian theology. As a Catholic critical historian, Meier felt able to hand over to the theologians the investigation of this domain “according to their own proper methods and criteria.” Meier’s task was to pursue a historical, as distinct from a theological, investigation of Jesus. Jesus was “a marginal Jew” in the sense that he was mentioned only in passing at the margins of Jewish and Greco-Roman accounts of history.

At the opposite end of the spectrum is former Benedictine monk and priest, subsequently professor of NT at Emory University, Luke Timothy Johnson (1943–), who launched a series of salvos against the current quest of the historical Jesus. His main target in The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest of the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (1996) was the Jesus Seminar. Johnson welcomed Meier’s critique of modern skepticism, but Meier’s separation of fact and meaning was misguided (Johnson 1996, 133). Indeed, “abandoning the frame of meaning given to the story of Jesus by the four canonical Gospels is to abandon the frame of meaning given to the story of Jesus and of Christian discipleship by the rest of the New Testament as well” (Johnson 1996, 166) (see also Johnson 1999).

Johnson was well aware of the slippery character of the word “real” (Johnson 1996, 127–33, 143–46, 166), and the fact that “real” does not imply unmediated access to Jesus. What historical scholarship achieves is the creation of models. Johnson used the word model “to mean an imaginative construal of the subject being studied, as well as a structured picture of both process and product: a model is a paradigm within which the data pertinent to a discipline makes sense” (Johnson 1996, 172). Here it may be observed that the alternative to the historian’s constructed models is not a direct, unmediated access to the “real” Jesus by prayer and faith. This is because prayer and faith use their own models, constructed by the community of faith as it develops its belief system, which incorporates testimonies to past experience, inspirational songs, patterns of worship, examples drawn from biblical narratives, and so on. Without models of some sort, we cannot think about Jesus or God.

Last, but by no means least, mention must be made of the personal contribution of Pope Benedict XVI, his three-volumes on Jesus of Nazareth:

From the Baptism in the Jordan to the Transfiguration (ET, 2007), Holy Week: From Entrance into Jerusalem to the Resurrection (ET, 2011) and The Infancy Narratives (ET, 2012). Previous popes had issued directives in the form of encyclicals regarding the study of Scripture. Benedict drew on his years of scholarship to deal with academic integrity and pastoral sensitivity issues of the gap between the “historical Jesus” and the “Christ of faith.” He set out his “methodology” in the first of the three volumes. His work made no claims to be “an exercise of the magisterium, but is solely an expression of my personal search ‘for the face of the Lord’ . . . Everyone is free, then, to contradict me. I would only ask my readers for that initial goodwill without which there can be no understanding” (Benedict XVI, xxiii–xxiv).

8.7. Methodology. The purpose of this section is to draw attention to the variety of methodologies and dynamics of argument in contemporary debate about the historical Jesus.

8.7.1. Data Beliefs, Data-Background Beliefs and Control Beliefs. In the academic world foundationalism is widely regarded as an illusion and failure. Knowledge and theorizing are not in practice based on a foundation of indubitables. No one has succeeded in stating how theories that are warranted are related to a set of indubitable propositions or demonstrating a general logic of the sciences and history. Hence, there is no general rule for a warranted theory of acceptance or rejection. Nicholas Wolterstorff, in Reason Within the Bounds of Religion (1976; 2nd ed., 1984) has made a case for distinguishing between data beliefs, data-background beliefs and control beliefs in weighing theories. In investigating an issue, the main focus is whether a thesis is supported by data beliefs and data-background beliefs. Control beliefs remain in the background, providing the general framework in which the inquiry is conducted. However, the cumulative weight of evidence may warrant modification of a control belief. In special cases, paradigm shifts occur involving major changes in control beliefs. Examples of paradigm shifts in the sciences are Newtonian physics, evolution, relativity and the discovery of DNA. In this context, “belief” does not necessarily imply doubt, of course, but rather an unavoidable reliance on the work of others of good standing, past and present. It should also be noted that a data belief in one investigation may become a data-background belief in another investigation, and vice versa.

Wolterstorff’s examples were drawn from the natural sciences, but his method seems applicable in other fields. For example, we may ask about the evidence for Jesus saying or behaving in a particular way. If the answer is that it is based on passages in Scripture or some other source, we are talking about data beliefs. If we are asking about their authorship and dating and the accuracy of the source, we are talking about data-background beliefs. If we ask about how it fits a particular theory about Jesus or its theological meaning, we are in the area of control beliefs.

8.7.2. Criteria for Assessing Data Beliefs. The most comprehensive and incisive discussion of criteria is The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, by Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter (1997; ET, 2002) (on Theissen's work, see 8.3.1 above). Although Theissen succeeded to the chair at Heidelberg formerly held by Martin Dibelius and Günther Bornkamm, he broke with them and traditional German scholarship at significant points, not least in rejecting the criterion of dissimilarity. He corrected it by proposing the criterion of historical plausibility, which was linked to the plausibility of effects (Wirkungsplausibilität). "It is the responsibility of historical research to interpret texts so that they can be seen as the effects of the history they report. . . . This means that in Jesus research we must explain and interpret the historical effect of Jesus as presented to us in the form of the sources generated by him" (Theissen and Winter, 231) (see Criteria of Authenticity).

Historical plausibility had various subcriteria. They included opposition to traditional bias (Tendenzwidrigkeit), which recognized historical credibility in "unintentional evidence that is not influenced by the tendency of source" (Theissen and Winter, 174). The latter seems close to what has traditionally been called the "criterion of embarrassment." However, one must recognize that the author may have deliberately included such evidence, with a view to refuting it.

In addition, Theissen recognized the importance of coherence of sources (Quellenkohärenz): "When sources independently of each other testify to the same event, the prospect that we are dealing with authentic material is enhanced" (Theissen and Winter, 177). Coherence of sources was recognizable through two further subcriteria: cross-section evidence (Querschnittsbeweis) refers to "recurring items of content, of formal motifs and structures in different streams of tradition" (Theissen and Winter, 178); genre constancy (Gattungsimvarianz) is found in "features and motifs that have maintained themselves in different genres" (Theissen and Winter, 178).

Furthermore, authentic material must satisfy the criterion of Jewish contextual plausibility, which had two aspects: contextual appropriateness and contextual distinctiveness. "What Jesus intended and said must be compatible with the Judaism in the first half of the first century in Galilee. . . . What Jesus intended and did must be recognizable as that of an individual figure within the framework of Judaism of that time" (Theissen and Winter, 211 [italics removed]).

8.7.3. The Changing Role of Data-Background Beliefs. Through the importance that they attached to noncanonical Gospels and early fragments, John Dominic Crossan and the Jesus Seminar brought fresh awareness to what typically had been assigned to the realm of data-background beliefs. By treating the Gospel of Thomas on a par with the canonical Gospels and the now largely discredited Secret Gospel of Mark as prior to canonical Mark, they elevated what was previously been thought of as background to data of prime importance. The variety of non-canonical gospels raises the question of the existence of a variety of early Christian communities.

8.7.4. From Data Beliefs to Control Beliefs. In some cases cumulative data may reach a critical mass in which they achieve the status of a control belief. In other cases, control beliefs may be imposed on data as an arbitrary controlling principle. It would be an interesting exercise to retrace our steps and examine the quest of the historical Jesus in the light of the dynamic of the three categories. However, space permits noting only one case from the recent past and two examples of the role of control beliefs in the ongoing debate. The past case is Crossan's The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (see 8.2 above). The two examples, taken from the ongoing debate, concern the roles of apocalyptic and of memory and oral tradition.

8.7.4.1. John Dominic Crossan. In the entire history of the quest no other book comes close to Crossan's The Historical Jesus in its determination to follow a rigorous methodology. The book was divided into three parts. Part 1 was devoted to the "Brokered Empire," a lengthy analysis of political, social and economic conditions under the Pax Romana. Part 2 zeroed in on the "Embattled Brokerage," Jewish life and Jewish figures under Roman rule. Only in part 3, on the "Brokerless Kingdom," did Jesus appear, assuming the role that was open to him in the socio-economic situation: a peasant Jewish Cynic who sought to subvert the system by "magic and meal." The historical basis for the reconstruction of Jesus was provided by an elaborate inventory of stratified sources, arranged in accordance with chronology and attestation. From first to last, control beliefs determined the outcome. In his autobiographical memoir, A Long Way from Tipperary (2000), Crossan could not help wondering how far his outlook was shaped by growing up in the postcolonial enclave of the Irish Republic after centuries of oppressive British rule.

8.7.4.2. Apocalyptic. From Albert Schweitzer onwards, apocalyptic eschatology has been a control belief that has divided scholars. Bart D. Ehrman fundamentally disagreed with Schweitzer on many critical points but thought that “he was essentially right that Jesus was an apocalypticist” (Ehrman, 128). Similar views were shared by Dale C. Allison Jr. (e.g., Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet [1998]; Constructing Jesus: Memory, Imagination, and History [2010]).

Other scholars regard the messianic woes as largely Schweitzer’s invention. N. T. Wright considers apocalyptic language as a way of speaking about the transcendent in history, and therefore it should not be taken literally as a programmatic guide to future events (Wright 1992, 392–93; cf. 280–338). Wright sees the parousia not as Jesus’ second coming back to earth after a period of absence, but rather, as in Daniel 7:13, as the coming of the Son of Man to the Ancient of Days to receive “enthronement” and dominion (Wright 1996, 341).

A solid body of scholarship has argued that the so-called apocalyptic discourse of Mark 13 and its parallels embody intertextual allusions to prophetic metaphorical language with regard to events in history (e.g., C. Brown, NIDNTT 2:915–17). The cosmic language about the heavenly bodies is not to be taken as prediction of unprecedented astronomical events; rather, it is the prophetic language of judgment used to denote the divine dimension of this-worldly events. In the end, contemporary interpretation is divided not only on exegesis of particular texts, but also more broadly on hermeneutical questions such as this.

8.7.4.3. Memory and Oral Tradition. The contemporary debate about memory and oral tradition is less about the exegesis of particular texts than their role in the creation of written texts. As such, it belongs chiefly to the realm of control beliefs. It is perhaps best described as a work in progress. In part, it is an alternative to the Bultmann tradition. Bultmann held that prior to the creation of the canonical Gospels there was a period in which traditions were freely created by prophets speaking in the name of Jesus within the life of the church. Scandinavian scholarship pioneered by Harald Riesenfeld’s The Gospel Tradition (1970) and developed by his pupil Birger Gerhardsson argued that rabbinic tradition, with its emphasis on memorization, could illuminate early Christian practice. Gerhardsson’s Memory and Manuscript (1961) argued that rabbinic practice suggested that Jesus required his followers to memorize his teaching. In The Reliability of the Gospel Tradition (2001) Gerhardsson envisaged a period in which oral tradition continued alongside the written Gospels until the four canonical Gospels achieved the status of Holy Scripture and became the primary sources of the Christian message. Samuel Byrskog’s Story as History—History as Story (2000) stressed that for Greek and Roman historians, the ideal witness was not the dispassionate observer but rather “the eyewitness who was socially involved or, even better, had been actively participating in the events” (Byrskog, 167). The subject was taken up by Richard Bauckham in Jesus and the Eyewitnesses (Bauckham, 8–11), which challenged the assumption that the Gospels were the product of anonymous community tradition. Much of the discussion belongs to data-background beliefs. However, it is strategic for building the control belief that determines Bauckham’s perspective on Christian origins in the Jesus of testimony.

Bauckham’s argument is that “the Gospels put us in close touch with the eyewitness of the history of Jesus” (Bauckham, 472). Testimony is “as basic a means of knowledge as perception, memory, and inference” (Bauckham, 477). Bauckham follows Byrskog’s argument that “the Gospels, though in some ways a very distinctive form of historiography, share broadly the attitude to eyewitness testimony that was common among historians in the Greco-Roman period” (Bauckham, 479) (see Historicisms and Historiography). Moreover, the category of testimony “is the one that does most justice to the Gospels both as history and as theology” (Bauckham, 505). “In summary, if the interests of Christian faith and theology in the Jesus who really lived are to recognize the disclosure of God in the history of Jesus, then testimony is the theologically appropriate, indeed the theologically necessary way of access to the historical Jesus, just as testimony is also the historically appropriate, indeed historically necessary way of access to this ‘uniquely unique’ historical event. It is in the Jesus of testimony that history and theology meet” (Bauckham, 508).

In his later career James D. G. Dunn has focused increasingly on Jesus as he was remembered. The first part of Dunn’s Jesus Remembered (2003) is devoted to a survey of the quest of the historical Jesus and its shortcomings. Perhaps the greatest shortcoming was that the various portraits of Jesus inevitably were constructs, which were then used to critique the Gospel tradition (Dunn 2003, 125-26). Like N. T. Wright (see 8.1 above), Dunn saw himself as a critical realist in the tradition of Bernard Lonergan (Dunn 2003, 111). However, Wright's work seemed to be more interested in constructing metanarratives of "exile theology" and Jesus as "the climax of the covenant" (Dunn 2003, 120, 470-77), whereas Dunn concerned himself with a hermeneutic of encounter with the remembered Jesus as interpreted by the tradition of testimony in the texts of the Gospels (Dunn 2003, 111-25). This involved reappraisal of the writings of Kenneth Bailey, who suggested degrees of informal controlled tradition as a corrective to the "informal uncontrolled tradition" of Bultmann and the "formal controlled tradition" of Gerhardsson (Dunn 2003, 206).

Dunn summed up his argument in four propositions: "(1) The only realistic objective for any 'quest of the historical Jesus' is Jesus remembered. (2) The Jesus tradition of the Gospels confirms that there was a concern within earliest Christianity to remember Jesus. (3) The Jesus tradition shows us how Jesus was remembered; its character suggests again and again a tradition given its essential shape by regular use and reuse in oral mode. (4) This suggests in turn that that essential shape was given by the original and immediate impact made by Jesus as that was first put into words by and among those involved or eyewitnesses of what Jesus said and did. In that key sense, the Jesus tradition is Jesus remembered. And Jesus thus remembered is Jesus, or as close as we will ever be able to reach back to him" (Dunn 2003, 335). Accordingly, Dunn proposed that "the quest should start from the recognition that Jesus evoked faith from the outset of his mission and that this faith is the surest indication of the historical reality and effect of his mission" (Dunn 2009, 203 [italics removed]). In contrast to "the blinkeredness" of the literary paradigm, Dunn proposed "the necessity of taking the oral phase of the history of Jesus with all seriousness" (Dunn 2009, 211 [italics removed]). In contrast to the liberal tradition, Dunn proposed that "we should look first of all for the Jewish Jesus rather than a non-Jewish Jesus," in the belief that "the characteristic emphases and motifs of the Jesus tradition give us a broad, clear and compelling picture of the characteristic Jesus" (Dunn 2009, 219, 223 [italics removed]).

My own reading of the literature suggests a perhaps unconscious stress on selective memory that focused on the positive while passing over negative items that actually might strengthen its case.

9. Concluding Reflections.

There are many issues that this article has not been able to explore, since they would take us beyond the "quest of the historical Jesus" in the strict sense of the term. Some belong to NT Christology or even Christology at large. Among them are the variety of socially oriented theologies, such as feminism, liberation Christology, and black, Hispanic and Asian Christologies, which are concerned with biblical hermeneutics and contemporary praxis.

With regard to how many quests there are of the historical Jesus, this survey has demonstrated that there is no clear answer. There is much to be said for Stanley E. Porter's reply that it is best to think of "a single multi-faceted quest of the historical Jesus, with modifications and adjustments in approach, some of them perhaps influenced with method and others perhaps by personality or nationality" (Porter 2000, 56). But it would be a mistake to think that the judgment implies a conscious concerted enterprise leading to the same destination. Alternatively, it is tempting to think of a forest fire, which makes unpredictable leaps.

Critics of the quest often assert that the quest of the historical Jesus brings no positive results. However the alternative of a quest of "the unhistorical Jesus" has its own problems. This quest, whether recognized or not, takes two main forms. On the one hand, there is Jesus the cultural icon who functions as a kind of talisman in life's situations. On the other hand, the history of Christian theology is replete with attempts like that of Anselm of Canterbury (ca. 1033-1109) to prove the rational necessity of the incarnation "apart from Christ, as if there was never anything about him" (Cur Deus Homo, preface).

In fact, the quest of the unhistorical Jesus does not have a better, more immediate access to Jesus than does the quest of the historical Jesus. It is equally a construct conditioned by sources, religious and cultural belief systems, and the personality of those who undertake the construction. As in the case of all constructs, they are prone to the risk described by George Tyrrell of peering down a deep well and seeing one's own face. The admission of limitations on the part of those engaged in the quest of the historical Jesus is not a confession of the futility of the enterprise. Rather, to engage in the quest of the historical Jesus is to assert the importance of apprehending Jesus historically. It gives recognition to the fact that historical knowledge is an essential component of knowing Jesus at all.

A term that appears with increasing frequency in discussions of the historical Jesus is hermeneutics.

Sometimes it is used in the limited sense of linguistic interpretation. A modern, more comprehensive definition is offered by Anthony C. Thiselton: "Hermeneutics explores how we read, understand, and handle texts, especially those written in another time or in a context of life different from our own. Biblical hermeneutics investigates more specifically how we read, understand, apply, and respond to biblical texts" (Thiselton, 1). The answer to the question of how many quests there are of the historical Jesus may well turn on the number of different hermeneutical approaches there are. If we look back at Schweitzer's narrative of the quest, we see that each of his main turning points involves major hermeneutical shifts: the decision to follow Strauss in rejecting supernaturalism, the decision to reject John in favor of the Synoptic Jesus, the adoption of "consistent eschatology." These three shifts may not have applied to theological scholarship as a whole, but certainly they determined Schweitzer's outlook.

In retrospect, hermeneutical factors shaped Jesus' activity and fate in ways that Schweitzer did not envisage. It is instructive to read the Gospels from opposing perspectives, which may be called "with the grain" and "against the grain" (see Brown 2011d). By "with the grain," I mean attempting to see what the authors of the Gospels wanted readers to see. By "against the grain," I refer to the standpoint of opponents and outsiders, which may be reconstructed from the narratives. The exercise is relevant to understanding both the content of the Gospels and their form.

With regard to content, I refer to material that traditionally has been regarded as embarrassing, but preserved because it was regarded as part of authentic memory. As such, its preservation has been treated as more or less fortuitous. It seems to me that the material preserved "against the grain," was preserved because Christian tradition deemed that it required an answer—for example, charges that Jesus was a blasphemer, a Sabbath breaker, a prophet possessed by Beelzebul who led astray, a mamzēr (a term usually denoting the offspring of an adulterous or incestuous union [Deut 23:2], which Chilton applied to Jesus because of the stigma attached to his birth [cf. Mk 6:3; Jn 8:41]) and a stubborn and rebellious son. All this sets Jesus firmly in a Second Temple Jewish context. It is also germane to the central question of the quest of the historical Jesus: his identity.

Although the content of the Gospels addressed Jewish concerns, their format, especially that of Mark, was adapted to the Greco-Roman world. Biography seems to lie outside the rabbinic tradition. Jacob Neusner made the following observation about stories of the sages in the Talmud: "Sage-stories turn out not to tell about sages at all; they are about the Torah personified. Sage-stories cannot yield a gospel because they are not about sages anyway. They are about the Torah. . . . The gospel does just the opposite, with its focus on the uniqueness of the hero" (Neusner 1988, 52-53) (see also Neusner 1984).

It now seems clear that the canonical Gospels belong to the genre of Greco-Roman biography (see Gospel: Genre). They also seem to square with Jonathan Z. Smith's observation that the major religious biographies of the ancient world were characterized by "a double defense against the charge of magic—against the calumny of outsiders and the sincere misunderstanding of admirers" (Smith, 25). It also seems to me that more attention should be paid to reading the Gospels as literary narratives instead of searching them to find lowest common denominators. There are many questions that we may put to the Gospels, but the most searching questions are those that the Gospels put to us.

See also CANONICAL CRITICISM; CHRISTOLOGY; CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY; FEMINIST AND WOMANIST CRITICISMS; FORM CRITICISM; GOSPELS: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY; JESUS IN NON-CHRISTIAN SOURCES; LATINO/LATINA CRITICISMS; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; POSTCOLONIAL CRITICISM; Q; REDACTION CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC CRITICISMS; SYNOPTIC PROBLEM; TEXTUAL CRITICISM; THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison Jr., The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); idem, The Historical Christ and the Theological Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); idem, Constructing Jesus: Memory, Imagination and History (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); W. Baird, History of New Testament Research (3 vols.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992-2013); E. Bammel and C. F. D. Moule, eds., Jesus and the Politics of His Day (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984); H.-W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth: A Theological Debate, trans. R. H. Fuller (2 vols; London: SPCK, 1953); R. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); J. K. Beilby and P. R. Eddy, eds., The Historical Jesus: Five Views (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2009); Benedict XVI (J. Ratzinger), Jesus of Naza-

- reth: From the Baptism in the Jordan to the Transfiguration, trans. A. J. Walker (San Francisco: Ignatius, 2008); D. L. Bock, Studying the Historical Jesus: A Guide to Sources and Methods (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2002); D. L. Bock and R. L. Webb, eds., Key Events in the Life of the Historical Jesus: A Collaborative Exploration of Context and Coherence (WUNT 247; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009); M. Bockmuehl, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Jesus (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001); H. K. Bond, The Historical Jesus: A Guide for the Perplexed (London: T & T Clark, 2012); M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness, and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1984); idem, Jesus, A New Vision: Spirit, Culture, and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); idem, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994); idem, ed., Jesus at 2000 (Boulder, CO: Westview, 1997); G. Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth, trans. I. McLuskey, F. McCluskey and J. M. Robinson (New York: Harper, 1960); W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos: A History of the Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus, trans. J. E. Steely (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970 [1913]); S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study in the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967); C. Brown, "The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT," NIDNTT 2:901-35; idem, Miracles and the Critical Mind (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984); idem, Jesus in European Protestant Thought, 1778-1860 (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985); idem, "Scripture and Christology: A Protestant Look at the Work of the Pontifical Biblical Commission," in Perspectives on Christology: Essays in Honor of Paul K. Jewett, ed. M. Shuster and R. Muller (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1991) 39-76; idem, "Issues in the History of the Debates on Miracles," in The Cambridge Companion to Miracles, ed. G. H. Twelftree (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2011a) 273-90; idem, "The Quest of the Unhistorical Jesus and the Quest of the Historical Jesus," in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011b) 2:855-86; idem, "Why Study the Historical Jesus?" in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011c) 2:1411-38; idem, "With the Grain and Against the Grain: A Strategy for Reading the Synoptic Gospels," Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011d) 1:619-48; idem, The Quests of the Historical Jesus: A Brief History (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, forthcoming); R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives of Matthew and Luke (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1973); The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave; A Commentary on the Passion Narratives of the Four Gospels (2 vols.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994); R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, trans. L. P. Smith and E. H. Lantero (New York: Scribner, 1934 [1926]); idem, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (New York: Scribner, 1951-1955); idem, Primitive Christianity in Its Contemporary Setting, trans. R. H. Fuller (London: Thames & Hudson, 1956 [1949]); idem, Jesus Christ and Mythology (London: SCM, 1960); idem, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (Oxford: Blackwell, 1963 [1921]); idem, "The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus," trans. C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville, in The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ: Essays on the New Quest of the Historical Jesus, ed. C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville (Nashville: Abingdon, 1964) 15-42; idem, Faith and Understanding, trans. L. P. Smith, ed. R. W. Funk (New York: Harper & Row, 1966); idem, "The Problem of Theological Exegesis," in The Beginnings of Dialectic Theology, ed. J. M. Robinson (Richmond: John Knox, 1968); R. A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Greco-Roman Biography (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); idem, Four Gospels, One Jesus? A Symbolic Reading (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); R. A. Burridge and G. Gould, Jesus Now and Then (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); S. Byrskog, Story as History—History as Story: The Gospel Tradition in the Context of Ancient History (WUNT 123; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); M. Casey, Son of Man: The Interpretation and Influence of Daniel 7 (London: SPCK, 1979); idem, From Jewish Prophet to Gentile God: The Origins and Development of New Testament Christology (Cambridge: James Clarke; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1991); idem, The Solution to the "Son of Man" Problem (LNTS 343; London: T & T Clark, 2007); idem, Jesus of Nazareth: An Independent Historian's Account of His Life and Teaching (London: T & T Clark, 2010); J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus' Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus in Early Judaism (New York: Crossroad, 1991); idem, ed., The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity; The First Princeton Symposium on Judaism and Christian Origins (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); idem, Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Doubleday, 1993); idem, ed., Jesus and Archaeology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); idem, The Historical Jesus: An Essential Guide (Nashville: Abingdon,

- 2008); J. H. Charlesworth and P. Pokorný, eds., Jesus Research: An International Perspective; The First Princeton-Prague Symposium on Jesus Research, Prague 2005 (Eerdmans: Grand Rapids, 2009); J. H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver, eds., Jesus Two Thousand Years Later (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000); B. Chilton, The Temple of Jesus: His Sacrificial Program Within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992); idem, Pure Kingdom: Jesus' Vision of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); idem, Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2000); B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research (NTTS 19; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); idem, eds., Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies (AGJU 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); idem, eds., Jesus in Context: Temple, Purity, and Restoration (AGJU 39; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); idem, eds., Authenticating the Words of Jesus (NTTS 28/1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999); idem, eds., Authenticating the Activities of Jesus (NTTS 28/2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999); H. Conzelmann, Jesus: The Classic Article from RGG Expanded and Updated, trans. R. Lord, ed. J. Reumann (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); P. Copan and C. A. Evans, Who Was Jesus? A Jewish-Christian Dialogue (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991); idem, Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994); idem, God and Empire: Jesus Against Rome, Then and Now (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2007); J. D. Crossan, L. T. Johnson and W. H. Kelber, The Jesus Controversy: Perspectives in Conflict (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London: Nisbet, 1935); idem, History and the Gospel (London: Nisbet, 1938; rev. ed.; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1964); idem, The Founder of Christianity (New York: Macmillan, 1970); J. D. G. Dunn, The Evidence for Jesus (Louisville: Westminster, 1985); idem, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); idem, A New Perspective on Jesus: What the Quest for the Historical Jesus Missed (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005); idem, "Remembering Jesus: How the Quest of the Historical Jesus Lost Its Way," in The Historical Jesus: Five Views, ed. J. K. Beilby and P. R. Eddy (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2009) 199-225; J. D. G. Dunn and S. McKnight, eds., The Historical Jesus in Recent Research (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005); B. D. Ehrman, Jesus: Apocalyptic Prophet of the New Millennium (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999); C. A. Evans, Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography (NTTS 24; Leiden: E. J. Brill 1996); idem, Fabricating Jesus: How Modern Scholars Distort the Gospels (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2006); idem, ed., Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus (London: Routledge, 2008); C. A. Evans and S. E. Porter, eds., The Historical Jesus: A Sheffield Reader (BibSem 33; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); D. Flusser, with R. S. Notley, The Sage from Galilee: Recovering Jesus' Genius (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); P. Fredriksen, From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of the New Testament Images of Jesus (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1988); idem, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity (New York: Knopf, 2000); R. H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Theology (New York: Scribner, 1965); R. W. Funk, Honest to Jesus: Jesus for a New Millennium (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); idem, "The Jesus Seminar and the Quest," in Jesus Then and Now: Images of Jesus in History and Christology, ed. M. Meyer and C. Hughes (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2001) 130-39; B. Gaventa and R. B. Hays, eds., Seeking the Identity of Jesus: A Pilgrimage (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, trans. E. J. Sharpe (ASNU 22; Lund: Gleerup, 1961); K. Hammann, Rudolf Bultmann: A Biography, trans. P. E. Devenish (Salem, OR: Polebridge, 2013); H. Harris, David Friedrich Strauss and His Theology (SJTMS; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973); idem, The Tübingen School: A Historical and Theological Investigation of the School of F. C. Baur (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990); A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982); M. Hengel, Was Jesus a Revolutionist? trans. W. Klassen (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971 [1970]); idem, Victory over Violence: Jesus and the Revolutionists, trans. D. E. Green (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973 [1971]); idem, The Charismatic Leader and His Followers, trans. J. Greig (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1981 [1968]); idem, The Zealots: Investigations into the Jewish Freedom Movement in the Period from Herod I Until 70 A.D., trans. D. Smith (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1989); T. Holmén and S. E. Porter, eds., Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2011); R. A. Horsley, "The Zealots: Their Origin, Relationships and Importance in the Jewish Revolt," NovT 28 (1986) 159-92; idem, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence:

- Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine* (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); idem, Sociology and the Jesus Movement (New York: Crossroad, 1989); idem, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Order (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); R. A. Horsley and J. S. Hanson, Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs: Popular Movements at the Time of Jesus (Minneapolis: Winston, 1985); R. A. Horsley and N. A. Silberman, The Message of the Kingdom: How Jesus and Paul Ignited a Revolution and Transformed the Ancient World (New York: Putnam, 1997); J. Jeremias, Jesus and the Message of the New Testament, ed. K. C. Hanson (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); L. T. Johnson, The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); idem, Living Jesus: Learning the Heart of the Gospel (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1999); E. Käsemann, Essays on New Testament Themes, trans. W. J. Montague (London: SCM, 1964); L. E. Keck, A Future for the Historical Jesus: The Place of Jesus in Preaching and Theology (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971); idem, Who Is Jesus? History in Perfect Tense (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); H. C. Kee, Medicine, Miracle, and Magic in New Testament Times (SNTSMS 55; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); C. S. Keener, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Grand Raids: Eerdmans, 2009); C. Keith and L. Hurtado, eds., Jesus Among Friends and Enemies: A Historical and Literary Introduction to Jesus in the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2011); W. H. Kelber and S. Byrskog, Jesus in Memory: Traditions in Oral and Scribal Perspectives (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009); J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth: His Life, Times, and Teaching, trans. H. Danby (London: Allen & Unwin, 1925); W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: History of the Investigation of Its Problems, trans. S. M. Gilmour and H. C. Kee (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972 [1970]); idem, Vierzig Jahre Jesusforschung (1950-1990), ed. H. Merklein (2nd ed.; BBB 91; Weinheim: Beltz Athenäum, 1994); B. F. LeBeau, L. Greenspoon and D. Hamm, eds., The Historical Jesus Through Catholic and Jewish Eyes (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000); G. E. Lessing, Lessing's Theological Writings: Selections in Translation, trans. H. Chadwick (London: A & C Black, 1956); A.-J. Levine, D. C. Allison Jr. and J. D. Crossan, eds., The Historical Jesus in Context (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2006); H. D. A. Major, T. W. Manson and C. J. Wright, The Mission and Message of Jesus: An Exposition of the Gospels in the Light of Modern Research (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1937); T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus: Studies in Its Form and Content (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1931); idem, "The Life of Jesus: Some Tendencies in Present-Day Research," in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: Studies in Honour of C. H. Dodd, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964) 211-20; S. McKnight and J. B. Modica, eds., Who Do My Opponents Say That I Am? An Investigation of the Accusations of the Accusations against Jesus (LNTS 327; London: T & T Clark, 2008); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (4 vols.; New York: Doubleday; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1991-2009); B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979); S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861-1986 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988); J. Neusner, In Search of Talmudic Biography: The Problem of the Attributed Saying (BJS 70; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1984); idem, Why No Gospels in Talmudic Judaism? (BJS 135; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); C. C. Newman, ed., Jesus and the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 1999); B. Pearson, "The Gospel according to the 'Jesus Seminar': On Some Recent Trends in Gospel Research," in The Emergence of the Christian Religion: Essays on Early Christianity (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997) 23-57; N. Perrin and R. B. Hays, eds., Jesus, Paul and the People of God: A Theological Dialogue with N. T. Wright (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2011); S. E. Porter, ed., Handbook to the Exegesis of the New Testament (NTTS 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); idem, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals (JSNTSup 191; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); M. A. Powell, Jesus as a Figure in History: How Modern Historians View the Man from Galilee (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); H. S. Reimarus, Fragments, trans. R. S. Fraser, ed. C. H. Talbert (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970); H. G. Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, History of Biblical Interpretation, 4 vols., trans. L. G. Perdue and J. O. Duke (4 vols.; SBLRBS 50, 61, 62, 63; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2009-2010); J. M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1959); idem, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus and Other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); idem, The Gospel of Jesus: In Search of the Original Good News (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2005); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); idem, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Allen Lane; Penguin Press, 1993); F. Schleiermacher, The Life of Jesus, trans. S. M. Gilmour, ed. J. C. Verheyden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); J. Schröter and R. Brucker, eds., Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung (BZNW 114; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002); A. Schweitzer, The Mystery of the Kingdom of God: The Secret of Jesus' Messiahship and Passion, trans. W. Lowrie (London: A & C Black, 1914); idem, The Problem of the Lord's Supper According to the Scholarly Research of the Nineteenth Century and the Historical Accounts, trans. A. J. Matill Jr., ed. J. Reumann (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1982); The Quest of the Historical Jesus, ed. J. Bowden (1st complete ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001 [1913]); J. Z. Smith, "Good News Is No News: Aretology and the Gospel," in Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults: Studies for Morton Smith at Sixty, ed. J. Neusner (4 vols.; SJLA 12; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1975) 1:21-38; D. F. Strauss, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, trans. G. Eliot, ed. P. C. Hodgson (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); idem, The Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History: A Critique of Schleiermacher's Life of Jesus, trans. L. E. Keck (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); G. Theissen, The Shadow of the Galilean: The Quest of the Historical Jesus in Narrative Form, trans. J. Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress 1987); idem, Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung; Zum 60. Geburtstag von Gerd Theissen, ed. A. Merz (FRLANT 202; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003); G. Theissen and A. Merz,

The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. J. Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); A. C. Thiselton, Hermeneutics: An Introduction (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus (WUNT 2/54; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1993); R. E. Van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament: An Introduction to the Ancient Evidence (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospels (London: Collins, 1973); idem, Jesus in His Jewish Context (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); W. P. Weaver, The Historical Jesus in the Twentieth Century, 1900-1950 (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); J. Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God, trans. R. H. Hiers and D. L. Holland (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); A. Witmer, Jesus, the Galilean Exorcist: His Exorcisms in Social and Political Context (LNTS 459; London: T & T Clark, 2012); W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig (Cambridge: James Clarke, 1971); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (COQG 1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); idem, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996). C. Brown

QUMRAN. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

QUOTATIONS OF OLD TESTAMENT. See OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS.

QUR'AN. See JESUS IN NON-CHRISTIAN SOURCES.

R

RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS

The surviving collections of rabbinic literature are potentially the most rewarding source of information about Jewish life in first century A.D., especially in Judea and to a lesser extent in *Galilee. Although the earliest material consists primarily of legal arguments with very little theology, it tells us a great deal about ordinary life and how Jewish scholars understood the OT. However, the material in these collections spans the first to fifth centuries A.D., and the key to usefully using this material lies in dating individual traditions.

On an initial assessment, the rabbinic material does not appear to be very useful for historical information, but with careful use, it is a valuable resource. All of the surviving rabbinic literature was written after A.D. 200, and those portions that deal with history and theology are the least likely to be accurate. However, the legal debates often can be dated fairly reliably, and they give indications about practices and beliefs in all areas of lifestyle. There is evidence internally and from archeology that this religious lifestyle was widely accepted, and even poor families attempted to follow all but the more onerous rules.

1. Transmission of Rabbinic Traditions
2. Major Rabbinic Collections
3. Dating Early Traditions
4. Insights from Rabbinic Traditions

1. Transmission of Rabbinic Traditions.

Rabbinic literature divides itself into halakah (legal material) and haggadah (everything else). Halakic works (such as Mishnah and Talmud) are organized by legal subject areas such as purity and festivals. Haggadic works (such as Sipra and other midrashim) usually are organized like a commentary on Scripture. Halakic works include haggadic material— anecdotes, expositions of Scripture and sometimes discussions of theology—which are interwoven into the legal discussions. Similarly, haggadic works contain halakic material, especially when discussing books such as Leviticus.

The distinction is important because halakic material is much more reliable for the historian, due to the different ways in which these two types of material have been transmitted. Halakic material originates in the courtroom and academy, so it was learned and transmitted in a very controlled way. Haggadic material probably originated in sermons and table talk, and although its authors may have been the same scholars who crafted the halakic traditions, it was not treated with such seriousness or transmitted with such care. Haggadic material includes stories about rabbis that are particularly unreliable, especially for the first century A.D. It is unlikely that any of these existed, even in oral form, before the middle of the second century A.D., and their tone is so honorific that they should be treated with the same skepticism as Christian hagiography.

Legal traditions, in contrast, were preserved carefully, even when the editors disagreed with their conclusions. Rabbinic law functions like case law, where legal principles depend on previous rulings and debates about them. If a ruling is based on a disagreement with a previous ruling or on an exception to it, then it is important to preserve precise details of that previous ruling in order to understand later arguments.

1.1. Editing of Rabbinic Traditions. Later editing of legal traditions means that we can never be sure that the wording of a tradition is identical to the original. However, there are indications that it was normal to preserve the original wording even when this was in a different language. In early collections such as Mishnah and Tosefta, most of the material is written in mishnaic Hebrew, with occasional quotes of older material in Aramaic. Later collections (such as the Babylonian Talmud) are written in Aramaic, but when they quote the Bible or Mishnah or some other tradition, they preserve the language of the original. For example, when Rabbi Judah b. Illai (A.D. 140-165) quoted the wording for a divorce certificate (m. Git. 9:3), the introduction is in mishnaic Hebrew, but the quotation itself is in Aramaic, and this same Aramaic wording is found in a first-century A.D. divorce certificate preserved at Masada, dated A.D. 72 (Mur. 20).

A large body of early halakic material is found in a series of disputes between the “houses” or “schools” of Hillel and of Shammai, which probably spanned the century before the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70. These are often referred to as the “school disputes” or “house disputes.” For some reason, they were recorded in a relatively nonpartisan way that gave equal weight to the decisions of both schools. We assume that these two groups of Pharisees had a close, though perhaps volatile and competitive, relationship, which caused them to preserve these records as a joint venture. The Shammaites were virtually wiped out during the catastrophe of A.D. 70, and the few surviving rabbis were Hillelites. Therefore, subsequent Judaism was founded on the Hillelite rulings, and these formed the basis of almost all subsequent legal discussions. However, they still preserved both sides of each dispute, and later collections often added the reasoning behind the decisions of both sides. Even these additions are likely to be based on genuine memories of the actual dispute, since the Shammaite reasoning often is stronger than the Hillelite.

The purpose of editing earlier traditions was not to change, but rather to preserve, the original. Legal rulings were abbreviated (as in modern volumes of case law) and given a form that was easy to memorize. It is likely that most of them were transformed into a memorizable form by originators themselves because the legal cases that they won would later become the basis of teaching material for their students, and rabbinic students were expected to memorize their lessons. However, later editing added expansions to these abbreviated versions in order to record both explanations and later developments. Where possible, these expansions were added to the end of traditions, but often they were inserted next to the actual words being expanded.

1.2. An Example of Editing. M. Sheb'it 4:2 concerns the seventh year, when fields could not be cultivated, and any food that happened to grow could be eaten by anyone. The schools of Hillel and Shammai debated about whether one could eat food from a field that someone had illegally improved by plowing it or removing stones during the start of the seventh year. The house dispute has been expanded, but based on the standard form, we can extract the original as follows:

A field that was improved:

The school of Shammai says: They do not eat.

And the school of Hillel says: They do eat.

The school of Shammai says: They do not eat by favor.

And the school of Hillel says: They do eat by favor.

The first three lines show the typical form of a house dispute. It is inscrutable to someone who is new to the subject, and many vital details are missing, including the main subject under discussion, but for a rabbinic pupil, this is a perfect summary. The pupil will already know about the laws of the Sabbath Year in general, and this tells him that if a field had been illegally improved, only the Hillelites allowed you to eat from it; and if the owner illegally harvested the field, the Hillelites allowed you to eat from that harvest, but only so long as the farmer gave it to you as a favor—that is, as a gift. But the Shammaites did not allow you to eat anything from an illegally improved field.

The form of these disputes is fixed and predictable. The schools are always named in the same order in rabbinic literature (first Shammai, then Hillel), so the text that required memorizing was very short. In this case, the ruling was made easier to remember by a play on words between “improved” and “favor,” both of which come from the same root (ṭob). So all they had to memorize was this:

A field that was improved (niṭṭaybâ):

They do not eat.

They do eat.

By favor (bēṭōbâ):

They do not eat.

They do eat.

But the editors of Mishnah obscured this simplicity by expanding it in order to make it more understandable.

A field that was improved:

The school of Shammai says: They do not eat its produce in the seventh year.

And the school of Hillel says: They do eat.

The school of Shammai says: They do not eat produce of the seventh year by favor.

And the school of Hillel says: They do eat by favor and which is not by favor.

The expansions clear up ambiguities. The ruling had been placed next to another one that concerned the year “following the seventh year,” so it became necessary to add the fact that this one concerned the seventh year. There was a potential contradiction between the second ruling and the first, because it might mean that you can only eat by favor (i.e., only what the farmer gives you), while the first ruling implied that you have the right to eat anything from the field. Therefore the phrase “and which is not by favor” was added to confirm that you can eat anything.

Although most editing was designed to make the meaning clear, later editing could also develop new details based on the original. For example, some later rabbis used the word “favor” or “gift” in the Hillelite ruling to justify buying and selling food during the seventh year by saying, “You make me a gift of your produce, and I will make you a gift of this money” (m. Shev. 8:3). Later scholars likewise changed the meaning of “improving a field” from “plowing” to “plowing more than normal” (t. Shev. 3:10). Even though they effectively overturned the earlier law, their later laws relied on the existence of the older law to provide an authoritative foundation, so they had to preserve the older law carefully.

1.3. Oral Transmission. The earliest written collection of rabbinic traditions is the Mishnah, which is dated at about A.D. 200, based on the dates of the latest contributions. Before this time, halakah was transmitted as oral law; mishnah is “that which is repeated”—that is, “oral teaching.” This appears to have been a deliberate choice made in order to distinguish it from the written law of scripture, and from the Sadducees, who recorded their legal traditions in writing (though these have not survived). *Oral transmission was taken very seriously, and it is likely that this was an accurate method of recording material without allowing change. A written text can be edited easily, every time it is rewritten, but it is very difficult to change a memorized text, especially in a community that repeated the text and where people were keen to correct each other.

On many occasions there are debates about the precise wording of a tradition that had been handed down in slightly different forms. For example, there was a dispute about the ruling examined above on the Sabbath Year. Rabbi Judah b. Illai (who taught in the mid-second century A.D.) said that the rulings were the wrong way around.

R. Judah [b. Illai, T4] says: Swap the statements. This [is] from the lenient [rulings] of the school of Shammai and from the severe rulings of the school of Hillel.

The Shammaites normally were more strict, while the Hillelites were known for making laws that were practical and reasonable. So, someone who had guessed which rulings belonged to which school would assume that the way the Mishnah recorded it was correct. But Rabbi Judah says that this is one of the rare situations where the Hillelites were stricter (other such rulings are listed at m. Ed. 4:1–5:5). The fact that such disagreements were recorded tells us that differences did creep in, but it also indicates that these differences were regarded as rare and important, and that the rabbis were keen to preserve the ancient rulings as carefully as possible.

1.4. Early Traditions in Later Collections. In later collections such as the Talmuds there are many supposedly ancient traditions that are not found in any older source. These may be invented either “innocently” as a misremembered tradition or deliberately in order to justify common practice, or they may represent genuinely old traditions. An early halakic tradition in Talmud that dates from Mishnaic times is known as a baraita (“outside”), and these may be attributed to a named individual or, more often, to an anonymous saying introduced by “It was taught” or “Our rabbis taught,” where “taught” is from tanna, the Aramiac equivalent of mishnah, “oral teaching.”

When a tradition was very important, and the origin was lost, there was a lot of pressure to attribute it to an authority venerable enough to justify its introduction and enforcement. Some rulings were attributed to very ancient authorities, such as King Solomon, or to an oral law that had been given to Moses at Sinai. Usually it could be tied to a Scripture text, but when it could not, another authority sometimes was found (e.g., m. Pe'ah 2:6). However, this kind of attribution is rare, and there is evidence that rabbinic attributions were not often invented.

This can be deduced by comparing the supposedly pre-A.D. 70 traditions that were passed on by rabbis in the Yavnian period (A.D. 70–130) with those passed on by rabbis in the Ushan period (A.D. 140–170). The subject areas covered by both sets of traditions are the same, even though these groups had different interests. The rabbis of the first century A.D. were concerned with little more than *table fellowship and cultic purity in home life, and this narrow set of interests is mirrored in the accounts in the Gospels (see Clean and Unclean). (Josephus's portrayal of the *Pharisees as political leaders and manipulators mirrors the time before 25 B.C., after which the Pharisees lost all political influence.) However, by the second century A.D. the rabbis had become the guiding force for the whole nation and were expected to provide answers to questions also about the public life and worship. It would have been very tempting to invent sayings by early respected authorities that answered difficult questions about statecraft and financial matters, but they resisted this (see Neusner 2007).

2. Major Rabbinic Collections.

Most rabbinic literature falls into two classes: legal collections, such as the Mishnah and the Talmuds, which contain mainly halakic (legal) material, and preaching material collected in various midrashim, which contains mainly haggadic (nonlegal) material (for the significance of “halakic” and “haggadic,” see 1 above). The *midrashim are collections of unrelated sayings and sermons arranged usually by the order of the main Scripture text that they deal with, and the collections do not attempt to deal with each verse. The earliest midrashim are called “halakic” because they deal mainly with the books of Exodus through Deuteronomy and especially with the legal material in these books. The Targumim (see Targums) may also come from the same stable as rabbinic material, though probably they have a much broader base. They will not be dealt with here.

There are now good English translations of most of this material: Mishnah by H. Danby (in flowing English) and by J. Neusner (a more literal translation); Tosefta by J. Neusner; Babylonian Talmud by I. Epstein (for Soncino) and by J. Neusner; Jerusalem Talmud by J. Neusner and H. Guggenheimer (incomplete); Midrash Rabbah by H. Freedman and M. Simon (for Soncino); and J. Neusner has translated all the earliest midrashic literature (Neusner 1997-1998). All the halakic collections can be seen in English and Hebrew at <http://RabbinicTraditions.com>.

2.1. Midrashic Collections. A listing of early halakic midrashim, some later haggadic midrashim and some collections of haggadic midrashim may be viewed in Tables 1.

2.2. Halakic Collections. The legal discussions have been preserved in the Talmuds. The Babylonian Talmud and the Palestinian or Jerusalem Talmud preserve debates by rabbis in Babylon and Palestine respectively. Both are edited as commentaries on the Mishnah, which is a collection of rulings made in Palestine before about A.D. 200. The Tosefta is a collection similar to Mishnah, which includes most of the Mishnah traditions (though often in a slightly different form) plus many more details and other rulings. It is edited later than Mishnah, but sometimes it preserves early material that was not included in Mishnah, hence the name, which means something like “supplement.” The purpose of the Tosefta and its relationship to Mishnah are still uncertain.

All of these legal collections are based on the same structure of about sixty tractates collected into six orders, a structure that predates the editing of Mishnah (see Table 3). Not all tractates are covered by all collections, as seen in Table 4.

2.3. Rabbinic Reference Systems. References to halakic rabbinic literature use the abbreviations for tractates with a prefix for the collection referred to. Thus, “m. Ber.” refers to the tractate Berakhot in the Mishnah. Mishnah and Tosefta are referred to by a chapter-and-verse system, though a verse in Mishnah is properly called a “mishnah.” Thus, “m. Ber. 2:1” indicates chapter 2, mishnah 1. The Talmuds also have chapters that usually follow the chapters of Mishnah, but references to the Babylonian Talmud use the folio page numbers, which have remained standard since the first printed edition in the sixteenth century. Thus, “b. Ber. 2a” indicates Babylonian Talmud sheet 2, side A. The Palestinian Talmud is also referred to by folio page numbers, though the standard edition has two columns per side, and these are indicated by A, B, C, D. Additionally, the chapter and verse numbers are cited, which conforms more or less to the corresponding reference in Mishnah (though a “verse” in Jerusalem Talmud and Tosefta is called a “halakah”). Thus, “y. Ber. 1:1, 2a” indicates Palestinian Talmud chapter 1, halakah 1, on sheet 2, column A. Some common variations exist: the letter j is often used instead of y for Jerusalem Talmud; the letters m and b are often omitted from references to Mishnah or Babylonian Talmud, in which case they are distinguished merely by the presence or absence of the folio page number; and the Palestinian Talmud may be cited only by page reference or only chapter plus halakah reference.

References to haggadic collections are more varied. Midrash Rabbah is often indicated simply by the letter R. Thus, “Gen. R. 20:1” refers to Genesis in Midrash Rabbah at the point where Genesis 20:1 is being interpreted. Similarly “Sif.” may be used to indicate Sifra or Sifre, so that “Sif. Lev. 9:1” refers to Sifra where Leviticus 9:1 is discussed. However, midrashim are also referenced by traditional named sections, or with traditional Parashah (chapter) numbers; thus, “Gen. R. 20:1” could also be referenced as “Gen. R. LII,” and “Sif. Lev. 6:1” could be Sifra Shemim I or Sifra XI. These divisions in midrashim, and also in the Talmuds, often are too large to be useful, and J. Neusner has helpfully defined further logical subdivisions in his translations.

Table 1. Midrashic Collections

Early Halakic Midrashim:		(Traditions from 2nd-3rd centuries A.D. though finally edited much later)
Mekilta (de R. Ishmael)	Commentary on Exodus	I
Mekilta de R. Shimeon b. Yohai	Commentary on Exodus (reconstructed from fragments)	A
Sipra	Commentary on Leviticus	A
Sipre	Commentary on Numbers & Commentary on Deuteronomy	I A
Sipre Zuta	Commentary on Numbers	A
Midrash Tanna'im	=Mek.Deut compiled from MHG	I
Megillat Ta'anit	Pre-A.D. 70 list of Fast Days, with a post-Talmudic commentary.
(I = School of Ishmael; A = School of Akiba)
Some Later Haggadic Midrashim:		(All edited after about A.D. 450)
Bereshit Rabbah	Sermonic comments on Genesis
Eykh Rabbah	Sermonic comments on Lamentations
Wayyiqra Rabbah	Sermonic comments on Leviticus
Midrash Rabbah	The above three plus later books covering the rest of the OT.
Pesiqta de Rab Kahana	Sermons for Holy days
Pesiqta Rabbati	Sermons for Holy days
Tanhuma Yelammedenu	Sermons on the Pentateuch
Haggadat Bereshit	Sermons on Genesis
Midrash Tehillim (Shoher Tov)	Sermons on Psalms
Midrash Mishle	Sermonic comments on Proverbs
Some Collections of Haggadic Midrashim:		(Edited after ca. A.D. 1100, including older traditions)
Midrash Hagadol	Large collection of older Midrashim Covering the Pentateuch & 5 Scrolls (Song, Ruth, Lam., Eccl., Esther)
Midrash Leqah Tov	Covering the Pentateuch & 5 Scrolls
Yalqut Hamakiri	Covers much of Prophets & Writings
Yalqut (Shimeon)	Collection of comments on whole OT

Table 2. Early Halakic Works

m	Mishnah	edited about A.D. 200
t	Tosefta	edited about A.D. 300
y	Talmud Yerushalmi or Jerusalem Talmud	edited about A.D. 400
b	Talmud Babli or Babylonian Talmud	edited about A.D. 500

Table 3. The Six Orders of Tractates

I	Zera'im	Seeds, i.e. agriculture	found in
Ber.	Berakhot	"Blessings" - Prayers	m t b y
Pe'ah	Pe'ah	"Corner" of the field and other poor tax	m t y
Demai	Demai	"Doubtful" tithe, and how to tithe	m t y
Kil.	Kil'ayim	"Mixtures" which are unlawful	m t y
Shev.	Shevi'it	"Seventh Year" rest for farm land	m t y
Ter.	Terumat	"Elevation Offerings" for priests to eat	m t y
Ma'as.	Ma'aserot (Ma'aser Rishon)	"Tithes" ("First Tithe" – in Tosepta)	m t y
Ma'as. Sh.	Ma'asher Sheni	"Second Tithe" spent in Jerusalem	m t y
Hal.	Hallah	"Cake" of Dough Offering	m t y
Or.	Orlah	Forefruit (lit. "foreskin") of young trees	m t y
Bik.	Bikkurim	"Firstfruits"	m t y
II	Mo'ed	Festivals	found in
Shabb.	Shabbat	"Sabbath" Day rest from work	m t b y
Eruv.	Eruvin	"Communities" marked for Sabbath limit	m t b y
Pesah.	Pesahim (Pisahim)	"Passover" (different vowels in Tosepta)	m t b y
Sheqal.	Sheqalim	Half "Shekels" for temple tax	m t y
Yoma	Yoma (Yom Hakippurim)	"The Day" of Atonement ("The Day of Atonement" – in Tosepta)	m t b y
Sukkah	Sukkah	"Booths" (i.e., Festival of Tabernacles)	m t b y
Betzah	Betzah (Yom Tov)	"Egg" and other Holy Day regulations ("Holy Day" – in Tosephta)	m t b y
Rosh Hash.	Rosh HaShanah	"New Year"	m t b y
Ta'an.	Ta'anit	"Fasting"	m t b y
Meg.	Megillah	"Scroll" of Esther at Purim	m t b y
Mo'ed Qat.	Mo'ed Qatan	"Lesser Festivals"	m t b y
Hag.	Hagigah (Ri'iyah)	"Festival Offering" ("Appearance" – in Tosepta)	m t b y
III	Nashim	Women	found in
Yevam.	Yevamot	"Sisters-in-law" in Levirate marriage	m t b y
Ketub.	Ketubbot	"Marriage contracts"	m t b y
Ned.	Nedarim	"Vows"	m t b y
Naz.	Nazir (Nezirut)	"Nazirite" vow (Abstinence – in Tosephta)	m t b y
Sot.	Sotah	"Suspected adulteress"	m t b y
Git.	Gittin	"Divorce Certificates"	m t b y
Qidd.	Qiddushin	"Betrothal"	m t b y

IV	Neziqin	Damages, i.e. litigation	found in
B. Qam.	Bava Qamma	"First gate" - Damages & compensation	m t b y
B. Mesi'a	Bava Metzi'a	"Middle gate" - Profits and wages	m t b y
B. Bat.	Baba Batra	"Last gate" - Property and inheritance	m t b y
Sanh.	Sanhedrin	"Sanhedrin" court	m t b y
Mak.	Makkot	"Stripes" and other punishment	m t b y
Shev.	Shevu'ot	"Oaths"	m t b y
Ed.	Eduyyot	"Testimonies" about early teaching	m t
Avod.	Avodah	"Idolatry"	m t b y
Zar.	Zarah
Avot	[Pirqe] Avot	"[Sayings of] the Fathers"	m
Hor.	Horayot	Erroneous "Decisions"	m t b y
V	Qodashim	Holy Things, i.e. Offerings	found in
Zevah.	Zevahim	"Sacrificial Victims"	m t b
Menah.	Menahot	"Meal Offerings"	m t b
Hul.	Hullin	"Profane things"	m t b
Bekh.	Bekhorot	"Firstborn"	m t b
Arakh.	Arakhin	"Assessments" of value for vows	m t b
Tem.	Temurah	"Exchange" for offerings	m t b
Ker.	Keritot	"Extirpations" from Israel	m t b
Me'il.	Me'ilah	"Misuse" of consecrated things	m t b
Tamid	Tamid	"Daily Burnt Offering"	m b
Mid.	Middot	"Measures" of Temple and furnishings	m
Qinnim	Qinnim	"Birds Nests" bird offerings	m
VI	Teharot	Purities	found in
Kel.	Kelim	"Utensils"	m t
(Divided into three in Tosepta, like the start of Neziqin : t.KBQ, t.KBB & t.KBM)
Ohal.	Ohalot	Under "roofs" with a corpse.	m t
Neg.	Nega'im	"Plagues" of leprosy	m t
Parah	Parah	Red "Heifer"	m t
Tehar.	Teharot	Im-"purities"	m t
Miqw.	Miqwa'ot	"Immersion pools"	m t
Nid.	Niddah	Menstrual "Isolation"	m t b y
Makhsh.	Makhshirin	"Predisposition" to defilement	m t
Zav.	Zavim	Impure "Discharges"	m t
T.Yom.	Tevul Yom	"Bathed same day" for cleansing	m t
Yad.	Yadayim	Washing of "Hands"	m t
Uq.	Uqtzin	Impurity from plant "Stalks"	m t

3. Dating Early Traditions.

